VLADIMIR [startled from his inspection of the sky] A knook?

POZZO That was nearly sixty years ago . . . [he consults his watch] . . . yes, nearly sixty. [Drawing himself up proudly.] You wouldn't think it to look at me, would you? Compared to him I look like a young man, no? [Pause.] Hat! [LUCKY puts down the basket and takes off his hat. His long white hair falls about his face. He puts his hat under his arm and picks up the basket.] Now look. [*POZZO takes off his hat.*⁵ He is completely bald. He puts on his hat again.] Did you see?

VLADIMIR And now you turn him away? Such an old and faithful servant!

ESTRAGON Swine!

[POZZO more and more agitated.]

VLADIMIR After having sucked all the good out of him you chuck him away like a . . . like a banana skin. Really . . .

POZZO [groaning, clutching his head] I can't bear it . . . any longer . . . the way he goes on . . . you've no idea . . . it's terrible . . . he must go . . . [he waves his arms] . . . I'm going mad . . . [he collapses, his head in his hands] . . . I can't bear it . . . any longer . . .

[Silence. All look at POZZO.]

VLADIMIR He can't bear it.

ESTRAGON Any longer.

VLADIMIR He's going mad.

ESTRAGON It's terrible.

VLADIMIR [to LUCKY] How dare you! It's abominable! Such a good master! Crucify him like that! After so many years! Really!

POZZO [sobbing] He used to be so kind . . . so helpful . . . and entertaining . . . my good angel . . . and now . . . he's killing me.

ESTRAGON [to VLADIMIR] Does he want to replace him?

VLADIMIR What?

ESTRAGON Does he want someone to take his place or not?

VLADIMIR I don't think so.

ESTRAGON What?

VLADIMIR I don't know.

ESTRAGON Ask him.

POZZO [calmer] Gentlemen, I don't know what came over me. Forgive me. Forget all I said. [More and more his old self.] I don't remember exactly what it was, but you may be sure there wasn't a word of truth in it. [Drawing himself up, striking his chest.] Do I look like a man that can be made to suffer? Frankly? [He rummages in his pockets.] What have I done with my pipe?

VLADIMIR Charming evening we're having.

ESTRAGON Unforgettable.

VLADIMIR And it's not over.

ESTRAGON Apparently not.

VLADIMIR It's only beginning.

ESTRAGON It's awful.

VLADIMIR Worse than the pantomime.⁶

ESTRAGON The circus.

VLADIMIR The music-hall.⁷

ESTRAGON The circus.

POZZO What can I have done with that briar?

ESTRAGON He's a scream. He's lost his dudeen.⁸ [Laughs noisily.]

VLADIMIR I'll be back. [He hastens towards the wings.]

ESTRAGON End of the corridor, on the left.

VLADIMIR Keep my seat. [Exit VLADIMIR.]

POZZO [on the point of tears] I've lost my Kapp and Peterson!⁹

ESTRAGON [convulsed with merriment] He'll be the death of me!

POZZO You didn't see by any chance—. [He misses VLADIMIR.]

Oh! He's gone! Without saying goodbye! How could he! He might have waited!

ESTRAGON He would have burst.

POZZO Oh! [Pause.] Oh well then of course in that case . . .

ESTRAGON Come here.

POZZO What for?

ESTRAGON You'll see.

POZZO You want me to get up?

ESTRAGON Quick! [POZZO gets up and goes over beside ESTRAGON.

ESTRAGON points off.] Look!

POZZO [having put on his glasses] Oh I say!

ESTRAGON It's all over.

[Enter VLADIMIR, somber. He shoulders LUCKY out of his way, kicks over the stool, comes and goes agitatedly.]

POZZO He's not pleased.

ESTRAGON [to VLADIMIR] You missed a treat. Pity.

[VLADIMIR halts, straightens the stool, comes and goes, calmer.]

POZZO He subsides. [Looking round.] Indeed all subsides. A great calm descends. [Raising his hand.] Listen! Pan sleeps.¹

VLADIMIR Will night never come?

[All three look at the sky.]

POZZO You don't feel like going until it does?

ESTRAGON Well you see—

POZZO Why it's very natural, very natural. I myself in your situation, if I had an appointment with a Godin . . . Godet . . . Godot . . . anyhow you see who I mean, I'd wait till it was black night before I gave up. [He looks at the stool.] I'd very much like to sit down, but I don't quite know how to go about it.

ESTRAGON Could I be of any help?

POZZO If you asked me perhaps.

ESTRAGON What?

POZZO If you asked me to sit down.

ESTRAGON Would that be a help?

POZZO I fancy so.

ESTRAGON Here we go. Be seated, Sir, I beg of you.

POZZO No no, I wouldn't think of it! [Pause. Aside.] Ask me again.

ESTRAGON Come come, take a seat I beseech you, you'll get pneumonia.

POZZO You really think so?

ESTRAGON Why it's absolutely certain.

POZZO No doubt you are right. [He sits down.] Done it again! [Pause.] Thank you, dear fellow. [He consults his watch.] But I must really be getting along, if I am to observe my schedule.

VLADIMIR Time has stopped.

POZZO [cuddling his watch to his ear] Don't you believe it, Sir, don't you believe it. [He puts his watch back in his pocket.] Whatever you like, but not that.

ESTRAGON [to POZZO] Everything seems black to him today.

POZZO Except the firmament.² [He laughs, pleased with this witticism.] But I see what it is, you are not from these parts, you don't know what our twilights can do. Shall I tell you? [Silence. ESTRAGON is fiddling with his boot again, VLADIMIR with his hat.] I can't refuse you. [Vaporizer.] A little attention, if you please. [VLADIMIR and ESTRAGON continue their fiddling, LUCKY is half asleep. POZZO cracks his whip feebly.] What's the matter with this whip? [He gets up and cracks it more vigorously, finally with success. LUCKY jumps. VLADIMIR's hat, ESTRAGON's boot, LUCKY's hat, fall to the ground. POZZO throws down the whip.] Worn out, this whip. [He looks at VLADIMIR and ESTRAGON.] What was I saying?

VLADIMIR Let's go.

ESTRAGON But take the weight off your feet, I implore you, you'll catch your death.

POZZO True. [He sits down. To ESTRAGON.] What is your name?

ESTRAGON Adam.

POZZO [who hasn't listened] Ah yes! The night. [He raises his head.] But be a little more attentive, for pity's sake, otherwise we'll never get anywhere. [He looks at the sky.] Look! [All look at the sky except LUCKY who is dozing off again. POZZO jerks the rope.] Will you look at the sky, pig! [LUCKY looks at the sky.] Good, that's enough. [They stop looking at the sky.] What is there so extraordinary about it? Qua sky.³ It is pale and luminous like any sky at this hour of the day. [Pause.] In these latitudes. [Pause.] When the weather is fine. [Lyrical.] An hour ago [he looks at his watch, prosaic] roughly [lyrical] after having poured forth even since [he hesitates, prosaic] say ten o'clock in the morning [lyrical] tirelessly torrents of red and white light it begins to lose its effulgence, to grow pale [gesture of the two hands lapsing by stages] pale, ever a little paler, a little paler until [dramatic pause, ample gesture of the two hands flung wide apart] pppfff! finished! it comes to rest. But—[hand raised in admonition—but behind this veil of gentleness and peace night is charging [vibrantly] and will burst upon us [snaps his fingers.] pop! like that! [His inspiration leaves him.] just when we least expect it. [Silence. Gloomily.] That's how it is on this bitch of an earth.

[Long silence.]

ESTRAGON So long as one knows.

VLADIMIR One can bide one's time.

ESTRAGON One knows what to expect.

VLADIMIR No further need to worry.

ESTRAGON Simply wait.

VLADIMIR We're used to it. [He picks up his hat, peers inside it, shakes it, puts it on.]

POZZO How did you find me? [VLADIMIR and ESTRAGON look at him blankly.] Good? Fair? Middling? Poor? Positively bad?

VLADIMIR [first to understand] Oh very good, very very good.

POZZO [to ESTRAGON] And you, Sir?

ESTRAGON Oh tray bong, tray tray tray bong.⁴

POZZO [fervently] Bless you, gentlemen, bless you! [Pause.] I have such need of encouragement! [Pause.] I weakened a little towards the end, you didn't notice?

VLADIMIR Oh perhaps just a teeny weeny little bit.

ESTRAGON I thought it was intentional.

POZZO You see my memory is defective.

[Silence.]

ESTRAGON In the meantime nothing happens.

POZZO You find it tedious?

ESTRAGON Somewhat.

POZZO [to VLADIMIR] And you, Sir?

VLADIMIR I've been better entertained.

[Silence. POZZO struggles inwardly.]

POZZO Gentlemen, you have been . . . civil to me.

ESTRAGON Not at all!

VLADIMIR What an idea!

POZZO Yes yes, you have been correct. So that I ask myself is there anything I can do in my turn for these honest fellows who are having such a dull, dull time.

ESTRAGON Even ten francs⁵ would be a help.

VLADIMIR We are not beggars!

POZZO Is there anything I can do, that's what I ask myself, to cheer them up? I have given them bones, I have talked to them about this and that, I have explained the twilight, admittedly. But is it enough, that's what tortures me, is it enough?

ESTRAGON Even five.

VLADIMIR [to ESTRAGON, indignantly] That's enough!

ESTRAGON I couldn't accept less.

POZZO Is it enough? No doubt. But I am liberal. It's my nature.

This evening. So much the worse for me. [He jerks the rope.

LUCKY looks at him.] For I shall suffer, no doubt about that.

[He picks up the whip.] What do you prefer? Shall we have him dance, or sing, or recite, or think, or—

ESTRAGON Who?

POZZO Who! You know how to think, you two?

VLADIMIR He thinks?

POZZO Certainly. Aloud. He even used to think very prettily once, I could listen to him for hours. Now . . . [He shudders.] So much the worse for me. Well, would you like him to think something for us?

ESTRAGON I'd rather he'd dance, it'd be more fun.

POZZO Not necessarily.

ESTRAGON Wouldn't it, Didi, be more fun?

VLADIMIR I'd like well to hear him think.

ESTRAGON Perhaps he could dance first and think afterwards, if it isn't too much to ask him.

VLADIMIR [to POZZO] Would that be possible?

POZZO By all means, nothing simpler. It's the natural order. [He laughs briefly.]

VLADIMIR Then let him dance.

[Silence.]

POZZO Do you hear, hog?

ESTRAGON He never refuses?

POZZO He refused once. [Silence.] Dance, misery!

[LUCKY puts down bag and basket, advances towards front, turns to POZZO. LUCKY dances. He stops.]

ESTRAGON Is that all?

POZZO Encore!

[LUCKY executes the same movements, stops.]

ESTRAGON Pooh! I'd do as well myself. [He imitates LUCKY, almost falls.] With a little practice.

POZZO He used to dance the farandole, the fling, the brawl, the jig, the fandango and even the hornpipe.⁶ He capered. For joy. Now that's the best he can do. Do you know what he calls it?

ESTRAGON The Scapegoat's Agony.

VLADIMIR The Hard Stool.

POZZO The Net. He thinks he's entangled in a net.

VLADIMIR [squirming like an aesthete] There's something about it . . .

[LUCKY makes to return to his burdens.]

POZZO Woaa!

[LUCKY stiffens.]

ESTRAGON Tell us about the time he refused.

POZZO With pleasure, with pleasure. [He fumbles in his pockets.] Wait. [He fumbles.] What have I done with my spray? [He fumbles.] Well now isn't that . . . [He looks up, consternation on his features. Faintly.] I can't find my pulverizer!⁷

ESTRAGON [faintly] My left lung is very weak! [He coughs feebly. In ringing tones.] But my right lung is as sound as a bell!

POZZO [normal voice] No matter! What was I saying. [He ponders.] Wait.

[Ponders.] Well now isn't that . . . [He raises his head.]

Help me!

ESTRAGON Wait!

VLADIMIR Wait!

POZZO Wait!

[All three take off their hats simultaneously, press their hands to their foreheads, concentrate.]

ESTRAGON [triumphantly] Ah!

VLADIMIR He has it.

POZZO [impatient] Well?

ESTRAGON Why doesn't he put down his bags?

VLADIMIR Rubbish!

POZZO Are you sure?

VLADIMIR Damn it haven't you already told us?

POZZO I've already told you?

ESTRAGON He's already told us?

VLADIMIR Anyway he has put them down.

ESTRAGON [glance at LUCKY] So he has. And what of it?

VLADIMIR Since he has put down his bags it is impossible we should have asked why he does not do so.

POZZO Stoutly reasoned!

ESTRAGON And why has he put them down?

POZZO Answer us that.

VLADIMIR In order to dance.

ESTRAGON True!

POZZO True!

[Silence. They put on their hats.]

ESTRAGON Nothing happens, nobody comes, nobody goes, it's awful!

VLADIMIR [to POZZO] Tell him to think.

POZZO Give him his hat.

VLADIMIR His hat?

POZZO He can't think without his hat.

VLADIMIR [to ESTRAGON] Give him his hat.

ESTRAGON Me! After what he did to me! Never!

VLADIMIR I'll give it to him. [He does not move.]

ESTRAGON [to POZZO] Tell him to go and fetch it.

POZZO It's better to give it to him.

VLADIMIR I'll give it to him.

[He picks up the hat and tenders it at arm's length to LUCKY, who does not move.]

POZZO You must put it on his head.

ESTRAGON [to POZZO] Tell him to take it.

POZZO It's better to put it on his head.

VLADIMIR I'll put it on his head.

[He goes round behind LUCKY, approaches him cautiously, puts the hat on his head and recoils smartly. LUCKY does not move. Silence.]

ESTRAGON What's he waiting for?

POZZO Stand back! [VLADIMIR and ESTRAGON move away from LUCKY. POZZO jerks the rope, LUCKY looks at POZZO.] Think, pig! [Pause. LUCKY begins to dance.] Stop! [LUCKY stops.] Forward! [LUCKY advances.] Stop! [LUCKY stops.] Think! [Silence.]

LUCKY On the other hand with regard to—

POZZO Stop! [LUCKY stops.] Back! [LUCKY moves back.] Stop!
[LUCKY stops.] Turn! [LUCKY turns towards auditorium.] Think!

LUCKY Given the existence as uttered forth in the public, works of Puncher and Wattmann⁸ of a personal God quaquaquaqu⁹ with white beard quaquaquaqu outside time without extension who from the heights of divine apathia divine athambia divine aphasia¹ loves us dearly with some exceptions for reasons unknown but time will tell and

[VLADIMIR and ESTRAGON all attention, POZZO dejected and disgusted.] suffers like the divine Miranda² with those who for reasons unknown but time will tell are plunged in torment plunged in fire whose fire flames if that continues and who can doubt it will fire the firmament that is to say blast hell to heaven so blue still and calm so calm with a calm which even though intermittent is better than nothing but not so fast and considering what is more that as a result of the labors left unfinished crowned by the Acacacademy of Anthropopopometry of Essy-in-Possy of Testew and ³ of Testew and Cunard⁴ it is established beyond all doubt all other doubt

[VLADIMIR and ESTRAGON begin to protest, POZZO's sufferings increase.] than that which clings to the labors of men that as a result of the labors unfinished of Testew and Cunard it is established as hereinafter but not so fast for reasons unknown that as a result of the public works of Puncher and Wattmann it is established beyond all doubt that in view of the labors of Fartov and Belcher⁵ left unfinished for reasons unknown of Testew and Cunard left unfinished it is established what many deny that man in Possy of Testew and Cunard that man in Essy that man in short that man in brief in spite of the strides of alimentation⁶ and defecation wastes and pines wastes and pines and

[VLADIMIR and ESTRAGON attentive again, POZZO more and more agitated and groaning.] concurrently simultaneously what is more for reasons unknown in spite of the strides of physical culture the practice of sports such as tennis football running cycling swimming flying floating riding gliding conating camogie⁷ skating tennis of all kinds dying flying sports of all sorts autumn summer winter winter tennis of all kinds hockey of all sorts penicillin and succedanea⁸ in a word I resume flying gliding golf over nine and eighteen holes tennis of all sorts in a word for reasons unknown in Feckham Peckham Fulham Clapham⁹ namely concurrently simultaneously what is more for reasons unknown but time will tell fades away I resume Fulham Clapham in a word the dead loss per head since the death of Bishop Berkeley¹ being to the tune of one inch four ounce per head approximately by and large more or less to the nearest

[VLADIMIR and ESTRAGON protest violently. POZZO jumps up, pulls on the rope. General outcry. LUCKY pulls on the rope, staggers, shouts his text. All three throw themselves on LUCKY who struggles and shouts his text.] decimal good measure round figures stark naked in the stockinged feet in Connemara² in a word for reasons unknown no matter what matter the facts are there and considering what is more much more grave that in the light of the labors lost of Steinweg and Peterman³ it appears what is more much more grave that in the light the light the light of the labors lost of Steinweg and Peterman that in the plains in the mountains by the seas by the rivers running water running fire the air is the same and then the earth namely the air and then the earth in the great cold the great dark the air and the earth abode of stones in the great cold alas alas in the year of their Lord six hundred and something the air the earth the sea the earth abode of stones in the great deeps the great cold on sea on land and in the air I resume for reasons unknown in spite of the tennis the facts are there but time will tell I resume alas alas on on in short in fine on on abode of stones who can doubt it I resume but not so fast I resume the skull fading fading fading and concurrently simultaneously what is more for reasons unknown in spite of the tennis on on the beard the flames the tears the stones so blue so calm alas alas on on the skull the skull the skull the skull in Connemara in spite of the tennis the labors abandoned left unfinished graver still abode of stones in a word I resume alas alas abandoned unfinished the skull the skull in Connemara in spite of the tennis the skull alas the stones Cunard [mêlée, final vociferations] tennis . . . the stones . . . so calm . . . Cunard . . . unfinished . . .

POZZO His hat!

[VLADIMIR seizes LUCKY's hat. Silence of LUCKY. He falls.
Silence. Panting of the victors.]

ESTRAGON Avenged!

[VLADIMIR examines the hat, peers inside it.]

POZZO Give me that! [He snatches the hat from VLADIMIR, throws it on the ground, tramples on it.] There's an end to his thinking!

VLADIMIR But will he be able to walk?

POZZO Walk or crawl! [He kicks LUCKY.] Up pig!

ESTRAGON Perhaps he's dead.

VLADIMIR You'll kill him.

POZZO Up scum! [He jerks the rope.] Help me!

VLADIMIR How?

POZZO Raise him up!

[VLADIMIR and ESTRAGON hoist LUCKY to his feet, support him an instant, then let him go. He falls.]

ESTRAGON He's doing it on purpose!

POZZO You must hold him. [Pause.] Come on, come on, raise him up.

ESTRAGON To hell with him!

VLADIMIR Come on, once more.

ESTRAGON What does he take us for?

[They raise LUCKY, hold him up.]

POZZO Don't let him go! [VLADIMIR and ESTRAGON totter.] Don't move!

POZZO [fetches bag and basket and brings them towards LUCKY.]
Hold him tight! [He puts the bag in LUCKY's hand. LUCKY drops it immediately.] Don't let him go! [He puts back the bag in LUCKY's hand. Gradually, at the feel of the bag, LUCKY recovers his senses and his fingers finally close round the handle.] Hold him tight! [As before with basket.] Now! You can let him go. [VLADIMIR and ESTRAGON move away from LUCKY who totters, reels, sags, but succeeds in remaining on his feet, bag and basket in his hands. POZZO steps back, cracks his whip.] Forward! [LUCKY totters forward.] Back! [LUCKY totters back.] Turn! [LUCKY turns.] Done it! He can walk. [Turning to VLADIMIR and ESTRAGON.] Thank you, gentlemen, and let me . . . [he fumbles in his pockets] . . . let me wish you . . . [fumbles.] . . . wish you . . . [fumbles.] . . . what have I done with my watch? [fumbles.] A genuine half-hunter, gentlemen, with deadbeat escapement!⁴ [Sobbing.] Twas my granpa gave it to me! [He searches on the ground, VLADIMIR and ESTRAGON likewise. POZZO turns over with his foot the remains of LUCKY's hat.] Well now isn't that just—

VLADIMIR Perhaps it's in your fob.⁵

POZZO Wait! [He doubles up in an attempt to apply his ear to his stomach, listens. Silence.] I hear nothing. [He beckons them to approach, VLADIMIR and ESTRAGON go over to him, bend over his stomach.] Surely one should hear the tick-tick.

VLADIMIR Silence!

[All listen, bent double.]

ESTRAGON I hear something.

POZZO Where?

VLADIMIR It's the heart.

POZZO [disappointed] Damnation!

VLADIMIR Silence!

ESTRAGON Perhaps it has stopped.

[They straighten up.]

POZZO Which of you smells so bad?

ESTRAGON He has stinking breath and I have stinking feet.

POZZO I must go.

ESTRAGON And your half-hunter?

POZZO I must have left it at the manor.

[Silence.]

ESTRAGON Then adieu.

POZZO Adieu.

VLADIMIR Adieu.

POZZO Adieu.

[Silence. No one moves.]

VLADIMIR Adieu.

POZZO Adieu.

ESTRAGON Adieu.

[Silence.]

POZZO And thank you.

VLADIMIR Thank you.

POZZO Not at all.

ESTRAGON Yes yes.

POZZO No no.

VLADIMIR Yes yes.

ESTRAGON No no.

[Silence.]

POZZO I don't seem to be able . . . [long hesitation] . . . to depart.

ESTRAGON Such is life.

[POZZO turns, moves away from LUCKY towards the wings, paying out the rope as he goes.]

VLADIMIR You're going the wrong way.

POZZO I need a running start. [Having come to the end of the rope, i.e. off stage, he stops, turns and cries.] Stand back!

[VLADIMIR and ESTRAGON stand back, look towards POZZO. Crack of whip.] On! On!

ESTRAGON On!

VLADIMIR On!

[LUCKY moves off.]

POZZO Faster! [He appears, crosses the stage preceded by LUCKY. VLADIMIR and ESTRAGON wave their hats. Exit LUCKY.] On! On! [On the point of disappearing in his turn he stops and turns. The rope tautens. Noise of LUCKY falling off.] Stool!

[VLADIMIR fetches stool and gives it to POZZO who throws it to LUCKY.] Adieu!

VLADIMIR

ESTRAGON

} [waving] Adieu! Adieu!

POZZO Up! Pig! [Noise of LUCKY getting up.] On! [Exit POZZO.]

Faster! On! Adieu! Pig! Yip! Adieu!

[Long silence.]

VLADIMIR That passed the time.

ESTRAGON It would have passed in any case.

VLADIMIR Yes, but not so rapidly.

[Pause.]

ESTRAGON What do we do now?

VLADIMIR I don't know.

ESTRAGON Let's go.

VLADIMIR We can't.

ESTRAGON Why not?

VLADIMIR We're waiting for Godot.

ESTRAGON [despairingly] Ah!

[Pause.]

VLADIMIR How they've changed!

ESTRAGON Who?

VLADIMIR Those two.

ESTRAGON That's the idea, let's make a little conversation.

VLADIMIR Haven't they?

ESTRAGON What?

VLADIMIR Changed.

ESTRAGON Very likely. They all change. Only we can't.

VLADIMIR Likely! It's certain. Didn't you see them?

ESTRAGON I suppose I did. But I don't know them.

VLADIMIR Yes you do know them.

ESTRAGON No I don't know them.

VLADIMIR We know them, I tell you. You forget everything.

[Pause. To himself.] Unless they're not the same . . .

ESTRAGON Why didn't they recognize us then?

VLADIMIR That means nothing. I too pretended not to recognize them. And then nobody ever recognizes us.

ESTRAGON Forget it. What we need—ow! [VLADIMIR does not react.] Ow!

VLADIMIR [to himself] Unless they're not the same . . .

ESTRAGON Didi! It's the other foot! [He goes hobbling towards the mound.]

VLADIMIR Unless they're not the same . . .

BOY [off] Mister!

[ESTRAGON halts. Both look towards the voice.]

ESTRAGON Off we go again.

VLADIMIR Approach, my child.

[Enter BOY, timidly. He halts.]

BOY Mister Albert . . . ?

VLADIMIR Yes.

ESTRAGON What do you want?

VLADIMIR Approach!

[The BOY does not move.]

ESTRAGON [forcibly] Approach when you're told, can't you?

[The BOY advances timidly, halts.]

VLADIMIR What is it?

BOY Mr. Godot . . .

VLADIMIR Obviously . . . [Pause.] Approach.

ESTRAGON [violently] Will you approach! [The BOY advances timidly.] What kept you so late?

VLADIMIR You have a message from Mr. Godot?

BOY Yes Sir.

VLADIMIR Well, what is it?

ESTRAGON What kept you so late?

[The BOY looks at them in turn, not knowing to which he should reply.]

VLADIMIR [to ESTRAGON] Let him alone.

ESTRAGON [violently] You let me alone. [Advancing, to the BOY.] Do you know what time it is?

BOY [recoiling] It's not my fault, Sir.

ESTRAGON And whose is it? Mine?

BOY I was afraid, Sir.

ESTRAGON Afraid of what? Of us? [Pause.] Answer me!

VLADIMIR I know what it is, he was afraid of the others.

ESTRAGON How long have you been here?

BOY A good while, Sir.

VLADIMIR You were afraid of the whip?

BOY Yes Sir.

VLADIMIR The roars?

BOY Yes Sir.

VLADIMIR The two big men.

BOY Yes Sir.

VLADIMIR Do you know them?

BOY No Sir.

VLADIMIR Are you a native of these parts? [Silence.] Do you belong to these parts?

BOY Yes Sir.

ESTRAGON That's all a pack of lies. [Shaking the BOY by the arm.] Tell us the truth!

BOY [trembling] But it is the truth, Sir!

VLADIMIR Will you let him alone! What's the matter with you?

[ESTRAGON releases the BOY, moves away, covering his face with his hands. VLADIMIR and the BOY observe him. ESTRAGON drops his hands. His face is convulsed.] What's the matter with you?

ESTRAGON I'm unhappy.

VLADIMIR Not really! Since when?

ESTRAGON I'd forgotten.

VLADIMIR Extraordinary the tricks that memory plays!

[ESTRAGON tries to speak, renounces, limps to his place, sits down and begins to take off his boots. To BOY]

Well?

BOY Mr. Godot—

VLADIMIR I've seen you before, haven't I?

BOY I don't know, Sir.

VLADIMIR You don't know me?

BOY No Sir.

VLADIMIR It wasn't you came yesterday?

BOY No Sir.

VLADIMIR This is your first time?

BOY Yes Sir.

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR Words words. [Pause.] Speak.

BOY [in a rush] Mr. Godot told me to tell you he won't come this evening but surely tomorrow.

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR Is that all?

BOY Yes Sir.

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR You work for Mr. Godot?

BOY Yes Sir.

VLADIMIR What do you do?

BOY I mind the goats, Sir.

VLADIMIR Is he good to you?

BOY Yes Sir.

VLADIMIR He doesn't beat you?

BOY No Sir, not me.

VLADIMIR Whom does he beat?

BOY He beats my brother, Sir.

VLADIMIR Ah, you have a brother?

BOY Yes Sir.

VLADIMIR What does he do?

BOY He minds the sheep, Sir.⁶

VLADIMIR And why doesn't he beat you?

BOY I don't know, Sir.

VLADIMIR He must be fond of you.

BOY I don't know, Sir.

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR Does he give you enough to eat? [The BOY hesitates.]
Does he feed you well?

BOY Fairly well, Sir.

VLADIMIR You're not unhappy? [The BOY hesitates.] Do you hear me?

BOY Yes Sir.

VLADIMIR Well?

BOY I don't know, Sir.

VLADIMIR You don't know if you're unhappy or not?

BOY No Sir.

VLADIMIR You're as bad as myself. [Silence.] Where do you sleep?

BOY In the loft, Sir.

VLADIMIR With your brother?

BOY Yes Sir.

VLADIMIR In the hay?

BOY Yes Sir.

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR All right, you may go.

BOY What am I to tell Mr. Godot, Sir?

VLADIMIR Tell him . . . [he hesitates.] . . . tell him you saw us. [Pause.] You did see us, didn't you?

BOY Yes Sir.

[He steps back, hesitates, turns and exits running. The light suddenly fails. In a moment it is night. The moon rises at back, mounts in the sky, stands still, shedding a pale light on the scene.]

VLADIMIR At last! [ESTRAGON gets up and goes towards VLADIMIR, a boot in each hand. He puts them down at edge of stage, straightens and contemplates the moon.] What are you doing?

ESTRAGON Pale for weariness.

VLADIMIR Eh?

ESTRAGON Of climbing heaven and gazing on the likes of us.

VLADIMIR Your boots, what are you doing with your boots?

ESTRAGON [turning to look at the boots] I'm leaving them there. [Pause.] Another will come, just as . . . as . . . as me, but with smaller feet, and they'll make him happy.

VLADIMIR But you can't go barefoot!

ESTRAGON Christ did.

VLADIMIR Christ! What has Christ got to do with it? You're not going to compare yourself to Christ!

ESTRAGON All my life I've compared myself to him.

VLADIMIR But where he lived it was warm, it was dry!

ESTRAGON Yes. And they crucified quick.

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR We've nothing more to do here.

ESTRAGON Nor anywhere else.

VLADIMIR Ah Gogo, don't go on like that. Tomorrow everything will be better.

ESTRAGON How do you make that out?

VLADIMIR Did you not hear what the child said?

ESTRAGON No.

VLADIMIR He said that Godot was sure to come tomorrow.

[Pause.] What do you say to that?

ESTRAGON Then all we have to do is to wait on here.

VLADIMIR Are you mad? We must take cover. [He takes

ESTRAGON by the arm.] Come on.

[He draws ESTRAGON after him. ESTRAGON yields, then resists. They halt.]

ESTRAGON [looking at the tree] Pity we haven't got a bit of rope.

VLADIMIR Come on. It's cold.

[He draws ESTRAGON after him. As before.]

ESTRAGON Remind me to bring a bit of rope tomorrow.

VLADIMIR Yes. Come on.

[He draws him after him. As before.]

ESTRAGON How long have we been together all the time now?

VLADIMIR I don't know. Fifty years maybe.

ESTRAGON Do you remember the day I threw myself into the Rhône?²

VLADIMIR We were grape harvesting.

ESTRAGON You fished me out.

VLADIMIR That's all dead and buried.

ESTRAGON My clothes dried in the sun.

VLADIMIR There's no good harking back on that. Come on.
 [He draws him after him. As before.]

ESTRAGON Wait!

VLADIMIR I'm cold!

ESTRAGON Wait! [He moves away from VLADIMIR.] I sometimes wonder if we wouldn't have been better off alone, each one for himself. [He crosses the stage and sits down on the mound.] We weren't made for the same road.

VLADIMIR [without anger] It's not certain.

ESTRAGON No, nothing is certain.
 [VLADIMIR slowly crosses the stage and sits down beside ESTRAGON.]

VLADIMIR We can still part, if you think it would be better.

ESTRAGON It's not worth while now.
 [Silence.]

VLADIMIR No, it's not worth while now.
 [Silence.]

ESTRAGON Well, shall we go?

VLADIMIR Yes, let's go.
 [They do not move.]

Curtain.

Endnotes

- Note 1: That is, the 1890s. "It": suicide.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: That is, they should have jumped from the Eiffel Tower, completed in 1889; it was the tallest human-built structure in the world until 1930.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick: but when the desire cometh, it is a tree of life" (Proverbs 13:12).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: That is, one of the thieves crucified at the same time as Jesus. See Luke 23:32–43.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The salt lake, or inland sea, between Israel and Jordan. "Gospels": the four books of the Bible written by the four

Evangelists—Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John.Return to reference 5

- Note 6: Verbally attacked him, or used foul language toward him. “The other three”: Matthew, Mark, and John. In fact, all the Gospels mention the thieves. John calls them “two others,” and both Matthew and Mark say that the thieves verbally attacked Jesus. See John 19:18, Matthew 27:38–44, and Mark 15:27–32.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: A tree often associated with sadness or grief.Return to reference 7
- Note 8:
In one version of the rest of the bawdy story, the Englishman replies that he wants a boy. Taken aback, the bawd threatens to call a policeman, to which the Englishman replies, “Oh, no, they’re too gritty.” In another version, he is shown through a series of doors, marked by hair color and size of private parts, and finally selects one marked “Grands Cons” (in French slang, literally, large vaginas; figuratively, big idiots). Confirming him as con, or idiot, his choice lands him back on the street.
Return to reference 8
- Note 9: That is, a boxer.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The mandrake is a plant with a forked root that resembles the human body, which, according to medieval European folklore, was said to grow from the semen ejaculated by hanged men and to shriek when uprooted. Hearing the shriek was said to be fatal, or to make the listener go mad.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Compare with the proverb “Strike while the iron is hot.”Return to reference 2
- Note 3: That is, making.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: An overcoat.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: A venereal disease, usually gonorrhea (slang).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A wound producing a discharge (hence, figuratively, constant irritation).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Saliva running out of the mouth.Return to reference 7

- Note 8: A swelling of the thyroid gland, in the neck.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: A dolphin.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: To fool (Irish slang).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: In classical mythology, his father was the Titan Iapetus, not Jupiter, the chief god of the Roman pantheon. Atlas had to hold the heavens on his shoulders.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Of the highest order.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Invented word, apparently referring to Lucky's position as servant; it may echo the Russian word knout, or "whip."Return to reference 4
- Note 5: All four wear bowlers [Beckett's note].Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A kind of theater involving music and slapstick comedy, usually based on fairy tales and performed for children around Christmastime in Britain, Ireland, France, and elsewhere.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Vaudeville, or popular entertainment including comedy, singing, and dancing.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: A short clay pipe (Irish). "Briar": a pipe made from briar wood.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: A brand of pipe from Dublin's most famous tobacco shop.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Greek god of shepherds, flocks, fields, and herds. His appearance was said to create terror similar to that of a stampeding herd, and the word panic is derived from his name. Thus, his sleep here may connote an absence of panic.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The sky or the heavens.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: As sky—that is, in the capacity of sky.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: A play on the French phrase "oui très bon," meaning "yes, very good." "Oui! Tray bong!" was also the title of a popular music-hall song performed at the end of the 19th century by Charles Chaplin Sr. (1863–1901).Return to reference 4

- Note 5: Ten French francs were then worth about three dollars.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: All lively dances, associated, respectively, with Provence, the Scottish Highlands, France, Ireland, Spain, and England.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: That is, his vaporizer.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Made-up scholars' names.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Repetition of the Latin word qua, meaning "in the capacity of," or "as being," in philosophy.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Partial or total loss of speech. "Apathia": apathy, or the absence of emotion. "Athambia": absence of fear or surprise. All Greek words, of which only "aphasia" is common in English.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The heroine of Shakespeare's The Tempest (1611), who empathizes with the victims of a shipwreck: "O, I have suffered / With those that I saw suffer!" (1.2.5–6).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: A fictitious place, with a name that echoes the Latin words esse (to be) and posse (to be able to). "Acacacacademy": a play on the words academy and caca, a children's word for excrement in French. "Anthropopopometry": that is, anthropometry, the measurement of the human body.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Made-up scholars' names, playing on words for male and female sexual organs.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Made-up scholars' names, with puns on bodily functions.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Nourishment, or feeding.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Women's version of Irish sport of hurling, played with sticks and a ball. "Conating": attempting or desiring (a word created by Beckett from conation).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Substitutes.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The last three names are neighborhoods in south London, the first a vulgar pun ("fuck 'em").Return to reference 9
- Note 1: George Berkeley (1685–1753), Irish philosopher and bishop, who theorized that objects exist only insofar as they are perceived.Return to reference 1

- Note 2: A region in western Ireland.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Made-up scholars' names.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: A check-and-release mechanism in watches; here, deadbeat because it does not work. "Half-hunter": a kind of pocket watch with a hinged metal cover, in the center of which is a small glass window allowing the hands to be seen.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: A small front pocket for a watch.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: See the parable in Matthew 25, in which the goats (the damned) are punished and the sheep (the saved) are blessed.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: A major river in southeastern France.Return to reference 7

Act 2

Next day. Same time.

Same place.

[ESTRAGON's boots front center, heels together, toes splayed. LUCKY's hat at same place.]

[The tree has four or five leaves.]

[Enter VLADIMIR agitatedly. He halts and looks long at the tree, then suddenly begins to move feverishly about the stage. He halts before the boots, picks one up, examines it, sniffs it, manifests disgust, puts it back carefully. Comes and goes. Halts extreme right and gazes into distance off, shading his eyes with his hand. Comes and goes. Halts extreme left, as before. Comes and goes. Halts suddenly and begins to sing loudly.]

VLADIMIR A dog came in—[Having begun too high he stops, clears his throat, resumes:]

A dog came in the kitchen
And stole a crust of bread.
Then cook up with a ladle⁸
And beat him till he was dead.

Then all the dogs came running
And dug the dog a tomb—

[He stops, broods, resumes:]
Then all the dogs came running
And dug the dog a tomb
And wrote upon the tombstone
For the eyes of dogs to come:

A dog came in the kitchen
And stole a crust of bread.

Then cook up with a ladle
And beat him till he was dead.

Then all the dogs came running
And dug the dog a tomb—

[He stops, broods, resumes:]
Then all the dogs came running
And dug the dog a tomb—

[He stops, broods. Softly.]
And dug the dog a tomb . . .

[He remains a moment silent and motionless, then begins to move feverishly about the stage. He halts before the tree, comes and goes, before the boots, comes and goes, halts extreme right, gazes into distance, extreme left, gazes into distance. Enter ESTRAGON right, barefoot, head bowed. He slowly crosses the stage. VLADIMIR turns and sees him.]

VLADIMIR You again! [ESTRAGON halts but does not raise his head.

VLADIMIR goes towards him.] Come here till I embrace you.

ESTRAGON Don't touch me!

[VLADIMIR holds back, pained.]

VLADIMIR Do you want me to go away? [Pause.] Gogo! [Pause.

VLADIMIR observes him attentively.] Did they beat you?

[Pause.] Gogo! [ESTRAGON remains silent, head bowed.] Where did you spend the night?

ESTRAGON Don't touch me! Don't question me! Don't speak to me! Stay with me!

VLADIMIR Did I ever leave you?

ESTRAGON You let me go.

VLADIMIR Look at me. [ESTRAGON does not raise his head.

Violently.] Will you look at me!

[ESTRAGON raises his head. They look long at each other, then suddenly embrace, clapping each other on the back.]

End of the embrace. ESTRAGON, no longer supported, almost falls.]

ESTRAGON What a day!

VLADIMIR Who beat you? Tell me.

ESTRAGON Another day done with.

VLADIMIR Not yet.

ESTRAGON For me it's over and done with, no matter what happens. [Silence.] I heard you singing.

VLADIMIR That's right, I remember.

ESTRAGON That finished me. I said to myself, He's all alone, he thinks I'm gone for ever, and he sings.

VLADIMIR One is not master of one's moods. All day I've felt in great form. [Pause.] I didn't get up in the night, not once!

ESTRAGON [sadly] You see, you piss better when I'm not there.

VLADIMIR I missed you . . . and at the same time I was happy. Isn't that a queer thing?

ESTRAGON [shocked] Happy?

VLADIMIR Perhaps it's not quite the right word.

ESTRAGON And now?

VLADIMIR Now? . . . [Joyous.] There you are again . . .

[Indifferent.] There we are again . . . [Gloomy.] There I am again.

ESTRAGON You see, you feel worse when I'm with you. I feel better alone too.

VLADIMIR [vexed] Then why do you always come crawling back?

ESTRAGON I don't know.

VLADIMIR No, but I do. It's because you don't know how to defend yourself. I wouldn't have let them beat you.

ESTRAGON You couldn't have stopped them.

VLADIMIR Why not?

ESTRAGON There was ten of them.

VLADIMIR No, I mean before they beat you. I would have stopped you from doing whatever it was you were doing.

ESTRAGON I wasn't doing anything.

VLADIMIR Then why did they beat you?

ESTRAGON I don't know.

VLADIMIR Ah no, Gogo, the truth is there are things escape you that don't escape me, you must feel it yourself.

ESTRAGON I tell you I wasn't doing anything.

VLADIMIR Perhaps you weren't. But it's the way of doing it that counts, the way of doing it, if you want to go on living.

ESTRAGON I wasn't doing anything.

VLADIMIR You must be happy too, deep down, if you only knew it.

ESTRAGON Happy about what?

VLADIMIR To be back with me again.

ESTRAGON Would you say so?

VLADIMIR Say you are, even if it's not true.

ESTRAGON What am I to say?

VLADIMIR Say, I am happy.

ESTRAGON I am happy.

VLADIMIR So am I.

ESTRAGON So am I.

VLADIMIR We are happy.

ESTRAGON We are happy. [Silence.] What do we do now, now that we are happy?

VLADIMIR Wait for Godot. [ESTRAGON groans. Silence.] Things have changed here since yesterday.

ESTRAGON And if he doesn't come.

VLADIMIR [after a moment of bewilderment] We'll see when the time comes. [Pause.] I was saying that things have changed here since yesterday.

ESTRAGON Everything oozes.

VLADIMIR Look at the tree.

ESTRAGON It's never the same pus from one second to the next.⁹

VLADIMIR The tree, look at the tree.

[ESTRAGON looks at the tree.]

ESTRAGON Was it not there yesterday?

VLADIMIR Yes of course it was there. Do you not remember? We nearly hanged ourselves from it. But you wouldn't. Do you not remember?

ESTRAGON You dreamt it.

VLADIMIR Is it possible you've forgotten already?

ESTRAGON That's the way I am. Either I forget immediately or I never forget.

VLADIMIR And Pozzo and Lucky, have you forgotten them too?

ESTRAGON Pozzo and Lucky?

VLADIMIR He's forgotten everything!

ESTRAGON I remember a lunatic who kicked the shins off me. Then he played the fool.

VLADIMIR That was Lucky.

ESTRAGON I remember that. But when was it?

VLADIMIR And his keeper, do you not remember him?

ESTRAGON He gave me a bone.

VLADIMIR That was Pozzo.

ESTRAGON And all that was yesterday, you say?

VLADIMIR Yes of course it was yesterday.

ESTRAGON And here where we are now?

VLADIMIR Where else do you think? Do you not recognize the place?

ESTRAGON [suddenly furious] Recognize! What is there to recognize? All my lousy life I've crawled about in the mud! And you talk to me about scenery! [Looking wildly about him.] Look at this muckheap! I've never stirred from it!

VLADIMIR Calm yourself, calm yourself.

ESTRAGON You and your landscapes! Tell me about the worms!

VLADIMIR All the same, you can't tell me that this [gesture] bears any resemblance to . . . [he hesitates.] . . . to the Mâcon country¹ for example. You can't deny there's a big difference.

ESTRAGON The Mâcon country! Who's talking to you about the Mâcon country?

VLADIMIR But you were there yourself, in the Mâcon country.

ESTRAGON No I was never in the Mâcon country! I've puked my puke of a life away here, I tell you! Here! In the Cackon country!²

VLADIMIR But we were there together, I could swear to it! Picking grapes for a man called . . . [he snaps his fingers] . . . can't think of the name of the man, at a place called . . . [snaps his fingers] . . . can't think of the name of the place, do you not remember?

ESTRAGON [a little calmer] It's possible. I didn't notice anything.

VLADIMIR But down there everything is red!

ESTRAGON [exasperated] I didn't notice anything, I tell you! [Silence. VLADIMIR sighs deeply.]

VLADIMIR You're a hard man to get on with, Gogo.

ESTRAGON It'd be better if we parted.

VLADIMIR You always say that and you always come crawling back.

ESTRAGON The best thing would be to kill me, like the other.

VLADIMIR What other? [Pause.] What other?

ESTRAGON Like billions of others.

VLADIMIR [sententious] To every man his little cross. [He sighs.] Till he dies. [Afterthought.] And is forgotten.

ESTRAGON In the meantime let us try and converse calmly, since we are incapable of keeping silent.

VLADIMIR You're right, we're inexhaustible.

ESTRAGON It's so we won't think.

VLADIMIR We have that excuse.

ESTRAGON It's so we won't hear.

VLADIMIR We have our reasons.

ESTRAGON All the dead voices.

VLADIMIR They make a noise like wings.

ESTRAGON Like leaves.

VLADIMIR Like sand.

ESTRAGON Like leaves.

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR They all speak at once.

ESTRAGON Each one to itself.

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR Rather they whisper.

ESTRAGON They rustle.

VLADIMIR They murmur.

ESTRAGON They rustle.

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR What do they say?

ESTRAGON They talk about their lives.

VLADIMIR To have lived is not enough for them.

ESTRAGON They have to talk about it.

VLADIMIR To be dead is not enough for them.

ESTRAGON It is not sufficient.

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR They make a noise like feathers.

ESTRAGON Like leaves.

VLADIMIR Like ashes.

ESTRAGON Like leaves.

[Long silence.]

VLADIMIR Say something!

ESTRAGON I'm trying.

[Long silence.]

VLADIMIR [in anguish] Say anything at all!

ESTRAGON What do we do now?

VLADIMIR Wait for Godot.

ESTRAGON Ah!

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR This is awful!

ESTRAGON Sing something.

VLADIMIR No no! [He reflects.] We could start all over again perhaps.

ESTRAGON That should be easy.

VLADIMIR It's the start that's difficult.

ESTRAGON You can start from anything.

VLADIMIR Yes, but you have to decide.

ESTRAGON True.

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR Help me!

ESTRAGON I'm trying.

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR When you seek you hear.

ESTRAGON You do.

VLADIMIR That prevents you from finding.

ESTRAGON It does.

VLADIMIR That prevents you from thinking.

ESTRAGON You think all the same.

VLADIMIR No no, impossible.

ESTRAGON That's the idea, let's contradict each other.

VLADIMIR Impossible.

ESTRAGON You think so?

VLADIMIR We're in no danger of ever thinking any more.

ESTRAGON Then what are we complaining about?

VLADIMIR Thinking is not the worst.

ESTRAGON Perhaps not. But at least there's that.

VLADIMIR That what?

ESTRAGON That's the idea, let's ask each other questions.

VLADIMIR What do you mean, at least there's that?

ESTRAGON That much less misery.

VLADIMIR True.

ESTRAGON Well? If we gave thanks for our mercies?

VLADIMIR What is terrible is to have thought.

ESTRAGON But did that ever happen to us?

VLADIMIR Where are all these corpses from?

ESTRAGON These skeletons.

VLADIMIR Tell me that.

ESTRAGON True.

VLADIMIR We must have thought a little.

ESTRAGON At the very beginning.

VLADIMIR A charnel-house! A charnel-house!³

ESTRAGON You don't have to look.

VLADIMIR You can't help looking.

ESTRAGON True.
VLADIMIR Try as one may.
ESTRAGON I beg your pardon?
VLADIMIR Try as one may.
ESTRAGON We should turn resolutely towards Nature.
VLADIMIR We've tried that.
ESTRAGON True.
VLADIMIR Oh it's not the worst, I know.
ESTRAGON What?
VLADIMIR To have thought.
ESTRAGON Obviously.
VLADIMIR But we could have done without it.
ESTRAGON Que voulez-vous?⁴
VLADIMIR I beg your pardon?
ESTRAGON Que voulez-vous.
VLADIMIR Ah! que voulez-vous. Exactly.
[Silence.]
ESTRAGON That wasn't such a bad little canter.
VLADIMIR Yes, but now we'll have to find something else.
ESTRAGON Let me see. [He takes off his hat, concentrates.]
VLADIMIR Let me see. [He takes off his hat, concentrates. Long silence.] Ah!
[They put on their hats, relax.]
ESTRAGON Well?
VLADIMIR What was I saying, we could go on from there.
ESTRAGON What were you saying when?
VLADIMIR At the very beginning.
ESTRAGON The very beginning of WHAT?
VLADIMIR This evening . . . I was saying . . . I was saying . . .
ESTRAGON I'm not a historian.
VLADIMIR Wait . . . we embraced . . . we were happy . . . happy . . . what do we do now that we're happy . . . go on waiting . . . waiting . . . let me think . . . it's coming . . . go on waiting . . . now that we're happy . . . let me see . . . ah! The tree!
ESTRAGON The tree?

VLADIMIR Do you not remember?

ESTRAGON I'm tired.

VLADIMIR Look at it.

[They look at the tree.]

ESTRAGON I see nothing.

VLADIMIR But yesterday evening it was all black and bare. And now it's covered with leaves.

ESTRAGON Leaves?

VLADIMIR In a single night.

ESTRAGON It must be the Spring.

VLADIMIR But in a single night!

ESTRAGON I tell you we weren't here yesterday. Another of your nightmares.

VLADIMIR And where were we yesterday evening according to you?

ESTRAGON How would I know? In another compartment. There's no lack of void.

VLADIMIR [sure of himself] Good. We weren't here yesterday evening. Now what did we do yesterday evening?

ESTRAGON Do?

VLADIMIR Try and remember.

ESTRAGON Do . . . I suppose we blathered.

VLADIMIR [controlling himself] About what?

ESTRAGON Oh . . . this and that I suppose, nothing in particular.

[With assurance.] Yes, now I remember, yesterday evening we spent blathering about nothing in particular. That's been going on now for half a century.

VLADIMIR You don't remember any fact, any circumstance?

ESTRAGON [weary] Don't torment me, Didi.

VLADIMIR The sun. The moon. Do you not remember?

ESTRAGON They must have been there, as usual.

VLADIMIR You didn't notice anything out of the ordinary?

ESTRAGON Alas!

VLADIMIR And Pozzo? And Lucky?

ESTRAGON Pozzo?

VLADIMIR The bones.

ESTRAGON They were like fishbones.
VLADIMIR It was Pozzo gave them to you.
ESTRAGON I don't know.
VLADIMIR And the kick.
ESTRAGON That's right, someone gave me a kick.
VLADIMIR It was Lucky gave it to you.
ESTRAGON And all that was yesterday?
VLADIMIR Show your leg.
ESTRAGON Which?
VLADIMIR Both. Pull up your trousers. [ESTRAGON gives a leg to VLADIMIR, staggers. VLADIMIR takes the leg. They stagger.] Pull up your trousers.
ESTRAGON I can't.
[VLADIMIR pulls up the trousers, looks at the leg, lets it go.
ESTRAGON almost falls.]
VLADIMIR The other. [ESTRAGON gives the same leg.] The other, pig! [ESTRAGON gives the other leg. Triumphantly.] There's the wound! Beginning to fester!
ESTRAGON And what about it?
VLADIMIR [letting go the leg] Where are your boots?
ESTRAGON I must have thrown them away.
VLADIMIR When?
ESTRAGON I don't know.
VLADIMIR Why?
ESTRAGON [exasperated] I don't know why I don't know!
VLADIMIR No, I mean why did you throw them away?
ESTRAGON [exasperated] Because they were hurting me!
VLADIMIR [triumphantly, pointing to the boots] There they are!
[ESTRAGON looks at the boots.] At the very spot where you left them yesterday!
[ESTRAGON goes towards the boots, inspects them closely.]
ESTRAGON They're not mine.
VLADIMIR [stupefied] Not yours!
ESTRAGON Mine were black. These are brown.
VLADIMIR You're sure yours were black?
ESTRAGON Well they were a kind of grey.

VLADIMIR And these are brown. Show.
ESTRAGON [picking up a boot] Well they're a kind of green.
VLADIMIR Show. [ESTRAGON hands him the boot. VLADIMIR inspects it, throws it down angrily.] Well of all the—ESTRAGON You see, all that's a lot of bloody—VLADIMIR Ah! I see what it is. Yes, I see what's happened.
ESTRAGON All that's a lot of bloody—
VLADIMIR It's elementary. Someone came and took yours and left you his.
ESTRAGON Why?
VLADIMIR His were too tight for him, so he took yours.
ESTRAGON But mine were too tight.
VLADIMIR For you. Not for him.
ESTRAGON [having tried in vain to work it out] I'm tired!
[Pause.] Let's go.
VLADIMIR We can't.
ESTRAGON Why not?
VLADIMIR We're waiting for Godot.
ESTRAGON Ah! [Pause. Despairing.] What'll we do, what'll we do!
VLADIMIR There's nothing we can do.
ESTRAGON But I can't go on like this!
VLADIMIR Would you like a radish?
ESTRAGON Is that all there is?
VLADIMIR There are radishes and turnips.
ESTRAGON Are there no carrots?
VLADIMIR No. Anyway you overdo it with your carrots.
ESTRAGON Then give me a radish. [VLADIMIR fumbles in his pockets, finds nothing but turnips, finally brings out a radish and hands it to ESTRAGON who examines it, sniffs it.] It's black!
VLADIMIR It's a radish.
ESTRAGON I only like the pink ones, you know that!
VLADIMIR Then you don't want it?
ESTRAGON I only like the pink ones!
VLADIMIR Then give it back to me. [ESTRAGON gives it back.]
ESTRAGON I'll go and get a carrot. [He does not move.]

VLADIMIR This is becoming really insignificant.

ESTRAGON Not enough.

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR What about trying them.

ESTRAGON I've tried everything.

VLADIMIR No, I mean the boots.

ESTRAGON Would that be a good thing?

VLADIMIR It'd pass the time. [ESTRAGON hesitates.] I assure you, it'd be an occupation.

ESTRAGON A relaxation.

VLADIMIR A recreation.

ESTRAGON A relaxation.

VLADIMIR Try.

ESTRAGON You'll help me?

VLADIMIR I will of course.

ESTRAGON We don't manage too badly, eh Didi, between the two of us?

VLADIMIR Yes yes. Come on, we'll try the left first.

ESTRAGON We always find something, eh Didi, to give us the impression we exist?

VLADIMIR [impatiently] Yes yes, we're magicians. But let us persevere in what we have resolved, before we forget. [He picks up a boot.] Come on, give me your foot. [ESTRAGON raises his foot.] The other, hog! [ESTRAGON raises the other foot.] Higher! [Wreathed together they stagger about the stage. VLADIMIR succeeds finally in getting on the boot.] Try and walk. [ESTRAGON walks.] Well?

ESTRAGON It fits.

VLADIMIR [taking string from his pocket] We'll try and lace it.

ESTRAGON [vehemently] No no, no laces, no laces!

VLADIMIR You'll be sorry. Let's try the other. [As before.] Well?

ESTRAGON [grudgingly] It fits too.

VLADIMIR They don't hurt you?

ESTRAGON Not yet.

VLADIMIR Then you can keep them.

ESTRAGON They're too big.

VLADIMIR Perhaps you'll have socks some day.
ESTRAGON True.
VLADIMIR Then you'll keep them?
ESTRAGON That's enough about these boots.
VLADIMIR Yes, but—
ESTRAGON [violently] Enough! [Silence.] I suppose I might as well sit down. [He looks for a place to sit down, then goes and sits down on the mound.]
VLADIMIR That's where you were sitting yesterday evening.
ESTRAGON If I could only sleep.
VLADIMIR Yesterday you slept.
ESTRAGON I'll try. [He resumes his foetal posture, his head between his knees.]
VLADIMIR Wait. [He goes over and sits down beside ESTRAGON and begins to sing in a loud voice.]

Bye bye bye bye
Bye bye—

ESTRAGON [looking up angrily] Not so loud!
VLADIMIR [softly]

Bye bye bye bye
Bye bye bye bye
Bye bye bye bye
Bye bye . . .

[ESTRAGON sleeps. VLADIMIR gets up softly, takes off his coat and lays it across ESTRAGON's shoulders, then starts walking up and down, swinging his arms to keep himself warm. ESTRAGON *wakes with a start, jumps up, casts*⁵*about wildly*. VLADIMIR returns to him, puts his arms round him.]

There . . . there . . . Didi is there . . . don't be afraid . . .

ESTRAGON Ah!

VLADIMIR There . . . there . . . it's all over.

ESTRAGON I was falling—

VLADIMIR It's all over, it's all over.

ESTRAGON I was on top of a—

VLADIMIR Don't tell me! Come, we'll walk it off.

[He takes ESTRAGON by the arm and walks him up and down until ESTRAGON refuses to go any further.]

ESTRAGON That's enough. I'm tired.

VLADIMIR You'd rather be stuck there doing nothing?

ESTRAGON Yes.

VLADIMIR Please yourself.

[He releases ESTRAGON, picks up his coat and puts it on.]

ESTRAGON Let's go.

VLADIMIR We can't.

ESTRAGON Why not?

VLADIMIR We're waiting for Godot.

ESTRAGON Ah! [VLADIMIR walks up and down.] Can you not stay still?

VLADIMIR I'm cold.

ESTRAGON We came too soon.

VLADIMIR It's always at nightfall.

ESTRAGON But night doesn't fall.

VLADIMIR It'll fall all of a sudden, like yesterday.

ESTRAGON Then it'll be night.

VLADIMIR And we can go.

ESTRAGON Then it'll be day again. [Pause. Despairing.] What'll we do, what'll we do!

VLADIMIR [halting, violently] Will you stop whining! I've had about my bellyful of your lamentations!

ESTRAGON I'm going.

VLADIMIR [seeing LUCKY's hat] Well!

ESTRAGON Farewell.

VLADIMIR Lucky's hat. [He goes towards it.] I've been here an hour and never saw it. [Very pleased.] Fine!

ESTRAGON You'll never see me again.

VLADIMIR I knew it was the right place. Now our troubles are over. [He picks up the hat, contemplates it, straightens it.] Must have been a very fine hat. [He puts it on in place of his own which he hands to ESTRAGON.] Here.

ESTRAGON What?

VLADIMIR Hold that.

[ESTRAGON takes VLADIMIR'S hat. VLADIMIR adjusts LUCKY'S hat on his head. ESTRAGON puts on VLADIMIR'S hat in place of his own which he hands to VLADIMIR. VLADIMIR takes ESTRAGON'S hat. ESTRAGON adjusts VLADIMIR'S hat on his head. VLADIMIR puts on ESTRAGON'S hat in place of LUCKY'S which he hands to ESTRAGON. ESTRAGON takes LUCKY'S hat. VLADIMIR adjusts ESTRAGON'S hat on his head. ESTRAGON puts on LUCKY'S hat in place of VLADIMIR'S which he hands to VLADIMIR. VLADIMIR takes his hat, ESTRAGON adjusts LUCKY'S hat on his head. VLADIMIR puts on his hat in place of ESTRAGON'S which he hands to ESTRAGON. ESTRAGON takes his hat. VLADIMIR adjusts his hat on his head. ESTRAGON puts on his hat in place of LUCKY'S which he hands to VLADIMIR. VLADIMIR takes LUCKY'S hat. ESTRAGON adjusts his hat on his head. VLADIMIR puts on LUCKY'S hat in place of his own which he hands to ESTRAGON. ESTRAGON takes VLADIMIR'S hat. VLADIMIR adjusts LUCKY'S hat on his head. ESTRAGON hands VLADIMIR'S hat back to VLADIMIR who takes it and hands it back to ESTRAGON who takes it and hands it back to VLADIMIR who takes it and throws it down.]

How does it fit me?

ESTRAGON How would I know?

VLADIMIR No, but how do I look in it? [*He turns his head coquettishly to and fro, minces like a mannequin.*⁶]

ESTRAGON Hideous.

VLADIMIR Yes, but not more so than usual?

ESTRAGON Neither more nor less.

VLADIMIR Then I can keep it. Mine irked me. [Pause.] How shall I say? [Pause.] It itched me. [He takes off LUCKY'S hat, peers into it, shakes it, knocks on the crown, puts it on again.]

ESTRAGON I'm going.

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR Will you not play?

ESTRAGON Play at what?

VLADIMIR We could play at Pozzo and Lucky.

ESTRAGON Never heard of it.

VLADIMIR I'll do Lucky, you do Pozzo. [He imitates LUCKY sagging under the weight of his baggage. ESTRAGON looks at him with stupefaction.] Go on.

ESTRAGON What am I to do?

VLADIMIR Curse me!

ESTRAGON [after reflection] Naughty!

VLADIMIR Stronger!

ESTRAGON Gonococcus! Spirochete!⁷

[VLADIMIR sways back and forth, doubled in two.]

VLADIMIR Tell me to think.

ESTRAGON What?

VLADIMIR Say, Think, pig!

ESTRAGON Think, pig!

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR I can't!

ESTRAGON That's enough of that.

VLADIMIR Tell me to dance.

ESTRAGON I'm going.

VLADIMIR Dance, hog! [He writhes. Exit ESTRAGON left, precipitately.] I can't! [He looks up, misses ESTRAGON.] Gogo! [He moves wildly about the stage. Enter ESTRAGON left, panting. He hastens towards VLADIMIR, falls into his arms.]

There you are again at last!

ESTRAGON I'm accursed!

VLADIMIR Where were you? I thought you were gone for ever.

ESTRAGON They're coming!

VLADIMIR Who?

ESTRAGON I don't know.

VLADIMIR How many?

ESTRAGON I don't know.

VLADIMIR [triumphantly] It's Godot! At last! Gogo! It's Godot!

We're saved! Let's go and meet him! [He drags ESTRAGON towards the wings. ESTRAGON resists, pulls himself free, exits right.] Gogo! Come back! [VLADIMIR runs to extreme left, scans the horizon. Enter ESTRAGON right, he hastens towards VLADIMIR, falls into his arms.] There you are again again!

ESTRAGON I'm in hell!

VLADIMIR Where were you?

ESTRAGON They're coming there too!

VLADIMIR We're surrounded! [ESTRAGON makes a rush towards back.] Imbecile! There's no way out there. [He takes ESTRAGON by the arm and drags him towards front. Gesture towards front.] There! Not a soul in sight! Off you go! Quick! [He pushes ESTRAGON towards auditorium. ESTRAGON recoils in horror.] You won't? [He contemplates auditorium.] Well I can understand that. Wait till I see. [He reflects.] Your only hope left is to disappear.

ESTRAGON Where?

VLADIMIR Behind the tree. [ESTRAGON hesitates.] Quick! Behind the tree. [ESTRAGON goes and crouches behind the tree, realizes he is not hidden, comes out from behind the tree.]

Decidedly this tree will not have been the slightest use to us.

ESTRAGON [calmer] I lost my head. Forgive me. It won't happen again. Tell me what to do.

VLADIMIR There's nothing to do.

ESTRAGON You go and stand there. [He draws VLADIMIR to extreme right and places him with his back to the stage.] There, don't move, and watch out. [VLADIMIR scans horizon, screening his eyes with his hand. ESTRAGON runs and takes up same position extreme left. They turn their heads and look at each other.] Back to back like in the good old days. [They continue to look at each other for a moment, then resume their watch. Long silence.] Do you see anything coming?

VLADIMIR [turning his head.] What?

ESTRAGON [louder] Do you see anything coming?

VLADIMIR No.

ESTRAGON Nor I.

[They resume their watch. Silence.]

VLADIMIR You must have had a vision.

ESTRAGON [turning his head] What?

VLADIMIR [louder] You must have had a vision.

ESTRAGON No need to shout!

[They resume their watch. Silence.]

VLADIMIR

ESTRAGON

} [turning simultaneously] Do you—

VLADIMIR Oh pardon!

ESTRAGON Carry on.

VLADIMIR No no, after you.

ESTRAGON No no, you first.

VLADIMIR I interrupted you.

ESTRAGON On the contrary.

[They glare at each other angrily.]

VLADIMIR Ceremonious ape!

ESTRAGON Punctilious pig!

VLADIMIR Finish your phrase, I tell you!

ESTRAGON Finish your own!

[Silence. They draw closer, halt.]

VLADIMIR Moron!

ESTRAGON That's the idea, let's abuse each other.

[They turn, move apart, turn again and face each other.]

VLADIMIR Moron!

ESTRAGON Vermin!

VLADIMIR Abortion!

ESTRAGON Morpion!⁸

VLADIMIR Sewer-rat!

ESTRAGON Curate!

VLADIMIR Cretin!

ESTRAGON [with finality] Crritic!

VLADIMIR Oh! [He wilts, vanquished, and turns away.]

ESTRAGON Now let's make it up.

VLADIMIR Gogo!

ESTRAGON Didi!

VLADIMIR Your hand!

ESTRAGON Take it!

VLADIMIR Come to my arms!

ESTRAGON Your arms?

VLADIMIR My breast!

ESTRAGON Off we go!

[They embrace. They separate. Silence.]

VLADIMIR How time flies when one has fun!

[Silence.]

ESTRAGON What do we do now?

VLADIMIR While waiting.

ESTRAGON While waiting.

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR We could do our exercises.

ESTRAGON Our movements.

VLADIMIR Our elevations.

ESTRAGON Our relaxations.

VLADIMIR Our elongations.

ESTRAGON Our relaxations.

VLADIMIR To warm us up.

ESTRAGON To calm us down.

VLADIMIR Off we go.

[VLADIMIR hops from one foot to the other. ESTRAGON imitates him.]

ESTRAGON [stopping] That's enough. I'm tired.

VLADIMIR [stopping] We're not in form. What about a little deep breathing?

ESTRAGON I'm tired breathing.

VLADIMIR You're right. [Pause.] Let's just do the tree, for the balance.

ESTRAGON The tree?

[VLADIMIR does the tree, staggering about on one leg.]

VLADIMIR [stopping] Your turn.

[ESTRAGON does the tree, staggers.]

ESTRAGON Do you think God sees me?

VLADIMIR You must close your eyes.

[ESTRAGON closes his eyes, staggers worse.]

ESTRAGON [stopping, brandishing his fists, at the top of his voice]

God have pity on me!

VLADIMIR [vexed] And me?

ESTRAGON On me! On me! Pity! On me!

[Enter POZZO and LUCKY. POZZO is blind. LUCKY burdened as before. Rope as before, but much shorter, so that POZZO may follow more easily. LUCKY wearing a different hat. At the sight of VLADIMIR and ESTRAGON he stops short. POZZO, continuing on his way, bumps into him.]

VLADIMIR Gogo!

POZZO [clutching on to LUCKY who staggers] What is it? Who is it?

[LUCKY falls, drops everything and brings down POZZO with him. They lie helpless among the scattered baggage.]

ESTRAGON Is it Godot?

VLADIMIR At last! [He goes towards the heap.] Reinforcements at last!

POZZO Help!

ESTRAGON Is it Godot?

VLADIMIR We were beginning to weaken. Now we're sure to see the evening out.

POZZO Help!

ESTRAGON Do you hear him?

VLADIMIR We are no longer alone, waiting for the night, waiting for Godot, waiting for . . . waiting. All evening we have struggled, unassisted. Now it's over. It's already tomorrow.

POZZO Help!

VLADIMIR Time flows again already. The sun will set, the moon rise, and we away . . . from here.

POZZO Pity!

VLADIMIR Poor Pozzo!
ESTRAGON I knew it was him.
VLADIMIR Who?
ESTRAGON Godot.
VLADIMIR But it's not Godot.
ESTRAGON It's not Godot?
VLADIMIR It's not Godot.
ESTRAGON Then who is it?
VLADIMIR It's Pozzo.
POZZO Here! Here! Help me up!
VLADIMIR He can't get up.
ESTRAGON Let's go.
VLADIMIR We can't.
ESTRAGON Why not?
VLADIMIR We're waiting for Godot.
ESTRAGON Ah!
VLADIMIR Perhaps he has another bone for you.
ESTRAGON Bone?
VLADIMIR Chicken. Do you not remember?
ESTRAGON It was him?
VLADIMIR Yes.
ESTRAGON Ask him.
VLADIMIR Perhaps we should help him first.
ESTRAGON To do what?
VLADIMIR To get up.
ESTRAGON He can't get up?
VLADIMIR He wants to get up.
ESTRAGON Then let him get up.
VLADIMIR He can't.
ESTRAGON Why not?
VLADIMIR I don't know.
[POZZO writhes, groans, beats the ground with his fists.] ESTRAGON We should ask him for the bone first. Then if he refuses we'll leave him there.
VLADIMIR You mean we have him at our mercy?
ESTRAGON Yes.

VLADIMIR And that we should subordinate our good offices to certain conditions?

ESTRAGON What?

VLADIMIR That seems intelligent all right. But there's one thing I'm afraid of.

POZZO Help!

ESTRAGON What?

VLADIMIR That Lucky might get going all of a sudden. Then we'd be ballocksed.⁹

ESTRAGON Lucky?

VLADIMIR The one that went for you yesterday.

ESTRAGON I tell you there was ten of them.

VLADIMIR No, before that, the one that kicked you.

ESTRAGON Is he there?

VLADIMIR As large as life. [Gesture towards LUCKY.] For the moment he is inert. But he might run amuck any minute.

POZZO Help!

ESTRAGON And suppose we gave him a good beating the two of us?

VLADIMIR You mean if we fell on him in his sleep?

ESTRAGON Yes.

VLADIMIR That seems a good idea all right. But could we do it? Is he really asleep? [Pause.] No, the best would be to take advantage of Pozzo's calling for help—

POZZO Help!

VLADIMIR To help him—

ESTRAGON We help him?

VLADIMIR In anticipation of some tangible return.

ESTRAGON And suppose he—

VLADIMIR Let us not waste our time in idle discourse! [Pause. Vehemently.] Let us do something, while we have the chance! It is not every day that we are needed. Not indeed that we personally are needed. Others would meet the case equally well, if not better. To all mankind they were addressed, those cries for help still ringing in our ears! But at this place, at this moment of time, all mankind is us, whether we like it or not. Let us make the most of it, before it is too late! Let us represent worthily for once the foul brood to which a cruel fate consigned us! What do you say? [ESTRAGON says nothing.] It is true that when with folded arms we weigh the pros and cons we are no less a credit to our species. The tiger bounds to the help of his congeners¹ without the least reflexion, or else he slinks away into the depths of the thickets. But that is not the question. What are we doing here, that is the question. And we are blessed in this, that we happen to know the answer. Yes, in this immense confusion one thing alone is clear. We are waiting for Godot to come—

ESTRAGON Ah!

POZZO Help!

VLADIMIR Or for night to fall. [Pause.] We have kept our appointment and that's an end to that. We are not saints, but we have kept our appointment. How many people can boast as much?

ESTRAGON Billions.

VLADIMIR You think so?

ESTRAGON I don't know.

VLADIMIR You may be right.

POZZO Help!

VLADIMIR All I know is that the hours are long, under these conditions, and constrain us to beguile them with proceedings which—how shall I say—which may at first sight seem reasonable, until they become a habit. You may say it is to prevent our reason from foundering. No doubt. But has it not long been straying in the night without end of the abyssal depths? That's what I sometimes wonder. You follow my reasoning?

ESTRAGON [aphoristic for once] We are all born mad. Some remain so.

POZZO Help! I'll pay you!

ESTRAGON How much?

POZZO One hundred francs!²

ESTRAGON It's not enough.

VLADIMIR I wouldn't go so far as that.

ESTRAGON You think it's enough?

VLADIMIR No, I mean so far as to assert that I was weak in the head when I came into the world. But that is not the question.

POZZO Two hundred!

VLADIMIR We wait. We are bored. [He throws up his hand.] No, don't protest, we are bored to death, there's no denying it. Good. A diversion comes along and what do we do? We let it go to waste. Come, let's get to work! [He advances towards the heap, stops in his stride.] In an instant all will vanish and we'll be alone once more, in the midst of nothingness! [He broods.]

POZZO Two hundred!

VLADIMIR We're coming!

[He tries to pull POZZO to his feet, fails, tries again, stumbles, falls, tries to get up, fails.]

ESTRAGON What's the matter with you all?

VLADIMIR Help!

ESTRAGON I'm going.

VLADIMIR Don't leave me! They'll kill me!

POZZO Where am I?

VLADIMIR Gogo!

POZZO Help!

VLADIMIR Help!

ESTRAGON I'm going.

VLADIMIR Help me up first, then we'll go together.

ESTRAGON You promise?

VLADIMIR I swear it!

ESTRAGON And we'll never come back?

VLADIMIR Never!

ESTRAGON We'll go to the Pyrenees.³

VLADIMIR Wherever you like.
ESTRAGON I've always wanted to wander in the Pyrenees.
VLADIMIR You'll wander in them.
ESTRAGON [recoiling] Who farted?
VLADIMIR Pozzo.
POZZO Here! Here! Pity!
ESTRAGON It's revolting!
VLADIMIR Quick! Give me your hand!
ESTRAGON I'm going. [Pause. Louder.] I'm going.
VLADIMIR Well I suppose in the end I'll get up by myself. [He tries, fails.] In the fullness of time.
ESTRAGON What's the matter with you?
VLADIMIR Go to hell.
ESTRAGON Are you staying there?
VLADIMIR For the time being.
ESTRAGON Come on, get up, you'll catch a chill.
VLADIMIR Don't worry about me.
ESTRAGON Come on, Didi, don't be pig-headed!
[He stretches out his hand which VLADIMIR makes haste to seize.] VLADIMIR Pull!
[ESTRAGON pulls, stumbles, falls. Long silence.]
POZZO Help!
VLADIMIR We've arrived.
POZZO Who are you?
VLADIMIR We are men.
[Silence.]
ESTRAGON Sweet mother earth!
VLADIMIR Can you get up?
ESTRAGON I don't know.
VLADIMIR Try.
ESTRAGON Not now, not now.
[Silence.]
POZZO What happened?
VLADIMIR [violently] Will you stop it, you! Pest! He can think of nothing but himself!

ESTRAGON What about a little snooze?

VLADIMIR Did you hear him? He wants to know what happened!

ESTRAGON Don't mind him. Sleep.

[Silence.]

POZZO Pity! Pity!

ESTRAGON [with a start] What is it?

VLADIMIR Were you asleep?

ESTRAGON I must have been.

VLADIMIR It's this bastard Pozzo at it again.

ESTRAGON Make him stop it. Kick him in the crotch.

VLADIMIR [striking Pozzo] Will you stop it! Crablouse! [POZZO extricates himself with cries of pain and crawls away. He stops, saws the air blindly, calling for help. VLADIMIR, propped on his elbow, observes his retreat.] He's off! [POZZO collapses.] He's down!

ESTRAGON What do we do now?

VLADIMIR Perhaps I could crawl to him.

ESTRAGON Don't leave me!

VLADIMIR Or I could call to him.

ESTRAGON Yes, call to him.

VLADIMIR Pozzo! [Silence.] Pozzo! [Silence.] No reply.

ESTRAGON Together.

VLADIMIR

ESTRAGON

} Pozzo! Pozzo!

VLADIMIR He moved.

ESTRAGON Are you sure his name is Pozzo?

VLADIMIR [alarmed] Mr. Pozzo! Come back! We won't hurt you!
[Silence.]

ESTRAGON We might try him with other names.

VLADIMIR I'm afraid he's dying.

ESTRAGON It'd be amusing.

VLADIMIR What'd be amusing?

ESTRAGON To try him with other names, one after the other. It'd pass the time. And we'd be bound to hit on the right one sooner or later.

VLADIMIR I tell you his name is Pozzo.

ESTRAGON We'll soon see. [He reflects.] Abel! Abel!

POZZO Help!

ESTRAGON Got it in one!

VLADIMIR I begin to weary of this motif.

ESTRAGON Perhaps the other is called Cain.⁴ Cain! Cain!

POZZO Help!

ESTRAGON He's all humanity. [Silence.] Look at the little cloud.

VLADIMIR [raising his eyes] Where?

ESTRAGON There. In the zenith.⁵

VLADIMIR Well? [Pause.] What is there so wonderful about it?
[Silence.]

ESTRAGON Let's pass on now to something else, do you mind?

VLADIMIR I was just going to suggest it.

ESTRAGON But to what?

VLADIMIR Ah!

[Silence.]

ESTRAGON Suppose we got up to begin with?

VLADIMIR No harm trying.

[They get up.]

ESTRAGON Child's play.

VLADIMIR Simple question of will-power.

ESTRAGON And now?

POZZO Help!

ESTRAGON Let's go.

VLADIMIR We can't.

ESTRAGON Why not?

VLADIMIR We're waiting for Godot.

ESTRAGON Ah! [Despairing.] What'll we do, what'll we do!

POZZO Help!

VLADIMIR What about helping him?

ESTRAGON What does he want?

VLADIMIR He wants to get up.

ESTRAGON Then why doesn't he?

VLADIMIR He wants us to help him to get up.

ESTRAGON Then why don't we? What are we waiting for?

[They help POZZO to his feet, let him go. He falls.]

VLADIMIR We must hold him. [They get him up again. POZZO sags between them, his arms round their necks.] Feeling better?

POZZO Who are you?

VLADIMIR Do you not recognize us?

POZZO I am blind.

[Silence.]

ESTRAGON Perhaps he can see into the future.⁶

VLADIMIR Since when?

POZZO I used to have wonderful sight—but are you friends?

ESTRAGON [laughing noisily] He wants to know if we are friends!

VLADIMIR No, he means friends of his.

ESTRAGON Well?

VLADIMIR We've proved we are, by helping him.

ESTRAGON Exactly. Would we have helped him if we weren't his friends?

VLADIMIR Possibly.

ESTRAGON True.

VLADIMIR Don't let's quibble about that now.

POZZO You are not highwaymen?

ESTRAGON Highwaymen! Do we look like highwaymen?

VLADIMIR Damn it can't you see the man is blind!

ESTRAGON Damn it so he is. [Pause.] So he says.

POZZO Don't leave me!

VLADIMIR No question of it.

ESTRAGON For the moment.

POZZO What time is it?

VLADIMIR [inspecting the sky] Seven o'clock . . . eight o'clock . .

ESTRAGON That depends what time of year it is.

POZZO Is it evening?

[Silence. VLADIMIR and ESTRAGON scrutinize the sunset.]

ESTRAGON It's rising.
VLADIMIR Impossible.
ESTRAGON Perhaps it's the dawn.
VLADIMIR Don't be a fool. It's the west over there.
ESTRAGON How do you know?
POZZO [anguished] Is it evening?
VLADIMIR Anyway it hasn't moved.
ESTRAGON I tell you it's rising.
POZZO Why don't you answer me?
ESTRAGON Give us a chance.
VLADIMIR [reassuring] It's evening, Sir, it's evening, night is drawing nigh. My friend here would have me doubt it and I must confess he shook me for a moment. But it is not for nothing I have lived through this long day and I can assure you it is very near the end of its repertory. [Pause.] How do you feel now?
ESTRAGON How much longer are we to cart him around? [They half release him, catch him again as he falls.] We are not caryatids!⁷
VLADIMIR You were saying your sight used to be good, if I heard you right.
POZZO Wonderful! Wonderful, wonderful sight!
[Silence.]
ESTRAGON [irritably] Expand! Expand!
VLADIMIR Let him alone. Can't you see he's thinking of the days when he was happy. [Pause.] *Memoria praeteritorum bonorum*⁸—that must be unpleasant.
ESTRAGON We wouldn't know.
VLADIMIR And it came on you all of a sudden?
POZZO Quite wonderful!
VLADIMIR I'm asking you if it came on you all of a sudden.
POZZO I woke up one fine day as blind as Fortune.⁹ [Pause.] Sometimes I wonder if I'm not still asleep.
VLADIMIR And when was that?
POZZO I don't know.

VLADIMIR But no later than yesterday—
POZZO [violently] Don't question me! The blind have no notion of time. The things of time are hidden from them too.
VLADIMIR Well just fancy that! I could have sworn it was just the opposite.
ESTRAGON I'm going.
POZZO Where are we?
VLADIMIR I couldn't tell you.
POZZO It isn't by any chance the place known as the Board?¹
VLADIMIR Never heard of it.
POZZO What is it like?
VLADIMIR [looking round] It's indescribable. It's like nothing. There's nothing. There's a tree.
POZZO Then it's not the Board.
ESTRAGON [sagging] Some diversion!
POZZO Where is my menial?
VLADIMIR He's about somewhere.
POZZO Why doesn't he answer when I call?
VLADIMIR I don't know. He seems to be sleeping. Perhaps he's dead.
POZZO What happened exactly?
ESTRAGON Exactly!
VLADIMIR The two of you slipped. [Pause.] And fell.
POZZO Go and see is he hurt.
VLADIMIR We can't leave you.
POZZO You needn't both go.
VLADIMIR [to ESTRAGON] You go.
ESTRAGON After what he did to me? Never!
POZZO Yes yes, let your friend go, he stinks so. [Silence.] What is he waiting for?
VLADIMIR What you waiting for?
ESTRAGON I'm waiting for Godot.
[Silence.]
VLADIMIR What exactly should he do?

POZZO Well to begin with he should pull on the rope, as hard as he likes so long as he doesn't strangle him. He usually responds to that. If not he should give him a taste of his boot, in the face and the privates as far as possible.

VLADIMIR [to ESTRAGON] You see, you've nothing to be afraid of. It's even an opportunity to revenge yourself.

ESTRAGON And if he defends himself?

POZZO No no, he never defends himself.

VLADIMIR I'll come flying to the rescue.

ESTRAGON Don't take your eyes off me. [He goes towards LUCKY.]

VLADIMIR Make sure he's alive before you start. No point in exerting yourself if he's dead.

ESTRAGON [bending over LUCKY] He's breathing.

VLADIMIR Then let him have it.

[With sudden fury ESTRAGON starts kicking LUCKY, hurling abuse at him as he does so. But he hurts his foot and moves away, limping and groaning. LUCKY stirs.]

ESTRAGON Oh the brute!

[He sits down on the mound and tries to take off his boot. But he soon desists and disposes himself for sleep, his arms on his knees and his head on his arms.]

POZZO What's gone wrong now?

VLADIMIR My friend has hurt himself.

POZZO And Lucky?

VLADIMIR So it is he?

POZZO What?

VLADIMIR It is Lucky?

POZZO I don't understand.

VLADIMIR And you are Pozzo?

POZZO Certainly I am Pozzo.

VLADIMIR The same as yesterday?

POZZO Yesterday?

VLADIMIR We met yesterday. [Silence.] Do you not remember?

POZZO I don't remember having met anyone yesterday. But tomorrow I won't remember having met anyone today. So don't count on me to enlighten you.

VLADIMIR But—

POZZO Enough! Up pig!

VLADIMIR You were bringing him to the fair to sell him. You spoke to us. He danced. He thought. You had your sight.

POZZO As you please. Let me go! [VLADIMIR moves away.] Up!

[LUCKY gets up, gathers up his burdens.]

VLADIMIR Where do you go from here?

POZZO On. [LUCKY, laden down, takes his place before POZZO.]

Whip! [LUCKY puts everything down, looks for whip, finds it, puts it into POZZO's hand, takes up everything again.] Rope!

[LUCKY puts everything down, puts end of rope into POZZO's hand, takes up everything again.]

VLADIMIR What is there in the bag?

POZZO Sand. [He jerks the rope.] On!

VLADIMIR Don't go yet.

POZZO I'm going.

VLADIMIR What do you do when you fall far from help?

POZZO We wait till we can get up. Then we go on. On!

VLADIMIR Before you go tell him to sing.

POZZO Who?

VLADIMIR Lucky.

POZZO To sing?

VLADIMIR Yes. Or to think. Or to recite.

POZZO But he is dumb.

VLADIMIR Dumb!

POZZO Dumb. He can't even groan.

VLADIMIR Dumb! Since when?

POZZO [suddenly furious] Have you not done tormenting me with your accursed time! It's abominable! When! When! One day, is that not enough for you, one day he went dumb, one day I went blind, one day we'll go deaf, one day we were born, one day we shall die, the same day, the same second, is that not enough for you? [Calmer.] They give birth astride of a grave, the light gleams an instant, then it's night once more. [He jerks the rope.] On!

[*Exeunt*² POZZO and LUCKY. VLADIMIR follows them to the edge of the stage, looks after them. The noise of falling, reinforced by mimic of VLADIMIR, announces that they are down again. Silence. VLADIMIR goes towards ESTRAGON, contemplates him a moment, then shakes him awake.]

ESTRAGON [wild gestures, incoherent words. Finally.] Why will you never let me sleep?

VLADIMIR I felt lonely.

ESTRAGON I was dreaming I was happy.

VLADIMIR That passed the time.

ESTRAGON I was dreaming that—

VLADIMIR [violently] Don't tell me! [Silence.] I wonder is he really blind.

ESTRAGON Blind? Who?

VLADIMIR Pozzo.

ESTRAGON Blind?

VLADIMIR He told us he was blind.

ESTRAGON Well what about it?

VLADIMIR It seemed to me he saw us.

ESTRAGON You dreamt it. [Pause.] Let's go. We can't. Ah!

[Pause.] Are you sure it wasn't him?

VLADIMIR Who?

ESTRAGON Godot.

VLADIMIR But who?

ESTRAGON Pozzo.

VLADIMIR Not at all! [Less sure.] Not at all! [Still less sure.] Not at all!

ESTRAGON I suppose I might as well get up. [He gets up painfully.] Ow! Didi!

VLADIMIR I don't know what to think any more.

ESTRAGON My feet! [He sits down again and tries to take off his boots.] Help me!

VLADIMIR Was I sleeping, while the others suffered? Am I sleeping now? Tomorrow, when I wake, or think I do, what shall I say of today? That with Estragon my friend, at this place, until the fall of night, I waited for Godot? That Pozzo passed, with his carrier, and that he spoke to us? Probably. But in all that what truth will there be? [ESTRAGON, having struggled with his boots in vain, is dozing off again. VLADIMIR looks at him.] He'll know nothing. He'll tell me about the blows he received and I'll give him a carrot. [Pause.] Astride of a grave and a difficult birth. Down in the hole, lingeringly, the grave-digger puts on the forceps.³ We have time to grow old. The air is full of our cries. [He listens.] But habit is a great deadener. [He looks again at ESTRAGON.] At me too someone is looking, of me too someone is saying, He is sleeping, he knows nothing, let him sleep on. [Pause.] I can't go on! [Pause.] What have I said?

[He goes feverishly to and fro, halts finally at extreme left, broods. Enter BOY right. He halts. Silence.]

BOY Mister . . . [VLADIMIR turns.] Mister Albert . . .

VLADIMIR Off we go again. [Pause.] Do you not recognize me?

BOY No Sir.

VLADIMIR It wasn't you came yesterday.

BOY No Sir.

VLADIMIR This is your first time.

BOY Yes Sir.

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR You have a message from Mr. Godot.

BOY Yes Sir.

VLADIMIR He won't come this evening.

BOY No Sir.

VLADIMIR But he'll come tomorrow.

BOY Yes Sir.

VLADIMIR Without fail.

BOY Yes Sir.

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR Did you meet anyone?

BOY No Sir.

VLADIMIR Two other . . . [he hesitates.] . . . men?

BOY I didn't see anyone, Sir.

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR What does he do, Mr. Godot? [Silence.] Do you hear me?

BOY Yes Sir.

VLADIMIR Well?

BOY He does nothing, Sir.

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR How is your brother?

BOY He's sick, Sir.

VLADIMIR Perhaps it was he came yesterday.

BOY I don't know, Sir.

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR [softly] Has he a beard, Mr. Godot?

BOY Yes Sir.

VLADIMIR Fair or . . . [he hesitates.] . . . or black?

BOY I think it's white, Sir.

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR Christ have mercy on us!

[Silence.]

BOY What am I to tell Mr. Godot, Sir?

VLADIMIR Tell him . . . [he hesitates] . . . tell him you saw me and that . . . [he hesitates] . . . that you saw me. [Pause.

VLADIMIR advances, the BOY recoils. VLADIMIR halts, the BOY halts. With sudden violence.] You're sure you saw me, you won't come and tell me tomorrow that you never saw me!

[Silence. VLADIMIR makes a sudden spring forward, the BOY avoids him and exits running. Silence. The sun sets, the moon rises. As in Act 1. VLADIMIR stands motionless and bowed. ESTRAGON wakes, takes off his boots, gets up with one in each hand and goes and puts them down center front, then goes towards VLADIMIR.]

ESTRAGON What's wrong with you?

VLADIMIR Nothing.

ESTRAGON I'm going.

VLADIMIR So am I.

ESTRAGON Was I long asleep?

VLADIMIR I don't know.

[Silence.]

ESTRAGON Where shall we go?

VLADIMIR Not far.

ESTRAGON Oh yes, let's go far away from here.

VLADIMIR We can't.

ESTRAGON Why not?

VLADIMIR We have to come back tomorrow.

ESTRAGON What for?

VLADIMIR To wait for Godot.

ESTRAGON Ah! [Silence.] He didn't come?

VLADIMIR No.

ESTRAGON And now it's too late.

VLADIMIR Yes, now it's night.

ESTRAGON And if we dropped him? [Pause.] If we dropped him?

VLADIMIR He'd punish us. [Silence. He looks at the tree.]

Everything's dead but the tree.

ESTRAGON [looking at the tree] What is it?

VLADIMIR It's the tree.

ESTRAGON Yes, but what kind?

VLADIMIR I don't know. A willow.

[ESTRAGON draws VLADIMIR towards the tree. They stand motionless before it. Silence.]

ESTRAGON Why don't we hang ourselves?

VLADIMIR With what?

ESTRAGON You haven't got a bit of rope?

VLADIMIR No.

ESTRAGON Then we can't.

[Silence.]

VLADIMIR Let's go.

ESTRAGON Wait, there's my belt.

VLADIMIR It's too short.

ESTRAGON You could hang onto my legs.

VLADIMIR And who'd hang on to mine?

ESTRAGON True.

VLADIMIR Show all the same. [ESTRAGON loosens the cord that holds up his trousers which, much too big for him, fall about his ankles. They look at the cord.] It might do at a pinch. But is it strong enough?

ESTRAGON We'll soon see. Here.
[They each take an end of the cord and pull. It breaks. They almost fall.]

VLADIMIR Not worth a curse.
[Silence.]

ESTRAGON You say we have to come back tomorrow?

VLADIMIR Yes.

ESTRAGON Then we can bring a good bit of rope.

VLADIMIR Yes.
[Silence.]

ESTRAGON Didi.

VLADIMIR Yes.

ESTRAGON I can't go on like this.

VLADIMIR That's what you think.

ESTRAGON If we parted? That might be better for us.

VLADIMIR We'll hang ourselves tomorrow. [Pause.] Unless Godot comes.

ESTRAGON And if he comes?

VLADIMIR We'll be saved.
[VLADIMIR takes off his hat (LUCKY'S), peers inside it, feels about inside it, shakes it, knocks on the crown, puts it on again.]

ESTRAGON Well? Shall we go?

VLADIMIR Pull on your trousers.

ESTRAGON What?

VLADIMIR Pull on your trousers.

ESTRAGON You want me to pull off my trousers?

VLADIMIR Pull ON your trousers.

ESTRAGON [realizing his trousers are down] True. [He pulls up his trousers.]

VLADIMIR Well? Shall we go?

ESTRAGON Yes, let's go.

[They do not move.]
Curtain.

1952; 1954

Endnotes

- Note 8: That is, the cook took up a ladle. Vladimir sings a round song.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: See "You can never step into the same river twice," a statement on flux by the ancient Greek philosopher Heraclitus (active ca. 500 B.C.E.).Return to reference 9
- Note 1: A wine-producing area in the Burgundy region of eastern France.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Punning on caca, children's word in French for excrement.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: A vault for the bodies or bones of the dead.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: What do you want? (formal French).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Looks.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A person employed to model clothes.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: One of a group of bacteria, usually the one that causes syphilis. "Gonococcus": the bacterium that causes gonorrhea.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Crab louse (a common French word, now obsolete in English).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Screwed (slang); from bollocks, or testicles.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Members of his kind.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Then worth about thirty dollars.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Mountain range along the border between France and Spain.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The older son of Adam and Eve, who murdered his brother, Abel. See Genesis 4:1–15.Return to reference 4

- Note 5: The point of the sky directly overhead.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Perhaps a reference to Tiresias, a figure in Greek mythology and literature who, although blind, possessed the gift of prophecy.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Female figures serving as support columns in classical buildings.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The memory of past good (Latin, quoting the Summa Theologica Secunda 2.2.36.1, by theologian and philosopher Thomas Aquinas [1225–1274]).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The Roman goddess of chance or luck, sometimes depicted as blindfolded.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The stage, or the profession of acting, is often called “the boards.”Return to reference 1
- Note 2: [They] exit (Latin).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: An instrument used in obstetrics to pull the baby out of the birth canal.Return to reference 3

W. H. AUDEN

1907–1973

Wystan Hugh Auden was born in York, England, the son of a doctor and of a former nurse. He was educated at private schools and Christ Church, Oxford. After graduation from Oxford he traveled abroad, taught school in England from 1930 to 1935, and later worked for a government film unit. His sympathies in the 1930s were with the left, like those of most intellectuals of his age, and he went to Spain during its civil war, intending to serve as an ambulance driver on the left-wing Republican side. To his surprise he felt so disturbed by the sight of the many Roman Catholic churches gutted and looted by the Republicans that he returned to England without fulfilling his ambition. He traveled in Iceland and China before moving to the United States in 1939; in 1946 he became an American citizen. He taught at a number of American colleges and was professor of poetry at Oxford from 1956 to 1960. Most of his later life was shared between residences in New York City and in Europe—first in southern Italy, then in Austria.

Auden was the most prominent of the young English poets who, in the late 1920s and early 1930s, saw themselves bringing new techniques and attitudes to English poetry. Stephen Spender, C. Day-Lewis, and Louis MacNeice were other liberal and leftist poets in this loosely affiliated group. Auden learned metrical and verbal techniques from Gerard Manley Hopkins and Wilfred Owen, and from T. S. Eliot he took a conversational and ironic tone, an acute inspection of cultural decay. Thomas Hardy's metrical variety, formal irregularity, and fusion of panoramic and intimate perspectives also proved a useful example, and Auden admired W. B. Yeats's "serious reflective" poems of "personal and public interest," though he later came to disavow Yeats's grand aspirations and rhetoric. Auden's English studies at Oxford familiarized him with the rhythms and long alliterative line of Anglo-Saxon poetry. He learned, too, from popular and folk culture, particularly the songs of the English music hall and, later, American blues singers.

The Depression that hit America in 1929 hit England soon afterward, and Auden and his contemporaries looked out at an England of industrial stagnation and mass unemployment, seeing not Eliot's metaphorical Waste Land but a more literal Waste Land of poverty and "depressed areas." Auden's early poetry diagnoses the ills of his country. This diagnosis, conducted in a verse that combines irreverence with craftsmanship, draws on both Freud and Marx to show England now as a nation of neurotic invalids, now as the victim of an antiquated economic system. The intellectual liveliness and nervous force of this work made a great impression, even though the compressed, elliptical, impersonal style created difficulties of interpretation.

Gradually Auden sought to clarify his imagery and syntax, and in the late 1930s he produced "Lullaby," "Musée des Beaux Arts," "In Memory of W. B. Yeats," and other poems of finely disciplined movement, pellucid clarity, and deep yet unsentimental feeling. Some of the poems he wrote at this time, such as "Spain" and "September 1, 1939," aspire to a visionary perspective on political and social change; but as Auden became increasingly skeptical of poetry in the grand manner, of poetry as revelation or as a tool for political change, he removed these poems from his canon. (He came to see as false his claim in "September 1, 1939" that "We must love one another or die.") "Poetry is not magic," he said in the essay "Writing," but a form of truth telling that should "disenchant and disintoxicate." As he continued to remake his style during World War II, he created a voice that, in contrast not only to Romanticism but also to the authoritarianism devastating Europe, was increasingly flat, ironic, and conversational. He never lost his ear for popular speech or his ability to combine elements from popular art with technical formality. He daringly mixed the grave and the flippant, vivid detail and allegorical abstraction. He always experimented, particularly in ways of bringing together high artifice and a colloquial tone.

The poems of Auden's last phase are increasingly personal in tone and combine an air of offhand informality with remarkable technical skill in versification. He turned out, as if effortlessly, poems in numerous verse forms, including sestinas, sonnets, ballads, canzones, syllabics, haiku, the blues, even limericks. As he became evermore mistrustful of a prophetic role for the poet, he embraced the ordinary—the hours of the day, the rooms of a house, a changeable landscape. He took refuge in love and friendship, particularly the love and friendship he shared with the American writer Chester Kallmann. Like Eliot, Auden became a member of the Church of England, and the emotions of his late poetry—sometimes comic, sometimes solemn—were grounded in an ever deepening but rarely obtrusive religious feeling. In the last year of his life he returned to England to live in Oxford, feeling the need to be part of a university community as a protection against loneliness. Auden is now generally recognized as one of the masters of twentieth-century English poetry, a thoughtful, seriously playful poet, combining extraordinary intelligence and immense craftsmanship.

A note on the texts: Auden heavily revised his poems, sometimes omitting stanzas (as in "Spain" and "In Memory of W. B. Yeats") or even entire poems ("Spain" and "September 1, 1939"). The texts below are reprinted as they first appeared in book form and again in his Selected Poems: A New Edition, ed. Edward Mendelson (1989).

Petition¹

Sir, no man's enemy, forgiving all
But will his negative inversion, be prodigal:
Send to us power and light, a sovereign touch²
Curing the intolerable neural itch,
The exhaustion of weaning, the liar's quinsy,[°]
5 And the distortions of ingrown virginity.
Prohibit sharply the rehearsed response
And gradually correct the coward's stance;
Cover in time with beams those in retreat
That, spotted, they turn though the reverse were 10 great;
Publish each healer that in city lives
Or country houses at the end of drives;
Harrow the house of the dead; look shining at
New styles of architecture, a change of heart.

Oct. 1929/1930

Endnotes

- Note 1: This title, by which the poem is widely known, is from Auden's later collections. Many of his early poems first appeared without titles.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The king's touch was often regarded as miraculous cure for disease (that is, sovereign as an adjective, meaning "supreme, all-dominating").Return to reference 2

Notes

- °: tonsillitisReturn to reference °

On This Island¹

Look, stranger, at this island now
The leaping light for your delight discovers,
Stand stable here
And silent be,
5 That through the channels of the ear
May wander like a river
The swaying sound of the sea.

Here at the small field's ending pause
Where the chalk wall falls to the foam, and its tall ledges
10 Oppose the pluck
And knock of the tide,
And the shingle scrambles after the sucking surf, and the gull lodges
A moment on its sheer side.

15 Far off like floating seeds the ships
Diverge on urgent voluntary errands;
And the full view
Indeed may enter
And move in memory as now these clouds do,
20 That pass the harbour mirror
And all the summer through the water saunter.

Nov. 19351936

Endnotes

- Note 1: The title is from Auden's later collections. Return to reference 1

Lullaby¹

Lay your sleeping head, my love,
Human on my faithless arm;
Time and fevers burn away
Individual beauty from Thoughtful children, and the grave
5 Proves the child ephemeral:
But in my arms till break of day
Let the living creature lie,
Mortal, guilty, but to me
The entirely beautiful.

10 Soul and body have no bounds:
To lovers as they lie upon
Her tolerant enchanted slope
In their ordinary swoon, Grave the vision Venus^o sends 15 Of supernatural sympathy,
Universal love and hope;
While an abstract insight wakes
Among the glaciers and the rocks
The hermit's sensual ecstasy.

20 Certainty, fidelity
On the stroke of midnight pass
Like vibrations of a bell,
And fashionable madmen raise
Their pedantic boring cry:
25 Every farthing² of the cost,
All the dreaded cards foretell,
Shall be paid, but from this night
Not a whisper, not a thought,

30 Not a kiss nor look be lost.
Beauty, midnight, vision dies:
Let the winds of dawn that blow
Softly round your dreaming head
Such a day of sweetness show
35 Eye and knocking heart may bless,
Find the mortal world enough;
Noons of dryness see you fed
By the involuntary powers,
Nights of insult let you pass
40 Watched by every human love.

Jan. 1937⁴⁰1937, 1940

Endnotes

- Note 1: Title from Auden's later collections.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: A quarter-penny, at one time the smallest and least valuable British coin.Return to reference 2

Notes

- °: Roman goddess of loveReturn to reference °

Spain¹

Yesterday all the past. The language of size Spreading to China along the trade-routes; the diffusion

Of the counting-frame and the cromlech;²
Yesterday the shadow-reckoning in the sunny climates.

5 Yesterday the assessment of insurance by cards,
The divination of water; yesterday the invention
Of cartwheels and clocks, the taming of Horses. Yesterday the bustling world of the navigators.

10 Yesterday the abolition of fairies and giants,
The fortress like a motionless eagle eyeing the valley,
The chapel built in the forest;
Yesterday the carving of angels and alarming
gargoyles;

The trial of heretics among the columns of stone;
Yesterday the theological feuds in the taverns
And the miraculous cure at the fountain;
15 Yesterday the Sabbath of witches; but to-day the struggle.

20 Yesterday the installation of dynamos and turbines,
The construction of railways in the colonial desert;
Yesterday the classic lecture
On the origin of Mankind. But to-day the struggle.

Yesterday the belief in the absolute value of Greek,
The fall of the curtain upon the death of a hero;
 Yesterday the prayer to the sunset
And the adoration of madmen. But to-day the struggle.

25 As the poet whispers, startled among the pines,
Or where the loose waterfall sings compact, or upright
 On the crag by the leaning tower:
"O my vision. O send me the luck of the sailor."

30 And the investigator peers through his instruments
At the inhuman provinces, the virile bacillus
 Or enormous Jupiter finished:
"But the lives of my friends. I inquire. I inquire."

And the poor in their fireless lodgings, dropping the sheets
Of the evening paper: "Our day is our loss, O show us
35 History the operator, the Organiser, Time the refreshing river."

And the nations combine each cry, invoking the life
That shapes the individual belly and orders
 The private nocturnal terror:
40 "Did you not found the city state of the sponge,

"Raise the vast military empires of the shark
And the tiger, establish the robin's plucky canton?
 Intervene. O descend as a dove or
A furious papa or a mild engineer,³ but descend."

45 And the life, if it answers at all, replies from the heart

And the eyes and the lungs, from the shops and squares of the city

“O no, I am not the mover;
Not to-day; not to you. To you, I’m the 50 “Yes-man, the bar-companion, the easily-duped;

I am whatever you do. I am your vow to be Good, your humorous story.
I am your business voice. I am your marriage.

55 “What’s your proposal? To build the just city? I will.
I agree. Or is it the suicide pact, the romantic Death? Very well, I accept, for
I am your choice, your decision. Yes, I am Spain.”

60 Many have heard it on remote peninsulas,
On sleepy plains, in the aberrant fishermen’s islands
Or the corrupt heart of the city,
Have heard and migrated like gulls or the seeds of a flower.

They clung like burrs to the long expresses that lurch
Through the unjust lands, through the night, through the alpine tunnel;
They floated over the oceans;
They walked the passes. All presented their lives.

65 On that arid square, that fragment nipped off from hot
Africa, soldered so crudely to inventive Europe;
On that tableland scored by rivers,
Our thoughts have bodies; the menacing shapes of our fever

Are precise and alive. For the fears which made us respond

70 To the medicine ad. and the brochure of winter cruises
Have become invading battalions;
And our faces, the institute-face, the chain-store, the ruin

Are projecting their greed as the firing squad and the bomb.
Madrid is the heart. Our moments of tenderness blossom
75 As the ambulance and the sandbag;
Our hours of friendship into a people's army.

To-morrow, perhaps the future. The research on fatigue
And the movements of packers; the gradual exploring of all the Octaves of radiation;
80 To-morrow the enlarging of consciousness by diet and breathing.

To-morrow the rediscovery of romantic love,
The photographing of ravens; all the fun under Liberty's masterful shadow;
To-morrow the hour of the pageant-master and the musician,

85 The beautiful roar of the chorus under the dome;
To-morrow the exchanging of tips on the breeding of terriers,
The eager election of chairmen
By the sudden forest of hands. But to-day the struggle.

To-morrow for the young the poets exploding like bombs,

90 The walks by the lake, the weeks of perfect communion;
 To-morrow the bicycle races
Through the suburbs on summer evenings. But today the struggle.

 To-day the deliberate increase in the chances of death,
The conscious acceptance of guilt in the necessary murder;⁴

95 To-day the expending of powers
On the flat ephemeral pamphlet and the boring meeting.

 To-day the makeshift consolations: the shared cigarette,
The cards in the candlelit barn, and the scraping concert,
 The masculine jokes; to-day the
Fumbled and unsatisfactory embrace before hurting.

100 The stars are dead. The animals will not look.
We are left alone with our day, and the time is short,
 and
 History to the defeated
May say Alas but cannot help nor pardon.

Mar. 1937

Endnotes

- Note 1:
The Spanish Civil War, which began in 1936 as a rebellion by General Franco's right-wing army against the left-wing, elected Spanish government, was viewed by British liberal intellectuals as a testing struggle between fascism and democracy. Written while the war was raging, this poem appeared separately in 1937, the proceeds of its sale going to Medical Aid for Spain. In 1940 Auden retitled the poem "Spain 1937," deleted lines 69–76, and made other changes; later he removed the poem from his canon.

Return to reference 1

- Note 2: Ancient stone circle. Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Auden plays on the idea of a deus ex machina, literally a god from a machine, who appears suddenly in a play to resolve an impasse. "Dove": in the Bible, the form taken by the Holy Spirit when descending to Earth. Return to reference 3
- Note 4: After these two lines were criticized by George Orwell, Auden revised them to read "the inevitable increase" and "the fact of murder." Return to reference 4

Notes

- °: district Return to reference °

As I Walked Out One Evening¹

As I walked out one evening,
Walking down Bristol Street,
The crowds upon the pavement
Were fields of harvest wheat.

5 And down by the brimming river
I heard a lover sing
Under an arch of the railway:
"Love has no ending.

"I'll love you, dear, I'll love you
Till China and Africa meet
10 And the river jumps over the mountain
And the salmon sing in the street.

"I'll love you till the ocean
Is folded and hung up to dry
15 And the seven stars² go squawking
Like geese about the sky.

"The years shall run like rabbits
For in my arms I hold
The Flower of the Ages
20 And the first love of the world."

But all the clocks in the city
Began to whirr and chime:
"O let not Time deceive you,
You cannot conquer Time.

"In the burrows of the Nightmare

25 Where Justice naked is,
Time watches from the shadow
And coughs when you would kiss.

30 “In headaches and in worry
Vaguely life leaks away,
And Time will have his fancy
To-morrow or to-day.

35 “Into many a green valley
Drifts the appalling³ snow;
Time breaks the threaded dances
And the diver’s brilliant bow.

40 “O plunge your hands in water,
Plunge them in up to the wrist;
Stare, stare in the basin
And wonder what you’ve missed.

 “The glacier knocks in the cupboard,
The desert sighs in the bed,
And the crack in the tea-cup opens
A lane to the land of the dead.

45 “Where the beggars raffle the banknotes
And the Giant is enchanting to Jack,
And the Lily-white Boy is a Roarer
And Jill goes down on her back.⁴

50 “O look, look in the mirror,
O look in your distress;
Life remains a blessing
Although you cannot bless.

 “O stand, stand at the window
As the tears scald and start;

55 You shall love your crooked neighbour
 With your crooked heart."

 It was late, late in the evening,
 The lovers they were gone;
 The clocks had ceased their chiming
 And the deep river ran on.

60
Nov. 1937¹⁹³⁸, 1940

Endnotes

- Note 1: Title from Auden's later collections. Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The constellation of the Pleiades, supposed by the ancients to be seven sisters. Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Literally, making white. Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The giant of "Jack and the Bean Stalk" is trying to seduce Jack; the "lily-white Boy" (presumably pure) becomes a boisterous reveler; Jill, of "Jack and Jill," is seduced. Return to reference 4

Musée des Beaux Arts¹

About suffering they were never wrong,
The Old Masters: how well they understood
Its human position; how it takes place
While someone else is eating or opening a window or just walking dully along;
5 How, when the aged are reverently, passionately waiting
For the miraculous birth, there always must be Children who did not specially want it to happen, skating
On a pond at the edge of the wood:
They never forgot
10 That even the dreadful martyrdom must run its course
Anyhow in a corner, some untidy spot
Where the dogs go on with their doggy life and the torturer's horse
Scratches its innocent behind on a tree.

In Brueghel's Icarus,² for instance: how everything turns away
15 Quite leisurely from the disaster; the ploughman may
Have heard the splash, the forsaken cry,
But for him it was not an important failure; the sun shone
As it had to on the white legs disappearing into the green
Water; and the expensive delicate ship that must have seen
Something amazing, a boy falling out of the sky,

20
Dec. 19381940

Had somewhere to get to and sailed calmly on.

Endnotes

- Note 1: Museum of Fine Arts (French).Return to reference 1
- Note 2:
The Fall of Icarus, by the Flemish painter Pieter Brueghel (ca. 1525–1569), in the Musées Royaux des Beaux Arts in Brussels. In one corner of Brueghel's painting, Icarus's legs are seen disappearing into the sea, his wings having melted when he flew too close to the sun. Auden also alludes to other paintings by Brueghel: the nativity scene in The Numbering at Bethlehem, skaters in Winter Landscape with Skaters and a Bird Trap, and possibly animals in The Massacre of the Innocents.
Return to reference 2

In Memory of W. B. Yeats¹

(d. January 1939)

I

He disappeared in the dead of winter:
The brooks were frozen, the air-ports almost deserted,
And snow disfigured the public statues;
The mercury sank in the mouth of the dying day.
O all the instruments agree
5 The day of his death was a dark cold day.

Far from his illness
The wolves ran on through the evergreen forests,
The peasant river was untempted by the fashionable quays;
By mourning tongues
10 The death of the poet was kept from his poems.

But for him it was his last afternoon as himself,
An afternoon of nurses and rumours;
The provinces of his body revolted,
The squares of his mind were empty,
15 Silence invaded the suburbs,
The current of his feeling failed: he became his admirers.

Now he is scattered among a hundred cities
And wholly given over to unfamiliar affections;
To find his happiness in another kind of wood²
20 And be punished under a foreign code of conscience.

The words of a dead man
Are modified in the guts of the living.

25 But in the importance and noise of to-morrow
When the brokers are roaring like beasts on the floor of the Bourse,³
And the poor have the sufferings to which they are fairly accustomed,
And each in the cell of himself is almost convinced of
his freedom;
A few thousand will think of this day
As one thinks of a day when one did something slightly unusual.

30 O all the instruments agree
The day of his death was a dark cold day.

II

You were silly like us: your gift survived it all;
The parish of rich women,⁴ physical decay,
Yourself; mad Ireland hurt you into poetry.
Now Ireland has her madness and her weather still,
35 For poetry makes nothing happen: it survives
In the valley of its saying where executives
Would never want to tamper; it flows south
From ranches of isolation and the busy griefs,
Raw towns that we believe and die in; it survives,
40 A way of happening, a mouth.

III⁵

Earth, receive an honoured guest;
William Yeats is laid to rest:
Let the Irish vessel lie

45 Emptied of its poetry.
Time that is intolerant
Of the brave and innocent,
And indifferent in a week
To a beautiful physique,
50 Worships language and forgives
Everyone by whom it lives;
Pardons cowardice, conceit,
Lays its honours at their feet.
Time that with this strange excuse
55 Pardoned Kipling⁶ and his views,
And will pardon Paul Claudel,⁷
Pardons him for writing well.
In the nightmare of the dark
All the dogs of Europe bark,⁸
60 And the living nations wait,
Each sequestered in its hate;
Intellectual disgrace
Stares from every human face,
And the seas of pity lie
65 Locked and frozen in each eye.
Follow, poet, follow right
To the bottom of the night,
With your unconstraining voice
Still persuade us to rejoice;
70 With the farming of a verse
Make a vineyard of the curse,
Sing of human unsuccess
In a rapture of distress;

In the deserts of the heart
 Let the healing fountain start,
 In the prison of his days
 Teach the free man how to praise.

Feb. 1939 1939, 1940

Endnotes

- Note 1: The Irish poet William Butler Yeats, born in 1865, died on January 29, 1939, in Roquebrune (southern France). Return to reference 1
- Note 2: See the beginning of Dante's Inferno: "In the middle of the journey of our life I came to myself in a dark wood where the straight way was lost" (1.1–3). Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The French stock exchange. Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Several wealthy women, including Lady Augusta Gregory (1852–1932), provided financial help to Yeats. Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The stanza pattern of this section echoes that of Yeats's late poem "Under Ben Bulbin." Auden later omitted the section's second, third, and fourth stanzas. Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The British writer Rudyard Kipling (1865–1936) championed imperialism. Return to reference 6
- Note 7: French author (1868–1955) with extremely conservative politics. Yeats was at times antidemocratic and appeared to favor dictatorship. Return to reference 7
- Note 8: World War II began in September 1939. Return to reference 8

The Unknown Citizen

To JS/07/M/378

This Marble Monument is Erected by the State

He was found by the Bureau of Statistics to be
One against whom there was no official complaint,
And all the reports on his conduct agree
That, in the modern sense of an old-fashioned word,
he was a saint,
5 For in everything he did he served the Greater Community.
Except for the War till the day he retired
He worked in a factory and never got fired,
But satisfied his employers, Fudge Motors Inc.
Yet he wasn't a scab or odd in his views,
10 For his Union reports that he paid his dues,
(Our report on his Union shows it was sound)
And our Social Psychology workers found
That he was popular with his mates and liked a drink.
The Press are convinced that he bought a paper
every day
15 And that his reactions to advertisements were normal in every way.
Policies taken out in his name prove that he was fully insured,
And his Health-card shows he was once in hospital
but left it cured.
Both Producers Research and High-Grade Living declare

He was fully sensible to the advantages of the Installment Plan
And had everything necessary to the Modern Man;
20 A gramophone, a radio, a car and a frigidaire.
Our researchers into Public Opinion are content
That he held the proper opinions for the time of year;
When there was peace, he was for peace; when there was war, he went.
25 He was married and added five children to the population,
Which our Eugenist¹ says was the right number for a parent of his generation,
And our teachers report that he never interfered with their education.
Was he free? Was he happy? The question is absurd:
Had anything been wrong, we should certainly have heard.

Mar. 1939 1939, 1940

Endnotes

- Note 1: An expert in eugenics, a pseudoscience for the genetic “improvement” of humans. Return to reference 1

September 1, 1939¹

I sit in one of the dives
On Fifty-Second Street²
Uncertain and afraid
As the clever hopes expire
Of a low dishonest decade:
5 Waves of anger and fear
Circulate over the bright
And darkened lands of the earth,
Obsessing our private lives;
The unmentionable odour of death
10 Offends the September night.

Accurate scholarship can Unearth the whole offence
From Luther³ until now
That has driven a culture mad,
15 Find what occurred at Linz,⁴
What huge imago⁵ made
A psychopathic god:
I and the public know
What all schoolchildren learn,
20 Those to whom evil is done
Do evil in return.

Exiled Thucydides⁶ knew
All that a speech can say
About Democracy,
25 And what dictators do,
The elderly rubbish they talk
To an apathetic grave;

Analysed all in his book,
The enlightenment driven away,
30 The habit-forming pain,
Mismanagement and grief:
We must suffer them all again.

Into this neutral air
Where blind skyscrapers use
35 Their full height to proclaim
The strength of Collective Man,
Each language pours its vain
Competitive excuse:
But who can live for long
40 In an euphoric dream;
Out of the mirror they stare,
Imperialism's face
And the international wrong.

Faces along the bar
45 Cling to their average day:
The lights must never go out,
The music must always play,
All the conventions conspire
To make this fort assume 50 The furniture of home;
Lest we should see where we are,
Lost in a haunted wood,
Children afraid of the night
Who have never been happy or good.
55

The windiest militant trash
Important Persons shout
Is not so crude as our wish:
What mad Nijinsky wrote
About Diaghilev²
60 Is true of the normal heart;

For the error bred in the bone
Of each woman and each man
Craves what it cannot have,
Not universal love
65 But to be loved alone.

From the conservative dark
Into the ethical life
The dense commuters come,
Repeating their morning vow,
70 "I will be true to the wife,
I'll concentrate more on my work,"
And helpless governors wake
To resume their compulsory game:
Who can release them now,
75 Who can reach the deaf,
Who can speak for the dumb?⁸

All I have is a voice
To undo the folded lie,
The romantic lie in the brain
80 Of the sensual man-in-the-street
And the lie of Authority
Whose buildings grope the sky:
There is no such thing as the State
And no one exists alone;
85 Hunger allows no choice
To the citizen or the police;
We must love one another or die.⁹

Defenceless under the night
Our world in stupor lies;
90 Yet, dotted everywhere,
Ironic points of light
Flash out wherever the Just Exchange their messages:

May I, composed like them
 Of Eros^o and of dust,
 Beleaguered by the same
 Negation and despair,
 Show an affirming flame.

Sept. 1939 1939, 1940

Endnotes

- Note 1: The date of Germany's invasion of Poland and the outbreak of World War II. Return to reference 1
- Note 2: In New York City, where Auden was living. Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Martin Luther (1483–1546), founder of the Protestant Reformation. Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Austrian city where Hitler spent his childhood. Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Psychoanalytic term for the unconscious representation of a parental figure. Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Greek general (d. ca. 401 B.C.E.) and historian of the Peloponnesian War, exiled from Athens because he failed to prevent the Spartans from seizing a colony. Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The Russian dancer and choreographer Vaslav Nijinsky (1890–1950) wrote that his former lover, the ballet impresario Sergey Diaghilev (1872–1929), "does not want universal love, but to be loved alone." Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Proverbs 31:8. Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Auden later revised this line, which struck him as "dishonest." In one version of the poem the line reads: "We must love one another and die." Another version leaves out the entire stanza. Return to reference 9

Notes

- °: Greek god of desireReturn to reference °

In Praise of Limestone¹

If it form the one landscape that we the inconstant ones

Are consistently homesick for, this is chiefly Because it dissolves in water. Mark these rounded slopes

5 With their surface fragrance of thyme and beneath
A secret system of caves and conduits; hear these springs

That spurt out everywhere with a chuckle
Each filling a private pool for its fish and carving
Its own little ravine whose cliffs entertain
The butterfly and the lizard; examine this region
Of short distances and definite places:

10 What could be more like Mother or a fitter background

For her son, for the nude young male who lounges
Against a rock displaying his dildo,^o never doubting That for all his faults he is loved, whose works are but

15 Extensions of his power to charm? From weathered outcrop

To hill-top temple, from appearing waters to Conspicuous fountains, from a wild to a formal vineyard,

Are ingenious but short steps that a child's wish
To receive more attention than his brothers, whether
By pleasing or teasing, can easily take.

20

Watch, then, the band of rivals as they climb up and down

Their steep stone gennels² in twos and threes, sometimes
 Arm in arm, but never, thank God, in step; or engaged
 On the shady side of a square at midday in Voluble discourse, knowing each other too well to think
 There are any important secrets, unable
 To conceive a god whose temper-tantrums are moral
 And not to be pacified by a clever line
 Or a good lay: for, accustomed to a stone that responds,
 They have never had to veil their faces in awe
 Of a crater whose blazing fury could not be fixed;
 Adjusted to the local needs of valleys
 Where everything can be touched or reached by walking,
 Their eyes have never looked into infinite space
 Through the lattice-work of a nomad's comb; born lucky,
 Their legs have never encountered the fungi
 And insects of the jungle, the monstrous forms and lives
 With which we have nothing, we like to hope, in common.
 So, when one of them goes to the bad, the way his mind works
 Remains comprehensible: to become a pimp
 Or deal in fake jewelry or ruin a fine tenor voice
 For effects that bring down the house could happen to all
 But the best and the worst of us . . .
 That is why, I suppose,

The best and worst never stayed here long but sought
45 Immoderate soils where the beauty was not so external,
The light less public and the meaning of life
Something more than a mad camp. "Come!" cried
the granite wastes,
"How evasive is your humor, how accidental Your kindest kiss, how permanent is death." (Saints-to-be 50 Slipped away sighing.) "Come!" purred the clays and gravels
"On our plains there is room for armies to drill; rivers Wait to be tamed and slaves to construct you a tomb
In the grand manner: soft as the earth is mankind and both Need to be altered." (Intendant Caesars rose and Left, slamming the door.) But the really reckless were 55 fetched
By an older colder voice, the oceanic whisper:
"I am the solitude that asks and promises nothing;
That is how I shall set you free. There is no love;
There are only the various envies, all of them sad."
60 They were right, my dear, all those voices were right
And still are; this land is not the sweet home that it looks,
Nor its peace the historical calm of a site
Where something was settled once and for all: A backward
And dilapidated province, connected
65 To the big busy world by a tunnel, with a certain Seedy appeal, is that all it is now? Not quite:
It has a worldly duty which in spite of itself
It does not neglect, but calls into question

All the Great Powers assume; it disturbs our rights.
The poet,
Admired for his earnest habit of calling
70 The sun the sun, his mind Puzzle, is made uneasy
By these solid statues which so obviously doubt
His antimythological myth; and these gamins,^o
Pursuing the scientist down the tiled colonnade
75 With such lively offers, rebuke his concern for Nature's
Remotest aspects: I, too, am reproached, for what
And how much you know. Not to lose time, not to get caught,
Not to be left behind, not, please! to resemble
The beasts who repeat themselves, or a thing like water
Or stone whose conduct can be predicted, these 80 Are our Common Prayer³ whose greatest comfort is music
Which can be made anywhere, is invisible,
And does not smell. In so far as we have to look forward
To death as a fact, no doubt we are right: But if Sins can be forgiven, if bodies rise from the dead, 85 These modifications of matter into Innocent athletes and gesticulating fountains,
Made solely for pleasure, make a further point:
The blessed will not care what angle they are regarded from,
90 Having nothing to hide. Dear, I know nothing of Either, but when I try to imagine a faultless love
Or the life to come, what I hear is the murmur
Of underground streams, what I see is a limestone landscape.

May 1948 1948, 1951

Endnotes

- Note 1:
Inspired by the limestone landscape outside Florence, Italy, where Auden and his longtime companion Chester Kallman (1921–1975) were staying; the poem also recalls the poet's native Yorkshire. In a letter to Elizabeth Mayer, Auden wrote: "I hadn't realised till I came how like Italy is to my 'Mutterland', the Pennines [hills in the north of England]. Am in fact starting on a poem, 'In Praise of Limestone', the theme of which is that rock creates the only truly human landscape."
Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Narrow passages between houses (Yorkshire dialect) or, as here, rocks.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The Book of Common Prayer is the liturgical book of the Anglican Church.Return to reference 3

Notes

- °: penisReturn to reference °
- °: urchinsReturn to reference °

The Shield of Achilles¹

5 She looked over his shoulder
For vines and olive trees,
Marble well-governed cities,
And ships upon untamed seas,
But there on the shining metal
His hands had put instead
An artificial wilderness
And a sky like lead.

10 A plain without a feature, bare and brown,
No blade of grass, no sign of neighborhood,
Nothing to eat and nowhere to sit down,
Yet, congregated on its blankness, stood
An unintelligible multitude,
A million eyes, a million boots in line,
Without expression, waiting for a sign.

15 Out of the air a voice without a face Proved by statistics that some cause was just
In tones as dry and level as the place:
No one was cheered and nothing was discussed;
Column by column in a cloud of dust
20 They marched away enduring a belief
Whose logic brought them, somewhere else, to grief.

25 She looked over his shoulder
For ritual pieties,
White flower-garlanded heifers,
Libation and sacrifice,²
But there on the shining metal
Where the altar should have been,

She saw by his flickering forge-light
Quite another scene.

Barbed wire enclosed an arbitrary spot
Where bored officials lounged (one cracked a joke)
And sentries sweated, for the day was hot:
A crowd of ordinary decent folk Watched from without and neither moved nor spoke
As three pale figures were led forth and bound
To three posts driven upright in the ground.

40 The mass and majesty of this world, all
That carries weight and always weighs the same,
Lay in the hands of others; they were small
And could not hope for help and no help came:
What their foes liked to do was done, their shame
Was all the worst could wish; they lost their pride
And died as men before their bodies died.

45 She looked over his shoulder
For athletes at their games,
Men and women in a dance
Moving their sweet limbs
Quick, quick, to music,
But there on the shining shield
50 His hands had set no dancing-floor
But a weed-choked field.

55 A ragged urchin, aimless and alone,
 Loitered about that vacancy; a bird
 Flew up to safety from his well-aimed stone:
 That girls are raped, that two boys knife a third,
 Were axioms to him, who'd never heard
 Of any world where promises were kept
 Or one could weep because another wept.

60 The thin-lipped armorer,
 Hephaestos, hobbled away;
 Thetis of the shining breasts
 Cried out in dismay
 At what the god had wrought
65 To please her son, the strong
 Iron-hearted man-slaying Achilles
 Who would not live long.

19521952, 1955

Endnotes

- Note 1:
In Homer's Iliad, Achilles, the chief Greek hero in the war with Troy, lends his armor to his great friend Patroclus and loses it when Patroclus is killed by Hector. While Achilles is mourning the death of his friend, his mother, the goddess Thetis, goes to Mt. Olympus to beg Hephaestos, the god of fire, to forge new armor for Achilles. The splendid shield of Achilles that Hephaestos then makes is described in book 18 (lines 478–608). On it he depicts Earth, the heavens, the sea, and the planets; a city in peace (with a wedding and a trial) and a city at war; scenes from country life, animal life, and the joyful life of young men and women. The ocean, as the outer border, flows around all these scenes.
Return to reference 1
- Note 2: See John Keats's "Ode on a Grecian Urn" (1820): "Who are these coming to the sacrifice? / To what green altar, O mysterious priest, / Lead'st thou that heifer lowing at the skies, / And all her silken flanks with garlands dressed?" "Libation": sacrifice of wine or other liquid.
Return to reference 2

DYLAN THOMAS

1914–1953

Dylan Thomas was born in Swansea, Wales, and educated at Swansea Grammar School. After working for a time as a newspaper reporter, he was “discovered” as a poet in 1933 through a poetry contest in a popular newspaper. The following year his Eighteen Poems caused considerable excitement because of their powerfully suggestive obscurity and the strange violence of their imagery. It looked as though a new kind of visionary Romanticism had been restored to English poetry after the deliberately muted ironic tones of T. S. Eliot and his followers. Over time it became clear that Thomas was also a master of poetic craft, not merely a shouting rhapsodist. His verbal panache played against strict verse forms, such as the villanelle (“Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night”). “I am a painstaking, conscientious, involved and devious craftsman in words,” he wrote in his “Poetic Manifesto.” His images were carefully ordered in a patterned sequence, and his major theme was the unity of all life, the continuing process of life and death and new life that linked the generations. Thomas saw the workings of biology as a magical transformation producing unity out of diversity, and again and again in his poetry he sought a poetic ritual to celebrate this unity (“The force that through the green fuse drives the flower / Drives my green age”). He saw men and women locked in cycles of growth, love, procreation, new growth, death, and new life again. Hence each image engenders its opposite in what he called “my dialectical method”: “Each image holds within it the seed of its own destruction.” Thomas derives his closely woven, sometimes self-contradictory images from the Bible, Welsh folklore and preaching, and Freud. In his poems of reminiscence and autobiographical emotion, such as “Poem in October,” he communicates more immediately through compelling use of lyrical feeling and simple natural images. His autobiographical work Portrait of the Artist as a Young Dog (1940) and his radio play Under Milk Wood (1954) reveal a vividness of observation and a combination of violence and tenderness in expression that show he could handle prose as excitingly as verse.

Thomas was a brilliant talker, an alcoholic, and an impulsive man whose short life was packed with emotional ups and downs. His poetry readings in the United States between 1950 and 1953 were enormous successes, in spite of his sometimes reckless antics. He died suddenly in New York of what was diagnosed as “an insult to the brain,” precipitated by alcohol. He played the part of the wild bohemian poet, and while some thought this behavior wonderful, others deplored it. He was a stirring reader of his own and others’ poems, and many people who do not normally read poetry were drawn to Thomas’s by the magic of his own reading. After his premature death a reaction set in: some critics declared that he had been overrated as a poet because of his sensational life. The “Movement” poets, such as Philip Larkin, repudiated his rhetorical extravagance. Even so, Thomas is still considered an original poet of great power and beauty.

The Force That Through the Green Fuse Drives the Flower

The force that through the green fuse drives the flower
Drives my green age; that blasts the roots of trees
Is my destroyer.
And I am dumb to tell the crooked rose
My youth is bent by the same wintry fever.
5

The force that drives the water through the rocks Drives my red blood; that dries the mouthing streams
Turns mine to wax.
And I am dumb to mouth unto my veins
How at the mountain spring the same mouth sucks.
10

The hand that whirls the water in the pool¹
Stirs the quicksand; that ropes the blowing wind
Hauls my shroud sail.
And I am dumb to tell the hanging man
How of my clay is made the hangman's lime.²
15

The lips of time leech to the fountain head;
Love drips and gathers, but the fallen blood
Shall calm her sores.

And I am dumb to tell a weather's wind
How time has ticked a heaven round the stars.
20

And I am dumb to tell the lover's tomb
How at my sheet goes the same crooked worm.

Endnotes

- Note 1: The hand of the angel who troubles the water of the pool Bethesda, thus rendering it curative, in John 5:1–4.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Quicklime was sometimes poured into the graves of public hangmen's victims to accelerate decomposition.Return to reference 2

The Hunchback in the Park

5 The hunchback in the park
A solitary mister
Propped between trees and water
From the opening of the garden lock
That lets the trees and water enter
Until the Sunday sombre bell at dark¹

10 Eating bread from a newspaper
Drinking water from the chained cup
That the children filled with gravel
In the fountain basin where I sailed my ship
Slept at night in a dog kennel
But nobody chained him up.

15 Like the park birds he came early
Like the water he sat down
And Mister they called Hey mister
The truant boys from the town
Running when he had heard them clearly
On out of sound

20 Past lake and rockery^o
Laughing when he shook his paper
Hunchbacked in mockery
Through the loud zoo of the willow groves
Dodging the park keeper
With his stick that picked up leaves.

25 And the old dog sleeper
Alone between nurses and swans
While the boys among willows

30 Made the tigers jump out of their eyes
 To roar on the rockery stones
 And the groves were blue with sailors

35 Made all day until bell time
 A woman figure without fault
 Straight as a young elm
 Straight and tall from his crooked bones
 That she might stand in the night
 After the locks and chains

40 All night in the unmade park
 After the railings and shrubberies
 The birds the grass the trees the lake
 And the wild boys innocent as strawberries
 Had followed the hunchback
 To his kennel in the dark.

19411946

Endnotes

- Note 1: The bell indicates the park's closing for the night.Return to reference 1

Notes

- °: rock gardenReturn to reference °

Poem in October

It was my thirtieth year to heaven
Woke to my hearing from harbour and neighbour wood
And the mussel pooled and the heron
Priested shore
The morning beckon
5 With water praying and call of seagull and rook¹
And the knock of sailing boats on the net webbed wall
Myself to set foot
That second
10 In the still sleeping town and set forth.
My birthday began with the water-Birds and the birds of the winged trees flying my name
Above the farms and the white horses
And I rose
In rainy autumn
15 And walked abroad in a shower of all my days.
High tide and the heron dived when I took the road
Over the border
And the gates
20 Of the town closed as the town awoke.
A springful of larks in a rolling Cloud and the roadside bushes brimming with whistling
Blackbirds and the sun of October
Summery
On the hill's shoulder,

25 Here were fond climates and sweet singers suddenly Come in the morning where I wandered and listened
To the rain wringing
Wind blow cold
30 In the wood faraway under me.

Pale rain over the dwindling harbour
And over the sea wet church the size of a snail
With its horns through mist and the castle
Brown as owls
But all the gardens
35 Of spring and summer were blooming in the tall tales
Beyond the border and under the lark full cloud.
There could I marvel
My birthday
40 Away but the weather turned around.

It turned away from the blithe country
And down the other air and the blue altered sky
Streamed again a wonder of summer
With apples
Pears and red currants
45 And I saw in the turning so clearly a child's Forgotten mornings when he walked with his mother
Through the parables
Of sun light
50 And the legends of the green chapels

And the twice told fields of infancy
That his tears burned my cheeks and his heart moved in mine.
These were the woods the river and sea
Where a boy
In the listening 55 Summertime of the dead whispered the truth of his joy

To the trees and the stones and the fish in the tide.
And the mystery
Sang alive
Still in the water and singingbirds.
60
And there could I marvel my birthday
Away but the weather turned around. And the true
Joy of the long dead child sang burning
In the sun.
It was my thirtieth
65 Year to heaven stood there then in the summer noon
Though the town below lay leaved with October blood.
O may my heart's truth
Still be sung
On this high hill in a year's turning.

70
19441946

Endnotes

- Note 1: A large type of crow.Return to reference 1

Fern Hill¹

Now as I was young and easy under the apple boughs
About the lilting house and happy as the grass was
green,
The night above the dingle² starry,
Time let me hail and climb
Golden in the heydays of his eyes,
5 And honoured among wagons I was prince of the apple towns
And once below a time I lordly had the trees and leaves
Trail with daisies and barley
Down the rivers of the windfall light.

10 And as I was green and carefree, famous among the barns
About the happy yard and singing as the farm was home,
In the sun that is young once only,
Time let me play and be
Golden in the mercy of his means, 15 And green and golden I was huntsman and herdsman, the calves
Sang to my horn, the foxes on the hills barked clear and cold,
And the sabbath rang slowly
In the pebbles of the holy streams.

20 All the sun long it was running, it was lovely, the hay Fields high as the house, the tunes from the chimneys, it was air

And playing, lovely and watery
And fire green as grass.
And nightly under the simple stars
As I rode to sleep the owls were bearing the farm away,
25 All the moon long I heard, blessed among stables,
the night-jars³
Flying with the ricks,^o and the horses
Flashing into the dark.

And then to awake, and the farm, like a wanderer
white
With the dew, come back, the cock on his shoulder:
it was all
30 Shining, it was Adam and maiden,⁴
The sky gathered again
And the sun grew round that very day.
So it must have been after the birth of the simple light
In the first, spinning place, the spellbound horses walking warm
35 Out of the whinnying green stable
On to the fields of praise.

And honoured among foxes and pheasants by the gay house
Under the new made clouds and happy as the heart was long,
In the sun born over and over,
40 I ran my heedless ways,
My wishes raced through the house high hay
And nothing I cared, at my sky blue trades, that time allows
In all his tuneful turning so few and such morning songs
Before the children green and golden

45 Follow him out of grace,
Nothing I cared, in the lamb white days, that time would take me
Up to the swallow thronged loft by the shadow of my hand,
In the moon that is always rising,
Nor that riding to sleep
I should hear him fly with the high fields
50 And wake to the farm forever fled from the childless land.
Oh as I was young and easy in the mercy of his means,
Time held me green and dying
Though I sang in my chains like the sea.

19451946

Endnotes

- Note 1: Name of the Welsh farmhouse, home of his aunt Ann Jones, where Thomas spent summer holidays as a boy.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Deep dell or hollow, usually wooded.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Species of bird.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: See Genesis 1.Return to reference 4

Notes

- °: haystacksReturn to reference °

Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night

Do not go gentle into that good night,
Old age should burn and rave at close of day;
Rage, rage against the dying of the light.

5 Though wise men at their end know dark is right,
Because their words had forked no lightning they
Do not go gentle into that good night.

Good men, the last wave by, crying how bright
Their frail deeds might have danced in a green bay,
Rage, rage against the dying of the light.

10 Wild men who caught and sang the sun in flight,
And learn, too late, they grieved it on its way,
Do not go gentle into that good night.

15 Grave men, near death, who see with blinding sight
Blind eyes could blaze like meteors and be gay,
Rage, rage against the dying of the light.

And you, my father, there on the sad height,
Curse, bless, me now with your fierce tears, I pray.
Do not go gentle into that good night.
Rage, rage against the dying of the light.

19511952

Voices from World War II

In December 1939, a few months after the start of World War II, a leading article in the Times Literary Supplement urged poets to do their duty: “it is for the poets to sound the trumpet call. . . . The monstrous threat to belief and freedom which we are fighting should urge new psalmists to fresh songs of deliverance.” The biblical diction reveals the underlying expectation that the poets of 1940 would come forward, like those of 1914, to sanctify the cause with images of sacrifice derived from Jesus Christ’s precedent and precept: “greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.” Far from taking up trumpets, the poets responded bitterly—C. Day-Lewis with the poem “Where Are the War Poets?”:

They who in folly or mere greed
Enslaved religion, markets, laws,
Borrow our language now and bid
Us to speak up in freedom’s cause.

It is the logic of our times,
No subject for immortal verse—
That we who lived by honest dreams
Defend the bad against the worse.

With few exceptions the British poets of the 1930s had been born shortly before the outbreak of World War I, and those who were to be the poets of World War II were born during that earlier conflict. They grew up not, as Rupert Brooke, in the sunlit peace of Georgian England but amid wars and rumors of wars. They lived through the Great Depression and the rise of fascism. Introduced to the horrors of the last war—increased to mythic proportions by their fathers, uncles, and elder brothers—they were continually reminded of it by a flood of best-selling battle memoirs: Edmund Blunden’s Undertones of War (1928), Robert Graves’s Goodbye to All That (1929), Siegfried Sassoon's Memoirs of an Infantry Officer (1930) and Sherston's Progress (1936), and David Jones's In Parenthesis (1937). By then another myth, that of the Next War, was taking even more terrifying shape. Western intellectuals' last hope for the 1930s rested with the ragged troops of the left-wing Spanish Republic in their civil war against the right-wing Spanish army that had mutinied in 1936 against the country's elected government. Democracy and fascism were at last in the open, fighting a war that many thought would determine not simply the future of Spain but the future of Europe. With the final defeat of the Spanish Republicans in 1938, the Next War ceased to be a myth so much as an all-but-inescapable certainty.

World War I had been fought, for the most part, on the land, and its emblem in popular mythology was the trench. After the indiscriminate killing of civilians in a bombing raid—by German aircraft—on the Spanish town of Guernica in 1937, the emblem of the Next War was the bomb, the fire from heaven. Horrified by pictures of children bombed by Franco's fascist forces in the Spanish Civil War, Virginia Woolf was moved on the eve of World War II to write her long pacifist polemic, Three Guineas (1938). Subjecting nationalism to fierce irony and indicting the masculinist assertion of power, Woolf appealed for a cosmopolitanism, inflected by the experiences of women, in which one's country is the "whole world." In her diary she summed up what she considered her role as writer and intellectual in wartime: "Thinking is my fighting."

On September 1, 1939, Germany, in pursuit of imperial ambitions and without warning, launched a savage attack on Poland by land and air. Two days later Britain and France declared war on Germany. By the end of the month, Germany and its ally Russia had, between them, defeated and partitioned Poland. Russia then attacked Finland, and in April 1940 Germany invaded Denmark and Norway. For Britain and France the period of inactivity that came to be known as "The Phoney War" ended in May, when the German army overran Luxembourg and invaded the Netherlands and Belgium; their armored columns raced for the English Channel. Cut off, the British forces were evacuated by sea, with heavy losses, from Dunkirk, and in June, France signed an armistice with Germany. In August, as prelude to an invasion, the German Luftwaffe (air force) attacked England. Over the months that followed, the fighter pilots of the Royal Air Force (RAF) challenged the enemy bombers' nightly blitz of London and other major cities. The Battle of Britain, as it came to be called, cost the Luftwaffe twenty-three hundred planes, and the RAF, nine hundred. The losses forced the Germans to postpone their plans for invasion.

The dome of St. Paul's Cathedral, 1940. Despite some direct hits, St. Paul's stands in the midst of smoke and flames caused by the German air force's nightly bombing, or blitz, of London and other major British cities. On December 29, more than ten thousand incendiary bombs fell on the capital.

In 1941, Woolf imagined the coming fury, which would be a factor in her suicide. At the end of Woolf's novel Between the Acts, the village pageant of English history is over, and Mr. Streatfield's speech of thanks is interrupted: "A zoom severed it. Twelve aeroplanes in perfect formation like a flight of wild duck came overhead." The following year Edith Sitwell depicted the blitz in "Still Falls the Rain," as did T. S. Eliot in part 2 of "Little Gidding." The Battle of Britain, however, was not the only battle, and British poets were already responding to war on land and at sea as well as in the air. The dominant mood of their poetry is strikingly unlike that from and about the trenches of the Western Front. Just as the heroics of 1914 were impossible in 1940 (although there was no lack of heroism), so too was the antipropagandist indignation of a Siegfried Sassoon. Now that everybody knew about the Battle of the Somme, the bombing of Guernica, London, and Dresden, who could be surprised by evidence of "Man's inhumanity to man"? In the draft preface to his poems, one of the more influential poetic manifestos of the twentieth century, Wilfred Owen had written: "All a poet can do today is warn. That is why the true poets must be truthful." His warnings and those of his contemporaries had been uttered in vain, but the poets and novelists of World War II knew they must be truthful, true to their wartime experience of boredom and brutality, true to their humanity, and above all resistant to the murderous inhumanity of the machines.

VIRGINIA WOOLF

In 1938, the year before the outbreak of full-blown war, when battles were already raging in Spain and Hitler's Nazism and Mussolini's fascism were extending their reach in Europe and Africa, Virginia Woolf wrote Three Guineas (see the introduction to Woolf [1882–1941] and the selection of her works earlier in this volume). In this long essay on war and gender, nationalism, and pacifism, she identifies the foundations of conflict in patriarchy and in the intimate connections among different forms of domination. Although Woolf doesn't believe that women are inherently pacifist, she argues that they must stand as ironic outsiders to the nationalism and militarism often mobilized, ostensibly, in their defense.

"This morning I got a packet of photographs from Spain, all of dead children, killed by bombs." So Woolf wrote to her nephew Julian Bell, on November 14, 1936. Within a year her nephew himself was dead, killed while driving an ambulance for the anti-fascist Republican forces in Spain. These war photographs and Bell's death, together with the pressure of the impending conflagration, spurred Woolf's meditation on war in relation to gender inequities and social power. The epistolary essay is written in the form of a freewheeling but hard-edged reply to a male correspondent who had asked her three years earlier, "How in your opinion are we to prevent war?" He had also invited her to join a society for war's prevention. Refusing his overture, she argues for the feminist cosmopolitan who has the courage to say, "as a woman I have no country. As a woman I want no country. As a woman my country is the whole world."

From Three Guineas

[AS A WOMAN I HAVE NO COUNTRY]

* * *

To begin with an elementary distinction: a society is a conglomeration of people joined together for certain aims; while you, who write in your own person with your own hand are single. You the individual are a man whom we have reason to respect; a man of the brotherhood, to which, as biography proves, many brothers have belonged. Thus Anne Clough,¹ describing her brother, says: "Arthur is my best friend and adviser. . . . Arthur is the comfort and joy of my life; it is for him, and from him, that I am incited to seek after all that is lovely and of good report." To which William Wordsworth, speaking of his sister but answering the other as if one nightingale called to another in the forests of the past, replies:

The Blessing of my later years
Was with me when a Boy:
She gave me eyes, she gave me ears;
And humble cares, and delicate fears;
A heart, the fountain of sweet tears;
And love, and thought, and joy.²

Such was, such perhaps still is, the relationship of many brothers and sisters in private, as individuals. They respect each other and help each other and have aims in common. Why then, if such can be their private relationship, as biography and poetry prove, should their public relationship, as law and history prove, be so very different? And here, since you are a lawyer, with a lawyer's memory, it is not necessary to remind you of certain decrees of English law from its first records to the year 1919 by way of proving that the public, the society relationship of brother and sister has been very different from the private. The very word "society" sets tolling in memory the dismal bells of a harsh music: shall not, shall not, shall not. You shall not learn; you shall not earn; you shall not own; you shall not—such was the society relationship of brother to sister for many centuries. And though it is possible, and to the optimistic credible, that in time a new society may ring a carillon³ of splendid harmony, and your letter heralds it, that day is far distant. Inevitably we ask ourselves, is there not something in the conglomeration of people into societies that releases what is most selfish and violent, least rational and humane in the individuals themselves? Inevitably we look upon society, so kind to you, so harsh to us, as an ill-fitting form that distorts the truth; deforms the mind; fetters the will. Inevitably we look upon societies as conspiracies that sink the private brother, whom many of us have reason to respect, and inflate in his stead a monstrous male, loud of voice, hard of fist, childishly intent upon scoring the floor of the earth with chalk marks, within whose mystic boundaries human beings are penned, rigidly, separately, artificially; where, daubed red and gold, decorated like a savage with feathers he goes through mystic rites and enjoys the dubious pleasures of power and dominion while we, "his" women, are locked in the private house without share in the many societies of which his society is composed. For such reasons compact as they are of many memories and emotions—for who shall analyse the complexity of a mind that holds so deep a reservoir of time past within it?—it seems both wrong for us rationally and impossible for us emotionally to fill up your form and join your society. For by so doing we should merge our identity in yours; follow and repeat and score still deeper the old worn ruts in which society, like a gramophone whose needle has stuck, is grinding out with intolerable unanimity "Three hundred millions spent upon arms." We should not give effect to a view which our own experience of "society" should have helped us to envisage. Thus, Sir, while we respect you as a private person and prove it by giving you a guinea⁴ to spend as you choose, we believe that we can help you most effectively by refusing to join your society; by working for our common ends—justice and equality and liberty for all men and women—outside your society, not within.

But this, you will say, if it means anything, can only mean that you, the daughters of educated men, who have promised us your positive help, refuse to join our society in order that you may make another of your own. And what sort of society do you propose to found outside ours, but in co-operation with it, so that we may both work together for our common ends? That is a question which you have every right to ask, and which we must try to answer in order to justify our refusal to sign the form you send. Let us then draw rapidly in outline the kind of society which the daughters of educated men might found and join outside your society but in co-operation with its ends. In the first place, this new society, you will be relieved to learn, would have no honorary treasurer, for it would need no funds. It would have no office, no committee, no secretary; it would call no meetings; it would hold no conferences. If name it must have, it could be called the Outsiders' Society. That is not a resonant name, but it has the advantage that it squares with facts—the facts of history, of law, of biography; even, it may be, with the still hidden facts of our still unknown psychology. It would consist of educated men's daughters working in their own class—how indeed can they work in any other?⁵ and by their own methods for liberty, equality and peace. Their first duty, to which they would bind themselves not by oath, for oaths and ceremonies have no part in a society which must be anonymous and elastic before everything, would be not to fight with arms. This is easy for them to observe, for in fact, as the papers inform us, "the Army Council have no intention of opening recruiting for any women's corps."⁶ The country ensures it. Next they would refuse in the event of war to make munitions or nurse the wounded. Since in the last war both these activities were mainly discharged by the daughters of working men, the pressure upon them here too would be slight, though probably disagreeable. On the other hand the next duty to which they would pledge themselves is one of considerable difficulty, and calls not only for courage and initiative, but for the special knowledge of the educated man's daughter. It is, briefly, not to incite their brothers to fight, or to dissuade them, but to maintain an attitude of complete indifference. But the attitude expressed by the word "indifference" is so complex and of such importance that it needs even here further definition. Indifference in the first place must be given a firm footing upon fact. As it is a fact that she cannot understand what instinct compels him, what glory, what interest, what manly satisfaction fighting provides for him—"without war there would be no outlet for the manly qualities which fighting develops"—as fighting thus is a sex characteristic which she cannot share, the counterpart some claim of the maternal instinct which he cannot share, so is it an instinct which she cannot judge. The outsider therefore must leave him free to deal with this instinct by himself, because liberty of opinion must be respected, especially when it is based upon an instinct which is as foreign to her as centuries of tradition and education can make it.⁷ This is a fundamental and instinctive distinction upon which indifference may be based. But the outsider will make it her duty not merely to base her indifference upon instinct, but upon reason. When he says, as history proves that he has said, and may say again, "I am fighting to protect our country" and thus seeks to rouse her patriotic emotion, she will ask herself, "What does 'our country' mean to me an outsider?" To decide this she will analyse the meaning of patriotism in her own case. She will inform herself of the position of her sex and her class in the past. She will inform herself of the amount of land, wealth and property in the possession of her own sex and class in the present—how much of "England" in fact belongs to her. From the same sources she will inform herself of the legal protection which the law has given her in the past and now gives her. And if he adds that he is fighting to protect her body, she will reflect upon the degree of physical protection that she now enjoys when the words "Air Raid Precaution" are written on blank walls. And if he says that he is fighting to protect England from foreign rule, she will reflect that for her there are no "foreigners," since by law she becomes a foreigner if she marries a foreigner. And she will do her best to make this a fact, not by forced fraternity, but by human sympathy. All these facts will convince her reason (to put it in a nutshell) that her sex and class has very little to thank England for in the past; not much to thank England for in the present; while the security of her person in the future is highly dubious. But probably she will have imbibed, even from the governess, some romantic notion that Englishmen, those fathers and grandfathers whom she sees marching in the picture of history, are "superior" to the men of other countries. This she will consider it her duty to check by comparing French historians with English; German with French; the testimony of the ruled—the Indians or the Irish, say—with the claims made by their rulers. Still some "patriotic" emotion, some ingrained belief in the intellectual superiority of her own country over other countries may remain. Then she will compare English painting with French painting; English music with German music; English literature with Greek literature, for translations abound. When all these comparisons have been faithfully made by the use of reason, the outsider will find herself in possession of very good reasons for her indifference. She will find that she has no good reason to ask her brother to fight on her behalf to protect "our" country. " 'Our country,' " she will say, "throughout the greater part of its history has treated me as a slave; it has denied me education or any share in its possessions. 'Our' country still ceases to be mine if I marry a foreigner. 'Our' country denies me the means of protecting myself, forces me to pay others a very large sum annually to protect me, and is so little able, even so, to protect me that Air Raid precautions are written on the wall. Therefore if you insist upon fighting to protect me, or 'our' country, let it be understood, soberly and rationally between us, that you are fighting to gratify a sex instinct which I cannot share; to procure benefits which I have not shared and probably will not share; but not to gratify my instincts, or to protect either myself or my country. For," the outsider will say, "in fact, as a woman, I have no country. As a woman I want no country. As a woman my country is the whole world." And if, when reason has said its say, still some obstinate emotion remains, some love of England dropped into a child's ears by the cawing of rooks in an elm tree, by the splash of waves on a beach, or by English voices murmuring nursery rhymes, this drop of pure, if irrational, emotion she will make serve her to give to England first what she desires of peace and freedom for the whole world.

Such then will be the nature of her “indifference” and from this indifference certain actions must follow. She will bind herself to take no share in patriotic demonstrations; to assent to no form of national self-praise; to make no part of any claque⁸ or audience that encourages war; to absent herself from military displays, tournaments, tattoos, prize-givings and all such ceremonies as encourage the desire to impose “our” civilization or “our” dominion upon other people. The psychology of private life, moreover, warrants the belief that this use of indifference by the daughters of educated men would help materially to prevent war. For psychology would seem to show that it is far harder for human beings to take action when other people are indifferent and allow them complete freedom of action, than when their actions are made the centre of excited emotion. The small boy struts and trumpets outside the window: implore him to stop; he goes on; say nothing; he stops. That the daughters of educated men then should give their brothers neither the white feather of cowardice nor the red feather of courage, but no feather at all; that they should shut the bright eyes that rain influence, or let those eyes look elsewhere when war is discussed—that is the duty to which outsiders will train themselves in peace before the threat of death inevitably makes reason powerless.

Such then are some of the methods by which the society, the anonymous and secret Society of Outsiders would help you, Sir, to prevent war and to ensure freedom.

* * *

Endnotes

- Note 1: British promoter of women's education and the first principal of Newnham College, Cambridge (1820–1892). Her brother was Arthur Clough (1819–1861), English poet.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: From "The Sparrows' Nest" by English poet William Wordsworth (1770–1850). His sister was Dorothy Wordsworth (1771–1855).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Melody played on bells.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: A guinea is a gold coin worth a pound and a shilling; its name links it to the West African coast (a region once called Guinea) and the slave trade in which the coin originated. It was often the standard fee for subscription to a society.Return to reference 4
- Note 5:
In a lengthy note, Woolf describes the benefits to women of the working class and the educated class who dedicate themselves to improving the social and economic standing of their class. She warns against glamorizing the working class. "The average housewife," reports a newspaper article Woolf cites, "washed an acre of dirty dishes, a mile of glass and three miles of clothes and scrubbed miles of floor yearly" (Daily Telegraph, Sept. 29, 1937).
Return to reference 5
- Note 6: "It was stated yesterday at the War Office that the Army Council have no intention of opening recruiting for any women's corps." (The Times, October 22, 1937 [p. 13]). This marks a prime distinction between the sexes. Pacifism is enforced upon women. Men are still allowed liberty of choice [Woolf's note].Return to reference 6
- Note 7:
The following quotation shows, however, that if sanctioned the fighting instinct easily develops. "The eyes deeply sunk into the sockets, the features acute, the amazon keeps herself very straight on the stirrups at the head of her squadron. . . . Five English parliamentaries look at this woman with the respectful and a bit restless admiration one feels for a 'fauve' of an unknown species. . . .

—Come nearer Amalia—orders the commandant. She pushes her horse towards us and salutes her chief with the sword.

—Sergeant Amalia Bonilla—continues the chief of the squadron—how old are you?—Thirty-six.—Where were you born?—In Granada.—Why have you joined the army?—My two daughters were militiawomen. The younger has been killed in the Alto de Leon. I thought I had to supersede her and avenge her.—And how many enemies have you killed to avenge her?—You know it, commandant, five. The sixth is not sure.—No, but you have taken his horse. The amazon Amalia rides in fact a magnificent dapple-grey horse, with glossy hair, which flatters like a parade horse. . . . This woman who has killed five men—but who feels not sure about the sixth—was for the envoys of the House of Commons an excellent introducer to the Spanish War." (The Martyrdom of Madrid, Inedited Witnesses, by Louis Delaprée, pp. 34, 5, 6. Madrid, 1937.) [Louis Delaprée (1902–1936) was a French journalist killed covering the Spanish Civil War; Woolf's note].

Return to reference 7

- Note 8: Group of subservient followers. Return to reference 8

PABLO PICASSO

Guernica

(p. 702)

Picasso painted the starkly black-white-and-gray, mural-size depiction of anguished and shattered human and animal figures after the German bombing and destruction of a Basque village in his native Spain in 1937. The attack by the warplanes in support of General Franco's Nationalist forces during the Civil War foreshadowed the widespread bombing of civilians in World War II. At the left of the painting, a woman mourns a dead child under a standing bull. At the center is a horse stabbed through by a spear and partly covered with newsprint; above the animal shines an eyelike light, and below it is the shattered body of a soldier. From the right, two female figures enter the room, one carrying a candle that contrasts with the harsh lightbulb, while a terrified person at the far right is surrounded by fire. The painting helped spread awareness of the Spanish Civil War's ravages, traveling to a large number of cities, including London, where it arrived in 1938 under the patronage in part of the novelists Virginia Woolf and E. M. Forster.

Guernica, 1937, Pablo Picasso.

EDITH SITWELL

Edith Sitwell's father was an eccentric English baronet; her mother, the daughter of an earl. Sitwell (1887–1964), an eccentrically gifted poet, objected to the subdued rural descriptions and reflections of the Georgian poets (of whom Rupert Brooke was the most popular) and reacted in favor of a highly abstract verbal experimentation that exploited the sounds and rhythms and suggestions of words and phrases, often with remarkable pyrotechnic display. She edited and contributed to the six "cycles" of Wheels (1916–21), an annual anthology of modern poems in which she displayed her verbal and rhythmic virtuosity and encouraged others to follow her example. Her sequence Façade (1922), with its cunning exploration of rhymes and rhythms, was set to music by the composer Sir William Walton, whose sympathetic treatment of the words enhanced their impact. The 1923 performance in London's Aeolian Hall was a sensation: Sitwell intoned the poems from behind a screen, and Walton conducted the orchestra.

But Sitwell was more than a manipulator of surfaces. Throughout her poetry she hints at profounder meanings, sometimes with mocking laughter, sometimes with anguish, and in her later work she attacks the pettiness and philistinism of high society. In still later poems, influenced by William Blake, W. B. Yeats, and her friend Dylan Thomas, Sitwell wished to achieve, she said in her autobiography, "a greater expressiveness, a greater formality, and a return to rhetoric," rejecting "the outcry for understatement, for quietness, for neutral tints in poetry." These poems, such as "Still Falls the Rain," are much concerned with the horrors of war, the varieties of human suffering produced by modern civilization, and the healing powers of a faith in God, combined with a sense of the richness and variety of nature.

Still Falls the Rain

The Raids, 1940.¹ Night and Dawn

Still falls the Rain—
Dark as the world of man, black as our loss—
Blind as the nineteen hundred and forty nails
Upon the Cross.

5 Still falls the Rain
With a sound like the pulse of the heart that is changed to the hammer-beat
In the Potter's Field,² and the sound of the impious feet
On the Tomb:
Still falls the Rain
In the Field of Blood where the small hopes breed and the human brain
Nurtures its greed, that worm with the brow of 10 Cain.³

Still falls the Rain
At the feet of the Starved Man hung upon the Cross.
Christ that each day, each night, nails there, have mercy on us—
On Dives and on Lazarus.⁴
15 Under the Rain the sore and the gold are as one.

Still falls the Rain—
Still falls the Blood from the Starved Man's wounded Side:
He bears in His Heart all wounds,—those of the light that died,

20 The last faint spark
In the self-murdered heart, the wounds of the sad
 uncomprehending dark,
The wounds of the baited bear,⁵—
The blind and weeping bear whom the keepers beat
On his helpless flesh . . . the tears of the hunted hare.

25 Still falls the Rain—
Then—O Ile leape up to my God: who pulles me
 doune—
See, see where Christ's blood streames in the firmament:⁶
It flows from the Brow we nailed upon the tree
Deep to the dying, to the thirsting heart
That holds the fires of the world,—dark-smirched with pain
30 As Caesar's laurel crown.⁷

Then sounds the voice of One who like the heart of man
Was once a child who among beasts has lain—
"Still do I love, still shed my innocent light, my Blood, for thee."

1942

Endnotes

- Note 1: During the Battle of Britain, the German air force carried out many raids on London, often with incendiary bombs (see lines 27 and 30). Return to reference 1
- Note 2:
See Matthew 27:3–8: "Then Judas, which betrayed [Jesus], when he saw that he was condemned, repented himself, and brought back the 30 pieces of silver to the chief priests and elders, saying, I have sinned in that I betrayed innocent blood. But they said, What is that to us? see thou to it. And he cast down the pieces of silver into the sanctuary, and departed; and he went away and hanged himself. And the chief priests took the pieces of silver . . . and bought with them the potter's field, to bury strangers in. Wherefore that field was called, The field of blood, unto this day."

Return to reference 2

- Note 3: The first murderer in the Bible (Genesis 4).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: In Jesus's parable the rich man Dives was sent to hell, while the leprous beggar Lazarus went to heaven (Luke 16:19–31). This is not the same Lazarus who was raised from the dead.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: A medieval and Elizabethan sport in which dogs fought a bear chained to a post.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Faustus's cry at the end of Marlowe's Doctor Faustus (1604), when he realizes that he has been damned for his pact with Mephistopheles.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Traditionally worn by victorious generals, and perhaps here associated with Jesus's crown of thorns (Matthew 27:29).Return to reference 7

HENRY REED

Henry Reed (1914–1986) was born and educated in Birmingham, at the King Edward VI School and at Birmingham University, where he gained a first-class degree in classics (having taught himself Greek) and began an M.A. thesis on Thomas Hardy. After leaving the university in 1934, he tried teaching, like other British writers of the 1930s, but, like most of them, hated it and left to make his way as a freelance writer and critic. During World War II he served—or rather studied,” as he put it—in the Royal Army Ordnance Corps for a year. A notable mimic, he entertained friends with a comic imitation of a sergeant instructing new recruits. After a few performances he noticed that the words of the weapon-training instructor, couched in the style of the military manual, fell into certain rhythmic patterns. His fascination with these patterns eventually informed his Lessons of the War, the first of which, “Naming of Parts,” is probably the most anthologized poem prompted by World War II.

From 1942 to 1945, Reed worked as a cryptographer and translator at the Government Code and Cypher School at Bletchley. In the evenings he wrote much of his first radio play—an adaptation of Melville’s Moby-Dick—and many of the poems to be published in A Map of Verona (1946). After the war, he produced a number of other successful—and often funny—radio plays, verse translations of the Italian poet Giacomo Leopardi (1798–1837), and more poems. Many of the best of these were found in manuscript at his death, and with the posthumous publication of his Collected Poems (1991), he emerged as a writer whose lifelong quest for lasting homosexual love—which he never found—led him through Edenic landscapes of desire, like the setting of “Naming of Parts.”

From Lessons of the War

To Alan Michell

Vixi duellis nuper idoneus
Et militavi non sine gloria¹

1. Naming of Parts

Today we have naming of parts. Yesterday,
We had daily cleaning. And tomorrow morning,
We shall have what to do after firing. But today,
Today we have naming of parts. Japonica²
5 Glistens like coral in all of the neighbouring gardens,
And today we have naming of parts.

This is the lower sling swivel. And this
Is the upper sling swivel, whose use you will see,
When you are given your slings. And this is the piling swivel,
10 Which in your case you have not got. The branches
Hold in the gardens their silent, eloquent gestures,
Which in our case we have not got.

This is the safety-catch, which is always released
With an easy flick of the thumb. And please do not let me
15 See anyone using his finger. You can do it quite easy
If you have any strength in your thumb. The blossoms
Are fragile and motionless, never letting anyone see
Any of them using their finger.

And this you can see is the bolt. The purpose of this 20 Is to open the breech, as you see. We can slide it Rapidly backwards and forwards: we call this Easing the spring.³ And rapidly backwards and forwards

 The early bees are assaulting and fumbling the flowers:
 They call it easing the Spring.

25 They call it easing the Spring: it is perfectly easy
 If you have any strength in your thumb; like the bolt,
 And the breech, and the cocking-piece, and the point
 of balance,
 Which in our case we have not got; and the almond-
 blossom
 Silent in all of the gardens and the bees going backwards and forwards,
 For today we have naming of parts.

30

1945

Endnotes

- Note 1: “Lately I have lived in the midst of battles, creditably enough, / and have soldiered, not without glory” (Horace’s Odes 3.26.1–2, with the p of puellis—girls—turned upside down to produce duellis—battles; an emendation that encapsulates the theme of the Lessons).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: A shrub with brilliant scarlet flowers.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Ejecting the bullets from the magazine of a rifle takes the pressure off the magazine spring.Return to reference 3

ELIZABETH BOWEN

Elizabeth Bowen (1899–1973) was a member of the Anglo-Irish gentry, a wealthy class descended from English Protestants in Ireland. They culturally identified with England, which led to tension with Irish Catholics, who supported the independence of Ireland. Bowen lived between Dublin and her family's country home in County Cork until the age of seven when, following her father's struggle with mental illness, she moved to London with her mother. At age thirteen, the loss of her mother to cancer led her to live with relatives. She began writing short stories at the age of twenty. She is the author of ten novels, the second of which, The Last September (1929), brought her early critical attention and praise. Set in a great Irish country house, modeled on her home in Cork, it chronicles the decline of an Anglo-Irish family against the backdrop of the Irish War of Independence. Bowen's later novels and short story collections drew inspiration from the political upheaval of World War II. The Heat of the Day (1949) is a tale of espionage and intrigue featuring two spies turned lovers, and The Demon Lover and Other Stories (1945) draws on supernatural imagery to represent the surreality of wartime experience in which death felt inescapable and ghosts closer than the living. Bowen worked for the English Ministry of Information during the war, and is as renowned for her wartime journalism as she is for her substantial body of fiction. "The Demon Lover," set during the Blitz (German air attacks on England), features a woman returning to her abandoned London home where she discovers a letter from her former fiancé. The letter triggers disturbing memories, and spurs the woman toward an ambiguous, but terrifying, encounter, made more frightening by the empty streets of wartime London.

The Demon Lover

Towards the end of her day in London Mrs. Drover went round to her shut-up house to look for several things she wanted to take away. Some belonged to herself, some to her family, who were by now used to their country life. It was late August; it had been a steamy, showery day: at the moment the trees down the pavement glittered in an escape of humid yellow afternoon sun. Against the next batch of clouds, already piling up ink-dark, broken chimneys and parapets stood out. In her once familiar street, as in any unused channel, an unfamiliar queerness had silted up; a cat wove itself in and out of railings, but no human eye watched Mrs. Drover's return. Shifting some parcels under her arm, she slowly forced round her latchkey in an unwilling lock, then gave the door, which had warped, a push with her knee. Dead air came out to meet her as she went in.

The staircase window having been boarded up, no light came down into the hall. But one door, she could just see, stood ajar, so she went quickly through into the room and unshuttered the big window in there. Now the prosaic woman, looking about her, was more perplexed than she knew by everything that she saw, by traces of her long former habit of life—the yellow smoke-stain up the white marble mantelpiece, the ring left by a vase on the top of the escritoire;¹ the bruise in the wallpaper where, on the door being thrown open widely, the china handle had always hit the wall. The piano, having gone away to be stored, had left what looked like claw-marks on its part of the parquet. Though not much dust had seeped in, each object wore a film of another kind; and, the only ventilation being the chimney, the whole drawing-room smelled of the cold hearth. Mrs. Drover put down her parcels on the escritoire and left the room to proceed upstairs; the things she wanted were in a bedroom chest.

She had been anxious to see how the house was—the part-time caretaker she shared with some neighbours was away this week on his holiday, known to be not yet back. At the best of times he did not look in often, and she was never sure that she trusted him. There were some cracks in the structure, left by the last bombing,² on which she was anxious to keep an eye. Not that one could do anything—

A shaft of refracted daylight now lay across the hall. She stopped dead and stared at the hall table—on this lay a letter addressed to her.

She thought first—then the caretaker must be back. All the same, who, seeing the house shuttered, would have dropped a letter in at the box? It was not a circular, it was not a bill. And the post office redirected, to the address in the country, everything for her that came through the post. The caretaker (even if he were back) did not know she was due in London to-day—her call here had been planned to be a surprise—so his negligence in the manner of this letter, leaving it to wait in the dusk and the dust, annoyed her. Annoyed, she picked up the letter, which bore no stamp. But it cannot be important, or they would know . . . She took the letter rapidly upstairs with her, without a stop to look at the writing till she reached what had been her bedroom, where she let in light. The room looked over the garden and other gardens: the sun had gone in; as the clouds sharpened and lowered, the trees and rank lawns seemed already to smoke with dark. Her reluctance to look again at the letter came from the fact that she felt intruded upon—and by someone contemptuous of her ways. However, in the tenseness preceding the fall of rain she read it: it was a few lines.

DEAR KATHLEEN,

You will not have forgotten that to-day is our anniversary, and the day we said. The years have gone by at once slowly and fast. In view of the fact that nothing has changed, I shall rely upon you to keep your promise. I was sorry to see you leave London, but was satisfied that you would be back in time. You may expect me, therefore, at the hour arranged.

Until then . . .

K.

Mrs. Drover looked for the date: it was to-day's. She dropped the letter on to the bed-springs, then picked it up to see the writing again—her lips, beneath the remains of lipstick, beginning to go white. She felt so much the change in her own face that she went to the mirror, polished a clear patch in it and looked at once urgently and stealthily in. She was confronted by a woman of forty-four, with eyes starting out under a hat-brim that had been rather carelessly pulled down. She had not put on any more powder since she left the shop where she ate her solitary tea. The pearls her husband had given her on their marriage hung loose round her now rather thinner throat, slipping into the V of the pink wool jumper her sister knitted last autumn as they sat round the fire. Mrs. Drover's most normal expression was one of controlled worry, but of assent. Since the birth of the third of her little boys, attended by a quite serious illness, she had had an intermittent muscular flicker to the left of her mouth, but in spite of this she could always sustain a manner that was at once energetic and calm.

Turning from her own face as precipitately as she had gone to meet it, she went to the chest where the things were, unlocked it, threw up the lid and knelt to search. But as rain began to come crashing down she could not keep from looking over her shoulder at the stripped bed on which the letter lay. Behind the blanket of rain the clock of the church that still stood struck six—with rapidly heightening apprehension she counted each of the slow strokes. 'The hour arranged . . . My God,' she said, 'what hour? How should I . . . ? After twenty-five years. . . '

The young girl talking to the soldier in the garden had not ever completely seen his face. It was dark; they were saying good-bye under a tree. Now and then—for it felt, from not seeing him at this intense moment, as though she had never seen him at all—she verified his presence for these few moments longer by putting out a hand, which he each time pressed, without very much kindness, and painfully, on to one of the breast buttons of his uniform. That cut of the button on the palm of her hand was, principally, what she was to carry away. This was so near the end of a leave from France that she could only wish him already gone. It was August 1916. Being not kissed, being drawn away from and looked at intimidated Kathleen till she imagined spectral glitters in the place of his eyes. Turning away and looking back up the lawn she saw, through branches of trees, the drawing-room window alight: she caught a breath for the moment when she could go running back there into the safe arms of her mother and sister, and cry: 'What shall I do, what shall I do? He has gone.'

Hearing her catch her breath, her fiancé said, without feeling: 'Cold?'

'You're going away such a long way.'

'Not so far as you think.'

'I don't understand?'

'You don't have to,' he said. 'You will. You know what we said.'

'But that was—suppose you—I mean, suppose.'

'I shall be with you,' he said, 'sooner or later. You won't forget that. You need do nothing but wait.'

Only a little more than a minute later she was free to run up the silent lawn. Looking in through the window at her mother and sister, who did not for the moment perceive her, she already felt that unnatural promise drive down between her and the rest of all human kind. No other way of having given herself could have made her feel so apart, lost and foresworn. She could not have plighted a more sinister troth.³

Kathleen behaved well when, some months later, her fiancé was reported missing, presumed killed. Her family not only supported her but were able to praise her courage without stint because they could not regret, as a husband for her, the man they knew almost nothing about. They hoped she would, in a year or two, console herself—and had it been only a question of consolation things might have gone much straighter ahead. But her trouble, behind just a little grief, was a complete dislocation from everything. She did not reject other lovers, for these failed to appear: for years she failed to attract men—and with the approach of her 'thirties she became natural enough to share her family's anxiousness on this score. She began to put herself out, to wonder; and at thirty-two she was very greatly relieved to find herself being courted by William Drover. She married him, and the two of them settled down in this quiet, arboreal part of Kensington: in this house the years piled up, her children were born and they all lived till they were driven out by the bombs of the next war. Her movements as Mrs. Drover were circumscribed, and she dismissed any idea that they were still watched.

As things were—dead or living the letter-writer sent her only a threat. Unable, for some minutes, to go on kneeling with her back exposed to the empty room, Mrs. Drover rose from the chest to sit on an upright chair whose back was firmly against the wall. The desuetude⁴ of her former bedroom, her married London home's whole air of being a cracked cup from which memory, with its reassuring power, had either evaporated or leaked away, made a crisis—and at just this crisis the letter-writer had, knowledgeably, struck. The hollowness of the house this evening cancelled years on years of voices, habits and steps. Through the shut windows she only heard rain fall on the roofs around. To rally herself, she said she was in a mood—and, for two or three seconds shutting her eyes, told herself that she had imagined the letter. But she opened them—there it lay on the bed.

On the supernatural side of the letter's entrance she was not permitting her mind to dwell. Who, in London, knew she meant to call at the house to-day? Evidently, however, this has been known. The caretaker, had he come back, had had no cause to expect her: he would have taken the letter in his pocket, to forward it, at his own time, through the post. There was no other sign that the caretaker had been in—but, if not? Letters dropped in at doors of deserted houses do not fly or walk to tables in halls. They do not sit on the dust of empty tables with the air of certainty that they will be found. There is needed some human hand—but nobody but the caretaker had a key. Under circumstances she did not care to consider, a house can be entered without a key. It was possible that she was not alone now. She might be being waited for, downstairs. Waited for—until when? Until ‘the hour arranged’. At least that was not six o’clock: six has struck.

She rose from the chair and went over and locked the door.

The thing was, to get out. To fly? No, not that: she had to catch her train. As a woman whose utter dependability was the keystone of her family life she was not willing to return to the country, to her husband, her little boys and her sister, without the objects she had come up to fetch. Resuming work at the chest she set about making up a number of parcels in a rapid, fumbling-decisive way. These, with her shopping parcels, would be too much to carry; these meant a taxi—at the thought of the taxi her heart went up and her normal breathing resumed. I will ring up the taxi now; the taxi cannot come too soon: I shall hear the taxi out there running its engine, till I walk calmly down to it through the hall. I’ll ring up—But no: the telephone is cut off . . . She tugged at a knot she had tied wrong.

The idea of flight . . . He was never kind to me, not really. I don’t remember him kind at all. Mother said he never considered me. He was set on me, that was what it was—not love. Not love, not meaning a person well. What did he do, to make me promise like that? I can’t remember—But she found that she could.

She remembered with such dreadful acuteness that the twenty-five years since then dissolved like smoke and she instinctively looked for the weal left by the button on the palm of her hand. She remembered not only all that he said and did but the complete suspension of her existence during that August week. I was not myself—they all told me so at the time. She remembered—but with one white burning blank as where acid has dropped on a photograph: under no conditions could she remember his face.

So, wherever he may be waiting, I shall not know him. You have no time to run from a face you do not expect.

The thing was to get to the taxi before any clock struck what could be the hour. She would slip down the street and round the side of the square to where the square gave on the main road. She would return in the taxi, safe, to her own door, and bring the solid driver into the house with her to pick up the parcels from room to room. The idea of the taxi driver made her decisive, bold: she unlocked her door, went to the top of the staircase and listened down.

She heard nothing—but while she was hearing nothing the *passé*⁵ air of the staircase was disturbed by a draught that travelled up to her face. It emanated from the basement: down there a door or window was being opened by someone who chose this moment to leave the house.

The rain had stopped; the pavements steamily shone as Mrs. Drover let herself out by inches from her own front door into the empty street. The unoccupied houses opposite continued to meet her look with their damaged stare. Making towards the thoroughfare and the taxi, she tried not to keep looking behind. Indeed, the silence was so intense—one of those creeks of London silence exaggerated this summer by the damage of war—that no tread could have gained on hers unheard. Where her street debouched on the square where people went on living, she grew conscious of, and checked, her unnatural pace. Across the open end of the square two buses impassively passed each other: women, a perambulator,⁶ cyclists, a man wheeling a barrow signaled, once again, the ordinary flow of life. At the square's most populous corner should be—and was—the short taxi rank. This evening, only one taxi—but this, although it presented its blank rump, appeared already to be alertly waiting for her. Indeed, without looking round the driver started his engine as she panted up from behind and put her hand on the door. As she did so, the clock struck seven. The taxi faced the main road: to make the trip back to her house it would have to turn—she had settled back on the seat and the taxi had turned before she, surprised by its knowing movement, recollected that she had not 'said where'. She leaned forward to scratch at the glass panel that divided the driver's head from her own.

The driver braked to what was almost a stop, turned round and slid the glass panel back: the jolt of this flung Mrs. Drover forward till her face was almost into the glass. Through the aperture driver and passenger, not six inches between them, remained for an eternity eye to eye. Mrs. Drover's mouth hung open for some seconds before she could issue her first scream. After that she continued to scream freely and to beat with her gloved hands on the glass all round as the taxi, accelerating without mercy, made off with her into the hinterland of deserted streets.

1945

Endnotes

- Note 1: Small writing desk.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Reference to the Blitz, a German bombing campaign against the United Kingdom in World War II focused on London and other large cities and industrial targets.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: A promise of marriage.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: To fall into disuse or be discontinued.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Dated, worn, disused (from French for past).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Baby carriage (British English).Return to reference 6

Nation, Race, and Language

Armies and navies, cannons and guns helped spread and consolidate British rule across vast areas of Earth's surface, but so too did the English language. Over many years, in various parts of the world, the language of the British Empire displaced or commingled with indigenous languages. Then the twentieth century witnessed the decolonization and devolution of the British Empire—from early-century Ireland; to mid-century South Asia, Africa, and the Caribbean; to late-century Hong Kong. Those under colonial rule were often made to feel inferior because they had “a different complexion or slightly flatter noses,” as Conrad's Marlow puts it in Heart of Darkness. When large numbers of non-White immigrants arrived in England after World War II, they were likely to find themselves stigmatized and discriminated against because of their race. Imaginative writers from the former colonies, as well as immigrants to Britain and their children, have thus had to wrestle with questions of nation, race, and language. Should they write stories, plays, and poems in the language and traditions of the colonizer, or should they repudiate English and return to their indigenous languages? Is English an enabling tool by which peoples of different races and nationalities can express their identities, or is it contaminated by a colonial history and racist mentality that it insidiously perpetuates? If English is chosen for imaginative writing, should it be the Standardized English of the imperial center or an English inflected by contact with indigenous languages—creole, patois, or pidgin? Since the power of the United States has sustained the global reach of English long after the withdrawal of British colonial armies and administrators, debates over such questions have persisted in many parts of the world where English still thrives in the aftermath of a dead empire.

Postwar immigrants to Britain from its former colonies have also brought these once faraway issues home to the “mother country.” On June 21, 1948, the first shipload of Caribbean immigrants, 492 passengers onboard the Empire Windrush, arrived at Tilbury Docks, near London. Many other Black and Asian immigrants from the Caribbean, from Asia, and from Africa soon followed, diversifying Britain until peoples of ethnic minorities made up 12.9 percent of the total population in 2011. Between the 1948 British Nationality Act, which allowed British subjects to immigrate, and the 1968 measure limiting immigration to citizens of British (that is, White) family origin, hundreds of thousands of Blacks and Asians were “colonizin / Englan in reverse,” in Jamaican poet Louise Bennett’s witty phrase.

The Windrush arrives, June 21, 1948. The Empire Windrush brought 492 passengers from Kingston, Jamaica, to Tilbury Docks, near London. Since Britain had just passed the 1948 British Nationality Act that granted citizenship to colonial subjects, West Indians sailed to Britain, many in search of job opportunities. Although they met with discrimination upon arrival, a large number of the Caribbean migrants stayed, becoming the first members of what is sometimes called “the Windrush generation.”

Assuming they would be welcomed as full-fledged British subjects, many of these immigrants, arriving in search of jobs and educational opportunities, were surprised by the racial discrimination they encountered. Bearing with them the dream England of Shakespeare, public monuments, and English civilization, many of these immigrants were refused housing because of their race and consigned to jobs below their skill level. In “Inglan Is a Bitch,” Black British poet Linton Kwesi Johnson relates the job woes of one such hapless immigrant. These exclusionary racial attitudes were also felt by immigrant writers. Jamaican playwright and poet Una Marson reflects on the violation of hearing a racial epithet “flung” at her speaker in “Nigger.” It is in this context that Salman Rushdie asserts the British Indian’s right to lay claim to full membership in British society and to British, Indian, and a variety of transnational literary inheritances. From a “black” perspective, Daljit Nagra retells the History of the English-Speaking Peoples, as Winston Churchill titled his monumental chronicle, to make room for an Asian Briton’s ambivalent participation in that history, as an insider-outsider who reinhabits an English literary canon centered on Shakespeare. Bernardine Evaristo goes back even further in time in The Emperor’s Babe, to the third century C.E., when African diasporic people like her were already living in Roman Londinium, contrary to the widespread misconception that Britain was racially homogeneous before 1948. Unmoored from the “calypso ways” of her native Guyana and feeling displaced in England’s “misty greyness,” immigrant poet Grace Nichols nevertheless declares, “Wherever I hang me knickers—that’s my home.” In her view, the new creolized English tongue she and other African Caribbeans have created after losing their African languages is a kind of linguistic home: “from the root of the old one / a new one has sprung.” East Indian writer Samuel Selvon, who was raised in the West Indies before moving to England, writes about Black men's resettlement with gentle humor and awareness of their vulnerability.

Such issues of nation, race, and language have a deep history in Britain's colonies, and not only its far-flung possessions in the global South. Irish immigrants to Britain had long found themselves discriminated against as racial "others." In Ireland itself, the British, having tried to subdue the local people for centuries, outlawed the use of the Irish language (or Gaelic). Because of Ireland's long and bloody colonial history and the flowering there of cultural nationalism, early-twentieth-century Irish writers were already expressing a powerful ambivalence toward English as both a vital literary inheritance and the language of colonial subjugation. Recalling the sixteenth- and seventeenth-century English "wars of extermination" against the Irish, W. B. Yeats acknowledges a historical hatred of the English but then reminds himself that, as an English-language writer, "I owe my soul to Shakespeare, to Spenser and to Blake, perhaps to William Morris, and to the English language in which I think, speak and write, that everything I love has come to me through English; my hatred tortures me with love, my love with hate" (see his "Introduction," excerpted in this volume). In A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man, James Joyce's autobiographical persona, Stephen Dedalus, reflects on his conversation with an academic dean, an Englishman: "The language in which we are speaking is his before it is mine. . . . I cannot speak or write these [English] words without unrest of spirit. His language, so familiar and so foreign, will always be for me an acquired speech. I have not made or accepted its words. My voice holds them at bay. My soul frets in the shadow of his language." Yet despite this vexed relation to the language, Yeats and Joyce wrote some of the most innovative English-language poetry and fiction of the twentieth century, ultimately influencing the very language that had so troubled them. Indeed, their conflicted relation to the English language and its literary inheritance—that "unrest of spirit" in its shadow—may, paradoxically, have impelled their massive literary achievements.

The BBC Voice radio program. Sitting in a recording studio in 1942 from left to right are Venu Chitale, M. J. Tambimuttu, T. S. Eliot, Una Marson, Mulk Raj Anand, Christopher Pemberton, and Narayana Menon. Standing are George Orwell, Nancy Barratt, and William Empson. This diverse set of writers collaborated on a poetry series that was broadcast to India on the BBC's Eastern Service. Radio programs such as Voice served as a cultural arm of the British Empire by connecting colonial audiences to England.

Transplanted to different parts of the world, English has sometimes seemed strange and estranging. When African and Caribbean schoolchildren with British colonial educations tried to write poems, as Kamau Brathwaite and other writers have attested, they would follow the conventions of English poetry, composing iambic pentameter verse about snowfall or daffodils, which they had never seen. English language and literature thus risked alienating colonized peoples from their local environments and distinctive cultural histories. The African Caribbean–Canadian poet M. NourbeSe

Philip writes of English as a “mother tongue” that is also a strangely violent and patriarchal “father tongue,” used for the brutal suppression of her slave ancestors.

The feeling that the English language is alienating, inextricably bound to colonialism, has led some nativist writers, such as the Kenyan novelist Ngũgĩ wa Thiong’o, to reject it outright. If language is a “collective memory bank,” then a people cannot recover its colonially suppressed identity and history without returning to an indigenous language. But the novelist Salman Rushdie, who often writes in an Indianized, or “chutnified,” English, takes the opposite stance: “The English language ceased to be the sole possession of the English some time ago,” he asserts. English has become a local language even in parts of the world, such as India, where it was once imposed by colonial rulers. Rushdie and other cosmopolitan writers reject the assumption that the English language has an inherent relationship to only one kind of national or racial experience. “The English language is nobody’s special property,” asserts the Caribbean poet Derek Walcott.

For the colonial, postcolonial, or immigrant writer who embraces English, the question remains, Which English? The imported Standardized English or a local vernacular? Or if both, should they be intermingled or kept apart? At one end of the spectrum are writers, such as Wole Soyinka and V. S. Naipaul, who think Standardized English, perhaps slightly altered, can bespeak a postcolonial experience of race, identity, and history. At the other end are vernacular writers who feel that the language of the center cannot do justice to their experience at the margins of empire. Louise Bennett, for example, gives voice to everyday Jamaican experience in her witty and wily use of Jamaican Creole, or patois; she mocks its denigration as a “corruption of the English language,” pointing out that Standardized English is itself but an amalgam of dialects and foreign languages. “It was in language that the slave was perhaps most successfully imprisoned by his master,” Kamau Brathwaite has written, “and it was in his (mis-)use of it that he perhaps most effectively rebelled.” Linton Kwesi Johnson graphically emphasizes his resistance to the norms of Standardized English by his phonetic (mis-)spelling of English words.

Between the Standardized English writer and the vernacular writer range a host of fiction writers, such as Chinua Achebe, Caryl Phillips, and Zadie Smith, and poets, such as Walcott, Brathwaite, and Nichols, who switch between standard and “dialect” within or across individual works, creating juxtapositions, tensions, and new relationships between languages that have traditionally been kept hierarchically discrete. They linguistically embody their interstitial experience of living in between metropolis and margin, canon and creole, schoolbooks and the street.

Whether using slightly or heavily creolized English, or a medley of the two, writers from across the world—Barbadians and Bengalis and Black Britons—have employed a diverse array of distinctive idioms, dialects, and creoles to defy imperial norms, express emerging cultural identities, and inaugurate rich new possibilities for literature in English.

UNA MARSON

Una Marson (1905–1965) was born in St. Elizabeth, Jamaica, a rural area on the southwest of the island. Her father was a well-respected preacher and influenced Marson's trajectory as a literary writer, journalist, and political activist. She earned a scholarship to attend Hampton High School, a predominantly White boarding school in Jamaica modeled on the English public school. Hampton introduced her to the canon of British literature and to overt and covert racism, which would follow her throughout her life. Marson began writing poetry and plays in Jamaica. The money she earned from her first play, At What a Price (pub. 1933), allowed her to travel to England in 1932, where she became the first colonial person of color to stage a play in London.

Marson's other plays include London Calling (1937) and Pocomania (1938), the latter of which became an influential early work of Jamaican theater. She published four poetry collections, which make use of traditional forms and straightforward verse to capture the experience of being Black and female in environments where one feels both invisible and hypervisible. She published the protest poem "Nigger" (1933) in The Keys, the newspaper of the League of Coloured Peoples, a civil rights group working toward racial equality for Black peoples in Britain. The poem captures the anger and pain inflicted by the racial epithet, and the movements of pronouns from "They" to "We" across stanzas emphasize the divisions sewn by the slur. "The Stranger," from Marson's collection The Moth and the Star (1937), offers a surprising twist on the dramatic monologue, as Marson combines two voices in the poem. The primary speaker is a Black woman, and she recounts a conversation with a White love interest who she thinks is drawn to her out of a desire for the exotic.

Marson lived in London from 1932 until 1936, but returned to Jamaica for a year in response to suffering from anxiety and depression. When she returned to England, she took a job with the BBC and assisted on the radio show Calling the West Indies, which began in 1939 as a venue for West Indian soldiers fighting in World War II to read letters home to their families. Despite enduring racial discrimination and social isolation at the BBC, Marson rose to the position of producer and created the radio show Caribbean Voices, which would evolve into a major organ for the development of West Indian literature.

Nigger

They called me "Nigger"
Those little white urchins.
They laughed and shouted
As I passed along the street,
They flung it at me:
5 "Nigger! Nigger! Nigger!"

What made me keep my fingers
From choking the words in their throats?
What made my face grow hot,
The blood boil in my veins
10 And tears spring to my eyes?
What made me go to my room
And sob my heart away
Because white urchins
Called me "Nigger"?
15

What makes the dark West Indian¹
Fight at being called a Nigger?
What is there in a word
That should strike like a dagger
To the heart of Coloured men
20 And make them wince?

You of the white skinned Race,
You who profess such innocence,
I'll tell you why 'tis a sin to tell
Your offspring Coloured folks are queer,
25 Black men are bogies² and inferior far
To any creature with a skin made white.

30 You who feel that you are "sprung
Of earth's first blood",³ your eyes
Are blinded now with arrogance.
With ruthlessness you seared
My people's flesh, and now you still
Would crush their very soul,
Add fierce insult to vilest injury.

35 We will not be called "Niggers"
Since this was the favourite curse
Of those who drove the Negroes
To their death in days of slavery.
"A good for nothing Nigger",
40 "Only one more Nigger gone"
They would repeat as though
He were a chicken or a rat.
That word then meant contempt,
All that was low and base,
45 And too refined for lower animals.

In later years when singing Negroes
Caused white men to laugh,
And show some interest in their art
They talked of "Nigger Minstrels"⁴
And patronised the Negro,
50 And laughing at his songs
They could nowise see
The thorns that pierced his heart.
"Nigger" was raised then to a Burlesque Show⁵
And thus from Curse to Clown progressed
55 A coloured man was cause for merriment.
And though to-day he soars in every field
Some shrunken souls still say
"Look at that Nigger there
As though they saw a green bloodhound
Or a pink puppy.

60 God keep my soul from hating such mean souls,
 God keep my soul from hating
 Those who preach the Christ
 And say with churlish smile
 "This place is not for 'Niggers'."
65 God save their souls from this great sin
 Of hurting human hearts that live
 And think and feel in unison
 With all humanity.

1933

Endnotes

- Note 1: Inhabitant or native of the West Indies, a historical term for the islands of the Caribbean.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: An evil spirit or specter.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Line from William Wordsworth's patriotic sonnet "It is not to be thought of" (1815). It bears themes of racial and linguistic supremacy.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Entertainment popular in the 19th and early 20th century United States that was founded on racial stereotypes and commonly featured troupes of White actors, musicians, and dancers in blackface.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Variety shows based on parody and featuring bawdy comedy and stripteases.Return to reference 5

The Stranger

You liked talking to people like me
You said, with a wistful smile
That enchanted me, so the pause
That came before I spoke
5 Must have seemed strange to you,
And when I returned the compliment
So sweetly made, I still thought
Of the wistfulness of your smile.

So you like talking to people like me,
10 Friend with the wistful smile,
To foreign girls who are brown of skin
And have black kinky hair
And have strange black eyes.

You like to hear the tales I tell
15 Of a tropic Paradise,
Of sunkissed woods and mountains high
Of skies that are bluer than ever
Skies are blue in your nordic clime:
Of magic sunsets and marvellous seas,
20 Of waterfalls clattering down,
Stars so near, and the moon so large,
And fireflies, stars of the earth.

I like to listen to you,
Friend with the wistful smile.
25 It's not to hear of your great country
And tales of your marvellous land,
But to watch the wistful smile
That plays around your mouth,

The strange look in your eyes
And hear the calm sweet tone of your voice.

LOUISE BENNETT

Louise Bennett (1919–2006), the preeminent West Indian poet of Creole verse, was born and grew up in Kingston, Jamaica, in the British West Indies, her mother a dressmaker, her father a baker. After she had published her first book of poetry, Dialect Verses (1942), she attended London's Royal Academy of Dramatic Art. As "Miss Lou" she won a mass following in the Caribbean through her vibrant stage performances of her poetry and of folk song; her weekly "dialect" poems published from 1943 in Jamaica's national newspaper, the Gleaner; her radio show, "Miss Lou's Views" (1966–82); and her children's television program, "Ring Ding" (1970–82).

Bennett helped dismantle the view that Jamaican English is a corruption of Standardized English, a prejudice she lambasted in radio monologues such as "Jamaica Language" and in poems such as "Dry-Foot Bwoy," which humorously juxtaposes a metaphor-rich Creole with a hollowly imitative British English. From a young age she felt that the humor, wit, and vigor of Creole were largely untapped possibilities for writing and performing poetry, even though this commitment to Jamaican English prevented her from being recognized as a poet until after the Black cultural revolution of the late 1960s and 1970s. In her poetry she often assumes the perspective of a West Indian trickster, such as the woman who cunningly subverts gender and geographic hierarchies in "Jamaica Oman [Woman]." Bennett makes wily and ebullient use of received forms, employing the ironic possibilities of dramatic monologue, the contrasts and inversions afforded by the ballad stanza, and the time-tested wisdom and pith of Jamaican proverbs. Both on the page and in her recorded performances, Bennett's vital characters and robust imagination help win over readers unfamiliar with Jamaican English, who can join in the laughing seriousness of poems such as "Colonization in Reverse," which ironically inverts Britain's xenophobic apprehension at the postwar influx of Jamaican immigrants, while also casting a suspicious eye on some Jamaicans' reverse exploitation of their exploiters. No one is safe from the multiple ironies and carnivalesque irreverence of Bennett's verse.

Jamaica Language¹

Listen, na!

My Auntie Roachy seh dat it bwile² her temper an really bex³ her fi true anytime she hear anybody a style we Jamaican dialect as "corruption of the English language." For if dat be de case, den dem shoulda call English Language corruption of Norman French an Latin an all dem tarra⁴ language what dem seh dat English is derived from.

Oonoo⁵ hear de wud? "Derived." English is a derivation but Jamaica Dialect is corruption! What a unfairity!

Auntie Roachy seh dat if Jamaican Dialect is corruption of de English Language, den it is also a corruption of de African Twi Language to, a oh!

For Jamaican Dialect did start when we English forefahders did start musan-boun⁶ we African ancestors fi stop talk fi-dem African Language altogedder an learn fi talk so-so⁷ English, because we English forefahders couldn understan what we African ancestors-dem wasa seh to dem one anodder when dem wasa talk eena dem African Language to dem one annodder!

But we African ancestors-dem pop⁸ we English forefahders-dem. Yes! Pop dem an disguise up de English Language fi projec fi-dem African Language in such a way dat we English forefahders-dem still couldn understan what we African ancestors-dem wasa talk bout when dem wasa talk to dem one annodder!

Yes, bwoy!

So till now, aldoah plenty a we Jamaica Dialect wuds-dem come from English wuds, yet, still an for all, de talkin is so-so Jamaican, an when we ready we can meck it soun like it no got no English at all eena it! An no so-so English-talkin smaddy cyaan⁹ understan weh we a seh if we doan want dem to understan weh we a seh, a oh!

An we fix up we dialect wud fi soun like whatsoever we a talk bout, look like! For instance, when we seh sinting “kooroo-kooroo”¹ up, yuh know seh dat it mark-up mark-up. An if we seh one house “rookoo-rookoo”² up, it is plain to see dat it ole an shaky-shaky. An when we seh smaddy “boogoo-yagga,” everybody know seh dat him outa-order; an if we seh dem “boonoonoonoos,”³ yuh know seh dat dem nice an we like dem. Mmmm.

Aunty Roachy seh dat Jamaica Dialect is more direc an to de point dan English. For all like how English smaddy would seh “Go away,” Jamaican jus seh “Gweh!” An de only time we use more wuds dan English is when we want fi meck someting soun strong: like when dem seh sinting “batter-batter” up, it soun more expressive dan if yuh seh “it is battered.” But most of all we fling weh all de bangarang an trimmins⁴-dem an only lef what wantin, an dat’s why when English smaddy seh “I got stuck by a prick” Jamaican jus seh “Macca⁵ jook me”!

So fi-we Jamaica Language is not no English Language corruption at all, a oh! An we no haffi shame a it, like one gal who did go a Englan go represent we Jamaican folk-song “One shif me got” as “De sole underwear garment I possess,” and go sing “Mumma, Mumma, dem ketch Puppa” as “Mother, Mother, they apprehended Father”!

Ay ya yie!

1979–81/1993

Endnotes

- Note 1: Originally broadcast sometime between 1979 and 1981, this radio monologue has been reprinted from Aunty Roachy Seh (1993), ed. Mervyn Morris.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Boils.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Vexes.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Other.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: You (plural).Return to reference 5

- Note 6: Compel. Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Only. Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Outwitted. Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Can't. "Smaddy": people. Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Rough; rocky. "Sinting": something. Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Unsteady. Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Beautiful; wonderful (term of endearment). "Boogoo-yagga": ill-mannered. Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Miscellaneous trash and trimmings. Return to reference 4
- Note 5: A prickly plant. Return to reference 5

Dry-Foot Bwoy¹

Wha wrong wid Mary dry-foot bwoy?
Dem gal got him fi mock,^o
An when me meet him tarra night
De bwoy gi me a shock!

5 Me tell him seh him auntie an
Him cousin dem sen howdy²
An ask him how him getting awn.
Him seh, 'Oh, jolley, jolley!'

10 Me start fi feel so sorry fi
De po bad-lucky soul,
Me tink him come a foreign lan
Come ketch bad foreign cole!

15 Me tink him got a bad sore-troat,
But as him chat-chat gwan
Me fine out seh is foreign twang
De bwoy wasa put awn!³

20 For me notice dat him answer
To nearly all me seh
Was 'Actually', 'What', 'Oh deah!'
An all dem sinting deh.^o

Me gi a joke, de gal dem laugh;
But hear de bwoy, 'Haw-haw!
I'm sure you got that bally-dash^o
Out of the cinema!'

Same time me laas me temper, an

25 Me holler, 'Bwoy, kirout!^o
 No chat to me wid no hot pittata
 Eena yuh mout!'

30 Him tan^o up like him stunted, den
 Hear him no, 'How silley!
 I don't think that I really Understand you, actually.'

35 Me seh, 'Yuh understan me, yaw!
 No yuh name Cudjoe Scoop?
 Always visit Nana kitchen an Gi laugh fi gungoo soup!⁴

40 'An now all yuh can seh is "actually"?
 Bwoy, but tap!
 Wha happen to dem sweet Jamaica
 Joke yuh use fi pop?'

45 Him get bex^o and walk tru de door,
 Him head eena de air;
 De gal-dem bawl out affa him,⁵
 'Not going? What! Oh deah!'

An from dat night till tedeh, mah,
 Dem all got him fi mock.
 Miss Mary dry-foot bwoy!
 Cyaan get over de shock!

1957

Endnotes

- Note 1: Thin-legged (inexperienced) boy. Return to reference 1
- Note 2: I told him that his auntie and his cousins sent [or send] greetings. Return to reference 2

- Note 3: But as he kept talking I realized his foreign accent was put on.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Chastising the boy for his pretensions, the speaker reminds him that he is African Jamaican. Cudjoe and Nana are African names used in Jamaica. "Gungoo": congo pea.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The girls went crying after him.Return to reference 5

Notes

- °: The girls are mocking himReturn to reference °
- °: All of them things thereReturn to reference °
- °: nonsense, balderdashReturn to reference °
- °: clear outReturn to reference °
- °: standReturn to reference °
- °: vexedReturn to reference °

Colonization in Reverse

What a joyful news, Miss Mattie;
Ah feel like me heart gwine burs—
Jamaica people colonizin
Englan in reverse.!

5 By de hundred, by de tousan,
From country an from town,
By de ship-load, by de plane-load,
Jamaica is Englan boun.

10 Dem a pour out a Jamaica;
Everybody future plan
Is fi get a big-time job
An settle in de motherlan.

15 What a islan! What a people!
Man an woman, ole an young
Jussa pack dem bag an baggage
An tun history upside dung!°

20 Some people doan like travel,
But fi show dem loyalty
Dem all a open up cheap-fare-
To-Englan agency;

An week by week dem shippin off
Dem countryman like fire
Fi immigrate an populate
De seat a de Empire.

25 Oonoo° se how life is funny,
Oonoo see de tunabout?

Jamaica live fi box bread
Out a English people mout.

30 For when dem catch a Englan
An start play dem different role
Some will settle down to work
An some will settle fi de dole.°

35 Jane seh de dole is not too bad
Because dey payin she
Two pounds a week fi seek a job
Dat suit her dignity.

40 Me seh Jane will never fine work
At de rate how she dah look
For all day she stay pon Aunt Fan couch
An read love-story book.

What a devilment a Englan!
Dem face war an brave de worse;
But ah wonderin how dem gwine stan
Colonizin in reverse.

1957

Endnotes

- Note I: Encouraged by the postwar labor shortage in England and the scarcity of work at home, three hundred thousand West Indians migrated to Britain from 1948 to 1962. Return to reference I

Notes

- °: down Return to reference °
- °: you (plural) Return to reference °

- °: for unemployment benefits Return to reference °

Jamaica Oman¹

Jamaica oman cunny, sah!^o
Is how dem jinnal so?^o
Look how long dem liberated
An de man dem never know!

5 Look how long Jamaica oman —Modder, sister, wife, sweetheart—
Outa road an eena yard^o deh pon
A dominate her part!

10 From Maroon Nanny² teck her body
Bounce bullet back pon man,
To when nowadays gal-pickney^o tun
Spellin-Bee champion.

15 From de grass root to de hill-top,
In profession, skill an trade,
Jamaica oman teck her time
Dah mount an meck de grade.

20 Some backa man a push, some side-a Man a hole him han,
Some a lick sense eena man head,
Some a guide him pon him plan!

Neck an neck an foot an foot wid man
She buckle hole^o her own;
While man a call her 'so-so rib'
Oman a tun backbone!³

An long before Oman Lib⁴ bruck out

25 Over foreign lan
Jamaica female wasa work
Her liberated plan!

30 Jamaica oman know she strong,
She know she tallawah,^o
But she no want her pickney^o dem
Fi start call her 'Puppa'.^o

35 So de cunny Jamma^o oman
Gwan like pants-suit is a style,
An Jamaica man no know she wear
De trousiz all de while!

40 So Jamaica oman coixin
Fambly budget from explode
A so Jamaica man a sing
'Oman a heaby load!'⁵

But de cunny Jamma oman
Ban her belly,⁶ bite her tongue,
Ketch water, put pot pon fire
An jus dig her toe a grung.⁷

45 For 'Oman luck deh a dungle',⁸
Some rooted more dan some,
But as long as fowl a scratch dungle heap
Oman luck mus come!

50 Lickle by lickle man start praise her,
Day by day de praise a grow;
So him praise her, so it sweet her,
For she wonder if him know.

Endnotes

- Note 1: Woman.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Jamaican national hero who led the Maroons, fugitive slaves, in battle during the 18th century. Bullets reputedly ricocheted off her and killed her enemies.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Eve is said to have come from Adam's rib (Genesis 2:21–22).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Women's liberation movement.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: A folk song often sung while working in the fields.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Binds her belly (a practice associated with grief; also a suggestion of belt tightening, as in hunger).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: And just digs her toes into the ground.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, woman's luck will be rediscovered (proverbial). "Dungle": garbage dump.Return to reference 8

Notes

- °: cunning, sirReturn to reference °
- °: how are they so tricky?Return to reference °
- °: homeReturn to reference °
- °: girl-childReturn to reference °
- °: she take holdReturn to reference °
- °: sturdyReturn to reference °
- °: childrenReturn to reference °
- °: PapaReturn to reference °
- °: JamaicanReturn to reference °

KAMAU BRATHWAITE

As a poet and historian, Kamau Brathwaite (1930–2020) was the most prominent West Indian spokesman for “the literature of reconnection”: he sought to recover and revalue the African inheritance in the Caribbean—a religious, linguistic, and cultural legacy seen as embarrassing or taboo through most of the twentieth century. In History of the Voice, a lecture first delivered in 1979, Brathwaite argues that African Caribbeans, their ancestors uprooted by slavery, were further cut off from their specific history and their local environment by Standard English models of language and literature. He proposes “nation language,” a creolized English saturated with African words, rhythms, even grammar, as a crucial tool for writers to recuperate African Caribbean history and experience. His own poetry draws on West Indian syncopations, orality, and musical traditions, but also adapts imported models, such as the modernist dislocations of persona, rhythm, and tone in T. S. Eliot’s verse.

He was born Lawson Edward Brathwaite in Bridgetown, Barbados, at the eastern edge of the West Indies. His undergraduate studies in history were at Cambridge University; his graduate studies, at the University of Sussex. He worked as an education officer for the Ministry of Education in Ghana (1955–62) and taught history at the University of the West Indies, before taking a position in comparative literature at New York University in 1991. His many books of poetry include a work of epic scope and scale, The Arrivants: A New World Trilogy (1973), which gathers Rights of Passage (1967), Masks (1968), and Islands (1969). Toward the end of his career, his poetry became more engaged with the idea of writing as a recording technology in books such as X/Self (1987) and ConVERsations with Nathaniel Mackey (1999) (see p. 1094 in this volume).

[Nation Language]¹

What I am going to talk about this morning is language from the Caribbean, the process of using English in a different way from the “norm”. English in a new sense as I prefer to call it. English in an ancient sense. English in a very traditional sense. And sometimes not English at all, but language.

I start my thoughts, taking up from the discussion that developed after Dennis Brutus’s² very excellent presentation. Without logic, and through instinct, the people who spoke with Dennis from the floor yesterday brought up the question of language. * * * In his case, it was English, and English as spoken by Africans, and the native languages as spoken by Africans.

We in the Caribbean have a similar kind of plurality: we have English, which is the imposed language on much of the archipelago. English is an imperial language, as are French, Dutch, and Spanish. We have what we call creole English, which is a mixture of English and an adaptation that English took in the new environment of the Caribbean when it became mixed with the other imported languages. We have also what is called nation language, which is the kind of English spoken by the people who were brought to the Caribbean, not the official English now, but the language of slaves and labourers, the servants who were brought in by the conquistadors. Finally, we have the remnants of ancestral languages still persisting in the Caribbean. There is Amerindian, which is active in certain parts of Central America but not in the Caribbean because the Amerindians are a destroyed people, and their languages were practically destroyed. We have Hindi, spoken by some of the more traditional East Indians who live in the Caribbean, and there are also varieties of Chinese. And, miraculously, there are survivals of African languages still persisting in the Caribbean. So we have that spectrum—that prism—of languages similar to the kind of structure that Dennis described for South Africa. Now, I have to give you some kind of background to the development of these languages, the historical development of this plurality, because I can't take it for granted that you know and understand the history of the Caribbean.

The Caribbean is a set of islands stretching out from Florida in a mighty curve. You must know of the Caribbean at least from television, at least now with hurricane David³ coming right into it. The islands stretch out on an arc of some two thousand miles from Florida through the Atlantic to the South American coast, and they were originally inhabited by Amerindian people, Taino, Siboney, Carib, Arawak. In 1492, Columbus "discovered" (as it is said) the Caribbean, and with that discovery came the intrusion of European culture and peoples and a fragmentation of the original Amerindian culture. We had Europe "nationalizing" itself into Spanish, French, English and Dutch so that people had to start speaking (and thinking) in four metropolitan languages rather than possibly a single native language. Then, with the destruction of the Amerindians, which took place within 30 years of Columbus' discovery (one million dead a year), it was necessary for the Europeans to import new labour bodies into the Caribbean. And the most convenient form of labour was the labour on the very edge of the trade winds—the labour on the edge of the slave trade winds, the labour on the edge of the hurricane, the labour on the edge of West Africa—. And so the peoples of Ashanti,⁴ Congo, Nigeria, from all that mighty coast of western Africa were imported into the Caribbean. And we had the arrival in that area of a new language structure. It consisted of many languages, but basically they had a common semantic and stylistic form. What these languages had to do, however, was to submerge themselves, because officially the conquering peoples—the Spaniards, the English, the French, and the Dutch—did not wish to hear people speaking Ashanti or any of the Congolese languages. So there was a submergence of this imported language. Its status became one of inferiority. Similarly, its speakers were slaves. They were conceived of as inferiors—nonhuman, in fact—. But this very submergence served an interesting intercultural purpose, because although people continued to speak English as it was spoken in Elizabethan times and on through the Romantic and Victorian ages, that English was, nonetheless, still being influenced by the underground language, the submerged language that the slaves had brought. And that underground language was itself constantly transforming itself into new forms. It was moving from a purely African form to a form that was African, but which was adapting to the new environment and to the cultural imperatives of the European languages. And it was influencing the way in which the French, Dutch, and Spanish spoke their own languages. So there was a very complex process taking place which is now beginning to surface in our literature.

In the Caribbean, as in South Africa (and in any area of cultural imperialism for that matter), the educational system did not recognize the presence of these various languages. What our educational system did was to recognize and maintain the language of the conquistador—the language of the planter, the language of the official, the language of the Anglican preacher—. It insisted that not only would English be spoken in the anglophone Caribbean, but that the educational system would carry the contours of an English heritage. Hence, as Dennis said, Shakespeare, George Eliot, Jane Austen—British literature and literary forms, the models that were intimate to Great Britain, that had very little to do, really, with the environment and the reality of the Caribbean—were dominant in the Caribbean educational system. People were forced to learn things that had no relevance to themselves. Paradoxically, in the Caribbean (as in many other “cultural disaster” areas), the people educated in this system came to know more, even today, about English kings and queens than they do about our own national heroes, our own slave rebels—the people who helped to build and to destroy our society—. We are more excited by English literary models, by the concept of, say, Sherwood Forest and Robin Hood, than we are by Nanny of the Maroons,⁵ a name some of us didn’t even know until a few years ago. And in terms of what we write, our perceptual models, we are more conscious (in terms of sensibility) of the falling of snow for instance—the models are all there for the falling of the snow—than of the force of the hurricanes that take place every year. In other words, we haven't got the syllables, the syllabic intelligence, to describe the hurricane, which is our own experience; whereas we can describe the imported alien experience of the snowfall. It is that kind of situation that we are in.

Now the creole adaptation to all this is the child who, instead of writing in an essay "The snow was falling on the fields of Shropshire"⁶ (which is what our children literally were writing until a few years ago, below drawings they made of white snow fields and the corn-haired people who inhabited such a landscape), wrote "The snow was falling on the cane fields." The child had not yet reached the obvious statement that it wasn't snow at all, but rain that was probably falling on the cane fields. She was trying to have both cultures at the same time. But that is creolization.

What is even more important, as we develop this business of emergent language in the Caribbean, is the actual rhythm and the syllables, the very body work, in a way, of the language. What English has given us as a model for poetry, and to a lesser extent, prose (but poetry is the basic tool here), is the pentameter: "The curfew tolls the knell of parting day."⁷ There have, of course, been attempts to break it. And there were other dominant forms like, for example, Beowulf (c. 750), The Seafarer,⁸ and what Langland (1322?–1400) had produced:

*For trewthe telleth that love. is triacle of hevene;
May no synne be on him sene. that useth that spise,
And alle his werkes he wrougte. with love as him liste.*

Or, from Piers the Plowman (which does not make it into Palgrave's Golden Treasury,⁹ but which we all had to "do" at school) the haunting prologue:

*In a somer seson. whan soft was the sonne
I shope me into shroudes. as I a shepe were*

Which has recently inspired our own Derek Walcott to his first major nation language effort:

*In idle August, while the sea soft,
and leaves of brown islands stick to the rim
of this Caribbean, I blow out the light
by the dreamless face of Maria Concepcion
to ship as a seaman on the schooner Flight.*¹

But by the time we reach Chaucer (1345–1400), the pentameter prevails. Over in the New World, the Americans—Walt Whitman—tried to bridge or to break the pentameter through a cosmic movement, a large movement of sound. Cummings tried to fragment it. And Marianne Moore attacked it with syllabics.² But basically the pentameter remained, and it carries with it a certain kind of experience, which is not the experience of a hurricane. The hurricane does not roar in pentameter. And that's the problem: how do you get a rhythm that approximates the natural experience, the environmental experience. We have been trying to break out of the entire pentametric model in the Caribbean and to move into a system that more closely and intimately approaches our own experience. So that is what we are talking about now.

It is nation language in the Caribbean that, in fact, largely ignores the pentameter. Nation language is the language that is influenced very strongly by the African model, the African aspect of our New World/Caribbean heritage. English it may be in terms of its lexicon, but it is not English in terms of its syntax. And English it certainly is not in terms of its rhythm and timbre, its own sound explosion. In its contours, it is not English, even though the words, as you hear them, would be English to a greater or lesser degree. And this brings us back to the question that some of you raised yesterday: can English be a revolutionary language? And the lovely answer that came back was: it is not English that is the agent. It is not language, but people, who make revolutions.

I think, however, that language does really have a role to play here, certainly in the Caribbean. But it is an English that is not the standard, imported, educated English, but that of the submerged, surrealist experience and sensibility, which has always been there and which is now increasingly coming to the surface and influencing the perception of contemporary Caribbean people. It is what I call, as I say, nation language. I use the term in contrast to dialect. The word dialect has been bandied about for a long time, and it carries very pejorative overtones. Dialect is thought of as “bad” English. Dialect is “inferior” English. Dialect is the language when you want to make fun of someone. Caricature speaks in dialect. Dialect has a long history coming from the plantation where people’s dignity was distorted through their languages and the descriptions that the dialect gave to them. Nation language, on the other hand, is the submerged area of that dialect that is much more closely allied to the African aspect of experience in the Caribbean. It may be in English, but often it is in an English which is like a howl, or a shout, or a machine-gun, or the wind, or a wave. It is also like the blues. And sometimes it is English and African at the same time.

* * *

The mainstream poets who were moving from standard English to nation language were influenced basically, I think (again the models are important), by T. S. Eliot. What T. S. Eliot did for Caribbean poetry and Caribbean literature was to introduce the notion of the speaking voice, the conversational tone.³ That is what really attracted us to Eliot. And you can see how the Caribbean poets introduced here have been influenced by him, although they eventually went on to create their own environmental expression.

* * *

1979–81 1984, 1986

Endnotes

- Note 1: First printed separately in 1984, Brathwaite's lecture History of the Voice was slightly modified and incorporated in his essay collection Roots (1986, 1993), from which this selection is excerpted.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: South African poet (1924–2009).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: A hurricane that killed over 2,000 people in the Caribbean in August 1979.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Region in present-day central Ghana.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The Maroons were Africans and escaped slaves who, after running away or participating in successful rebellions, set up autonomous societies throughout plantation America in marginal and certainly inaccessible areas outside European influence. . . . Nanny of the Maroons, an ex-Ashanti (?) Queen Mother, is regarded as one of the greatest of the Jamaican freedom fighters [Brathwaite's note].Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Region of western England on the Welsh border, written about by the English poet A. E. Housman (1859–1936).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The opening line of "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard," by the English poet Thomas Gray (1716–1771).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Poem in Old English.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Collection of songs and lyric poems published in London. Piers the Plowman: Middle English poem believed to have been written by William Langland (ca. 1330–1387).Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Beginning of "The Schooner Flight," by the Saint Lucian poet Derek Walcott (1930–2017).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Verses based on the number of syllables, not accents, in a line. E. E. Cummings (1894–1962), American poet. Marianne Moore (1887–1972), American poet.Return to reference 2
- Note 3:

For those of us who really made the breakthrough, it was Eliot's actual voice—or rather his recorded voice, property of the British Council (Barbados)—reading "Preludes," "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock," The Waste Land, and later the Four Quartets—not the texts—which turned us on. In that dry deadpan delivery, the "riddims" of St. Louis (though we did not know the source then) were stark and clear for those of us who at the same time were listening to the dislocations of Bird, Dizzy, and Klook. And it is interesting that, on the whole, the establishment could not stand Eliot's voice—and far less jazz [Brathwaite's note]. "Bird": American jazz musician Charlie "Bird" Parker (1920–1955). "Dizzy": American jazz trumpeter Dizzy Gillespie (1917–1993). "Klook": American jazz drummer Kenny Clarke (1914–1985).

Return to reference 3

NGŪGĨ WA THIONG'O

Ngũgĩ wa Thiong'o (b. 1938) was born in Limuru, Kenya, where his father was a peasant farmer. He was educated at the Alliance High School in Kikuyu, Kenya; Makerere University in Kampala, Uganda; and Leeds University in England. In the late 1960s, while teaching at University College, Nairobi, Kenya, he was one of the prime movers behind the abolition of the college's English department, arguing for its replacement by a Department of African Literature and Languages (two departments were formed, one of literature, the other of language). His novels include Weep Not, Child (1964), about the 1950s Mau Mau rebellion against British rule in Kenya, A Grain of Wheat (1967), about the war's aftermath, and Petals of Blood (1977), about the failure of the East African state, and he has written plays and novels in his native Gĩkũyũ, also sharply critical of post-independence Kenya, such as the novel Matigari (1986). In 1982, after his imprisonment in Kenya and the banning of his books there, Ngũgĩ left to teach abroad, most recently at the University of California, Irvine.

At the beginning of Decolonising the Mind (1986), Ngũgĩ declares the book "my farewell to English as a vehicle for any of my writings. From now on it is Gĩkũyũ and Kiswahili all the way." Although Ngũgĩ has subsequently modified this position, he lays out starkly the case against English language and literature as tools of colonialism, which continue to have insidious effects long after formal decolonization. As the student of a British colonial education, Ngũgĩ came to feel that, because of the close relation between language and cultural memory, the imposition of English language and literature severs colonized peoples from their cultural experience—an experience best recovered and explored in indigenous languages.

From Decolonising the Mind

From The Language of African Literature

III

I was born into a large peasant family: father, four wives and about twenty-eight children. I also belonged, as we all did in those days, to a wider extended family and to the community as a whole.

We spoke Gĩkũyũ¹ as we worked in the fields. We spoke Gĩkũyũ in and outside the home. I can vividly recall those evenings of story-telling around the fireside. It was mostly the grown-ups telling the children but everybody was interested and involved. We children would re-tell the stories the following day to other children who worked in the fields picking the pyrethrum flowers,² tea-leaves or coffee beans of our European and African landlords.

The stories, with mostly animals as the main characters, were all told in Gĩkũyũ. Hare, being small, weak but full of innovative wit and cunning, was our hero. We identified with him as he struggled against the brutes of prey like lion, leopard, hyena. His victories were our victories and we learnt that the apparently weak can outwit the strong. We followed the animals in their struggle against hostile nature—drought, rain, sun, wind—a confrontation often forcing them to search for forms of co-operation. But we were also interested in their struggles amongst themselves, and particularly between the beasts and the victims of prey. These twin struggles, against nature and other animals, reflected real-life struggles in the human world.

Not that we neglected stories with human beings as the main characters. There were two types of characters in such human-centred narratives: the species of truly human beings with qualities of courage, kindness, mercy, hatred of evil, concern for others; and a man-eat-man two-mouthed species with qualities of greed, selfishness, individualism and hatred of what was good for the larger co-operative community. Co-operation as the ultimate good in a community was a constant theme. It could unite human beings with animals against ogres and beasts of prey, as in the story of how dove, after being fed with castor-oil seeds, was sent to fetch a smith working far away from home and whose pregnant wife was being threatened by these man-eating two-mouthed ogres.

There were good and bad story-tellers. A good one could tell the same story over and over again, and it would always be fresh to us, the listeners. He or she could tell a story told by someone else and make it more alive and dramatic. The differences really were in the use of words and images and the inflexion of voices to effect different tones.

We therefore learnt to value words for their meaning and nuances. Language was not a mere string of words. It had a suggestive power well beyond the immediate and lexical meaning. Our appreciation of the suggestive magical power of language was reinforced by the games we played with words through riddles, proverbs, transpositions of syllables, or through nonsensical but musically arranged words. So we learnt the music of our language on top of the content. The language, through images and symbols, gave us a view of the world, but it had a beauty of its own. The home and the field were then our pre-primary school but what is important, for this discussion, is that the language of our evening teach-ins, and the language of our immediate and wider community, and the language of our work in the fields were one.

And then I went to school, a colonial school, and this harmony was broken. The language of my education was no longer the language of my culture. I first went to Kamaandura, missionary run, and then to another called Maanguuũ run by nationalists grouped around the Gĩkũyũ Independent and Karinga Schools Association. Our language of education was still Gĩkũyũ. The very first time I was ever given an ovation for my writing was over a composition in Gĩkũyũ. So for my first four years there was still harmony between the language of my formal education and that of the Limuru peasant community.

It was after the declaration of a state of emergency over Kenya in 1952³ that all the schools run by patriotic nationalists were taken over by the colonial regime and were placed under District Education Boards chaired by Englishmen. English became the language of my formal education. In Kenya, English became more than a language: it was the language, and all the others had to bow before it in deference.

Thus one of the most humiliating experiences was to be caught speaking Gĩkũyũ in the vicinity of the school. The culprit was given corporal punishment—three to five strokes of the cane on bare buttocks—or was made to carry a metal plate around the neck with inscriptions such as I AM STUPID OR I AM A DONKEY. Sometimes the culprits were fined money they could hardly afford. And how did the teachers catch the culprits? A button was initially given to one pupil who was supposed to hand it over to whoever was caught speaking his mother tongue. Whoever had the button at the end of the day would sing who had given it to him and the ensuing process would bring out all the culprits of the day. Thus children were turned into witch-hunters and in the process were being taught the lucrative value of being a traitor to one's immediate community.

The attitude to English was the exact opposite: any achievement in spoken or written English was highly rewarded; prizes, prestige, applause; the ticket to higher realms. English became the measure of intelligence and ability in the arts, the sciences, and all the other branches of learning. English became the main determinant of a child's progress up the ladder of formal education.

As you may know, the colonial system of education in addition to its apartheid racial demarcation had the structure of a pyramid: a broad primary base, a narrowing secondary middle, and an even narrower university apex. Selections from primary into secondary were through an examination, in my time called Kenya African Preliminary Examination, in which one had to pass six subjects ranging from Maths to Nature Study and Kiswahili.⁴ All the papers were written in English. Nobody could pass the exam who failed the English language paper no matter how brilliantly he had done in the other subjects. I remember one boy in my class of 1954 who had distinctions in all subjects except English, which he had failed. He was made to fail the entire exam. He went on to become a turn boy⁵ in a bus company. I who had only passes but a credit in English got a place at the Alliance High School, one of the most elitist institutions for Africans in colonial Kenya. The requirements for a place at the University, Makerere University College,⁶ were broadly the same: nobody could go on to wear the undergraduate red gown, no matter how brilliantly they had performed in all the other subjects unless they had a credit—not even a simple pass!—in English. Thus the most coveted place in the pyramid and in the system was only available to the holder of an English language credit card. English was the official vehicle and the magic formula to colonial elitedom.

Literary education was now determined by the dominant language while also reinforcing that dominance. Orature (oral literature) in Kenyan languages stopped. In primary school I now read simplified Dickens and Stevenson alongside Rider Haggard. Jim Hawkins, Oliver Twist, Tom Brown—not Hare, Leopard and Lion—were now my daily companions in the world of imagination.⁷ In secondary school, Scott and G. B. Shaw vied with more Rider Haggard, John Buchan, Alan Paton, Captain W. E. Johns.⁸ At Makerere I read English: from Chaucer to T. S. Eliot with a touch of Graham Greene.⁹

Thus language and literature were taking us further and further from ourselves to other selves, from our world to other worlds.

* * *

Endnotes

- Note 1: Bantu language spoken in western Kenya by approximately five million people.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Flower used to produce a natural insecticide.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The Mau Mau, militant African nationalists, led a revolt in 1952 that resulted in four years of British military operations and the deaths of more than 11,000 insurgents.Return to reference 3

- Note 4: Swahili, a Bantu language that is the most widely understood language in Africa.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: That is, the person who operates a turnstile.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: University in Kampala, Uganda, that was connected with the University of London in the 1950s and 1960s.Return to reference 6
- Note 7:
The English novelist Charles Dickens (1812–1870) wrote Oliver Twist. Jim Hawkins is the hero of Treasure Island, by the Scottish fiction writer and essayist Robert Louis Stevenson (1850–1894). The English novelist Rider Haggard (1856–1925) wrote African adventure stories. Tom Brown's Schooldays is by the English novelist Thomas Hughes (1822–1896).
Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Sir Walter Scott (1771–1832), Scottish novelist. George Bernard Shaw (1856–1950), Anglo-Irish dramatist. John Buchan (1875–1940), Scottish author of adventure stories. Alan Paton (1903–1988), South African novelist. William Earl Johns (1893–1968), English author of children's fiction.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Geoffrey Chaucer (ca. 1343–1400), English poet. T. S. Eliot (1888–1965), Anglo-American poet. Graham Greene (1904–1991), English novelist. "Read": here "majored in."Return to reference 9

IV

* * *

Language carries culture, and culture carries, particularly through orature and literature, the entire body of values by which we come to perceive ourselves and our place in the world. How people perceive themselves affects how they look at their culture, at their politics and at the social production of wealth, at their entire relationship to nature and to other beings. Language is thus inseparable from ourselves as a community of human beings with a specific form and character, a specific history, a specific relationship to the world.

V

So what was the colonialist imposition of a foreign language doing to us children?

The real aim of colonialism was to control the people's wealth: what they produced, how they produced it, and how it was distributed; to control, in other words, the entire realm of the language of real life. Colonialism imposed its control of the social production of wealth through military conquest and subsequent political dictatorship. But its most important area of domination was the mental universe of the colonised, the control, through culture, of how people perceived themselves and their relationship to the world. Economic and political control can never be complete or effective without mental control. To control a people's culture is to control their tools of self-definition in relationship to others.

For colonialism this involved two aspects of the same process: the destruction or the deliberate undervaluing of a people's culture, their art, dances, religions, history, geography, education, orature and literature, and the conscious elevation of the language of the coloniser. The domination of a people's language by the languages of the colonising nations was crucial to the domination of the mental universe of the colonised.

* * *

IX

I started writing in Gĩkũyũ language in 1977 after seventeen years of involvement in Afro-European literature, in my case Afro-English literature. * * * Wherever I have gone, particularly in Europe, I have been confronted with the question: why are you now writing in Gĩkũyũ? Why do you now write in an African language? In some academic quarters I have been confronted with the rebuke, 'Why have you abandoned us?' It was almost as if, in choosing to write in Gĩkũyũ, I was doing something abnormal. But Gĩkũyũ is my mother tongue! The very fact that what common sense dictates in the literary practice of other cultures is being questioned in an African writer is a measure of how far imperialism has distorted the view of African realities. It has turned reality upside down: the abnormal is viewed as normal and the normal is viewed as abnormal. Africa actually enriches Europe: but Africa is made to believe that it needs Europe to rescue it from poverty. Africa's natural and human resources continue to develop Europe and America: but Africa is made to feel grateful for aid from the same quarters that still sit on the back of the continent. Africa even produces intellectuals who now rationalise this upside-down way of looking at Africa.

I believe that my writing in Gĩkũyũ language, a Kenyan language, an African language, is part and parcel of the anti-imperialist struggles of Kenyan and African peoples. In schools and universities our Kenyan languages—that is the languages of the many nationalities which make up Kenya—were associated with negative qualities of backwardness, underdevelopment, humiliation and punishment. We who went through that school system were meant to graduate with a hatred of the people and the culture and the values of the language of our daily humiliation and punishment. I do not want to see Kenyan children growing up in that imperialist-imposed tradition of contempt for the tools of communication developed by their communities and their history. I want them to transcend colonial alienation.

* * *

We African writers are bound by our calling to do for our languages what Spenser, Milton and Shakespeare did for English; what Pushkin and Tolstoy¹ did for Russian; indeed what all writers in world history have done for their languages by meeting the challenge of creating a literature in them, which process later opens the languages for philosophy, science, technology and all the other areas of human creative endeavours.

1986

Endnotes

- Note 1: Leo Tolstoy (1828–1910), Russian novelist; Aleksandr Pushkin (1799–1837), Russian poet. Return to reference 1

SAMUEL SELVON

Samuel “Sam” Selvon (1923–1994) was born in San Fernando, Trinidad. His father was a cocoa merchant from India, and his mother was of mixed Indian and Scottish ancestry. Selvon attended Naparima College (a secondary school for boys) before joining the Trinidad Royal Navy reserve in 1939. He worked as a wireless radio operator for a brief period and then shifted to journalism and literary writing in Trinidad. He and his wife moved to London in 1950 as part of the Windrush Generation, a large wave of immigrants from the Caribbean colonies who sought job opportunities in the United Kingdom. This generation contributed to the growing racial diversity of post–World War II England and signaled demographic shifts in the population of the UK as former subjects of the British Empire settled in its metropolitan center.

As an East Indian growing up in the West Indies, Selvon was no stranger to resettlement, and he brought themes and styles of cultural mixture to his novels and short stories. A Brighter Sun (1952), published just after his arrival in England, explored the mutual distrust among Indians and Creoles (a group of mixed African and European ancestry) in Trinidad. Subsequent novels and short story collections explored the transition from the racial politics of the Caribbean islands to the de facto racial segregation of London, where newly arrived immigrants of color found themselves systemically isolated and marginalized by the predominantly White population. Selvon’s most renowned novel, The Lonely Londoners (1956), combined modernist techniques of narrative fragmentation with dialect writing to capture the collective disorientation and alienation of Black and Brown immigrants, mostly single men, in their own voices and accents. Its sequels, Moses Ascending (1975) and Moses Migrating (1983), followed one migrant in particular through the dream of owning a home and his return to his native Trinidad.

The short story included here, "Waiting for Aunty to Cough" from the collection Ways of Sunlight (1957), is representative of Selvon's subtle humor and sensitivity to the male immigrant experience. The story is told by a first-person narrator, a migrant waiting for his friend Brackley to return from a date with a White local woman who lives on the outskirts of London. Throughout the "ballad," as the narrator calls it, Selvon adopts the informal language and slang of his subjects so that dialect both estranges Standardized English and invites the reader into the thoughts and feelings of protagonists otherwise stigmatized within London. Brackley's story, framed by the narrator, highlights the vulnerability and fear of Black migrants in London as well as the self-protective role that storytelling plays among young men struggling to establish themselves in a new place.

Waiting for Aunty to Cough

It had a late lime¹ what few of the boys acquainted with. That don't mean to say was anything exclusive, but as far as I know Brackley was the only fellar who get in with a thing² that living far from London, and had was to see the piece home every night, going out of the city and coming back late, missing bus and train and having to hustle or else stay stranded in one of them places behind God back.

I mean, some people might say a place like where Brackley used to go ain't far, and argue even that it still included in London, but to the city boys, as soon as you start to hit Clapham Common or Chiswick or Mile End or Highgate,³ that mean you living in the country, and they out to give you tone, like: 'Mind you miss the last bus home, old man,' and, 'When next you coming to town?' or, 'You could get some fresh eggs for me where you living?'

Well Brackley in fact settle down nicely in Central, a two and ten room in Ladbroke Grove,⁴ with easy communications⁵ for liming out in the evenings after work, and the old Portobello road⁶ near by to buy rations like saltfish and red beans and pig foot and pig tail. And almost every evening he would meet the boys and they would lime by the Arch, or the Gate,⁷ and have a cup of coffee (it have place like stupidity now all over London selling coffee, you notice?) and coast a talk and keep a weather eye open for whatever might appear on the horizon.

But a time come, when the boys begin to miss Brackley.

'Anybody see Brackley?'

'I ain't see Brackley a long time, man. He must be move.'

'He uses to be in this coffee shop regular, but these days I can't see him at all.'

All this time, Brackley on one of them green trains you does catch in Charing Cross or Waterloo,⁸ taking a ride and seeing the girl home.

Though Brackley living in London for eight years, is as if he start to discover a new world. Brackley never hear name like what he reading as they pass them stations—Gypsy Hill, Penge West, Forest Hill.

'You sure we on the right train?' Brackley frighten like hell the first time, feeling as if they going to Scotland or something. 'How far from London you say this place is?'

'It is in London, I keep telling you,' the girl say patiently.

'All of this is London?' Brackley look out and see a station name Honor Oak Park. Houses fading away and down there real grim as if is a place far out in the country.

'Yes,' Beatrice say.

'And every day, you have to come all this way to work in London?'

'Yes.'

'Oh, you must be one of those commuter people I read about in the papers.'

Brackley look at his wristwatch. 'I don't like this lime,' he say.

'Oh, you'll get accustomed to it,' Beatrice say. 'It is like nothing to me now.'

'I wonder what the boys doing in the coffee shop in town,' Brackley mutter.

'That is all you ever worry about—wasting your time,' Beatrice start to sulk.

'It ain't have no high spots this side of the world?' Brackley ask. 'If it have, we could go out down here instead of staying in London and coming home late every night.'

'You know I like to go out in the city,' Beatrice pout. 'The only place we could go to down here is near to Croydon.'⁹

'Croydon!' Brackley repeat. 'Where the aeroplanes come from all over the world? You mean to say we so far from London?'

'There are frequent trains,' Beatrice say anxiously.

'Frequent trains!' Brackley repeat. 'Frequent planes, you mean! I don't like the lime at all.'

But all the same, Brackley like the thing and he was seeing she home every night.

Well he start to extend his geographical knowledge from the time he going out with Beatrice, and when he was explaining his absence from the city to the boys, he making it sound as if is a grand lime.

'Man,' he boasting, 'you-all don't know London! You think London is the Gate and the Arch and Trafalgar Square,¹ but them places is nothing. You ever hear about Honor Oak Rise?'

'Which part that is, behind God back?'

'That is a place in London, man! I mean, look at it this way. You live in London so long, and up to now you don't know where that is. You see what I mean?'

'Man Brackley, you only full of guile. This time so that woman have you stupid and travelling all over the country, when you could be liming here. You staying tonight? It have two sharp things does come for coffee here—I think they from Sweden, and you know over there ain't have no inhibition.'²

'I can't stay tonight.'

'Today is Saturday, no night bus.'

But Brackley in hot with Beatrice at this stage and that ain't worrying him. What happen that night was he find himself walking to Kent³ afterwards, thinking that he was on the way to London, and he would have found himself picking hops⁴ or something if a fellar didn't put him right.

One night Brackley was taking a cuppa and a roll in a little place it have near Charing Cross, what does stay open all night for stragglers like him. The set-up is this: three-four frowsy women, and some tests who look as if they only come out at night. I mean, if you really want to meet some characters, is to lime out there by the Embankment after midnight, and you sure to meet some individuals.

That night, two fellars playing dominoes. A group stand up round a fire that they light with wood to keep warm. Suddenly a big commotion start, because the police take Olive and a test say it serve her right.

A woman start to 'buse the fellar who say it serve Olive right.

'What do you know about it?' the woman snarl. 'Keep your ——ing mouth shut.'

She start to scratch her thigh. Same time another woman come hustling up with the stale news that the police take Olive.

'Yes,' the first woman say, 'and this bastard here say that it served her right.' She turn to the fellar again, 'Keep your ——ing mouth shut,' she say, though the fellar ain't saying anything.

Suddenly she turn on Brackley and start to 'buse him, saying that he was responsible. Poor Brackley ain't have a clue what the woman talking about, but three-four frowsy-looking sports gather around him and want to beat him up.

Brackley ease away and start to go up by Whitehall, and the starlings kicking up hell on the sides of the tall buildings, and is almost three o'clock in the morning and he thinking what a hell of a thing life is, how he never ever hear about any Olive and look how them women wanted to beat him up.

Well to get back to the heart of the ballad, one rainy night Brackley and Beatrice went theatre, and theatre over late, and they catch the last train out of town. While they on the train—and Brackley like a regular commuter these days, reading the *Standard*⁵ while Beatrice catching up on some knitting—Beatrice suddenly open her handbag and say: 'Gosh, I think I've lost my key!'

'You could always get another one,' Brackley say, reading How The Other Half Laughs.

'You don't understand,' Beatrice moan. 'Aunty is always complaining about my coming in late, and by the time we get home it will be long after midnight, and the door will be shut.'

'Ring the bell,' Brackley say, laughing at a joke in the paper.

'I daren't wake Aunty at that hour,' Beatrice say, putting aside the knitting to worry better.

'Don't worry, I will open a window for you,' Brackley say.

But when they get to where Beatrice living she was still worrying what to do. She tell Brackley to wait by the gate. She went inside and pick up a tiny pebble and throw at the window, which was on the first floor. It make a sound ping! but nothing happen. After a little while she throw another one ping! but still nothing happen.

Brackley stand up there watching her.

She turn to Brackley helplessly. 'I can't wake Aunty,' she say.

Brackley open the gate and come inside and pick up a big brick from the garden to pelt at the people glass window. Beatrice barely had time to hold his hand.

'Are you mad?' she say in a fierce whisper.

'Well,' Brackley say, 'you don't want to get inside?'

'You are making too much noise already,' Beatrice whisper. 'I will have to stay on the steps until Aunty gets up.'

'What time is that?' Brackley ask.

'About six o'clock,' Beatrice say. 'She is an early riser.'

'You mean to say,' Brackley say, 'you spending the night here in the damp? Why you don't make a big noise and wake she up?'

'No no,' Beatrice say quickly, 'we mustn't make any noise. The neighbours are very troublesome. Let us wait here until Aunty gets up. She is restless at night. When I hear her coughing I will throw another stone.'

So Brackley and Beatrice sit down on the wet steps, waiting for Aunty to cough.

One o'clock come and gone, two o'clock come and gone. Three o'clock rain start to pelt slantways and fall on the steps wetting Brackley. This time so, as Brackley look around, the world grim. Rain and fog around him, and Beatrice sleeping on his shoulder.

He shake her.

Beatrice open her eyes and say, 'What is it, did you hear Aunty cough?'

'No. It look as if her cold get better, I don't think she going to cough tonight at all.'

'She always coughs in the night. As soon as she does I will throw some stones again.'

'Why you don't make a big noise and finish with it? Back home in Trinidad,⁶ you think this could happen? Why—'

'Hush, you are speaking too loudly. I told you it would cause trouble with the neighbours.'

'Why you don't wake up the people on the ground floor?'

'Nobody is there—they work nights.'

'I ain't even have a cigarette,' Brackley grumble, wondering what the boys doing, if they get in with the two girls from Sweden and gone to sleep in a nice warm room.

Beatrice went back to sleep, using poor Brackley as pillow.

Four o'clock come, five o'clock come, and still Brackley waiting for Auntie to cough and she wouldn't cough. This time so he have a sizeable stone in his hand and he make up his mind that the moment Auntie cough he going to fling the stone at the window even if he wake up everybody in the street. Sleep killing Brackley but the doorway small and he bend up there like a piece of wire, catching cramp and unable to shift position. In fact, between five and halfpast Brackley think he hear Auntie cough and he make to get up and couldn't move, all the joints frozen in the damp and cold.

He shake Beatrice roughly. 'Auntie cough,' he say.

'I didn't hear,' Beatrice say.

'I hear,' Brackley say, and he stretch out slowly and get up.

Brackley augment the stone he had with three others and he fling his hand back and he pelt the stones on the people glass window before Beatrice know what he doing.

Well glass cracks and break and splinters fly all about and the noise sound as if the glasshouse in Kew Gardens⁷ falling down. Same time Auntie start one set of coughing.

'You see?' Brackley say, 'I tell you Auntie was coughing!'

'You fool!' Beatrice say. 'Look what you have done! You had better go quickly before you cause further trouble.'

And before Brackley know what happening Beatrice hustle him out to the pavement and shut the gate.

Well a kind of fore-day light⁸ was falling at that hour of the morning and when Aunty fling open the window to see what happening, she see Brackley stand up out there. Only, she not so sure, because Brackley blend in nicely with the kind of half-light half-dark. But all the same, Aunty begin to scream murder and thief.

Brackley take off as if he on the Ascot racecourse.⁹

Some nights later he tell the boys the episode, making it sound like a good joke though at the time he was frighten like hell. But that was a mistake he make, because since that time whenever the boys see him they hailing out:

'Brackley! You still waiting for Aunty to cough?'

1957

Endnotes

- Note 1: Hangout or gathering (slang).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Romantic encounter or date with a woman.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Area of north London; "Clapham Common": a park in south London; "Chiswick": area of west London; "Mile End": area of east London.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Area in west London.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Public transport.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Site of a well-known antiques and secondhand market.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Possibly Marble Arch and Notting Hill Gate (which is a train station). Selvon often makes reference to London landmarks in his work.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Train stations.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Town in south London, a borough of London, and for a while was home to London's main airport.Return to reference 9

- Note 1: Busy square in central London and a tourist attraction.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Inhibition. The migrants are reproducing stereotypes of Swedish women.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: County in southeast England.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: In the early to mid-20th century, Londoners would travel to Kent to pick hops (flowers that give beer its bitter taste) in the hop gardens.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The Evening Standard was a major newspaper with conservative leanings at the time.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Caribbean island under the rule of the British Empire until 1962.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Botanical garden in southwest London with large glass greenhouses.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: West Indian English for the nature of the light at sunrise.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Prestigious horse racing track in England.Return to reference 9

M. NOURBESE PHILIP

Marlene Nourbese Philip (b. 1947), publishing recently as M. NourbeSe Philip, was born on the island of Tobago and raised on the island of Trinidad. She received her B.Sc. in economics at the University of the West Indies (1968), before completing a master's degree in political science (1970) and a law degree (1973) at the University of Western Ontario. She practiced law for seven years in Toronto, where she still lives, before turning full-time to writing poetry, novels, essays, and plays. Her book-length poem Zong! (2008) reexamines a famous eighteenth-century case of enslaved people thrown overboard for insurance savings. Her poem "Discourse on the Logic of Language," from her third book of poetry, She Tries Her Tongue, Her Silence Softly Breaks (1989), considers the estrangement of the postcolonial and female subject within the imposed colonial language of English. She experiments with typography, wordplay, multiple voices, and discourses to give visible form to this linguistic imprisonment—and to her witty and violent attempts at subversion.

Discourse on the Logic of Language

English
is my mother tongue.
A mother tongue is not
not a foreign language,
language
/anguish anguish
—a foreign anguish.

EN IT WAS BORN, THE MOTHER HELD HER NEWBORN CHILD CLOSE: SHE AN THEN TO LICK IT ALL OVER. THE CHILD WHIMPERED A LITTLE, BUT THE MOTHER'S TONGUE MOVED FASTER AND STRONGER OVER ITS BODY, REW SILENT—THE MOTHER TURNING IT THIS WAY AND THAT UNDER TONGUE, UNTIL SHE HAD TONGUED IT CLEAN OF THE CREAMY WHITE STANCE COVERING ITS BODY.

English is
my father tongue.
A father tongue is
a foreign language,
therefore English is
a foreign language
not a mother tongue.

What is my mother
tongue
my mammy tongue
my mummy tongue
my momsy tongue
my modder tongue
my ma tongue?

I have no mother tongue
no mother to tongue
no tongue to mother
to mother tongue
me

I must therefore be tongu dumb dumb-tongued dub¹-tongued damn dumb tongue

EDICT I

Every owner of slaves shall, wherever possible, ensure that his slaves belong to as many ethno-linguistic groups as possible. If they cannot speak to each other, they cannot then foment rebellion and revolution.

Those parts of the brain chiefly responsible for speech are named after two learned nineteenth century doctors, the eponymous Doctors Wernicke and Broca² respectively.

Dr. Broca believed the size of the brain determined intelligence; he devoted much of his time to 'proving' that white males of the Caucasian race had larger brains than, and were therefore superior to, women, Blacks and other peoples of colour.

Understanding and recognition of the spoken word takes place in Wernicke's area—the left temporal lobe, situated next to the auditory cortex; from there relevant information passes to Broca's area—situated in the left frontal cortex—which then forms the response and passes it on to the motor cortex. The motor cortex controls the muscles of speech.

MOTHER THEN PUT HER FINGERS INTO HER CHILD'S MOUTH—GENTLY
CING IT OPEN; SHE TOUCHES HER TONGUE TO THE CHILD'S TONGUE, HOLDING THE TINY MOUTH OPEN, SHE BLOWS INTO IT—HARD. SHE BLOWING WORDS—HER WORDS, HER MOTHER'S WORDS, THOSE OF MOTHER'S MOTHER, AND ALL THEIR MOTHERS BEFORE—INTO HER UGHTER'S MOUTH.

but I have a dumb tongue

tongue dumb

father tongue

and english is my mother tongue

is

my father tongue

is a foreign lan lan lang

language

l/anguish

anguish

a foreign anguish

is english—

another tongue

my mother

mammy

mummy moder

mater

macer

moder³

tongue

mothertongue tongue mother tongue me

mothertongue me

mother me

touch me

with the tongue of your lan lan lang

language
l/anguish
anguish
english
is a foreign anguish

EDICT II

*Every slave caught speaking his native language shall be severely punished.
Where necessary,
removal of the tongue is recommended. The offending organ, when removed, should be hung on high in a central place, so that all may see and tremble.*

A tapering, blunt-tipped, muscular, soft and fleshy organ describes

- (a) the penis.
- (b) the tongue.
- (c) neither of the above.
- (d) both of the above.

In man the tongue is

- (a) the principal organ of taste.

- (b) the principal organ of articulate speech.
- (c) the principal organ of oppression and exploitation.
- (d) all of the above.

The tongue

- (a) is an interwoven bundle of striated muscle running in three planes.
- (b) is fixed to the jawbone.
- (c) has an outer covering of a mucous membrane covered with papillae.
- (d) contains ten thousand taste buds, none of which is sensitive to the taste of foreign words.

Air is forced out of the lungs up the throat to the larynx where it causes the vocal cords to vibrate and create sound. The metamorphosis from sound to intelligible word requires

- (a) the lip, tongue and jaw all working together.
- (b) a mother tongue.
- (c) the overseer's whip.
- (d) all of the above or none.

1989

Endnotes

- Note 1: Type of African Caribbean performance poetry, named after "dub music," or remixed reggae-style music. Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Pierre Paul Broca (1824–1880), French physician; Carl Wernicke (1848–1905), German physician. Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Mother (archaic Scots, Swedish, etc.). "Mater": mother (Latin). "Macer": lean, poor (Latin). Return to reference 3

SALMAN RUSHDIE

In these excerpts from two essays in his collection Imaginary Homelands, fiction writer Salman Rushdie (b. 1947; see the headnote to him and his story "The Prophet's Hair" later in this volume) claims both Britishness and the English language for immigrant writers in England. Lured by a dream-England, such writers have often been disappointed by exclusionary racial attitudes in their new homeland. Transplanted and culturally plural, they write out of multiple literary inheritances, including the literature of exile and displacement. Rushdie counters the nativist view of English as an imperial yoke that must be thrown off: he recounts the spread of English as a world language, describes its indigenization by the non-English, and claims it as a vital and expressive South Asian literary language, with its own history and tradition.

[The British Indian Writer and a Dream-England]

* * *

So if I am to speak for Indian writers in England I would say this, paraphrasing G. V. Desani's H. Hatterr: The migrations of the fifties and sixties happened. 'We are. We are here.'¹ And we are not willing to be excluded from any part of our heritage; which heritage includes both a Bradford-born Indian kid's right to be treated as a full member of British society, and also the right of any member of this post-diaspora community to draw on its roots for its art, just as all the world's community of displaced writers has always done. (I'm thinking, for instance, of Grass's Danzig-become-Gdansk, of Joyce's abandoned Dublin, of Isaac Bashevis Singer and Maxine Hong Kingston and Milan Kundera² and many others. It's a long list.)

Let me override at once the faintly defensive note that has crept into these last few remarks. The Indian writer, looking back at India, does so through guilt-tinted spectacles. (I am of course, once more, talking about myself.) I am speaking now of those of us who emigrated . . . and I suspect that there are times when the move seems wrong to us all, when we seem, to ourselves, post-lapsarian men and women. We are Hindus who have crossed the black water; we are Muslims who eat pork.³ And as a result—as my use of the Christian notion of the Fall indicates—we are now partly of the West. Our identity is at once plural and partial. Sometimes we feel that we straddle two cultures; at other times, that we fall between two stools. But however ambiguous and shifting this ground may be, it is not an infertile territory for a writer to occupy. If literature is in part the business of finding new angles at which to enter reality, then once again our distance, our long geographical perspective, may provide us with such angles. Or it may be that that is simply what we must think in order to do our work.

* * *

England's Indian writers are by no means all the same type of animal. Some of us, for instance, are Pakistani. Others Bangladeshi. Others West, or East, or even South African. And V. S. Naipaul,⁴ by now, is something else entirely. This word 'Indian' is getting to be a pretty scattered concept. Indian writers in England include political exiles, first-generation migrants, affluent expatriates whose residence here is frequently temporary, naturalized Britons, and people born here who may never have laid eyes on the subcontinent. Clearly, nothing that I say can apply across all these categories. But one of the interesting things about this diverse community is that, as far as Indo-British fiction is concerned, its existence changes the ball game, because that fiction is in future going to come as much from addresses in London, Birmingham and Yorkshire as from Delhi or Bombay.

One of the changes has to do with attitudes towards the use of English. Many have referred to the argument about the appropriateness of this language to Indian themes. And I hope all of us share the view that we can't simply use the language in the way the British did; that it needs remaking for our own purposes. Those of us who do use English do so in spite of our ambiguity towards it, or perhaps because of that, perhaps because we can find in that linguistic struggle a reflection of other struggles taking place in the real world, struggles between the cultures within ourselves and the influences at work upon our societies. To conquer English may be to complete the process of making ourselves free.

But the British Indian writer simply does not have the option of rejecting English, anyway. His children, her children, will grow up speaking it, probably as a first language; and in the forging of a British Indian identity the English language is of central importance. It must, in spite of everything, be embraced. (The word 'translation' comes, etymologically, from the Latin for 'bearing across'. Having been borne across the world, we are translated men. It is normally supposed that something always gets lost in translation; I cling, obstinately, to the notion that something can also be gained.)

To be an Indian writer in this society is to face, every day, problems of definition. What does it mean to be 'Indian' outside India? How can culture be preserved without becoming ossified? How should we discuss the need for change within ourselves and our community without seeming to play into the hands of our racial enemies? What are the consequences, both spiritual and practical, of refusing to make any concessions to Western ideas and practices? What are the consequences of embracing those ideas and practices and turning away from the ones that came here with us? These questions are all a single, existential question: How are we to live in the world?

I do not propose to offer, prescriptively, any answers to these questions; only to state that these are some of the issues with which each of us will have to come to terms.

To turn my eyes outwards now, and to say a little about the relationship between the Indian writer and the majority white culture in whose midst he lives, and with which his work will sooner or later have to deal:

In common with many Bombay-raised middle-class children of my generation, I grew up with an intimate knowledge of, and even sense of friendship with, a certain kind of England: a dream-England composed of Test Matches at Lord's presided over by the voice of John Arlott, at which Freddie Trueman bowled unceasingly and without success at Polly Umrigar;⁵ of Enid Blyton and Billy Bunter, in which we were even prepared to smile indulgently at portraits such as 'Hurree Jamset Ram Singh', 'the dusky nabob of Bhanipur'.⁶ I wanted to come to England. I couldn't wait. And to be fair, England has done all right by me; but I find it a little difficult to be properly grateful. I can't escape the view that my relatively easy ride is not the result of the dream-England's famous sense of tolerance and fair play, but of my social class, my freak fair skin and my 'English' English accent. Take away any of these, and the story would have been very different. Because of course the dream-England is no more than a dream.

Sadly, it's a dream from which too many white Britons refuse to awake. Recently, on a live radio programme, a professional humorist asked me, in all seriousness, why I objected to being called a wog.⁷ He said he had always thought it a rather charming word, a term of endearment. 'I was at the zoo the other day,' he revealed, 'and a zoo keeper told me that the wogs were best with the animals; they stuck their fingers in their ears and wiggled them about and the animals felt at home.' The ghost of Hurree Jamset Ram Singh walks among us still.

As Richard Wright⁸ found long ago in America, black and white descriptions of society are no longer compatible. Fantasy, or the mingling of fantasy and naturalism, is one way of dealing with these problems. It offers a way of echoing in the form of our work the issues faced by all of us: how to build a new, 'modern' world out of an old, legend-haunted civilization, an old culture which we have brought into the heart of a newer one. But whatever technical solutions we may find, Indian writers in these islands, like others who have migrated into the north from the south, are capable of writing from a kind of double perspective: because they, we, are at one and the same time insiders and outsiders in this society. This stereoscopic vision is perhaps what we can offer in place of 'whole sight'.

* * *

Art is a passion of the mind. And the imagination works best when it is most free. Western writers have always felt free to be eclectic in their selection of theme, setting, form; Western visual artists have, in this century, been happily raiding the visual storehouses of Africa, Asia, the Philippines. I am sure that we must grant ourselves an equal freedom.

Let me suggest that Indian writers in England have access to a second tradition, quite apart from their own racial history. It is the culture and political history of the phenomenon of migration, displacement, life in a minority group. We can quite legitimately claim as our ancestors the Huguenots,⁹ the Irish, the Jews; the past to which we belong is an English past, the history of immigrant Britain. Swift, Conrad, Marx are as much our literary forebears as Tagore or Ram Mohan Roy.¹ America, a nation of immigrants, has created great literature out of the phenomenon of cultural transplantation, out of examining the ways in which people cope with a new world; it may be that by discovering what we have in common with those who preceded us into this country, we can begin to do the same.

I stress this is only one of many possible strategies. But we are inescapably international writers at a time when the novel has never been a more international form (a writer like Borges speaks of the influence of Robert Louis Stevenson on his work; Heinrich Böll² acknowledges the influence of Irish literature; cross-pollination is everywhere); and it is perhaps one of the more pleasant freedoms of the literary migrant to be able to choose his parents. My own—selected half consciously, half not—include Gogol, Cervantes, Kafka, Melville, Machado de Assis;³ a polyglot family tree, against which I measure myself, and to which I would be honoured to belong.

There's a beautiful image in Saul Bellow's latest novel, The Dean's December.⁴ The central character, the Dean, Corde, hears a dog barking wildly somewhere. He imagines that the barking is the dog's protest against the limit of dog experience. 'For God's sake,' the dog is saying, 'open the universe a little more!' And because Bellow is, of course, not really talking about dogs, or not only about dogs, I have the feeling that the dog's rage, and its desire, is also mine, ours, everyone's. 'For God's sake, open the universe a little more!'

Endnotes

- Note 1: From All About H. Hatterr (1948) by the Indian novelist G. V. Desani (1909–2000).Return to reference 1
- Note 2:
Czech novelist (b. 1929). “Grass’s Danzig-become-Gdansk”: Polish city known until the end of World War II as Danzig (its German name) and known today as Gdansk; the city features prominently in a trilogy by the German novelist Günter Grass (1927–2015). “Joyce’s abandoned Dublin”: birthplace of the Irish writer James Joyce (1882–1941) and the setting for much of his work, although Joyce spent most of his adult life outside Dublin, in Paris, Trieste, and Zurich. “Isaac Bashevis Singer”: Polish American writer (1904–1991). “Maxine Hong Kingston”: Chinese American writer (b. 1940).
Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Inverting, that is, the Muslim prohibition against eating pork as unclean and the Hindu prohibition against crossing the ocean (“black water”).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Trinidad-born English writer of Indian descent (1932–2018).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Pahlān Ratanjī Umrigar (1926–2006), Indian cricket player. “Test Matches at Lord’s”: cricket matches played at Lord’s Cricket Ground in London. “John Arlott”: English cricket commentator and writer (1914–1991). “Freddie Trueman”: Fred Trueman (1931–2006), English cricket player.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Character who speaks stereotypically comic English in the “Famous Five” series of children’s books by English author Enid Blyton (1897–1968), whose work has been criticized for its racism. “Billy Bunter”: key character in the Greyfriars School stories published from 1908 to 1940 in the boys’ weekly magazine The Magnet by Charles Hamilton (1876–1961), writing under the pen name Frank Richards.Return to reference 6

- Note 7: Foreigner (derogatory term).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: American fiction writer and essayist (1908–1960).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Protestants who emigrated from France in the 16th and 17th centuries because of religious persecution.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Bengali intellectual and social and religious reformer (1772–1833). Jonathan Swift (1667–1745), Anglo-Irish writer. Joseph Conrad (1857–1924), Polish novelist who lived in England and wrote in English. Karl Marx (1818–1883), German social theorist who spent much of his adult life in England. Rabindranath Tagore (1861–1941), Bengali poet.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: German writer (1917–1985). Jorge Luis Borges (1899–1986), Argentinean writer. Robert Louis Stevenson (1850–1894), Scottish writer.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Joaquim María Machado de Assis (1839–1908), Brazilian writer. Nikolai Gogol (1809–1852), Russian writer. Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra (1547–1616), Spanish writer. Franz Kafka (1883–1924), Czech writer. Herman Melville (1819–1891), American writer.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Novel (1982) by Bellow (1915–2005), American novelist.Return to reference 4

[English Is an Indian Literary Language]

I'll begin from an obvious starting place. English is by now the world language. It achieved this status partly as a result of the physical colonization of a quarter of the globe by the British, and it remains ambiguous but central to the affairs of just about all the countries to whom it was given, along with mission schools, trunk roads¹ and the rules of cricket, as a gift of the British colonizers.

But its present-day pre-eminence is not solely—perhaps not even primarily—the result of the British legacy. It is also the effect of the primacy of the United States of America in the affairs of the world. This second impetus towards English could be termed a kind of linguistic neo-colonialism, or just plain pragmatism on the part of many of the world's governments and educationists, according to your point of view.

As for myself, I don't think it is always necessary to take up the anti-colonial—or is it post-colonial?—cudgels against English. What seems to me to be happening is that those peoples who were once colonized by the language are now rapidly remaking it, domesticating it, becoming more and more relaxed about the way they use it—assisted by the English language's enormous flexibility and size, they are carving out large territories for themselves within its frontiers.

To take the case of India, only because it's the one with which I'm most familiar. The debate about the appropriateness of English in post-British India has been raging ever since 1947;² but today, I find, it is a debate which has meaning only for the older generation. The children of independent India seem not to think of English as being irredeemably tainted by its colonial provenance. They use it as an Indian language, as one of the tools they have to hand.

(I am simplifying, of course, but the point is broadly true.)

There is also an interesting North–South divide in Indian attitudes to English. In the North, in the so-called ‘Hindi belt’, where the capital, Delhi, is located, it is possible to think of Hindi as a future national language; but in South India, which is at present suffering from the attempts of central government to impose this national language on it, the resentment of Hindi is far greater than of English. After spending quite some time in South India, I’ve become convinced that English is an essential language in India, not only because of its technical vocabularies and the international communication which it makes possible, but also simply to permit two Indians to talk to each other in a tongue which neither party hates.

Incidentally, in West Bengal, where there is a State-led move against English, the following graffito, a sharp dig at the State’s Marxist chief minister, Jyoti Basu, appeared on a wall, in English: it said, ‘My son won’t learn English; your son won’t learn English; but Jyoti Basu will send his son abroad to learn English.’

One of the points I want to make is that what I’ve said indicates, I hope, that Indian society and Indian literature have a complex and developing relationship with the English language. * * *

English literature has its Indian branch. By this I mean the literature of the English language. This literature is also Indian literature. There is no incompatibility here. If history creates complexities, let us not try to simplify them.

So: English is an Indian literary language, and by now, thanks to writers like Tagore, Desani, Chaudhuri, Mulk Raj Anand, Raja Rao, Anita Desai³ and others, it has quite a pedigree.

* * *

In my own case, I have constantly been asked whether I am British, or Indian. The formulation ‘Indian-born British writer’ has been invented to explain me. But, as I said last night, my new book deals with Pakistan. So what now? ‘British-resident Indo-Pakistani writer’? You see the folly of trying to contain writers inside passports.

One of the most absurd aspects of this quest for national authenticity is that—as far as India is concerned, anyway—it is completely fallacious to suppose that there is such a thing as a pure, unalloyed tradition from which to draw. The only people who seriously believe this are religious extremists. The rest of us understand that the very essence of Indian culture is that we possess a mixed tradition, a mélange of elements as disparate as ancient Mughal⁴ and contemporary Coca-Cola American. To say nothing of Muslim, Buddhist, Jain,⁵ Christian, Jewish, British, French, Portuguese, Marxist, Maoist, Trotskyist, Vietnamese, capitalist, and of course Hindu elements. Eclecticism, the ability to take from the world what seems fitting and to leave the rest, has always been a hallmark of the Indian tradition, and today it is at the centre of the best work being done both in the visual arts and in literature.

* * *

As far as Eng. Lit. itself is concerned, I think that if a// English literatures could be studied together, a shape would emerge which would truly reflect the new shape of the language in the world, and we could see that Eng. Lit. has never been in better shape, because the world language now also possesses a world literature, which is proliferating in every conceivable direction.

The English language ceased to be the sole possession of the English some time ago. * * *

1983

Endnotes

- Note 1: Main roads, such as the Grand Trunk Road, the immense highway between Calcutta and Amritsar constructed during the British Raj.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: When the British relinquished control of India.Return to reference 2

- Note 3: Rabindranath Tagore (1861–1941), Bengali poet; G. V. Desani (1909–2000), Nirad C. Chaudhuri (1897–1999), Mulk Raj Anand (1905–2004), Raja Rao (1909–2006), Anita Desai (b. 1937): Indian fiction and nonfiction writers.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Dynasty of Muslim emperors who reigned in India, 1526–1858.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Jainism is one of India's oldest religions.Return to reference 5

GRACE NICHOLS

Born and raised in British Guiana (now Guyana), Grace Nichols (b. 1950) worked as a freelance journalist after receiving a diploma in communications from the University of Guyana. She left the Caribbean for England in 1977.

In “Epilogue” and other poems, Nichols memorializes the uprooting of Africans and their languages when slavery brought these peoples to the West Indies, where a new tongue grew “from the root of the old one.” The new tongue melded English with African and European languages, and despite the stigma that once attached to it, Nichols celebrates it as a vibrant medium for literature. Like Louise Bennett, she writes of black immigrants’ reverse colonization of the English language and of English society. In The Fat Black Woman’s Poems (1984) and other of her subsequent volumes, the speaker—appropriating and reversing cultural stereotypes—transforms London’s landscape by virtue of her robust physical, verbal, and cultural presence. In 2021 Nichols won the Queen’s Gold Medal for Poetry.

Epilogue

I have crossed an ocean
I have lost my tongue from the root of the old one a new one has sprung

1983

The Fat Black Woman Goes Shopping

Shopping in London winter is a real drag for the fat black woman going from store to store in search of accommodating clothes and de weather so cold
5
Look at the frozen thin mannequins fixing her with grin and de pretty face salesgals exchanging slimming glances thinking she don't notice
10
Lord is aggravating
Nothing soft and bright and billowing to flow like breezy sunlight
when she walking
15
The fat black woman curses in Swahili/Yoruba and nation language¹ under her breathing all this journeying and journeying
The fat black woman could only conclude that when it come to fashion
the choice is lean 20
Nothing much beyond size 14

1984

Endnotes

- Note 1: Term for creolized English coined by West Indian poet Kamau Brathwaite (1930–2020). “Swahili”: East African language. “Yoruba”: Nigerian language. Return to reference 1

Wherever I Hang

I leave me people, me land, me home
For reasons, I not too sure
I forsake de sun
And de humming-bird splendour
Had big rats in de floorboard
5 So I pick up me new-world-self
And come, to this place call England
At first I feeling like I in dream—
De misty greyness
I touching de walls to see if they real
10 They solid to de seam
And de people pouring from de underground system¹
Like beans
And when I look up to de sky
I see Lord Nelson² high—too high to lie
15
And is so I sending home photos of myself
Among de pigeons and de snow
And is so I warding off de cold
And is so, little by little
I begin to change my calypso ways
20 Never visiting nobody
Before giving them clear warning
And waiting me turn in queue^o
Now, after all this time
I get accustom to de English life
25 But I still miss back-home side
To tell you de truth
I don't know really where I belaang

Yes, divided to de ocean

Wherever I hang me knickers—that's my home.

1989

"Stop the Coloured Invasion" protest amid the lions of Trafalgar Square, London, January 1, 1959. After the British Nationality Act of 1948, citizens of the British colonies were allowed to enter and work in the United Kingdom without a visa. As people of African and Asian descent arrived from the British Empire and Commonwealth in the 1950s and 1960s, some Whites denounced the policies that permitted immigration. As a result, laws permitting entry were tightened in the 1960s, and politicians such as Member of Parliament Enoch Powell fomented anxieties that immigration was destroying Britain and would lead to civil strife.

Endnotes

- Note 1: The London subway system.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: British Admiral Horatio Nelson (1758–1805), whose naval victories are commemorated by a tall column surmounted by his statue in Trafalgar Square, London. There are also monuments to him in the Caribbean, where he spent much of his career.Return to reference 2

Notes

- °: in lineReturn to reference °

LINTON KWESI JOHNSON

Born in Jamaica in 1952, Linton Kwesi Johnson immigrated to England at the age of eleven. He grew up in Brixton, South London, where he was shocked by the racist hostility. After he graduated with a B.A. in sociology from Goldsmiths, University of London, he began to publish collections of poetry, beginning with Voices of the Living and the Dead (1974). His influential recordings of his poetry set to reggae music, such as his first album Dread Beat an' Blood (1977), reached a wide audience. In 2002 he became the second living poet published in the Penguin Modern Classics series.

Building on the example of poets such as Claude McKay and Louise Bennett but more fiercely assailing the norms of Standardized English, Johnson represents Black British speech in words spelled phonetically, sentences without punctuation, and rhythms surging with reggae and other African diasporic musical traditions. In stylized versions of the voices of working-class immigrants to Britain, poems such as "Inglan Is a Bitch" chronicle their relentless struggle with racism, violence, discrimination, incarceration, and police brutality. Although both Johnson's poem and Claude McKay's "Old England" (included earlier in this volume) draw on African Caribbean speech, McKay's buoyantly idealized London could hardly differ more from the grimly repressive London of "Inglan Is a Bitch."

Inglan Is a Bitch

wen mi jus come to Landan toun
mi use to work pan di andahgroun
but workin pan di andahgroun yu dont get fi know your way aroun

5 Inglan is a bitch
dere's no escapin it
Inglan is a bitch
dere's no runin whe fram it

10 mi get a likkle^o jab in a big otell an awftah a while, mi woz doin quite well dem staat mi awf as a dish-washah but wen mi tek a stack, mi noh tun clack-watchah!¹

15 Inglan is a bitch
dere's no escapin it
Inglan is a bitch
noh baddah try fi hide fram it

20 wen dem gi you di likkle wage packit^o fus dem rab it wid dem big tax rackit^o yu haffi struggle fi mek enz meet an wen yu goh a yu bed yu jus cant sleep

25 Inglan is a bitch
dere's no escapin it
Inglan is a bitch fi true
a noh lie mi a tell, a true

me use to work dig ditch wen it cowl noh bitch^o 25 mi did^o strang like a mule, but, bwoy, mi did fool

den awftah a while mi jus stap dhu owevahtime den awftah a while mi jus phu dung^o mi tool

30 Inglan is a bitch
dere's no escapin it
Inglan is a bitch
yu haffi know how fi suvive in it

35 well mi dhu^o day wok an mi dhu nite wok mi dhu clean wok and mi dhu dutty^o wok dem seh dat black man is very lazy but if yu si how mi wok yu woodah seh mi crazy

40 Inglan is a bitch
dere's no escapin it
Inglan is a bitch
yu bettah face up to it

dem have a likkle facktri up inna Brackly inna disya facktri all dem dhu is pack crackry fi di laas fifteen years dem get mi laybah
now awftah fifteen years mi fall out a fayvah

45 Inglan is a bitch
dere's no escapin it
Inglan is a bitch
dere's no runin whe fram it

50 mi know dem have wok, wok in abundant yet still, dem mek mi redundant^o now, at fifty-five mi getin quite ole yet still, dem sen mi fi goh draw dole^o

Inglan is a bitch
dere's no escapin it
Inglan is a bitch fi true
is whe wi a goh dhu bout it?

Endnotes

- Note 1: But when I started to make money, I didn't turn into a clock-watcher (that is, a lazy worker).Return to reference 1

Notes

- °: littleReturn to reference °
- °: checkReturn to reference °
- °: fraudReturn to reference °
- °: cold, no shitReturn to reference °
- °: wasReturn to reference °
- °: put downReturn to reference °
- °: didReturn to reference °
- °: dirtyReturn to reference °
- °: they laid me offReturn to reference °
- °: welfare paymentsReturn to reference °

BERNARDINE EVARISTO

Born in London in 1959, the daughter of an English mother and Nigerian father, Bernardine Evaristo was educated at the Rose Bruford College of Speech and Drama and at the University of London, and was a founding member of the London-based Theatre of Black Women. The author of a number of books in prose and verse, she made her reputation with two novels-in-verse exploring hybrid identities and histories: the semiautobiographical Lara (1997), which traces its mixed-race heroine's English, Nigerian, Brazilian, and Irish roots, and The Emperor's Babe (2001), for which "Amo Amas Amat" is the prologue. In 2019 Evaristo became the first woman of Black British heritage to win the Booker Prize. She won it for her novel Girl, Woman, Other. She shared the honor with Margaret Atwood, who also won that year for The Testaments.

Set in a teeming multicultural London in the year 211 C.E., when Britain was a far-flung colony at the periphery of the Roman Empire, The Emperor's Babe tells the story of Zuleika, the hip, restless, playful daughter of Sudanese immigrants. Married at a young age to an often absent nobleman, she eventually has an affair with visiting Septimius Severus—a historical figure, an emperor of African origin who ruled over Rome and died in Britain's York. Delving into Britain's deep past, Evaristo's novel-in-verse humorously provincializes London, representing it not as the energizing hub of empire but, in the Roman scheme of things, as an underdeveloped backwater. Against the idea that Britain was racially or culturally homogeneous before the arrival of postwar, Windrush-era immigrants, Evaristo represents it as already richly multicultural in ancient times. In her verbal amalgamations, she zigzags from street slang to high diction and among multiple foreign tongues, highlighting the multinational roots of the English language. Both historical and humorously anachronistic, the poem's linguistic mix is emblematic of both the ancient and the contemporary cultural hybridization of Britain.

From The Emperor's Babe

Amo Amas Amat¹

Who do you love? Who do you love, when the man you married goes off for months on end, quelling rebellions

at the frontiers, or playing hot-shot senator in Rome;

5 his flashy villa on the Palatine Hill,² home to another woman, I hear,

one who has borne him offspring.
My days are spent roaming this house,

10 its vast mosaic walls full of the scenes on Olympus,
for my husband loves melodrama.

They say his mistress is an actress,
a flaxen-Fräulein type, from Germania Superior.³

Oh, everyone envied me, Illa Bella Negreeta!⁴
born in the back of a shop on Gracechurch Street,⁵

15 who got hitched to a Roman nobleman, whose parents sailed out of Khartoum⁶ on a barge,

no burnished throne, no poop of beaten gold,
but packed with vomiting brats

and cows releasing warm turds on to their bare feet. Thus perfumed,

20 they made it to Londinium on a donkey,
with only a thin purse and a fat dream.

Here in the drizzle of this wild west town
Dad wandered the streets looking for work, 25 but there was no room at the inn,
so he set up shop on the kerb and sold sweet cakes which Mum made.

(He's told me this story a mille^o times.)

Now he owns several shops, selling everything 30 from vino to shoes, veggies to tools, and he employs all sorts to work in them,
a Syrian, Tunisian, Jew, Persian, hopefuls just off the olive barge from Gaul,⁷

in fact anyone who'll work for pebbles.

35 When Felix came after me, Dad was in ecstasy, father-in-law to Lucius Aurelius Felix, no less.

I was spotted at the baths of Cheapside,⁸ just budding, and my fate was sealed

by a man thrice my age and thrice my girth, 40 all at sweet eleven—even then Dad thought I was getting past it.

Then I was sent off to a snooty Roman bitch called Clarissa for decorum classes, learnt how to talk, eat and fart,

how to get my amo amas amat right, and ditch

my second-generation plebby creole.⁹

45 Zuleika accepta est.
 *Zuleika delicata est.*¹
 Zuleika bloody goody-two-shoes est.

50 But I dreamt of creating mosaics, of remaking my town with bright stones and glass.

 But no! Numquam!^o It's not allowed.
 Sure, Felix brings me presents, when he deigns to come west. I've had Chinese silk, a marble figurine from Turkey, gold earrings

55 shaped like dolphins, and I have the deepest fondness for my husband, of course,

 sort of, though he spills over me like dough
 and I'm tempted to call Cook mid coitus

60 to come trim his sides so that he fits me.
 Then it's puff and Ciao, baby!

 Solitudoh, solitudee, solitudargh!

2001

Endnotes

- Note 1: I love, you love, he/she loves (Latin conjugations).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Historic center of ancient Rome.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Province of the Roman Empire (now parts of Switzerland, France, and Germany). "Fräulein": unmarried woman (German).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The Beautiful Negress! (Italian).Return to reference 4

- Note 5: A main road in modern London, site of the early Roman settlement called “Londinium” established around 43 C.E. Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Now capital of Sudan. Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Large region of Western Europe, including most of modern-day France, under Roman rule from 58 B.C.E. to 486 C.E. Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Street in London. Return to reference 8
- Note 9: A hybrid language. “Plebby”: vulgar (from plebeian, or lower-class). Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Zuleika is accepted. Zuleika is delicate (Latin). Return to reference 1

Notes

- °: thousand (Latin) Return to reference °
- °: Never! Return to reference °

DALJIT NAGRA

Look, We Have Coming to Dover! (2007) is Daljit Nagra's first, Forward Prize-winning collection of poems, its title alluding to Matthew Arnold and W. H. Auden and inflecting an iconic British site with Indianized English. Nagra was born in 1966 in Yiewsley, west London, to Sikh Punjabi parents who had come to England in the 1950s. He grew up in Britain between Punjabi and English cultures, and his work, including the poems in Tippoo Sultan's Incredible White-Man-Eating Tiger Toy Machine!!! (2011) and British Museum (2017), as well as an English retelling of the Ramayana (2013), weaves together his disparate inheritances.

His poem "A Black History of the English-Speaking Peoples"—a title that ironically recalls Winston Churchill's monumental History of the English-Speaking Peoples—meditates on Shakespeare's Globe from an Asian British perspective. Although some of Nagra's poetry is in an ebulliently performative Indian English, this poem and others are written in a Standard English richly threaded with literary allusions. Nagra lovingly and mockingly echoes poets who helped forge the language and forms of his poetry, writers such as Shakespeare, Tennyson, Walcott, and Auden (whose anvil-like stanza form Nagra adapts from the poem "Spain"). He writes in this high literary English as an insider-outsider: he self-consciously extends a literary canon that goes back to Shakespeare, even as he recalls, from within the heart of the former empire, Britain's sometimes exploitative and racist history. Combining insider and rebel, perpetuator and opponent, mimic and insurgent, Nagra acknowledges his complicity in colonialism even as he disavows it, resists the empire even as he renovates its language and literary traditions.

A Black History of the English-Speaking Peoples¹

I

A king's invocations at the Globe Theatre² spin me from my stand to a time when boyish bravado and cannonade
and plunder were enough to woo the regal seat.

5 That the stuff of Elizabethan art and a nation of walled gardens in a local one-upmanship would tame the four-cornered world for Empire's dominion seems inconceivable.

Between the birth and the fire and rebirth of the Globe

10 the visions of Albion³ led to a Rule Britannia of trade-winds-and-Gulf-Stream all-conquering fleets that aroused theatres

for lectures on Hottentots⁴ and craniology,⁵ whilst Eden was paraded in Kew.⁶

15 Between Mayflower and *Windrush*⁷
(with each *necessary murder*⁸) the celebrated embeddings of imperial gusto where jungles were surmounted so the light of learning be spread to help sobbing suttees⁹

20 give up the ghost of a husband's flaming pyre.

II

So much for yesterday,¹ but today's time-honoured televised clashes repeat the flag of a book burning² and May Day's Mohican
Churchill³ and all that shock and awe⁴

25 that brings me back to Mr Wanamaker's⁵ Globe.
An American's thatched throwback to the king of the canon! I watch the actor as king, from the cast of masterful Robeson.⁶

The crowd, too, seem a hotchpotch from the pacts and sects of our ebb and flow.⁷ My forbears played 30 their part for the Empire's quid^o pro quo by assisting the rule and divide⁸ of their ilk.

Did such relations bear me to this stage?
Especially with Macaulay⁹ in mind, who claimed the passing of the imperial sceptre would highlight
35 the imperishable empire of our arts . . . ¹

So does the red of Macaulay's map run through my blood? Am I a noble scruff who hopes a proud academy might canonise
40 his poems for their faith in canonical allusions?

Is my voice phoney over these oft-heard beats?
Well if my voice feels vexatious, what can I but pray that it reign Bolshie²
through puppetry and hypocrisy full of gung-ho fury!

III

45 The heyday Globe incited brave new verse³ modelled on the past, where time's frictions

courted Shakespeare's corruptions for tongue's mastery of the pageant subject. Perhaps

50 the Globe should be my muse! I'm happy digging for my England's good garden⁴ to bear again.
My garden's only a state of mind, where it's easy aligning myself with a
'turncoat'

55 T. E. Lawrence⁵ and a *half-naked fakir*⁶ and always the groundling. Perhaps to aid the succession of this language of the world, for the poet weeding the roots, for the debate

in ourselves, now we're bound to the wheels of global power,⁷ we should tend the manorial
slime⁸—that legacy
60 offending the outcasts who fringe our circles.

IV

Who believes a bleached yarn? Would we openly admit the Livingstone⁹ spirit turned Kurtz,¹ our flag is a union of black and blue flapping in the anthems of haunted rain . . . ?

65 Coming clean would surely give us greater distance than this king at the Globe, whose head seems cluttered with golden-age bumph,² whose suffering ends him agog at the stars.

V

I applaud and stroll toward Westminster,³

70 yet softly tonight the waters of Britannia bobble with flotillas of tea and white gold cotton and sugar and the sweetness-and-light⁴

blood lettings and ultimately red-faced Suez.⁵
 And how swiftly the tide removes from the scene
 the bagpipe clamouring
 75 garrisons with the field-wide scarlet soldiery

and the martyr's cry: *Every man die at his post!*⁶ Till what's ahead are the upbeat lovers who gaze from the London Eye⁷
 80 at multinationals lying along the sanitised Thames.

2011

Endnotes

- Note 1: See A History of the English-Speaking Peoples (1956–58), a history in four volumes of Great Britain and its former possessions by Winston Churchill (1874–1965). As an ethnic descriptor, “Black” in the British context has sometimes been used to include people not only of African but also of South Asian descent.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: London theater associated with Shakespeare, built in 1599, destroyed by fire in 1613, rebuilt the following year, closed in 1642, and reconstructed near the original site in 1997.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Ancient name for the island of Great Britain. See Visions of the Daughters of Albion (1793) by the English poet William Blake (1757–1827).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Derogatory term for the native Khoikhoi people of southern Africa.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Study of the shape and size of the skulls of different human races.Return to reference 5

- Note 6: West London suburb. Kew Gardens massively expanded its global collection of plants in the Victorian era.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Ship that in 1948 brought the first large group of West Indian immigrants to Britain. “Mayflower,” ship that in 1620 brought the first English Puritan emigrants to Massachusetts.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Phrase that, like the poem’s stanza form, is taken from “Spain” (1937) by W. H. Auden (1907–1973) (see p. 675, above).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Indian widows who immolated themselves on their husbands’ funeral pyres before Britain banned the practice in the 19th century.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: See the refrain of “Yesterday” in Auden’s “Spain” (lines 1ff.) (p. 672, above).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: British Muslim protesters were televised burning Salman Rushdie’s Satanic Verses (1988).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: During May Day demonstrations in London in 2000, a statue of Winston Churchill was given a Mohawk (“Mohican”) hairdo made of turf.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: U.S. military doctrine widely cited during the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Sam Wanamaker (1919–1993), American expatriate film director and actor who re-created the Globe Theatre.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Paul Robeson (1898–1976), American singer, actor, and civil rights advocate acclaimed for his performances as Othello.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: See King Lear addressing his daughter Cordelia: “and we’ll wear out, / In a walled prison, packs and sects of great ones, / That ebb and flow by the moon” (King Lear 5.3.17–19).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The British Empire employed a “divide and rule” strategy to weaken local powers in India.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Thomas Babington Macaulay (1800–1859), British historian and politician who mandated English language instruction in Indian schools.Return to reference 9

- Note 1: In a 1833 speech calling for the education of Indians in English ways, Macaulay said: “The scepter may pass away from us. . . . But . . . [t]here is an empire exempt from all natural causes of decay. Those triumphs are the pacific triumphs of reason over barbarism: that empire is the imperishable empire of our arts and our morals, our literature and our laws.”Return to reference 1
- Note 2: British slang for Bolshevik, Russian revolutionary communist; hence, disobedient, uncooperative.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: See Brave New World (1931), a dystopian novel set in London by English writer Aldous Huxley (1894–1963), its title taken from Miranda’s speech in Shakespeare’s The Tempest (5.1.205).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: See Richard II (2.1.42, 50): “This other Eden, demi-paradise / . . . This blessed plot, this earth, this realm, this England.”Return to reference 4
- Note 5: British military officer (1888–1935) who, dressing like and identifying with his Arab partners, led a revolt against the Ottoman Empire during World War I; he became known as Lawrence of Arabia.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Condensed version of Churchill’s insulting reference to Mahatma Gandhi (1869–1948), leader of the Indian Independence movement.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: See King Lear 4.7.46–47: “I am bound / Upon a wheel of fire.”Return to reference 7
- Note 8: “Some slave is rotting in this manorial lake,” exclaims St. Lucian poet Derek Walcott (1930–2017) in his poem “Ruins of a Great House” (1962), which meditates on the decay of empire by invoking the stench of “rotting lime.”Return to reference 8
- Note 9: David Livingstone (1813–1873), Scottish medical missionary and explorer in Africa.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Fictional European ivory trader who rules a society of central African natives as a demigod in Joseph Conrad’s Heart of Darkness (see p. 67).Return to reference 1

- Note 2: That is, superfluous documents; toilet paper.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: London area with Westminster Abbey, Buckingham Palace, and the Houses of Parliament.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Phrase for the beauty and intelligence of culture that English poet Matthew Arnold (1822–1888) borrowed from Irish poet Jonathan Swift (1667–1745).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Egyptian seaport city where an invasion by Britain, France, and Israel failed in 1956, a failure seen as a turning point in the decline of the British Empire.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: From “The Defence of Lucknow” (1879) by English poet Alfred, Lord Tennyson (1809–1892), which celebrates the defenders of the British Residency in the Indian city of Lucknow that fell under siege during the Indian Rebellion of 1857.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Tallest Ferris wheel in Europe, on the south bank of the River Thames.Return to reference 7

Notes

- °: one pound sterlingReturn to reference °

DORIS LESSING

1919–2013

Born in Persia (now Iran) to British parents, Doris Lessing (née Tayler) lived in southern Rhodesia (now Zimbabwe) from 1924 to 1949, before settling in England. Her five-novel sequence with the general title Children of Violence (beginning with Martha Quest, 1952) combines psychological autobiography with powerful explorations of the relationship between Black and White peoples in southern Africa. Her combination of psychological introspection, political analysis, social documentary, and feminism gives a characteristic tone to her novels and short stories. These elements are effectively combined in her novel The Golden Notebook (1962), which explores with unexhibitionist frankness the sexual problems of an independent woman while at the same time probing the political conscience of an ex-communist and the needs and dilemmas of a creative writer. In the early 1970s, influenced by the writings of the renegade psychologist R. D. Laing and by the principles of Sufism (the mystical, ecstatic dimension of Islam), Lessing's realistic investigations of social issues took a different turn. In Briefing for a Descent into Hell (1971) and The Memoirs of a Survivor (1974), she explores myth and fantasy, restrained within a broadly realist context. In a series of novels with the general title Canopus in Argos: Archives (written between 1979 and 1983), she draws on her reading of the Old and New Testaments, the Apocrypha, and the Koran and borrows conventions from science fiction to describe the efforts of a superhuman, extraterrestrial race to guide human history. The novels convey the scope of human suffering in the twentieth century with a rare imaginative power. On completion of this novel sequence, Lessing took the unusual step of publishing two pseudonymous novels (now known jointly as The Diaries of Jane Somers, 1983–84), in which she reverted to the realist mode with which she was most widely associated. The Good Terrorist (1985) is also written in the style of documentary realism, but The Fifth Child (1988) combines elements of realism and fantasy, exploring the effect on a happy family of the birth of a genetically abnormal, nonhuman child.

Her work from the early 1990s on included two candid volumes of autobiography, Under My Skin (1994) and Walking in the Shade (1997); the four short novels that comprise The Grandmothers (2003); The Cleft (2007); a clutch of other novels; and a series of short stories. Some of these stories—which deal with racial and social dilemmas as well as with loneliness, the claims of politics, the problems of aging (especially for women), the conflict between the generations, and a whole spectrum of problems of alienation and isolation—have a particular pungency and force. Winner of the Nobel Prize in Literature in 2007, Lessing was very much a writer of her time, deeply involved with the changing patterns of thought, feeling, and culture during the last sixty years. She consistently explored and tested the boundaries of realist technique, without resort to formal experimentalism. Published just on the cusp of second-wave feminism, the story reprinted here, “To Room Nineteen,” is a psychologically penetrating study of a woman who finds ultimate fulfillment in neither her marriage nor her children and, feeling trapped by traditional gender roles, seeks solitude in—to echo the title of Virginia Woolf’s feminist classic about gender, space, and identity—a room of her own.

To Room Nineteen

This is a story, I suppose, about a failure in intelligence: the Rawlings' marriage was grounded in intelligence.

They were older when they married than most of their married friends: in their well-seasoned late twenties. Both had had a number of affairs, sweet rather than bitter; and when they fell in love—for they did fall in love—had known each other for some time. They joked that they had saved each other “for the real thing.” That they had waited so long (but not too long) for this real thing was to them a proof of their sensible discrimination. A good many of their friends had married young, and now (they felt) probably regretted lost opportunities; while others, still unmarried, seemed to them arid, self-doubting, and likely to make desperate or romantic marriages.

Not only they, but others, felt they were well matched: their friends' delight was an additional proof of their happiness. They had played the same roles, male and female, in this group or set, if such a wide, loosely connected, constantly changing constellation of people could be called a set. They had both become, by virtue of their moderation, their humour, and their abstinence from painful experience people to whom others came for advice. They could be, and were, relied on. It was one of those cases of a man and a woman linking themselves whom no one else had ever thought of linking, probably because of their similarities. But then everyone exclaimed: Of course! How right! How was it we never thought of it before!

And so they married amid general rejoicing, and because of their foresight and their sense for what was probable, nothing was a surprise to them.

Both had well-paid jobs. Matthew was a subeditor on a large London newspaper, and Susan worked in an advertising firm. He was not the stuff of which editors or publicised journalists are made, but he was much more than “a subeditor,” being one of the essential background people who in fact steady, inspire and make possible the people in the limelight. He was content with this position. Susan had a talent for commercial drawing. She was humorous about the advertisements she was responsible for, but she did not feel strongly about them one way or the other.

Both, before they married, had had pleasant flats, but they felt it unwise to base a marriage on either flat, because it might seem like a submission of personality on the part of the one whose flat it was not. They moved into a new flat in South Kensington on the clear understanding that when their marriage had settled down (a process they knew would not take long, and was in fact more a humorous concession to popular wisdom than what was due to themselves) they would buy a house and start a family.

And this is what happened. They lived in their charming flat for two years, giving parties and going to them, being a popular young married couple, and then Susan became pregnant, she gave up her job, and they bought a house in Richmond. It was typical of this couple that they had a son first, then a daughter, then twins, son and daughter. Everything right, appropriate, and what everyone would wish for, if they could choose. But people did feel these two had chosen; this balanced and sensible family was no more than what was due to them because of their infallible sense for choosing right.

And so they lived with their four children in their garden house in Richmond and were happy. They had everything they had wanted and had planned for.

And yet . . .

Well, even this was expected, that there must be a certain flatness. . . .

Yes, yes, of course, it was natural they sometimes felt like this. Like what?

Their life seemed to be like a snake biting its tail. Matthew’s job for the sake of Susan, children, house, and garden—which caravanserai¹ needed a well-paid job to maintain it. And Susan’s practical intelligence for the sake of Matthew, the children, the house and the garden—which unit would have collapsed in a week without her.

But there was no point about which either could say: “For the sake of this is all the rest.” Children? But children can’t be a centre of life and a reason for being. They can be a thousand things that are delightful, interesting, satisfying, but they can’t be a wellspring to live from. Or they shouldn’t be. Susan and Matthew knew that well enough.

Matthew’s job? Ridiculous. It was an interesting job, but scarcely a reason for living. Matthew took pride in doing it well; but he could hardly be expected to be proud of the newspaper: the newspaper he read, his newspaper, was not the one he worked for.

Their love for each other? Well, that was nearest it. If this wasn’t a centre, what was? Yes, it was around this point, their love, that the whole extraordinary structure revolved. For extraordinary it certainly was. Both Susan and Matthew had moments of thinking so, of looking in secret disbelief at this thing they had created: marriage, four children, big house, garden, charwomen,² friends, cars . . . and this thing, this entity, all of it had come into existence, been blown into being out of nowhere, because Susan loved Matthew and Matthew loved Susan. Extraordinary. So that was the central point, the wellspring.

And if one felt that it simply was not strong enough, important enough, to support it all, well whose fault was that? Certainly neither Susan’s nor Matthew’s. It was in the nature of things. And they sensibly blamed neither themselves nor each other.

On the contrary, they used their intelligence to preserve what they had created from a painful and explosive world: they looked around them, and took lessons. All around them, marriages collapsing, or breaking, or rubbing along (even worse, they felt). They must not make the same mistakes, they must not.

They had avoided the pitfall so many of their friends had fallen into—of buying a house in the country for the sake of the children; so that the husband became a weekend husband, a weekend father, and the wife always careful not to ask what went on in the town flat which they called (in joke) a bachelor flat. No, Matthew was a full-time husband, a full-time father, and at nights, in the big married bed in the big married bedroom (which had an attractive view of the river) they lay beside each other talking and he told her about his day, and what he had done, and whom he had met; and she told him about her day (not as interesting, but that was not her fault) for both knew of the hidden resentments and deprivations of the woman who has lived her own life—and above all, has earned her own living—and is now dependent on a husband for outside interests and money.

Nor did Susan make the mistake of taking a job for the sake of her independence, which she might very well have done, since her old firm, missing her qualities of humour, balance, and sense, invited her often to go back. Children needed their mother to a certain age, that both parents knew and agreed on; and when these four healthy wisely brought-up children were of the right age, Susan would work again, because she knew, and so did he, what happened to women of fifty at the height of their energy and ability, with grown-up children who no longer needed their full devotion.

So here was this couple, testing their marriage, looking after it, treating it like a small boat full of helpless people in a very stormy sea. Well, of course, so it was. . . . The storms of the world were bad, but not too close—which is not to say they were selfishly felt: Susan and Matthew were both well-informed and responsible people. And the inner storms and quicksands were understood and charted. So everything was all right. Everything was in order. Yes, things were under control.

So what did it matter if they felt dry, flat? People like themselves, fed on a hundred books (psychological, anthropological, sociological) could scarcely be unprepared for the dry, controlled wistfulness which is the distinguishing mark of the intelligent marriage. Two people, endowed with education, with discrimination, with judgement, linked together voluntarily from their will to be happy together and to be of use to others—one sees them everywhere, one knows them, one even is that thing oneself: sadness because so much is after all so little. These two, unsurprised, turned towards each other with even more courtesy and gentle love: this was life, that two people, no matter how carefully chosen, could not be everything to each other. In fact, even to say so, to think in such a way, was banal, they were ashamed to do it.

It was banal, too, when one night Matthew came home late and confessed he had been to a party, taken a girl home and slept with her. Susan forgave him, of course. Except that forgiveness is hardly the word. Understanding, yes. But if you understand something, you don't forgive it, you are the thing itself: forgiveness is for what you don't understand. Nor had he confessed—what sort of word is that?

The whole thing was not important. After all, years ago they had joked: Of course I'm not going to be faithful to you, no one can be faithful to one other person for a whole lifetime. (And there was the word faithful—stupid, all these words, stupid, belonging to a savage old world.) But the incident left both of them irritable. Strange, but they were both bad-tempered, annoyed. There was something unassimilable about it.

Making love splendidly after he had come home that night, both had felt that the idea that Myra Jenkins, a pretty girl met at a party, could be even relevant was ridiculous. They had loved each other for over a decade, would love each other for years more. Who, then, was Myra Jenkins?

Except, thought Susan, unaccountably bad-tempered, she was (is?) the first. In ten years. So either the ten years' fidelity was not important, or she isn't. (No, no, there is something wrong with this way of thinking, there must be.) But if she isn't important, presumably it wasn't important either when Matthew and I first went to bed with each other that afternoon whose delight even now (like a very long shadow at sundown) lays a long, wand-like finger over us. (Why did I say sundown?) Well, if what we felt that afternoon was not important, nothing is important, because if it hadn't been for what we felt, we wouldn't be Mr and Mrs Rawlings with four children, etc., etc. The whole thing is absurd—for him to have come home and told me was absurd. For him not to have told me was absurd. For me to care, or for that matter not to care, is absurd . . . and who is Myra Jenkins? Why, no one at all.

There was only one thing to do, and of course these sensible people did it: they put the thing behind them, and consciously, knowing what they were doing, moved forward into a different phase of their marriage, giving thanks for past good fortune as they did so.

For it was inevitable that the handsome, blond, attractive, manly man, Matthew Rawlings, should be at times tempted (oh, what a word!) by the attractive girls at parties she could not attend because of the four children; and that sometimes he would succumb (a word even more repulsive, if possible) and that she, a good-looking woman in the big well-tended garden at Richmond, would sometimes be pierced as by an arrow from the sky with bitterness. Except that bitterness was not in order, it was out of court. Did the casual girls touch the marriage? They did not. Rather it was they who knew defeat because of the handsome Matthew Rawlings' marriage body and soul to Susan Rawlings.

In that case why did Susan feel (though luckily not for longer than a few seconds at a time) as if life had become a desert, and that nothing mattered, and that her children were not her own?

Meanwhile her intelligence continued to assert that all was well. What if her Matthew did have an occasional sweet afternoon, the odd affair? For she knew quite well, except in her moments of aridity, that they were very happy, that the affairs were not important.

Perhaps that was the trouble? It was in the nature of things that the adventures and delights could no longer be hers, because of the four children and the big house that needed so much attention. But perhaps she was secretly wishing, and even knowing that she did, that the wildness and the beauty could be his. But he was married to her. She was married to him. They were married inextricably. And therefore the gods could not strike him with the real magic, not really. Well, was it Susan's fault that after he came home from an adventure he looked harassed rather than fulfilled? (In fact, that was how she knew he had been unfaithful, because of his sullen air, and his glances at her, similar to hers at him: What is it that I share with this person that shields all delight from me?) But none of it by anybody's fault. (But what did they feel ought to be somebody's fault?) Nobody's fault, nothing to be at fault, no one to blame, no one to offer or to take it . . . and nothing wrong, either, except that Matthew never was really struck, as he wanted to be, by joy; and that Susan was more and more often threatened by emptiness. (It was usually in the garden that she was invaded by this feeling: she was coming to avoid the garden, unless the children or Matthew were with her.) There was no need to use the dramatic words, unfaithful, forgive, and the rest: intelligence forbade them. Intelligence barred, too, quarrelling, sulking, anger, silences of withdrawal, accusations and tears. Above all, intelligence forbids tears.

A high price has to be paid for the happy marriage with the four healthy children in the large white gardened house.

And they were paying it, willingly, knowing what they were doing. When they lay side by side or breast to breast in the big civilised bedroom overlooking the wild sullied river, they laughed, often, for no particular reason; but they knew it was really because of these two small people, Susan and Matthew, supporting such an edifice on their intelligent love. The laugh comforted them; it saved them both, though from what, they did not know.

They were now both fortyish. The older children, boy and girl were ten and eight, at school. The twins, six, were still at home. Susan did not have nurses or girls to help her: childhood is short; and she did not regret the hard work. Often enough she was bored, since small children can be boring; she was often very tired; but she regretted nothing. In another decade, she would turn herself back into being a woman with a life of her own.

Soon the twins would go to school, and they would be away from home from nine until four. These hours, so Susan saw it, would be the preparation for her own slow emancipation away from the role of hub-of-the-family into woman-with-her-own-life. She was already planning for the hours of freedom when all the children would be "off her hands." That was the phrase used by Matthew and by Susan and by their friends, for the moment when the youngest child went off to school. "They'll be off your hands, darling Susan, and you'll have time to yourself." So said Matthew, the intelligent husband, who had often enough commended and consoled Susan, standing by her in spirit during the years when her soul was not her own, as she said, but her children's.

What it amounted to was that Susan saw herself as she had been at twenty-eight, unmarried; and then again somewhere about fifty, blossoming from the root of what she had been twenty years before. As if the essential Susan were in abeyance, as if she were in cold storage. Matthew said something like this to Susan one night: and she agreed that it was true—she did feel something like that. What, then, was this essential Susan? She did not know. Put like that it sounded ridiculous, and she did not really feel it. Anyway, they had a long discussion about the whole thing before going off to sleep in each other's arms.

So the twins went off to their school, two bright affectionate children who had no problems about it, since their older brother and sister had trodden this path so successfully before them. And now Susan was going to be alone in the big house, every day of the school term, except for the daily woman who came in to clean.

It was now, for the first time in this marriage, that something happened which neither of them had foreseen.

This is what happened. She returned, at nine-thirty, from taking the twins to the school by car, looking forward to seven blissful hours of freedom. On the first morning she was simply restless, worrying about the twins "naturally enough" since this was their first day away at school. She was hardly able to contain herself until they came back. Which they did happily, excited by the world of school, looking forward to the next day. And the next day Susan took them, dropped them, came back, and found herself reluctant to enter her big and beautiful home because it was as if something was waiting for her there that she did not wish to confront. Sensibly, however, she parked the car in the garage, entered the house, spoke to Mrs Parkes the daily woman about her duties, and went up to her bedroom. She was possessed by a fever which drove her out again, downstairs, into the kitchen, where Mrs Parkes was making cake and did not need her, and into the garden. There she sat on a bench and tried to calm herself, looking at trees, at a brown glimpse of the river. But she was filled with tension, like a panic: as if an enemy was in the garden with her. She spoke to herself severely, thus: All this is quite natural. First, I spent twelve years of my adult life working, living my own life. Then I married, and from the moment I became pregnant for the first time I signed myself over, so to speak, to other people. To the children. Not for one moment in twelve years have I been alone, had time to myself. So now I have to learn to be myself again. That's all.

And she went indoors to help Mrs Parkes cook and clean, and found some sewing to do for the children. She kept herself occupied every day. At the end of the first term she understood she felt two contrary emotions. First: secret astonishment and dismay that during those weeks when the house was empty of children she had in fact been more occupied (had been careful to keep herself occupied) than ever she had been when the children were around her needing her continual attention. Second: that now she knew the house would be full of them, and for five weeks, she resented the fact she would never be alone. She was already looking back at those hours of sewing, cooking (but by herself), as at a lost freedom which would not be hers for five long weeks. And the two months of term which would succeed the five weeks stretched alluringly open to her—freedom. But what freedom—when in fact she had been so careful not to be free of small duties during the last weeks? She looked at herself, Susan Rawlings, sitting in a big chair by the window in the bedroom, sewing shirts or dresses, which she might just as well have bought. She saw herself making cakes for hours at a time in the big family kitchen: yet usually she bought cakes. What she saw was a woman alone, that was true, but she had not felt alone. For instance, Mrs Parkes was always somewhere in the house. And she did not like being in the garden at all, because of the closeness there of the enemy—irritation, restlessness, emptiness, whatever it was, which keeping her hands occupied made less dangerous for some reason.

Susan did not tell Matthew of these thoughts. They were not sensible. She did not recognize herself in them. What should she say to her dear friend and husband Matthew? "When I go into the garden, that is, if the children are not there, I feel as if there is an enemy there waiting to invade me." "What enemy, Susan darling?" "Well I don't know, really. . . ." "Perhaps you should see a doctor?"

No, clearly this conversation should not take place. The holidays began and Susan welcomed them. Four children, lively, energetic, intelligent, demanding: she was never, not for a moment of her day, alone. If she was in a room, they would be in the next room, or waiting for her to do something for them; or it would soon be time for lunch or tea, or to take one of them to the dentist. Something to do: five weeks of it, thank goodness.

On the fourth day of these so welcome holidays, she found she was storming with anger at the twins, two shrinking beautiful children who (and this is what checked her) stood hand in hand looking at her with sheer dismayed disbelief. This was their calm mother, shouting at them. And for what? They had come to her with some game, some bit of nonsense. They looked at each other, moved closer for support, and went off hand in hand, leaving Susan holding on to the windowsill of the living room, breathing deep, feeling sick. She went to lie down, telling the older children she had a headache. She heard the boy Harry telling the little ones: "It's all right, Mother's got a headache." She heard that It's all right with pain.

That night she said to her husband: "Today I shouted at the twins, quite unfairly." She sounded miserable, and he said gently: "Well, what of it?"

"It's more of an adjustment than I thought, their going to school."

"But Susie, Susie darling. . . ." For she was crouched weeping on the bed. He comforted her: "Susan, what is all this about? You shouted at them? What of it? If you shouted at them fifty times a day it wouldn't be more than the little devils deserve." But she wouldn't laugh. She wept. Soon he comforted her with his body. She became calm. Calm, she wondered what was wrong with her, and why she should mind so much that she might, just once, have behaved unjustly with the children. What did it matter? They had forgotten it all long ago: Mother had a headache and everything was all right.

It was a long time later that Susan understood that that night, when she had wept and Matthew had driven the misery out of her with his big solid body, was the last time, ever in their married life, that they had been—to use their mutual language—with each other. And even that was a lie, because she had not told him of her real fears at all.

The five weeks passed, and Susan was in control of herself, and good and kind, and she looked forward to the end of the holidays with a mixture of fear and longing. She did not know what to expect. She took the twins off to school (the elder children took themselves to school) and she returned to the house determined to face the enemy wherever he was, in the house, or the garden or—where?

She was again restless, she was possessed by restlessness. She cooked and sewed and worked as before, day after day, while Mrs Parkes remonstrated: "Mrs Rawlings, what's the need for it? I can do that, it's what you pay me for."

And it was so irrational that she checked herself. She would put the car into the garage, go up to her bedroom, and sit, hands in her lap, forcing herself to be quiet. She listened to Mrs Parkes moving around the house. She looked out into the garden and saw the branches shake the trees. She sat defeating the enemy, restlessness. Emptiness. She ought to be thinking about her life, about herself. But she did not. Or perhaps she could not. As soon as she forced her mind to think about Susan (for what else did she want to be alone for?) it skipped off to thoughts of butter or school clothes. Or it thought of Mrs Parkes. She realised that she sat listening for the movements of the cleaning woman, following her every turn, bend, thought. She followed her in her mind from kitchen to bathroom, from table to oven, and it was as if the duster, the cleaning cloth, the saucepan, were in her own hand. She would hear herself saying: No, not like that, don't put that there. . . . Yet she did not give a damn what Mrs Parkes did, or if she did it at all. Yet she could not prevent herself from being conscious of her, every minute. Yes, this was what was wrong with her: she needed, when she was alone, to be really alone, with no one near. She could not endure the knowledge that in ten minutes or in half an hour Mrs Parkes would call up the stairs: "Mrs Rawlings, there's no silver polish. Madam, we're out of flour."

So she left the house and went to sit in the garden where she was screened from the house by trees. She waited for the demon to appear and claim her, but he did not.

She was keeping him off, because she had not, after all, come to an end of arranging herself.

She was planning how to be somewhere where Mrs Parkes would not come after her with a cup of tea, or a demand to be allowed to telephone (always irritating since Susan did not care who she telephoned or how often), or just a nice talk about something. Yes, she needed a place, or a state of affairs, where it would not be necessary to keep reminding herself: In ten minutes I must telephone Matthew about . . . and at half past three I must leave early for the children because the car needs cleaning. And at ten o'clock tomorrow I must remember. . . . She was possessed with resentment that the seven hours of freedom in every day (during weekdays in the school term) were not free, that never, not for one second, ever, was she free from the pressure of time, from having to remember this or that. She could never forget herself; never really let herself go into forgetfulness.

Resentment. It was poisoning her. (She looked at this emotion and thought it was absurd. Yet she felt it.) She was a prisoner. (She looked at this thought too, and it was no good telling herself it was a ridiculous one.) She must tell Matthew—but what? She was filled with emotions that were utterly ridiculous, that she despised, yet that nevertheless she was feeling so strongly she could not shake them off.

The school holidays came round, and this time they were for nearly two months, and she behaved with a conscious controlled decency that nearly drove her crazy. She would lock herself in the bathroom, and sit on the edge of the bath, breathing deep, trying to let go into some kind of calm. Or she went up into the spare room, usually empty, where no one would expect her to be. She heard the children calling “Mother, Mother,” and kept silent, feeling guilty. Or she went to the very end of the garden, by herself, and looked at the slow-moving brown river; she looked at the river and closed her eyes and breathed slow and deep, taking it into her being, into her veins.

Then she returned to the family, wife and mother, smiling and responsible, feeling as if the pressure of these people—four lively children and her husband—were a painful pressure on the surface of her skin, a hand pressing on her brain. She did not once break down into irritation during these holidays, but it was like living out a prison sentence, and when the children went back to school, she sat on a white stone seat near the flowing river, and she thought: It is not even a year since the twins went to school, since they were off my hands (What on earth did I think I meant when I used that stupid phrase?) and yet I’m a different person. I’m simply not myself. I don’t understand it.

Yet she had to understand it. For she knew that this structure—big white house, on which the mortgage still cost four hundred a year, a husband, so good and kind and insightful, four children, all doing so nicely, and the garden where she sat, and Mrs Parkes the cleaning woman—all this depended on her, and yet she could not understand why, or even what it was she contributed to it.

She said to Matthew in their bedroom: “I think there must be something wrong with me.”

And he said: "Surely not, Susan? You look marvelous—you're as lovely as ever."

She looked at the handsome blond man, with his clear, intelligent, blue-eyed face, and thought: Why is it I can't tell him? Why not? And she said: "I need to be alone more than I am."

At which he swung his slow blue gaze at her, and she saw what she had been dreading: Incredulity. Disbelief. And fear. An incredulous blue stare from a stranger who was her husband, as close to her as her own breath.

He said: "But the children are at school and off your hands."

She said to herself: I've got to force myself to say: Yes, but do you realise that I never feel free? There's never a moment I can say to myself: There's nothing I have to remind myself about, nothing I have to do in half an hour, or an hour, or two hours. . . .

But she said: "I don't feel well."

He said: "Perhaps you need a holiday."

She said, appalled: "But not without you, surely?" For she could not imagine herself going off without him. Yet that was what he meant. Seeing her face, he laughed, and opened his arms, and she went into them, thinking: Yes, yes, but why can't I say it? And what is it I have to say?

She tried to tell him, about never being free. And he listened and said: "But Susan, what sort of freedom can you possibly want—short of being dead! Am I ever free? I go to the office, and I have to be there at ten—all right, half past ten, sometimes. And I have to do this or that, don't I? Then I've got to come home at a certain time—I don't mean it, you know I don't—but if I'm not going to be back home at six I telephone you. When can I ever say to myself: I have nothing to be responsible for in the next six hours?"

Susan, hearing this, was remorseful. Because it was true. The good marriage, the house, the children, depended just as much on his voluntary bondage as it did on hers. But why did he not feel bound? Why didn't he chafe and become restless? No, there was something really wrong with her and this proved it.

And that word bondage—why had she used it? She had never felt marriage, or the children, as bondage. Neither had he, or surely they wouldn't be together lying in each other's arms content after twelve years of marriage.

No, her state (whatever it was) was irrelevant, nothing to do with her real good life with her family. She had to accept the fact that after all, she was an irrational person and to live with it. Some people had to live with crippled arms, or stammers, or being deaf. She would have to live knowing she was subject to a state of mind she could not own.

Nevertheless, as a result of this conversation with her husband, there was a new regime next holidays.

The spare room at the top of the house now had a cardboard sign saying: PRIVATE! DO NOT DISTURB! on it. (This sign had been drawn in coloured chalks by the children, after a discussion between the parents in which it was decided this was psychologically the right thing.) The family and Mrs Parkes knew this was "Mother's Room" and that she was entitled to her privacy. Many serious conversations took place between Matthew and the children about not taking Mother for granted. Susan overheard the first, between father and Harry, the older boy, and was surprised at her irritation over it. Surely she could have a room somewhere in that big house and retire into it without such a fuss being made? Without it being so solemnly discussed? Why couldn't she simply have announced: "I'm going to fit out the little top room for myself, and when I'm in it I'm not to be disturbed for anything short of fire"? Just that, and finished; instead of long earnest discussions. When she heard Harry and Matthew explaining it to the twins with Mrs Parkes coming in—"Yes, well, a family sometimes gets on top of a woman"—she had to go right away to the bottom of the garden until the devils of exasperation had finished their dance in her blood.

But now there was a room, and she could go there when she liked, she used it seldom: she felt even more caged there than in her bedroom. One day she had gone up there after a lunch for ten children she had cooked and served because Mrs Parkes was not there, and had sat alone for a while looking into the garden. She saw the children stream out from the kitchen and stand looking up at the window where she sat behind the curtains. They were all—her children and their friends—discussing Mother's Room. A few minutes later, the chase of children in some game came pounding up the stairs, but ended as abruptly as if they had fallen over a ravine, so sudden was the silence. They had remembered she was there, and had gone silent in a great gale of "Hush! Shhhhhh! Quiet, you'll disturb her. . . ." And they went tiptoeing downstairs like criminal conspirators. When she came down to make tea for them, they all apologised. The twins put their arms around her, from front and back, making a human cage of loving limbs, and promised it would never occur again. "We forgot, Mummy, we forgot all about it!"

What it amounted to was that Mother's Room, and her need for privacy, had become a valuable lesson in respect for other people's rights. Quite soon Susan was going up to the room only because it was a lesson it was a pity to drop. Then she took sewing up there, and the children and Mrs Parkes came in and out: it had become another family room.

She sighed, and smiled, and resigned herself—she made jokes at her own expense with Matthew over the room. That is, she did from the self she liked, she respected. But at the same time, something inside her howled with impatience, with rage. . . . And she was frightened. One day she found herself kneeling by her bed and praying: "Dear God, keep it away from me, keep him away from me." She meant the devil, for she now thought of it, not caring if she were irrational, as some sort of demon. She imagined him, or it, as a youngish man, or perhaps a middle-aged man pretending to be young. Or a man young-looking from immaturity? At any rate, she saw the young-looking face which, when she drew closer, had dry lines about mouth and eyes. He was thinnish, meagre in build. And he had a reddish complexion, and ginger hair. That was he—a gingery, energetic man, and he wore a reddish hairy jacket, unpleasant to the touch.

Well, one day she saw him. She was standing at the bottom of the garden, watching the river ebb past, when she raised her eyes and saw this person, or being, sitting on the white stone bench. He was looking at her, and grinning. In his hand was a long crooked stick, which he had picked off the ground, or broken off the tree above him. He was absent-mindedly, out of an absent-minded or freakish impulse of spite, using the stick to stir around in the coils of a blindworm or a grass snake (or some kind of snakelike creature: it was whitish and unhealthy to look at, unpleasant). The snake was twisting about, flinging its coils from side to side in a kind of dance of protest against the teasing prodding stick.

Susan looked at him thinking: Who is the stranger? What is he doing in our garden? Then she recognised the man around whom her terrors had crystallised. As she did so, he vanished. She made herself walk over to the bench. A shadow from a branch lay across thin emerald grass, moving jerkily over its roughness, and she could see why she had taken it for a snake, lashing and twisting. She went back to the house thinking: Right, then, so I've seen him with my own eyes, so I'm not crazy after all—there is a danger because I've seen him. He is lurking in the garden and sometimes even in the house, and he wants to get into me and to take me over.

She dreamed of having a room or a place, anywhere, where she could go and sit, by herself, no one knowing where she was.

Once, near Victoria, she found herself outside a news agent that had Rooms to Let advertised. She decided to rent a room, telling no one. Sometimes she could take the train in to Richmond and sit alone in it for an hour or two. Yet how could she? A room would cost three or four pounds a week, and she earned no money, and how could she explain to Matthew that she needed such a sum? What for? It did not occur to her that she was taking it for granted she wasn't going to tell him about the room.

Well, it was out of the question, having a room; yet she knew she must.

One day, when a school term was well established, and none of the children had measles or other ailments, and everything seemed in order, she did the shopping early, explained to Mrs Parkes she was meeting an old school friend, took the train to Victoria, searched until she found a small quiet hotel, and asked for a room for the day. They did not let rooms by the day, the manageress said, looking doubtful, since Susan so obviously was not the kind of woman who needed a room for unrespectable reasons. Susan made a long explanation about not being well, being unable to shop without frequent rests for lying down. At last she was allowed to rent the room provided she paid a full night's price for it. She was taken up by the manageress and a maid, both concerned over the state of her health . . . which must be pretty bad if, living at Richmond (she had signed her name and address in the register), she needed a shelter at Victoria.

The room was ordinary and anonymous, and was just what Susan needed. She put a shilling in the gas fire, and sat, eyes shut, in a dingy armchair with her back to a dingy window. She was alone. She was alone. She could feel pressures lifting off her. First the sounds of traffic came very loud; then they seemed to vanish; she might even have slept a little. A knock on the door: it was Miss Townsend the manageress, bringing her a cup of tea with her own hands, so concerned was she over Susan's long silence and possible illness.

Miss Townsend was a lonely woman of fifty, running this hotel with all the rectitude expected of her, and she sensed in Susan the possibility of understanding companionship. She stayed to talk. Susan found herself in the middle of a fantastic story about her illness, which got more and more improbable as she tried to make it tally with the large house at Richmond, well-off husband, and four children. Suppose she said instead: Miss Townsend, I'm here in your hotel because I need to be alone for a few hours, above all alone and with no one knowing where I am. She said it mentally, and saw, mentally, the look that would inevitably come on Miss Townsend's elderly maiden's face. "Miss Townsend, my four children and my husband are driving me insane, do you understand that? Yes, I can see from the gleam of hysteria in your eyes that comes from loneliness controlled but only just contained that I've got everything in the world you've ever longed for. Well, Miss Townsend, I don't want any of it. You can have it, Miss Townsend. I wish I was absolutely alone in the world, like you. Miss Townsend, I'm besieged by seven devils, Miss Townsend, Miss Townsend, let me stay here in your hotel where the devils can't get me. . . ." Instead of saying all this, she described her anaemia, agreed to try Miss Townsend's remedy for it, which was raw liver, minced, between whole-meal bread, and said yes, perhaps it would be better if she stayed at home and let a friend do shopping for her. She paid her bill and left the hotel, defeated.

At home Mrs Parkes said she didn't really like it, no, not really, when Mrs Rawlings was away from nine in the morning until five. The teacher had telephoned from school to say Joan's teeth were paining her, and she hadn't known what to say; and what was she to make for the children's tea, Mrs Rawlings hadn't said.

All this was nonsense, of course. Mrs Parkes's complaint was that Susan had withdrawn herself spiritually, leaving the burden of the big house on her.

Susan looked back at her day of "freedom" which had resulted in her becoming a friend to the lonely Miss Townsend, and in Mrs Parkes's remonstrances. Yet she remembered the short blissful hour of being alone, really alone. She was determined to arrange her life, no matter what it cost, so that she could have that solitude more often. An absolute solitude, where no one knew her or cared about her.

But how? She thought of saying to her old employer: I want you to back me up in a story with Matthew that I am doing part-time work for you. The truth is that . . . but she would have to tell him a lie too, and which lie? She could not say: I want to sit by myself three or four times a week in a rented room. And besides, he knew Matthew, and she could not really ask him to tell lies on her behalf, apart from his being bound to think it meant a lover.

Suppose she really took a part-time job, which she could get through fast and efficiently, leaving time for herself. What job?

Addressing envelopes? Canvassing?

And there was Mrs Parkes, working widow, who knew exactly what she was prepared to give to the house, who knew by instinct when her mistress withdrew in spirit from her responsibilities. Mrs Parkes was one of the servers of this world, but she needed someone to serve. She had to have Mrs Rawlings, her madam, at the top of the house or in the garden, so that she could come and get support from her: "Yes, the bread's not what it was when I was a girl. . . . Yes, Harry's got a wonderful appetite, I wonder where he puts it all. . . . Yes, it's lucky the twins are so much of a size, they can wear each other's shoes, that's a saving in these hard times. . . . Yes, the cherry jam from Switzerland is not a patch on the jam from Poland, and three times the price. . . ." And so on. That sort of talk Mrs Parkes must have, every day, or she would leave, not knowing herself why she left.

Susan Rawlings, thinking these thoughts, found that she was prowling through the great thicketed garden like a wild cat: she was walking up the stairs, down the stairs, through the rooms, into the garden, along the brown running river, back, up through the house, down again. . . . It was a wonder Mrs Parkes did not think it strange. But on the contrary, Mrs Rawlings could do what she liked, she could stand on her head if she wanted, provided she was there. Susan Rawlings prowled and muttered through her house, hating Mrs Parkes, hating poor Miss Townsend, dreaming of her hour of solitude in the dingy respectability of Miss Townsend's hotel bedroom, and she knew quite well she was mad. Yes, she was mad.

She said to Matthew that she must have a holiday. Matthew agreed with her. This was not as things had been once—how they had talked in each other's arms in the marriage bed. He had, she knew, diagnosed her finally as unreasonable. She had become someone outside himself that he had to manage. They were living side by side in this house like two tolerably friendly strangers.

Having told Mrs Parkes, or rather, asked for her permission, she went off on a walking holiday in Wales. She chose the remotest place she knew of. Every morning the children telephoned her before they went off to school, to encourage and support her, just as they had over Mother's Room. Every evening she telephoned them, spoke to each child in turn, and then to Matthew. Mrs Parkes, given permission to telephone for instructions or advice, did so every day at lunchtime. When, as happened three times, Mrs Rawlings was out on the mountainside, Mrs Parkes asked that she should ring back at such and such a time, for she would not be happy in what she was doing without Mrs Rawlings' blessing.

Susan prowled over wild country with the telephone wire holding her to her duty like a leash. The next time she must telephone, or wait to be telephoned, nailed her to her cross. The mountains themselves seemed trammelled by her unfreedom. Everywhere on the mountains, where she met no one at all, from breakfast time to dusk, excepting sheep, or a shepherd, she came face to face with her own craziness which might attack her in the broadest valleys, so that they seemed too small; or on a mountaintop from which she could see a hundred other mountains and valleys, so that they seemed too low, too small, with the sky pressing down too close. She would stand gazing at a hillside brilliant with ferns and bracken, jeweled with running water, and see nothing but her devil, who lifted inhuman eyes at her from where he leaned negligently on a rock, switching at his ugly yellow boots with a leafy twig.

She returned to her home and family, with the Welsh emptiness at the back of her mind like a promise of freedom.

She told her husband she wanted to have an au pair girl.³

They were in their bedroom, it was late at night, the children slept. He sat, shirted and slippered, in a chair by the window, looking out. She sat brushing her hair and watching him in the mirror. A time-hallowed scene in the connubial bedroom. He said nothing, while she heard the arguments coming into his mind, only to be rejected because every one was reasonable.

"It seems strange to get one now, after all, the children are in school most of the day. Surely the time for you to have help was when you were stuck with them day and night. Why don't you ask Mrs Parkes to cook for you? She's even offered to—I can understand if you are tired of cooking for six people. But you know that an au pair girl means all kinds of problems, it's not like having an ordinary char⁴ in during the day. . . ."

Finally he said carefully: "Are you thinking of going back to work?"

"No," she said, "no, not really," She made herself sound vague, rather stupid. She went on brushing her black hair and peering at herself so as to be oblivious of the short uneasy glances her Matthew kept giving her. "Do you think we can't afford it?" she went on vaguely, not at all the old efficient Susan who knew exactly what they could afford.

"It's not that," he said, looking out of the window at dark trees, so as not to look at her. Meanwhile she examined a round, candid, pleasant face with clear dark brows and clear grey eyes. A sensible face. She brushed thick healthy black hair and thought: Yet that's the reflection of a madwoman. How very strange! Much more to the point if what looked back at me was the gingery green-eyed demon with his dry meagre smile. . . . Why wasn't Matthew agreeing? After all, what else could he do? She was breaking her part of the bargain and there was no way of forcing her to keep it: that her spirit, her soul, should live in this house, so that the people in it could grow like plants in water, and Mrs Parkes remain content in their service. In return for this, he would be a good loving husband, and responsible towards the children. Well, nothing like this had been true of either of them for a long time. He did his duty, perfunctorily; she did not even pretend to do hers. And he had become like other husbands, with his real life in his work and the people he met there, and very likely a serious affair. All this was her fault.

At last he drew heavy curtains, blotting out the trees, and turned to force her attention: "Susan, are you really sure we need a girl?" But she would not meet his appeal at all: She was running the brush over her hair again and again, lifting fine black clouds in a small hiss of electricity. She was peering in and smiling as if she were amused at the clinging hissing hair that followed the brush.

"Yes, I think it would be a good idea on the whole," she said, with the cunning of a madwoman evading the real point.

In the mirror she could see her Matthew lying on his back, his hands behind his head, staring upwards, his face sad and hard. She felt her heart (the old heart of Susan Rawlings) soften and call out to him. But she set it to be indifferent.

He said: "Susan, the children?" It was an appeal that almost reached her. He opened his arms, lifting them from where they had lain by his sides, palms up, empty. She had only to run across and fling herself into them, onto his hard, warm chest, and melt into herself, into Susan. But she could not. She would not see his lifted arms. She said vaguely: "Well, surely it'll be even better for them? We'll get a French or a German girl and they'll learn the language."

In the dark she lay beside him, feeling frozen, a stranger. She felt as if Susan had been spirited away. She disliked very much this woman who lay here, cold and indifferent beside a suffering man, but she could not change her.

Next morning she set about getting a girl, and very soon came Sophie Traub from Hamburg, a girl of twenty, laughing, healthy, blue-eyed, intending to learn English. Indeed, she already spoke a good deal. In return for a room—"Mother's Room"—and her food, she undertook to do some light cooking, and to be with the children when Mrs Rawlings asked. She was an intelligent girl and understood perfectly what was needed. Susan said: "I go off sometimes, for the morning or for the day—well, sometimes the children run home from school, or they ring up, or a teacher rings up. I should be here, really. And there's the daily woman. . . ." And Sophie laughed her deep fruity Fräulein's laugh, showed her fine white teeth and her dimples, and said: "You want some person to play mistress of the house sometimes, not so?"

"Yes, that is just so," said Susan, a bit dry, despite herself, thinking in secret fear how easy it was, how much nearer to the end she was than she thought. Healthy Fräulein Traub's instant understanding of their position proved this to be true.

The au pair girl, because of her own common sense, or (as Susan said to herself with her new inward shudder) because she had been chosen so well by Susan, was a success with everyone, the children liking her, Mrs Parkes forgetting almost at once that she was German, and Matthew finding her "nice to have around the house." For he was now taking things as they came, from the surface of life, withdrawn both as a husband and a father from the household.

One day Susan saw how Sophie and Mrs Parkes were talking and laughing in the kitchen, and she announced that she would be away until teatime. She knew exactly where to go and what she must look for. She took the District Line to South Kensington, changed to the Circle, got off at Paddington, and walked around looking at the smaller hotels until she was satisfied with one which had FRED'S HOTEL painted on windowpanes that needed cleaning. The façade was a faded shiny yellow, like unhealthy skin. A door at the end of a passage said she must knock; she did, and Fred appeared. He was not at all attractive, not in any way, being fattish, and run-down, and wearing a tasteless striped suit. He had small sharp eyes in a white creased face, and was quite prepared to let Mrs Jones (she chose the farcical name deliberately, staring him out) have a room three days a week from ten until six. Provided of course that she paid in advance each time she came? Susan produced fifteen shillings (no price had been set by him) and held it out, still fixing him with a bold unblinking challenge she had not known until then she could use at will. Looking at her still, he took up a ten-shilling note from her palm between thumb and forefinger, fingered it; then shuffled up two half crowns, held out his own palm with these bits of money displayed thereon, and let his gaze lower broodingly at them. They were standing in the passage, a red-shaded light above, bare boards beneath, and a strong smell of floor polish rising about them. He shot his gaze up at her over the still-extended palm, and smiled as if to say: What do you take me for? "I shan't," said Susan, "be using this room for the purposes of making money." He still waited. She added another five shillings, at which he nodded and said: "You pay, and I ask no questions." "Good," said Susan. He now went past her to the stairs, and there waited a moment: the light from the street door being in her eyes, she lost sight of him momentarily. Then she saw a sober-suited, white-faced, white-balding little man trotting up the stairs like a waiter, and she went after him. They proceeded in utter silence up the stairs of this house where no questions were asked—Fred's Hotel, which could afford the freedom for its visitors that poor Miss Townsend's hotel could not. The room was hideous. It had a single window, with thin green brocade curtains, a three-quarter bed that had a cheap green satin bedspread on it, a fireplace with a gas fire and a shilling meter by it, a chest of drawers, and a green wicker armchair.

"Thank you," said Susan, knowing that Fred (if this was Fred, and not George, or Herbert or Charlie) was looking at her not so much with curiosity, an emotion he would not own to, for professional reasons, but with a philosophical sense of what was appropriate. Having taken her money and shown her up and agreed to everything, he was clearly disapproving of her for coming here. She did not belong here at all, so his look said. (But she knew, already, how very much she did belong: the room had been waiting for her to join it.) "Would you have me called at five o'clock, please?" and he nodded and went downstairs.

It was twelve in the morning. She was free. She sat in the armchair, she simply sat, she closed her eyes and sat and let herself be alone. She was alone and no one knew where she was. When a knock came on the door she was annoyed, and prepared to show it: but it was Fred himself, it was five o'clock and he was calling her as ordered. He flicked his sharp little eyes over the room—bed, first. It was undisturbed. She might never have been in the room at all. She thanked him, said she would be returning the day after tomorrow, and left. She was back home in time to cook supper, to put the children to bed, to cook a second supper for her husband and herself later. And to welcome Sophie back from the pictures where she had gone with a friend. All these things she did cheerfully, willingly. But she was thinking all the time of the hotel room, she was longing for it with her whole being.

Three times a week. She arrived promptly at ten, looked Fred in the eyes, gave him twenty shillings, followed him up the stairs, went into the room, and shut the door on him with gentle firmness. For Fred, disapproving of her being here at all, was quite ready to let friendship, or at least acquaintanceship, follow his disapproval, if only she would let him. But he was content to go off on her dismissing nod, with the twenty shillings in his hand.

She sat in the armchair and shut her eyes.

What did she do in the room? Why, nothing at all. From the chair, when it had rested her, she went to the window, stretching her arms, smiling, treasuring her anonymity, to look out. She was no longer Susan Rawlings, mother of four, wife of Matthew, employer of Mrs Parkes and of Sophie Traub, with these and those relations with friends, schoolteachers, tradesmen. She no longer was mistress of the big white house and garden, owning clothes suitable for this and that activity or occasion. She was Mrs Jones, and she was alone, and she had no past and no future. Here I am, she thought, after all these years of being married and having children and playing those roles of responsibility—and I'm just the same. Yet there have been times I thought that nothing existed of me except the roles that went with being Mrs Matthew Rawlings. Yes, here I am, and if I never saw any of my family again, here I would still be . . . how very strange that is! And she leaned on the sill, and looked into the street, loving the men and women who passed, because she did not know them. She looked at the downtrodden buildings over the street, and at the sky, wet and dingy, or sometimes blue, and she felt she had never seen buildings or sky before. And then she went back to the chair, empty, her mind a blank. Sometimes she talked aloud, saying nothing—an exclamation, meaningless, followed by a comment about the floral pattern on the thin rug, or a stain on the green satin coverlet. For the most part, she wool-gathered—what word is there for it?—brooded, wandered, simply went dark, feeling emptiness run deliciously through her veins like the movement of her blood.

This room had become more her own than the house she lived in. One morning she found Fred taking her a flight higher than usual. She stopped, refusing to go up, and demanded her usual room, Number 19. "Well, you'll have to wait half an hour then," he said. Willingly she descended to the dark disinfectant-smelling hall, and sat waiting until the two, man and woman, came down the stairs, giving her swift indifferent glances before they hurried out into the street, separating at the door. She went up to the room, her room, which they had just vacated. It was no less hers, though the windows were set wide open, and a maid was straightening the bed as she came in.

After these days of solitude, it was both easy to play her part as mother and wife, and difficult—because it was so easy: she felt an impostor. She felt as if her shell moved here, with her family, answering to Mummy, Mother, Susan, Mrs Rawlings. She was surprised no one saw through her, that she wasn't turned out of doors, as a fake. On the contrary, it seemed the children loved her more; Matthew and she "got on" pleasantly, and Mrs Parkes was happy in her work under (for the most part, it must be confessed) Sophie Traub. At night she lay beside her husband, and they made love again, apparently just as they used to, when they were really married. But she, Susan, or the being who answered so readily and improbably to the name of Susan, was not there: she was in Fred's Hotel, in Paddington, waiting for the easing hours of solitude to begin.

Soon she made a new arrangement with Fred and with Sophie. It was for five days a week. As for the money, five pounds, she simply asked Matthew for it. She saw that she was not even frightened he might ask what for: he would give it to her, she knew that, and yet it was terrifying it could be so, for this close couple, these partners, had once known the destination of every shilling they must spend. He agreed to give her five pounds a week. She asked for just so much, not a penny more. He sounded indifferent about it. It was as if he were paying her, she thought: paying her off—yes, that was it. Terror came back for a moment, when she understood this, but she stilled it: things had gone too far for that. Now, every week, on Sunday nights, he gave her five pounds, turning away from her before their eyes could meet on the transaction. As for Sophie Traub, she was to be somewhere in or near the house until six at night, after which she was free. She was not to cook, or to clean, she was simply to be there. So she gardened or sewed, and asked friends in, being a person who was bound to have a lot of friends. If the children were sick, she nursed them. If teachers telephoned, she answered them sensibly. For the five daytimes in the school week, she was altogether the mistress of the house.

One night in the bedroom, Matthew asked: "Susan, I don't want to interfere—don't think that, please—but are you sure you are well?"

She was brushing her hair at the mirror. She made two more strokes on either side of her head, before she replied: "Yes, dear, I am sure I am well."

He was again lying on his back, his big blond head on his hands, his elbows angled up and part-concealing his face. He said: "Then Susan, I have to ask you this question, though you must understand, I'm not putting any sort of pressure on you." (Susan heard the word pressure with dismay, because this was inevitable, of course she could not go on like this.) "Are things going to go on like this?"

"Well," she said, going vague and bright and idiotic again, so as to escape: "Well, I don't see why not."

He was jerking his elbows up and down, in annoyance or in pain, and, looking at him, she saw he had got thin, even gaunt; and restless angry movements were not what she remembered of him. He said: "Do you want a divorce, is that it?"

At this, Susan only with the greatest difficulty stopped herself from laughing: she could hear the bright bubbling laughter she would have emitted, had she let herself. He could only mean one thing: she had a lover, and that was why she spent her days in London, as lost to him as if she had vanished to another continent.

Then the small panic set in again: she understood that he hoped she did have a lover, he was begging her to say so, because otherwise it would be too terrifying.

She thought this out, as she brushed her hair, watching the fine black stuff fly up to make its little clouds of electricity, hiss, hiss, hiss. Behind her head, across the room, was a blue wall. She realised she was absorbed in watching the black hair making shapes against the blue. She should be answering him. "Do you want a divorce, Matthew?"

He said: "That surely isn't the point, is it?"

"You brought it up, I didn't," she said, brightly, suppressing meaningless tinkling laughter.

Next day she asked Fred: "Have enquiries been made for me?"

He hesitated, and she said: "I've been coming here a year now. I've made no trouble, and you've been paid every day. I have a right to be told."

"As a matter of fact, Mrs Jones, a man did come asking."

"A man from a detective agency?"

"Well, he could have been, couldn't he?"

"I was asking you . . . well, what did you tell him?"

"I told him a Mrs Jones came every weekday from ten until five or six and stayed in Number Nineteen by herself."

"Describing me?"

"Well Mrs Jones, I had no alternative. Put yourself in my place."

"By rights I should deduct what that man gave you for the information."

He raised shocked eyes: she was not the sort of person to make jokes like this! Then he chose to laugh: a pinkish wet slit appeared across his white crinkled face: his eyes positively begged her to laugh, otherwise he might lose some money. She remained grave, looking at him.

He stopped laughing and said: "You want to go up now?"—returning to the familiarity, the comradeship, of the country where no questions are asked, on which (and he knew it) she depended completely.

She went up to sit in her wicker chair. But it was not the same. Her husband had searched her out. (The world had searched her out.) The pressures were on her. She was here with his connivance. He might walk in at any moment, here, into Room 19. She imagined the report from the detective agency: "A woman calling herself Mrs Jones, fitting the description of your wife (etc., etc., etc.), stays alone all day in room No. 19. She insists on this room, waits for it if it is engaged. As far as the proprietor knows she receives no visitors there, male or female." A report something on these lines, Matthew must have received.

Well of course he was right: things couldn't go on like this. He had put an end to it all simply by sending the detective after her.

She tried to shrink herself back into the shelter of the room, a snail pecked out of its shell and trying to squirm back. But the peace of the room had gone. She was trying consciously to revive it, trying to let go into the dark creative trance (or whatever it was) that she had found there. It was no use, yet she craved for it, she was as ill as a suddenly deprived addict.

Several times she returned to the room, to look for herself there, but instead she found the unnamed spirit of restlessness, a prickling fevered hunger for movement, an irritable self-consciousness that made her brain feel as if it had coloured lights going on and off inside it. Instead of the soft dark that had been the room's air, were now waiting for her demons that made her dash blindly about, muttering words of hate; she was impelling herself from point to point like a moth dashing itself against a windowpane, sliding to the bottom, fluttering off on broken wings, then crashing into the invisible barrier again. And again and again. Soon she was exhausted, and she told Fred that for a while she would not be needing the room, she was going on holiday. Home she went, to the big white house by the river. The middle of a weekday, and she felt guilty at returning to her own home when not expected. She stood unseen, looking in at the kitchen window. Mrs Parkes, wearing a discarded floral overall of Susan's, was stooping to slide something into the oven. Sophie, arms folded, was leaning her back against a cupboard and laughing at some joke made by a girl not seen before by Susan—a dark foreign girl, Sophie's visitor. In an armchair Molly, one of the twins, lay curled, sucking her thumb and watching the grownups. She must have some sickness, to be kept from school. The child's listless face, the dark circles under her eyes, hurt Susan: Molly was looking at the three grownups working and talking in exactly the same way Susan looked at the four through the kitchen window: she was remote, shut off from them.

But then, just as Susan imagined herself going in, picking up the little girl, and sitting in an armchair with her, stroking her probably heated forehead, Sophie did just that: she had been standing on one leg, the other knee flexed, its foot set against the wall. Now she let her foot in its ribbon-tied red shoe slide down the wall, and stood solid on two feet, clapping her hands before and behind her, and sang a couple of lines in German, so that the child lifted her heavy eyes at her and began to smile. Then she walked, or rather skipped, over to the child, swung her up, and let her fall into her lap at the same moment she sat herself. She said "Hopla! Hopla! Molly . . ." and began stroking the dark untidy young head that Molly laid on her shoulder for comfort.

Well. . . . Susan blinked the tears of farewell out of her eyes, and went quietly up the house to her bedroom. There she sat looking at the river through the trees. She felt at peace, but in a way that was new to her. She had no desire to move, to talk, to do anything at all. The devils that had haunted the house, the garden, were not there; but she knew it was because her soul was in Room 19 in Fred's Hotel; she was not really here at all. It was a sensation that should have been frightening: to sit at her own bedroom window, listening to Sophie's rich young voice sing German nursery songs to her child, listening to Mrs Parkes clatter and move below, and to know that all this had nothing to do with her: she was already out of it.

Later, she made herself go down and say she was home: it was unfair to be here unannounced. She took lunch with Mrs Parkes, Sophie, Sophie's Italian friend Maria, and her daughter Molly, and felt like a visitor.

A few days later, at bedtime, Matthew said: "Here's your five pounds," and pushed them over at her. Yet he must have known she had not been leaving the house at all.

She shook her head, gave it back to him, and said, in explanation, not in accusation: "As soon as you knew where I was, there was no point."

He nodded, not looking at her. He was turned away from her: thinking, she knew, how best to handle this wife who terrified him.

He said: "I wasn't trying to . . . it's just that I was worried."

"Yes, I know."

"I must confess that I was beginning to wonder . . ."

"You thought that I had a lover?"

"Yes, I am afraid I did."

She knew that he wished she had. She sat wondering how to say: "For a year now I've been spending all my days in a very sordid hotel room. It's the place where I'm happy. In fact, without it I don't exist." She heard herself saying this, and understood how terrified he was that she might. So instead she said: "Well, perhaps you're not far wrong."

Probably Matthew would think the hotel proprietor lied: he would want to think so.

"Well," he said, and she could hear his voice spring up, so to speak, with relief: "in that case I must confess I've got a bit of an affair on myself."

She said, detached and interested: "Really? Who is she?" and saw Matthew's startled look because of this reaction.

"It's Phil. Phil Hunt."

She had known Phil Hunt well in the old unmarried days. She was thinking: No, she won't do, she's too neurotic and difficult. She's never been happy yet. Sophie's much better: Well Matthew will see that himself, as sensible as he is.

This line of thought went on in silence, while she said aloud: "It's no point in telling you about mine, because you don't know him."

Quick, quick, invent, she thought. Remember how you invented all that nonsense for Miss Townsend.

She began slowly, careful not to contradict herself: "His name is Michael"—(Michael What?)—"Michael Plant." (What a silly name!) "He's rather like you—in looks, I mean." And indeed, she could imagine herself being touched by no one but Matthew himself. "He's a publisher." (Really? Why?) "He's got a wife already and two children."

She brought out this fantasy, proud of herself.

Matthew said: "Are you two thinking of marrying?"

She said, before she could stop herself: "Good God, no!"

She realised, if Matthew wanted to marry Phil Hunt, that this was too emphatic, but apparently it was all right, for his voice sounded relieved as he said: "It is a bit impossible to imagine oneself married to anyone else, isn't it?" With which he pulled her to him, so that her head lay on his shoulder. She turned her face into the dark of his flesh, and listened to the blood pounding through her ears saying: I am alone, I am alone, I am alone.

In the morning Susan lay in bed while he dressed.

He had been thinking things out in the night, because now he said: "Susan, why don't we make a foursome?"

Of course, she said to herself, of course he would be bound to say that. If one is sensible, if one is reasonable, if one never allows oneself a base thought or an envious emotion, naturally one says: Let's make a foursome!

"Why not?" she said.

"We could all meet for lunch. I mean, it's ridiculous, you sneaking off to filthy hotels, and me staying late at the office, and all the lies everyone has to tell."

What on earth did I say his name was?—she panicked, then said: "I think it's a good idea, but Michael is away at the moment. When he comes back though—and I'm sure you two would like each other."

"He's away, is he? So that's why you've been . . ." Her husband put his hand to the knot of his tie in a gesture of male coquetry she would not before have associated with him; and he bent to kiss her cheek with the expression that goes with the words: Oh you naughty little puss! And she felt its answering look, naughty and coy, come onto her face.

Inside she was dissolving in horror at them both, at how far they had both sunk from honesty of emotion.

So now she was saddled with a lover, and he had a mistress! How ordinary, how reassuring, how jolly! And now they would make a foursome of it, and go about to theatres and restaurants. After all, the Rawlings could well afford that sort of thing, and presumably the publisher Michael Plant could afford to do himself and his mistress quite well. No, there was nothing to stop the four of them developing the most intricate relationship of civilised tolerance, all enveloped in a charming afterglow of autumnal passion. Perhaps they would all go off on holidays together? She had known people who did. Or perhaps Matthew would draw the line there? Why should he, though, if he was capable of talking about "foursomes" at all?

She lay in the empty bedroom, listening to the car drive off with Matthew in it, off to work. Then she heard the children clattering off to school to the accompaniment of Sophie's cheerfully ringing voice. She slid down into the hollow of the bed, for shelter against her own irrelevance. And she stretched out her hand to the hollow where her husband's body had lain, but found no comfort there: he was not her husband. She curled herself up in a small tight ball under the clothes: she could stay here all day, all week, indeed, all her life.

But in a few days she must produce Michael Plant, and—but how? She must presumably find some agreeable man prepared to impersonate a publisher called Michael Plant. And in return for which she would—what? Well, for one thing they would make love. The idea made her want to cry with sheer exhaustion. Oh no, she had finished with all that—the proof of it was that the words "make love," or even imagining it, trying hard to revive no more than the pleasures of sensuality, let alone affection, or love, made her want to run away and hide from the sheer effort of the thing. . . . Good Lord, why make love at all? Why make love with anyone? Or if you are going to make love, what does it matter who with? Why shouldn't she simply walk into the street, pick up a man and have a roaring sexual affair with him? Why not? Or even with Fred? What difference did it make?

But she had let herself in for it—an interminable stretch of time with a lover, called Michael, as part of a gallant civilised foursome. Well, she could not, and she would not.

She got up, dressed, went down to find Mrs Parkes, and asked her for the loan of a pound, since Matthew, she said, had forgotten to leave her money. She exchanged with Mrs Parkes variations on the theme that husbands are all the same, they don't think, and without saying a word to Sophie, whose voice could be heard upstairs from the telephone, walked to the underground, travelled to South Kensington, changed to the Inner Circle, got out at Paddington, and walked to Fred's Hotel. There she told Fred that she wasn't going on holiday after all, she needed the room. She would have to wait an hour, Fred said. She went to a busy tearoom-cum-restaurant around the corner, and sat watching the people flow in and out the door that kept swinging open and shut, watched them mingle and merge and separate, felt her being flow into them, into their movement. When the hour was up she left a half crown for her pot of tea, and left the place without looking back at it, just as she had left her house, the big, beautiful white house, without another look, but silently dedicating it to Sophie. She returned to Fred, received the key of No. 19, now free, and ascended the grimy stairs slowly, letting floor after floor fall away below her, keeping her eyes lifted, so that floor after floor descended jerkily to her level of vision, and fell away out of sight.

No. 19 was the same. She saw everything with an acute, narrow, checking glance: the cheap shine of the satin spread, which had been replaced carelessly after the two bodies had finished their convulsions under it; a trace of powder on the glass that topped the chest of drawers; an intense green shade in a fold of the curtain. She stood at the window, looking down, watching people pass and pass and pass until her mind went dark from the constant movement. Then she sat in the wicker chair, letting herself go slack. But she had to be careful, because she did not want, today, to be surprised by Fred's knock at five o'clock.

The demons were not here. They had gone forever, because she was buying her freedom from them. She was slipping already into the dark fructifying dream that seemed to caress her inwardly, like the movement of her blood . . . but she had to think about Matthew first. Should she write a letter for the coroner? But what should she say? She would like to leave him with the look on his face she had seen this morning—banal, admittedly, but at least confidently healthy. Well, that was impossible, one did not look like that with a wife dead from suicide. But how to leave him believing she was dying because of a man—because of the fascinating publisher Michael Plant? Oh, how ridiculous! How absurd! How humiliating! But she decided not to trouble about it, simply not to think about the living. If he wanted to believe she had a lover, he would believe it. And he did want to believe it. Even when he had found out that there was no publisher in London called Michael Plant, he would think: Oh poor Susan, she was afraid to give me his real name.

And what did it matter whether he married Phil Hunt or Sophie? Though it ought to be Sophie, who was already the mother of those children . . . and what hypocrisy to sit here worrying about the children, when she was going to leave them because she had not got the energy to stay.

She had about four hours. She spent them delightfully, darkly, sweetly, letting herself slide gently, gently, to the edge of the river. Then, with hardly a break in her consciousness, she got up, pushed the thin rug against the door, made sure the windows were tight shut, put two shillings in the meter, and turned on the gas. For the first time since she had been in the room she lay on the hard bed that smelled stale, that smelled of sweat and sex.

She lay on her back on the green satin cover, but her legs were chilly. She got up, found a blanket folded in the bottom of the chest of drawers, and carefully covered her legs with it. She was quite content lying there, listening to the faint soft hiss of the gas that poured into the room, into her lungs, into her brain, as she drifted off into the dark river.

1963

Endnotes

- Note 1: Inn with large courtyard, in West Asia.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Household workers.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Live-in foreigner who serves a family in exchange for learning its language.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Charwoman—a woman hired to clean.Return to reference 4

PHILIP LARKIN

1922–1985

Philip Larkin was born in Coventry; was educated at its King Henry VIII School and at St. John's College, Oxford; and was for many years librarian of the Hull University Library. He wrote the poems of his first book, The North Ship (1945), under W. B. Yeats's strong enchantment. Although this influence persisted in the English poet's formal skill and subdued visionary longings, Larkin began to read Thomas Hardy seriously after World War II, and Hardy's rugged language, local settings, and ironic tone helped counter Yeats's influence. "After that," Larkin said, "Yeats came to seem so artificial—all that crap about masks and Crazy Jane and all the rest. It all rang so completely unreal." Also rejecting the international modernism of Eliot and Pound because of its mythical allusions, polyglot discourse, and fragmentary syntax, Larkin reclaimed a more direct, personal, formally regular model of poetry, supposedly rooted in a native English tradition of Wordsworth, Hardy, A. E. Housman, Wilfred Owen, and W. H. Auden. Even so, his poetry is not so thoroughly antimodernist as are his declarations: witness his imagist precision and alienated personae, his blending of revulsion and attraction toward modernity.

Larkin was the dominant figure in what came to be known as "the Movement," a group of university poets that included Kingsley Amis, Donald Davie, and Thom Gunn, gathered together in Robert Conquest's landmark anthology of 1956, New Lines. Their work was seen as counteracting not only the extravagances of modernism but also the influence of Dylan Thomas's high-flown, apocalyptic rhetoric: like Larkin, these poets preferred a civil grammar and rational syntax over prophecy, suburban realities over mythmaking.

No other poet presents the welfare-state world of postimperial Britain so vividly, so unsparingly, and so tenderly. "Poetry is an affair of sanity, of seeing things as they are," Larkin said; "I don't want to transcend the commonplace, I love the commonplace life. Everyday things are lovely to me." Eschewing the grandiose, he writes poetry that, in its everyday diction and melancholy wryness, worldly subjects and regular meters, affirms rather than contravenes the restrictions of ordinary life. Love's failure, the erosion of religious and national abutments, the loneliness of age and death—Larkin does not avert his poetic gaze from these bleak realities. As indicated by the title of his 1955 collection The Less Deceived, disillusionment, drabness, and resignation color these poems. Yet Larkin's drearily mundane world often gives way to muted promise, his speakers' alienation to possible communion, his skepticism to encounters even with the sublime. At the end of "High Windows," the characteristically ironic and self-deprecating speaker glimpses both radiant presence and total absence in the sunlit glass: "And beyond it, the deep blue air, that shows / Nothing, and is nowhere, and is endless."

Like Hardy, Larkin also wrote novels—Jill (1946) and A Girl in Winter (1947)—and his poems have a novelist's sense of place and skill in the handling of direct speech. He also edited a controversial anthology, The Oxford Book of Twentieth-Century English Verse (1973), which attempted to construct a modern native tradition in England. But his most significant legacy was his poetry, although his output was limited to four volumes. Out of "the commonplace life" he fashioned uncommon poems—some of the most emotionally complex, rhythmically polished, and intricately rhymed poems of the second half of the twentieth century.

Church Going

Once I am sure there's nothing going on
I step inside, letting the door thud shut.
Another church: matting, seats, and stone,
And little books; sprawlings of flowers, cut
For Sunday, brownish now; some brass and stuff
5 Up at the holy end; the small neat organ;
And a tense, musty, unignorable silence,
Brewed God knows how long. Hatless, I take off
My cycle-clips in awkward reverence,

10 Move forward, run my hand around the font.
From where I stand, the roof looks almost new—Cleaned, or restored? Someone would know: I don't.
Mounting the lectern, I peruse a few Hectoring large-scale verses,¹ and pronounce
"Here endeth" much more loudly than I'd meant.
15 The echoes snigger briefly. Back at the door
I sign the book, donate an Irish sixpence,²
Reflect the place was not worth stopping for.

Yet stop I did: in fact I often do,
And always end much at a loss like this,
20 Wondering what to look for; wondering, too,
When churches fall completely out of use
What we shall turn them into, if we shall keep
A few cathedrals chronically on show,
Their parchment, plate and pyx³ in locked cases,
25 And let the rest rent-free to rain and sheep.
Shall we avoid them as unlucky places?

Or, after dark, will dubious women come

To make their children touch a particular stone;
Pick simples^o for a cancer; or on some 30 Advised night see walking a dead one?
Power of some sort or other will go on
In games, in riddles, seemingly at random;
But superstition, like belief, must die,
And what remains when disbelief has gone?
35 Grass, weedy pavement, brambles, buttress, sky,

A shape less recognisable each week,
A purpose more obscure. I wonder who Will be the last, the very last, to seek
This place for what it was; one of the crew 40 That tap and jot and know what rood-lofts⁴ were?
Some ruin-bibber, randy for antique,
Or Christmas-addict, counting on a whiff
Of gown-and-bands and organ-pipes and myrrh?⁵
Or will he be my representative,
45
Bored, uninformed, knowing the ghostly silt
Dispersed, yet tending to this cross of ground⁶
Through suburb scrub because it held unspilt
So long and equably what since is found
Only in separation—marriage, and birth, 50 And death, and thoughts of these—for which was built
This special shell? For, though I've no idea
What this accoutred frowsty barn is worth,
It pleases me to stand in silence here;

A serious house on serious earth it is,
55 In whose blent air all our compulsions meet,
Are recognised, and robed as destinies.
And that much never can be obsolete,
Since someone will forever be surprising
A hunger in himself to be more serious,

60 And gravitating with it to this ground,
Which, he once heard, was proper to grow wise in,
If only that so many dead lie round.

19541955

Endnotes

- Note 1: That is, Bible verses printed in large type for reading aloud.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: An Irish sixpence has no value in England.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Box in which Communion wafers are kept.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Galleries on top of carved screens separating the nave of a church from the choir.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Gum resin used in the making of incense; one of three presents given by the three wise men to the infant Jesus. "Gown-and-bands": gown and decorative collar worn by clergypeople.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Most Christian churches were built in the shape of a cross.Return to reference 6

Notes

- °: medicinal herbsReturn to reference °

MCMXIV¹

Those long uneven lines
Standing as patiently
As if they were stretched outside
The Oval or Villa Park,²
5 The crowns of hats, the sun
On moustached archaic faces
Grinning as if it were all
An August Bank Holiday³ lark;

And the shut shops, the bleached,
10 Established names on the sunblinds,
The farthings and sovereigns,⁴
And dark-clothed children at play
Called after kings and queens,
The tin advertisements
15 For cocoa and twist,⁰ and the pubs
Wide open all day;

And the countryside not caring:
The place-names all hazed over
With flowering grasses, and fields
20 Shadowing Domesday lines⁵
Under wheat's restless silence;
The differently-dressed servants
With tiny rooms in huge houses,
The dust behind limousines;

25 Never such innocence,
Never before or since,
As changed itself to past
Without a word—the men

Leaving the gardens tidy,
The thousands of marriages
Lasting a little while longer:
Never such innocence again.

19601964

Endnotes

- Note 1: 1914, in Roman numerals, as incised on stone memorials to the dead of World War I. Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Respectively, London cricket ground and Birmingham football ground. Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Nationwide public holiday observed, when this poem was written (and in 1914), on the first Monday in August. Return to reference 3
- Note 4: At that time the least valuable and the most valuable British coins. Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The still-visible boundaries of medieval farmers' long and narrow plots, ownership of which is recorded in William the Conqueror's Domesday Book (1085–86). Return to reference 5

Notes

- °: tobacco Return to reference °

Talking in Bed

Talking in bed ought to be easiest,
Lying together there goes back so far,
An emblem of two people being honest.

5 Yet more and more time passes silently.
Outside, the wind's incomplete unrest
Builds and disperses clouds about the sky,

And dark towns heap up on the horizon.
None of this cares for us. Nothing shows why
At this unique distance from isolation

10 It becomes still more difficult to find Words at once true and kind,
Or not untrue and not unkind.

19601964

High Windows

When I see a couple of kids
And guess he's fucking her and she's Taking pills or wearing a diaphragm,
I know this is paradise

5 Everyone old has dreamed of all their lives—
Bonds and gestures pushed to one side
Like an outdated combine harvester,¹
And everyone young going down the long slide

10 To happiness, endlessly. I wonder if Anyone looked at me, forty years back,
And thought, That'll be the life;
No God any more, or sweating in the dark

15 About hell and that, or having to hide
What you think of the priest. He
And his lot will all go down the long slide
Like free bloody birds. And immediately

Rather than words comes the thought of high windows:

The sun-comprehending glass,
And beyond it, the deep blue air, that shows
Nothing, and is nowhere, and is endless.

20 19671974

Endnotes

- Note 1: Farm machine for harvesting grain. Return to reference 1

Going, Going¹

I thought it would last my time—
The sense that, beyond the town,
There would always be fields and farms,
Where the village louts² could climb
Such trees as were not cut down;
5 I knew there'd be false alarms

In the papers about old streets
And split-level shopping,³ but some
Have always been left so far;
And when the old part retreats
10 As the bleak high-risers come
We can always escape in the car.

Things are tougher than we are, just
As earth will always respond
However we mess it about;
15 Chuck filth in the sea, if you must:
The tides will be clean beyond.
—But what do I feel now? Doubt?

Or age, simply? The crowd
Is young in the Mi⁴ café;
20 Their kids are screaming for more—
More houses, more parking allowed,
More caravan⁵ sites, more pay.
On the Business Page, a score

25 Of spectacled grins approve
Some takeover bid that entails
Five per cent profit (and ten Per cent more in the estuaries): move

Your works to the unspoilt dales⁶
(Grey area grants)!⁷ And when 30 You try to get near the sea
In summer . . .
It seems, just now,
To be happening so very fast;
Despite all the land left free
35 For the first time I feel somehow
That it isn't going to last,
That before I snuff it, the whole
Boiling⁸ will be bricked in Except for the tourist parts—
40 First slum of Europe: a role
It won't be so hard to win,
With a cast of crooks and tarts.⁹
And that will be England gone,
The shadows, the meadows, the lanes,
45 The guildhalls,¹ the carved choirs.
There'll be books; it will linger on
In galleries; but all that remains
For us will be concrete and tyres.
Most things are never meant.
This won't be, most likely: but greeds
50 And garbage are too thick-strewn
To be swept up now, or invent
Excuses that make them all needs.
I just think it will happen, soon.

19721974

Endnotes

- Note 1: After the auctioneer's cry, "Going, going, gone!" This poem was commissioned by the UK government to preface a report submitted to the 1972 UN Stockholm Conference on the Environment. Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Uncouth or awkward person. Return to reference 2
- Note 3: In old-fashioned shops, the store was on the ground floor, the owner's living quarters above. Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The first inter-urban motorway in the UK. Return to reference 4
- Note 5: A camper or travel trailer. Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Valleys. "Works": factories. Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Building areas are zoned, on English maps, by colors. Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, the whole boiling mess. Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Offensive slang for a promiscuous woman. Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Town halls. Return to reference 1

Sad Steps¹

Groping back to bed after a piss
I part thick curtains, and am startled by
The rapid clouds, the moon's cleanliness.

5 Four o'clock: wedge-shadowed gardens lie
Under a cavernous, a wind-picked sky.
There's something laughable about this,

The way the moon dashes through clouds that blow
Loosely as cannon-smoke to stand apart
(Stone-coloured light sharpening the roofs below)

10 High and preposterous and separate—
Lozenge^o of love! Medallion of art!
O wolves of memory! Immensements! No,

One shivers slightly, looking up there.
The hardness and the brightness and the plain
15 Far-reaching singleness of that wide stare

Is a reminder of the strength and pain
Of being young; that it can't come again,
But is for others undiminished somewhere.

19681974

Endnotes

- Note 1: See Sir Philip Sidney's Astrophil and Stella 31: "With how sad steps, O Moon, thou climb'st the skies." Return to reference 1

Notes

- °: diamondlike shapeReturn to reference °

Homage to a Government

Next year we are to bring the soldiers home
For lack of money,¹ and it is all right.
Places they guarded, or kept orderly,
Must guard themselves, and keep themselves orderly.
5 We want the money for ourselves at home
Instead of working. And this is all right.

It's hard to say who wanted it to happen,
But now it's been decided nobody minds.
The places are a long way off, not here,
Which is all right, and from what we hear
10 The soldiers there only made trouble happen.
Next year we shall be easier in our minds.

Next year we shall be living in a country
That brought its soldiers home for lack of money.
The statues will be standing in the same
15 Tree-muffled squares, and look nearly the same.
Our children will not know it's a different country.
All we can hope to leave them now is money.

Jan. 10, 19691974

Endnotes

- Note 1: In 1968 Harold Wilson's Labour government decided to withdraw troops east of the Suez Canal, mainly in the Persian Gulf and Southeast Asia.Return to reference 1

The Explosion

On the day of the explosion
Shadows pointed towards the pithead:°
In the sun the slagheap° slept.

5 Down the lane came men in pitboots
Coughing oath-edged talk and pipe-smoke,
Shouldering off the freshened silence.

One chased after rabbits; lost them;
Came back with a nest of lark's eggs;
Showed them; lodged them in the grasses.

10 So they passed in beards and moleskins,¹
Fathers, brothers, nicknames, laughter,
Through the tall gates standing open.

15 At noon, there came a tremor; cows
Stopped chewing for a second; sun,
Scarfed as in a heat-haze, dimmed.

*The dead go on before us, they
Are sitting in God's house in comfort,
We shall see them face to face—*

20 Plain as lettering in the chapels
It was said, and for a second
Wives saw men of the explosion

Larger than in life they managed—
Gold as on a coin, or walking
Somehow from the sun towards them,

One showing the eggs unbroken.

19701974⁵

Endnotes

- Note 1: Clothes of heavy fabric. Return to reference 1

Notes

- °: mine entrance Return to reference °
- °: pile of scrap, refuse Return to reference °

This Be The Verse¹

They fuck you up, your mum and dad.
They may not mean to, but they do.
They fill you with the faults they had
And add some extra, just for you.

5 But they were fucked up in their turn
By fools in old-style hats and coats,
Who half the time were soppy-stern
And half at one another's throats.

10 Man hands on misery to man.
It deepens like a coastal shelf.²
Get out as early as you can,
And don't have any kids yourself.

Apr.? 19711974

Endnotes

- Note 1: See the elegy "Requiem," by Robert Louis Stevenson (1850–1894), of which the final verse reads, "This be the verse you grave for me: / Here he lies where he longed to be, / Home is the sailor, home from sea, / And the hunter home from the hill."Return to reference 1
- Note 2: That is, continental shelf.Return to reference 2

Aubade¹

I work all day, and get half-drunk at night.
Waking at four to soundless dark, I stare.
In time the curtain-edges will grow light.
Till then I see what's really always there:
5 Unresting death, a whole day nearer now,
Making all thought impossible but how
And where and when I shall myself die.
Arid interrogation: yet the dread
Of dying, and being dead,
10 Flashes afresh to hold and horrify.

The mind blanks at the glare. Not in remorse
—The good not done, the love not given, time Torn off unused—nor wretchedly because
An only life can take so long to climb
Clear of its wrong beginnings, and may never;
15 But at the total emptiness for ever,
The sure extinction that we travel to
And shall be lost in always. Not to be here,
Not to be anywhere,
And soon; nothing more terrible, nothing more true.
20

This is a special way of being afraid
No trick dispels. Religion used to try,
That vast moth-eaten musical brocade
Created to pretend we never die,
And specious stuff that says No rational being 25 Can fear a thing it will not feel, not seeing
That this is what we fear—no sight, no sound,
No touch or taste or smell, nothing to think with,
Nothing to love or link with,

30 The anaesthetic from which none come round.
 And so it stays just on the edge of vision,
 A small unfocused blur, a standing chill
 That slows each impulse down to indecision.
 Most things may never happen: this one will,
 And realisation of it rages out
 35 In furnace-fear when we are caught without People or drink. Courage is no good:
 It means not scaring others. Being brave
 Lets no one off the grave.
 Death is no different whined at than withstood.
 40
 Slowly light strengthens, and the room takes shape.
 It stands plain as a wardrobe, what we know,
 Have always known, know that we can't escape,
 Yet can't accept. One side will have to go.
 Meanwhile telephones crouch, getting ready to ring
 45 In locked-up offices, and all the uncaring
 Intricate rented world begins to rouse.
 The sky is white as clay, with no sun.
 Work has to be done.
 Postmen like doctors go from house to house.
 50
 19771977

Endnotes

- Note 1: Music or poem announcing dawn. Return to reference 1

A. K. RAMANUJAN

1929–1993

Born in Mysore, India, Attipat Krishnaswami Ramanujan grew up amid the different languages that later informed his life's work as poet, translator, and linguist: he spoke Kannada in the streets, Tamil with his mother, and English with his father, a mathematics professor at Mysore University. Educated there and at Deccan College, he traveled for graduate studies to Indiana University, staying on in the United States to teach at the University of Chicago from 1961. He was the recipient of a MacArthur Fellowship, and in 1976 the Indian government honored him with the Padma Shri for distinguished service to the nation.

Ramanujan affirmed that "cultural traditions in India are indissolubly plural and often conflicting," and his poetry—in its texture and subject matter—embodies this complex intercultural mingling within India and across much of the contemporary world. His poems reflect the influence of modern English-language poets, such as W. B. Yeats, Ezra Pound, William Carlos Williams, and Wallace Stevens, while also drawing on the vivid and structural use of metaphor, the flowing imagery and syntax, the spare diction and paradoxes of ancient and medieval poetry of south India. A poem such as the wittily entitled "Elements of Composition" recalls a traditional Indian vision of identity as embedded in endlessly fluid, concentrically arranged contexts at the same time that it suggests a postmodern vision of the self as decentered, composite, and provisional. "India does not have one past," Ramanujan emphasized, "but many pasts," and the same is true of the self whose multiple pasts he composes and decomposes in his poetry.

Self-Portrait

I resemble everyone
but myself, and sometimes see in shop-windows,
despite the well-known laws
of optics,
5 the portrait of a stranger,
date unknown,
often signed in a corner
by my father.

1966

Elements of Composition

Composed as I am, like others,
of elements on certain well-known lists,
father's seed and mother's egg

5 gathering earth, air, fire, mostly water, into a mulberry mass,
moulding calcium,

carbon, even gold, magnesium and such,
into a chattering self tangled
in love and work,

10 scary dreams, capable of eyes that can see,
only by moving constantly,
the constancy of things

like Stonehenge or cherry trees;

add uncle's eleven fingers 15 making shadow-plays of rajas^o
and cats, hissing,

becoming fingers again, the look of panic on sister's face
an hour before

20 her wedding, a dated newspaper map of a place one has never seen, maybe no longer there

after the riots, downtown Nairobi,¹ that a friend carried in his passport

25 as others would a woman's picture in their wallets;
add the lepers of Madurai,⁰ male, female, married,
with children,
30 lion faces, crabs for claws, clotted on their shadows
under the stone-eyed goddesses of dance, mere pillars, moving as nothing on earth
can move—
35 I pass through them
as they pass through me
taking and leaving affections, seeds, skeletons, 40 millennia of fossil records of insects that do not last a day,
body-prints of mayflies,
a legend half-heard 45 in a train
of the half-man searching for an ever-fleeing other half²
through Muharram tigers,³ 50 hyacinths in crocodile waters, and the sweet

twisted lives of epileptic saints,
and even as I add,
I lose, decompose
55 into my elements,
into other names and forms,
past, and passing, tenses
without time,
caterpillar on a leaf, eating,
60 being eaten.⁴

1986

Endnotes

- Note 1: Capital of Kenya; in the rioting that ensued after a coup in 1978, many Asian-owned shops were looted and burned. (South Asians formed much of Nairobi's merchant class during and after the era of British colonial rule.)Return to reference 1
- Note 2: In an essay Ramanujan compares the Hindu myth of the god that "splits himself into male and female" to "the androgynous figure in Plato's Symposium, halved into male and female segments which forever seek each other and crave union."Return to reference 2
- Note 3: During the first month of the Islamic calendar, Muharram processions, often including dancers in tiger masks, commemorate the martyrdom of Muhammad's grandson, Husein.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: According to a poem in the ancient Sanskrit Taittiriya Upanishad, "What eats is eaten, / and what's eaten, eats / in turn" (Ramanujan's translation, in his essay "Some Thoughts on 'Non-Western' Classics").Return to reference 4

Notes

- °: Indian kings or princesReturn to reference °
- °: city in south IndiaReturn to reference °

THOM GUNN

1929–2004

The son of a London journalist, Thomson Gunn was educated at University College School, London, then Trinity College, Cambridge, and Stanford University, where he studied under the antimodernist, classically inclined poet Yvor Winters. In a poem addressed to Winters, he wrote: "You keep both Rule and Energy in view, / Much power in each, most in the balanced two." The poems of Gunn's Fighting Terms (1954) and The Sense of Movement (1957) aimed for the same balance. They were influenced by the seventeenth-century English poet John Donne and the twentieth-century French philosopher Jean-Paul Sartre and introduced a modern Metaphysical poet able to give powerfully concrete expression to abstract ideas. Along with Philip Larkin, he was seen as a member of "the Movement"—English poets who preferred inherited verse forms to either modernist avant-gardism or high-flown Romanticism. In the second half of My Sad Captains (1961), he began to move away from the will-driven heroes and the tight-fitting stanzas of his early work into more tentative explorations of experience and more supple syllabic or open verse forms. "Most of my poems are ambivalent," he said. Moving from England to San Francisco, he experimented with LSD and moved also from poems presumably addressed to women to poems frankly homosexual. The Man with Night Sweats (1992) ends with a sequence of poems remarkable for their unflinching directness, compassion, and grace about the deaths of friends from AIDS. Gunn was a poet of rare intelligence and power in all his protean changes.

Black Jackets

In the silence that prolongs the span
Rawly of music when the record ends,
The red-haired boy who drove a van
In weekday overalls but, like his friends,

5 Wore cycle boots and jacket here
To suit the Sunday hangout he was in,
 Heard, as he stretched back from his beer,
Leather creak softly round his neck and chin.

 Before him, on a coal-black sleeve
10 Remote exertion had lined, scratched, and burned
 Insignia that could not revive
The heroic fall or climb where they were earned.

 On the other drinkers bent together,
Concocting selves for their impervious kit,
15 He saw it as no more than leather
Which, taut across the shoulders grown to it,

 Sent through the dimness of a bar
As sudden and anonymous hints of light
 As those that shipping give, that are 20 Now flickers in the Bay, now lost in night.

 He stretched out like a cat, and rolled
The bitterish taste of beer upon his tongue,
 And listened to a joke being told:
The present was the things he stayed among.

25 If it was only loss he wore,
He wore it to assert, with fierce devotion,

Complicity and nothing more.
He recollected his initiation,

30 And one especially of the rites.
For on his shoulders they had put tattoos:
The group's name on the left, The Knights,
And on the right the slogan Born To Lose.

1961

My Sad Captains

One by one they appear in the darkness: a few friends, and a few with historical names. How late they start to shine!
5 but before they fade they stand perfectly embodied, all the past lapping them like a cloak of chaos. They were men who, I thought, lived only to 10 renew the wasteful force they spent with each hot convulsion.

They remind me, distant now.

True, they are not at rest yet,
but now that they are indeed 15 apart, winnowed from failures, they withdraw to an orbit
and turn with disinterested hard energy, like the stars.

1961

From the Wave

It mounts at sea, a concave wall
Down-ribbed with shine,
And pushes forward, building tall
Its steep incline.

5 Then from their hiding rise to sight
Black shapes on boards
Bearing before the fringe of white
It mottles towards.

10 Their pale feet curl, they poise their weight
With a learn'd skill.
It is the wave they imitate
Keeps them so still.

15 The marbling bodies have become
Half wave, half men,
Grafted it seems by feet of foam
Some seconds, then,

20 Late as they can, they slice the face
In timed procession:
Balance is triumph in this place,
Triumph possession.

The mindless heave of which they rode
A fluid shelf
Breaks as they leave it, falls and, slowed,
Loses itself.

25 Clear, the sheathed bodies slick as seals
Loosen and tingle;

And by the board the bare foot feels
The suck of shingle.

30 They paddle in the shallows still;
Two splash each other;
Then all swim out to wait until
The right waves gather.

1971

Still Life

I shall not soon forget
The greyish-yellow skin
To which the face had set:
Lids tight: nothing of his,
No tremor from within,
5 Played on the surfaces.

He still found breath, and yet
It was an obscure knack.
I shall not soon forget
The angle of his head,
10 Arrested and reared back
On the crisp field of bed,

Back from what he could neither
Accept, as one opposed,
Nor, as a life-long breather,
15 Consentingly let go,
The tube his mouth enclosed
In an astonished O.

The Missing

Now as I watch the progress of the plague,
The friends surrounding me fall sick, grow thin,
And drop away. Bared, is my shape less vague
—Sharply exposed and with a sculpted skin?

5 I do not like the statue's chill contour,
Not nowadays. The warmth investing me
Led outward through mind, limb, feeling, and more
In an involved increasing family.

10 Contact of friend led to another friend,
Supple entwinement through the living mass
Which for all that I knew might have no end,
Image of an unlimited embrace.

15 I did not just feel ease, though comfortable:
Aggressive as in some ideal of sport,
With ceaseless movement thrilling through the whole,
Their push kept me as firm as their support.

20 But death—Their deaths have left me less defined:
It was their pulsing presence made me clear.
I borrowed from it, I was unconfined,
Who tonight balance unsupported here,

Eyes glaring from raw marble, in a pose
Languorously part-buried in the block,
Shins perfect and no calves, as if I froze
Between potential and a finished work.

—Abandoned incomplete, shape of a shape,

25

In which exact detail shows the more strange,
Trapped in unwholeness, I find no escape
Back to the play of constant give and change.

Aug. 19871992

Notes

- °: AIDSReturn to reference °

DEREK WALCOTT

1930—2017

Derek Walcott was born on the island of Saint Lucia in the British West Indies, where he had a Methodist upbringing in a largely Roman Catholic society. He was educated at St. Mary's College in Saint Lucia and the University of the West Indies in Jamaica. He then moved to Trinidad, where he worked as a book reviewer, art critic, playwright, and artistic director of a theater workshop. From the early 1980s on he also taught at a number of American colleges and universities, especially Boston University; in 1992 he received the Nobel Prize in Literature.

As a Black poet writing from within both the English literary tradition and the history of a colonized people, Walcott self-mockingly referred to his split allegiances to his African Caribbean and his European inheritances as those of a "schizophrenic," a "mongrel," a "mulatto of style." His background was indeed racially and culturally mixed: his grandmothers were of African descent; his grandfathers were White, a Dutchman and an Englishman. Schooled in the Standard English that is the official language of Saint Lucia, Walcott also grew up speaking the predominantly French Creole (or patois) that is the primary language of everyday life (the island had traded hands fourteen times in colonial wars between the British and the French). In his poetry this cross-cultural inheritance is sometimes the source of pain and ambivalence, as when in "A Far Cry from Africa" he refers to himself as being "poisoned with the blood of both.” At other times it fuels a celebratory integration of multiple forms, visions, and energies, as in parts of his long poem Omeros, which transposes elements of Homeric epic from the Aegean to the Caribbean.

Even as a schoolboy Walcott knew he was not alone in his effort to sort through his vexed postcolonial affiliations. From a young age he felt a special affinity with Irish writers such as W. B. Yeats, James Joyce, and J. M. Synge, whom he saw as fellow colonials—“They were the niggers of Britain”—with the same paradoxical hatred for the British Empire and worship of the English language. He repeatedly asked how the postcolonial poet can both grieve the agonizing harm of British colonialism and appreciate the empire’s literary gift. Walcott also acknowledged other English and American writers—T. S. Eliot, Ezra Pound, Hart Crane, W. H. Auden, and Robert Lowell—as enabling influences.

Over the course of his prolific career, Walcott adapted various European literary archetypes (for example, the Greek character Philoctetes) and forms (epic, quatrains, terza rima, English meters). He ascribed his rigorous concern with craft to his youthful Protestantism. At once disciplined and flamboyant as a poet, he insisted on the specifically Caribbean opulence of his art: “I come from a place that likes grandeur; it likes large gestures; it is not inhibited by flourish; it is a rhetorical society; it is a society of physical performance; it is a society of style.” Although much of his poetry is in a rhetorically elevated Standard English, Walcott adapted the calypso rhythms of a lightly creolized English in “The Schooner Flight,” and he braided together West Indian English, Standard English, and French patois in Omeros. He had a great passion for metaphor, by which he deftly wove imaginative connections across cultural and racial boundaries. His plays, written in an accurate and energetic language, are similarly infused with the spirit of syncretism, vividly conjoining Caribbean and European motifs, images, and idioms.

A Far Cry from Africa

A wind is ruffling the tawny pelt
Of Africa. Kikuyu,¹ quick as flies,
Batten upon the bloodstreams of the veldt.²
Corpses are scattered through a paradise.
Only the worm, colonel of carrion, cries:
5 "Waste no compassion on these separate dead!"
Statistics justify and scholars seize
The salients of colonial policy.
What is that to the white child hacked in bed?
To savages, expendable as Jews?
10
Threshed out by beaters,³ the long rushes break
In a white dust of ibises whose cries
Have wheeled since civilization's dawn
From the parched river or beast-teeming plain.
The violence of beast on beast is read
15 As natural law, but upright man
Seeks his divinity by inflicting pain.
Delirious as these worried beasts, his wars
Dance to the tightened carcass of a drum,
While he calls courage still that native dread
20 Of the white peace contracted by the dead.
Again brutish necessity wipes its hands
Upon the napkin of a dirty cause, again
A waste of our compassion, as with Spain,⁴
The gorilla wrestles with the superman.
25 I who am poisoned with the blood of both,
Where shall I turn, divided to the vein?
I who have cursed
The drunken officer of British rule, how choose Between this Africa and the English tongue I love?

Betray them both, or give back what they give?
How can I face such slaughter and be cool?
How can I turn from Africa and live?

1956, 1962

Endnotes

- Note 1: An East African ethnic group whose members, as Mau Mau fighters, conducted an eight-year campaign of violent resistance against British colonial settlers in Kenya in the 1950s.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Open country, neither cultivated nor forest (Afrikaans).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: In big-game hunting, Natives are hired to beat the brush, driving birds—such as ibises—and other animals into the open.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The Spanish Civil War (1936–39).Return to reference 4

From The Schooner Flight

1 Adios, Carenage¹

In idle August, while the sea soft,
and leaves of brown islands stick to the rim
of this Caribbean, I blow out the light
by the dreamless face of Maria Concepcion
to ship as a seaman on the schooner Flight.
5 Out in the yard turning grey in the dawn,
I stood like a stone and nothing else move
but the cold sea rippling like galvanize and the nail holes of stars in the sky roof, till a wind start to interfere with the trees.
10 I pass me dry neighbour sweeping she yard
as I went downhill, and I nearly said:
"Sweep soft, you witch, 'cause she don't sleep hard,"
but the bitch look through me like I was dead.
A route taxi pull up, park-lights still on.
15 The driver size up my bags with a grin:
"This time, Shabine, like you really gone!"
I ain't answer the ass, I simply pile in the back seat and watch the sky burn above Laventille² pink as the gown 20 in which the woman I left was sleeping, and I look in the rearview and see a man exactly like me, and the man was weeping for the houses, the streets, the whole fucking island.

25 Christ have mercy on all sleeping things!
From that dog rotting down Wrightson Road to when I was a dog on these streets;

if loving these islands must be my load,
out of corruption my soul takes wings,
But they had started to poison my soul
30 with their big house, big car, big-time bohbohl,³ coolie, nigger, Syrian, and French Creole, so I leave it for them and their carnival—
I taking a sea-bath, I gone down the road.
I know these islands from Monos to Nassau,⁴ 35 a rusty head sailor with sea-green eyes that they nickname Shabine, the patois^o for any red nigger, and I, Shabine, saw when these slums of empire was paradise.
I'm just a red nigger who love the sea,
40 I had a sound colonial education,
I have Dutch, nigger, and English in me,
and either I'm nobody, or I'm a nation.

But Maria Concepcion was all my thought watching the sea heaving up and down 45 as the port side of dories, schooners, and yachts was painted afresh by the strokes of the sun signing her name with every reflection;
I knew when dark-haired evening put on her bright silk at sunset, and, folding the sea, 50 sidled under the sheet with her starry laugh,
that there'd be no rest, there'd be no forgetting.
Is like telling mourners round the graveside about resurrection, they want the dead back, so I smile to myself as the bow rope untied 55 and the Flight swing seaward: "Is no use repeating that the sea have more fish. I ain't want her dressed in the sexless light of a seraph,^o
I want those round brown eyes like a marmoset,⁵
and
till the day when I can lean back and laugh,

60 those claws that tickled my back on sweating
Sunday afternoons, like a crab on wet sand.”
As I worked, watching the rotting waves come past the bow that scissor the sea like silk, 65 I swear to you all, by my mother’s milk,
by the stars that shall fly from tonight’s furnace,
that I loved them, my children, my wife, my home;
I loved them as poets love the poetry that kills them, as drowned sailors the sea.

70 You ever look up from some lonely beach and see a far schooner? Well, when I write this poem, each phrase go be soaked in salt;
I go draw and knot every line as tight
as ropes in this rigging; in simple speech 75 my common language go be the wind,
my pages the sails of the schooner Flight.

1979

Endnotes

- Note 1: Waterfront where schooners are cleaned and repaired. “Adios”: good-bye (Spanish). Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Hillside slum outside Port of Spain, Trinidad. Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Or bobol: corrupt practices or fraud, organized by people in positions of power (eastern Caribbean English). Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Capital of the Bahamas. “Monos”: island off the northwest coast of Trinidad. Return to reference 4
- Note 5: South American monkey. Return to reference 5

Notes

- °: spoken dialectReturn to reference °
- °: angelReturn to reference °

The Season of Phantasmal Peace

Then all the nations of birds lifted together
the huge net of the shadows of this earth in multitudinous dialects, twittering tongues, stitching and crossing it. They lifted up 5 the shadows of long pines down trackless slopes, the shadows of glass-faced towers down evening streets,
the shadow of a frail plant on a city sill—
the net rising soundless as night, the birds' cries soundless, until there was no longer dusk, or season, decline, or weather,
10 only this passage of phantasmal light that not the narrowest shadow dared to sever.

And men could not see, looking up, what the wild geese drew,
what the ospreys trailed behind them in silvery ropes that flashed in the icy sunlight; they could not hear 15 battalions of starlings waging peaceful cries, bearing the net higher, covering this world like the vines of an orchard, or a mother drawing the trembling gauze over the trembling eyes of a child fluttering to sleep;

it was the light
20 that you will see at evening on the side of a hill in yellow October, and no one hearing knew what change had brought into the raven's cawing, the killdeer's screech, the ember-circling chough—
such an immense, soundless, and high concern for the fields and cities where the birds belong,

25 except it was their seasonal passing, Love, made seasonless, or, from the high privilege of their birth,
 something brighter than pity for the wingless ones below them who shared dark holes in windows and in houses,
30 and higher they lifted the net with soundless voices above all change, betrayals of falling suns, and this season lasted one moment, like the pause between dusk and darkness, between fury and peace,
 but, for such as our earth is now, it lasted long.

1981

Notes

- °: bird in crow familyReturn to reference °

FROM OMEROS^{1}

Endnotes

- Note 1: Modern Greek version of the name Homer. Homer's Iliad and Odyssey are, along with Dante's Divine Comedy, from which Walcott adapts the terza rima stanza, and James Joyce's Ulysses (1922), major influences on this Caribbean epic, which moves across centuries and geographies, from Saint Lucia to Africa to Ireland. Return to reference 1

Book One

Chapter III

III

"Mais qui ça qui rivait-ous, Philoctete?"²

"Moin

blessé."³

"But what is wrong wif you, Philoctete?"

"I am blest

wif this wound, Ma Kilman⁴ qui pas ka guérir pièce.

Which will never heal."

"Well, you must take it easy.

Go home and lie down, give the foot a lickle^o

5

rest."

Philoctete, his trouser-legs rolled, stares out to sea from the worn rumshop window. The itch in the sore tingles like the tendrils of the anemone, and the puffed blister of Portuguese man-o'-war.^o

10

He believed the swelling came from the chained ankles

of his grandfathers. Or else why was there no cure?
That the cross he carried was not only the anchor's

but that of his race, for a village black and poor as the pigs that rooted in its burning garbage, then were hooked on the anchors of the abattoir.^o

15

Ma Kilman was sewing. She looked up and saw his face

squinting from the white of the street. He was waiting to pass out on the table. This went on for days.

20 The ice turned to warm water near the self-hating gesture of clenching his head tight in both hands.
 She
 heard the boys in blue uniforms, going to school, screaming at his elbow: "Pheeloh! Pheelosophee!"
 A mummy embalmed in Vaseline and alcohol.
 In the Egyptian silence she muttered softly:

 25 "It have a flower somewhere, a medicine, and ways my grandmother would boil it. I used to watch ants climbing her white flower-pot. But, God, in which place?"

 Where was this root? What senna,^o what tepid tisanes,^o
 could clean the branched river of his corrupted
 blood,
 30 whose sap was a wounded cedar's? What did it mean,

 this name that felt like a fever? Well, one good heft of his garden-cutlass would slice the damned name clean
 from its rotting yam. He said, "Merci."^o Then he left.

Endnotes

- Note 2:
 Pronounced fee-lock-TET; a name shared with Philoctetes, who, in the Iliad and Sophocles' eponymous play, is abandoned on an island on the way to the Trojan War after receiving a snakebite. The wound never heals and continually torments Philoctetes, who moans uncontrollably. Later the gods decide that the war cannot be won without him, and the Greek soldiers have to go back to the island and beg him to return with them to battle.

Return to reference 2

- Note 3: French patois, punningly mistranslated below, since blessé actually means “wounded.” Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The owner of the No Pain Café, Ma Kilman serves in the poem as a sibyl (female prophet) and an obeah woman (one practicing a kind of West Indian sorcery). Return to reference 4

Notes

- °: little (West Indian English) Return to reference °
- °: jellyfish Return to reference °
- °: slaughterhouse Return to reference °
- °: medicinal herb Return to reference °
- °: medicinal beverages Return to reference °
- °: Thank you (French) Return to reference °

Book Six

Chapter XLIX

I

She bathed him in the brew of the root.¹ The basin was one of those cauldrons from the old sugar-mill, with its charred pillars, rock pasture, and one grazing horse, looking like helmets that have tumbled downhill

5 from an infantry charge. Children rang them with stones.

Wildflowers sprung in them when the dirt found a seam.

She had one in her back yard, close to the crotons,^o agape in its crusted, agonized O: the scream of centuries. She scraped its rusted scabs, she scoured

10 the mouth of the cauldron, then fed a crackling pyre with palms and banana-trash. In the scream she poured tin after kerosene tin, its base black from fire, of seawater and sulphur. Into this she then fed the bubbling root and leaves. She led Philoctete to the gurgling lava. Trembling, he entered 15 his bath like a boy. The lime leaves leeches to his wet knuckled spine like islands that cling to the basin of the rusted Caribbean. An icy sweat glazed his scalp, but he could feel the putrescent shin

20 drain in the seethe like sucked marrow, he felt it drag
the slime from his shame. She rammed him back to his place

as he tried climbing out with: "Not yet!" With a rag sogged in a basin of ice she rubbed his squeezed
face
the way boys enjoy their mother's ritual rage,

25 and as he surrendered to her, the foul flower on his shin whitened and puckered, the corolla closed its thorns like the sea-egg. What else did it cure?

II

The bow leapt back to the palm of the warrior.
The yoke of the wrong name lifted from his shoulders.
30 His muscles loosened like those of a brown river that was dammed with silt, and then silken its boulders with refreshing strength. His ribs thudded like a horse
cantering on a beach that bursts into full gallop

while a boy yanks at its rein with terrified "Whoas!"
35 The white foam unlocked his coffles, his ribbed shallop broke from its anchor, and the water, which he swirled

like a child, steered his brow into the right current, as calm as *In God We Troust*² to that other world,
and his flexed palm enclosed an oar with the identi-

40 ical closure of a mouth around its own name, the way a sea-anemone closes slyly
into a secrecy many mistake for shame.

Centuries weigh down the head of the swamp-lily,
its tribal burden arches the sea-almond's^o spine, 45 in barracoon³ back yards the soul-smoke still passes, but the wound has found her own cure. The soft days spin

the spittle of the spider in webbed glasses,
as she drenches the burning trash to its last flame,
and the embers steam and hiss to the schoolboys'
cries
50 when he'd weep in the window for their tribal shame.

A shame for the loss of words, and a language tired of accepting that loss, and then all accepted.
That was why the sea stank from the frothing urine of surf, and fish-guts reeked from the government shed,

55 and why God pissed on the village for months of rain.

But now, quite clearly the tears trickled down his face
like rainwater down a cracked carafe from Choiseul,⁴

as he stood like a boy in his bath with the first clay's innocent prick! So she threw Adam a towel.

Endnotes

- Note 1: Ma Kilman is bathing Philoctete to heal his wound.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Near the poem's beginning, the character Achille chisels this misspelled phrase into his canoe and then decides, "Leave it! Is God' spelling and mine" (1.1.2).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Barracks for housing convicts or enslaved people.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: A village in Saint Lucia.Return to reference 4

Notes

- °: tree or shrubReturn to reference °
- °: a treeReturn to reference °

TED HUGHES

1930–1998

Ted Hughes was born in Yorkshire, the son of one of seventeen men from a regiment of several hundred to return from the battle of Gallipoli in World War I, a tragedy that imprinted the imagination of the poet. He was educated at Mexborough Grammar School and Pembroke College, Cambridge, where in his last year he changed his course of study from English to archaeology and anthropology, pursuing his interest in the mythic structures that were later to inform his poetry. In 1956 he married the American-born poet Sylvia Plath, who committed suicide in 1963. As poets they explored the world of raw feeling and sensation, a world that Hughes's poems tended to view through the eye of the predator, Plath's through the eye of the victim.

In contrast to the rational lucidity and buttoned-up forms of Philip Larkin and other English poets of "the Movement," Hughes fashions a mythical consciousness in his poems, embodied in violent metaphors, blunt syntax, harsh alliterative clusters, bunched stresses, incantatory repetitions, insistent assonances, and a dark brooding tone. His early books, The Hawk in the Rain (1957) and Lupercal (1960), show the influence of D. H. Lawrence's Birds, Beasts and Flowers (1923), and Hughes's electrifying descriptions of jaguars, thrushes, and pike similarly generate metaphors that relate such creatures to forces underlying all animal and human experience. With Crow (1970) and Gaudete (1977) he abandoned at once the semblance of realism and the traditional metrical patterning of his early work, in the belief that “the very sound of metre calls up the ghosts of the past and it is difficult to sing one’s own tune against that choir. It is easier to speak a language that raises no ghosts.” Returning from the wilder shores of myth, Hughes showed in Moortown (1979), Remains of Elmet (1979), River (1983), and Flowers and Insects (1989) that he could render the natural world with a delicacy and tenderness as arresting as his earlier ferocity. In Tales from Ovid (1997) he brilliantly re-created—rather than translated—twenty-four passages from the Roman poet Ovid’s Metamorphoses. In the poems of his last volume, Birthday Letters (1998), all but two of which are addressed to Plath, Hughes broke a silence of thirty-five years to lift the curtain on the tragic drama of their marriage. That same year he was appointed a member of the Order of Merit, having served as poet laureate of the United Kingdom since 1984. His Collected Poems was published in 2003.

Wind

This house has been far out at sea all night,
The woods crashing through darkness, the booming hills,
Winds stampeding the fields under the window
Floundering black astride and blinding wet

5 Till day rose; then under an orange sky
The hills had new places, and wind wielded
Blade-light, luminous and emerald,
Flexing like the lens of a mad eye.

10 At noon I scaled along the house-side as far as
The coal-house door. I dared once to look up—Through the brunt wind that dented the balls of my eyes
The tent of the hills drummed and strained its guyrope,¹

15 The fields quivering, the skyline a grimace,
At any second to bang and vanish with a flap:
The wind flung a magpie away and a black-
Back gull bent like an iron bar slowly. The house

20 Rang like some fine green goblet in the note
That any second would shatter it. Now deep
In chairs, in front of the great fire, we grip
Our hearts and cannot entertain book, thought,

Or each other. We watch the fire blazing,
And feel the roots of the house move, but sit on,
Seeing the window tremble to come in,

Hearing the stones cry out under the horizons.

1957

Endnotes

- Note 1: Rope or cable that extends from a tent or pole and anchors it to the ground.Return to reference 1

Pike

Pike, three inches long, perfect
Pike in all parts, green tigering the gold.
Killers from the egg: the malevolent aged grin.
They dance on the surface among the flies.

5 Or move, stunned by their own grandeur,
Over a bed of emerald, silhouette
Of submarine delicacy and horror.
A hundred feet long in their world.

In ponds, under the heat-struck lily pads—
Gloom of their stillness:
10 Logged on last year's black leaves, watching upwards.
Or hung in an amber cavern of weeds

The jaws' hooked clamp and fangs
Not to be changed at this date;
A life subdued to its instrument;
15 The gills kneading quietly, and the pectorals.

Three we kept behind glass,
Jungled in weed: three inches, four,
And four and a half: fed fry to them—
20 Suddenly there were two. Finally one

With a sag belly and the grin it was born with.
And indeed they spare nobody.
Two, six pounds each, over two feet long,
High and dry and dead in the willow-herb—

One jammed past its gills down the other's gullet:

25 The outside eye stared: as a vice locks—
The same iron in this eye
Though its film shrank in death.

30 A pond I fished, fifty yards across,
Whose lilies and muscular tench¹
Had outlasted every visible stone
Of the monastery that planted them—

35 Stilled legendary depth:
It was as deep as England. It held
Pike too immense to stir, so immense and old
That past nightfall I dared not cast

40 But silently cast and fished
With the hair frozen on my head
For what might move, for what eye might move.
The still splashes on the dark pond,

 Owls hushing the floating woods
Frail on my ear against the dream
Darkness beneath night's darkness had freed,
That rose slowly towards me, watching.

1959, 1960

Endnotes

- Note 1: Variety of freshwater fish. Return to reference 1

Notes

- °: young fish Return to reference °

Out

1 The Dream Time

My father sat in his chair recovering
From the four-year mastication^o by gunfire and mud,
Body buffeted wordless, estranged by long soaking
In the colors of mutilation.

His outer perforations
5 Were valiantly healed, but he and the hearth-fire, its blood-flicker
On biscuit-bowl and piano and table leg,
Moved into strong and stronger possession
Of minute after minute, as the clock's tiny cog
Labored and on the thread of his listening 10 Dragged him bodily from under
The mortised^o four-year strata of dead Englishmen
He belonged with. He felt his limbs clearing With every slight, gingerish movement. While I, small and four,
Lay on the carpet as his luckless double,
His memory's buried, immovable anchor,
15 Among jawbones and blown-off boots, tree-stumps,
shell-cases and craters,
Under rain that goes on drumming its rods and thickening
Its kingdom, which the sun has abandoned, and where nobody
Can ever again move from shelter.

20 The dead man in his cave beginning to sweat;
The melting bronze visor of flesh
Of the mother in the baby-furnace—

Nobody believes, it
Could be nothing, all Undergo smiling at 25 The lulling of blood in
Their ears, their ears, their ears, their eyes
Are only drops of water and even the dead man suddenly
Sits up and sneezes—Atishoo!
Then the nurse wraps him up, smiling,
30 And, though faintly, the mother is smiling,
And it's just another baby.

As after being blasted to bits
The reassembled infantryman
Tentatively totters out, gazing around with the eyes
35 Of an exhausted clerk.

3 Remembrance Day¹

The poppy is a wound, the poppy is the mouth
Of the grave, maybe of the womb searching—

A canvas-beauty puppet on a wire
40 Today whoring everywhere. It is years since I wore one.

It is more years
The shrapnel that shattered my father's paybook

Gripped me, and all his dead
Gripped him to a time

45 He no more than they could outgrow, but, cast into one, like iron,
 Hung deeper than refreshing of ploughs

 In the woe-dark under my mother's eye—
 One anchor

 Holding my juvenile neck bowed to the dunkings of the Atlantic.

50 So goodbye to that bloody-minded flower.

 You dead bury your dead.
 Goodbye to the cenotaphs^o on my mother's breasts.

 Goodbye to all the remaindered charms of my father's survival.
 Let England close. Let the green sea-anemone close.

1967

Endnotes

- Note 1: Holiday (November 11) commemorating soldiers who lost their lives in battle. The practice of wearing red poppies in honor of lost soldiers recalls John McCrae's poem "In Flanders Fields" (1915), which depicts the flowers growing between the graves on a battlefield.Return to reference 1

Notes

- °: grinding; chewingReturn to reference °
- °: firmly fixedReturn to reference °
- °: empty tombsReturn to reference °

Theology

No, the serpent did not
Seduce Eve to the apple.
All that's simply
Corruption of the facts.

5 Adam ate the apple.
Eve ate Adam.
The serpent ate Eve.
This is the dark intestine.

10 The serpent, meanwhile,
Sleeps his meal off in Paradise—
Smiling to hear
God's querulous calling.

1967

Crow's Last Stand

Burning
 burning burning¹
 there was finally something
5 The sun could not burn, that it had rendered
 Everything down to—a final obstacle
 Against which it raged and charred

And rages and chars

Limpid^o among the glaring furnace clinkers^o
10 The pulsing blue tongues and the red and the yellow
 The green lickings of the conflagration

Limpid and black—

Crow's eye-pupil, in the tower of its scorched fort.
1970

Endnotes

- Note 1: See "Burning burning burning burning," line 308 of T. S. Eliot's Waste Land, where it is quoted from the Buddha's Fire Sermon. Return to reference 1

Notes

- °: clear Return to reference °
- °: coal remains Return to reference °

Crow Tyrannosaurus

Creation quaked voices—
It was a cortege¹
Of mourning and lament
Crow could hear and he looked around fearfully.

5 The swift's body fled past
Pulsating
With insects
And their anguish, all it had eaten.

10 The cat's body writhed
Gagging
A tunnel
Of incoming death-struggles, sorrow on sorrow.

And the dog was a bulging filterbag
Of all the deaths it had gulped for the flesh and the bones.
15 It could not digest their screeching finales.
Its shapeless cry was a blort² of all those voices.

Even man he was a walking
Abattoir³
Of innocents—
20 His brain incinerating their outcry.

Crow thought 'Alas
Alas ought I .
To stop eating
And try to become the light?'

25 But his eye saw a grub. And his head, trapsprung, stabbed.
And he listened
And he heard
Weeping

30 Grubs grubs He stabbed he stabbed
Weeping
Weeping .

Weeping he walked and stabbed

Thus came the eye's roundness
the ear's deafness.

1970

Endnotes

- Note 1: A procession, especially for a funeral.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: A neologism (made-up word) that accentuates shapelessness.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Slaughterhouse.Return to reference 3

ALICE MUNRO

(1931–2024)

Alice Munro was one of the leading short-story writers of her generation. Her fiction combines sparseness and realism—an uncompromising look at a panorama of faltering lives—with magisterial vision and expansiveness. Munro’s signature approach to the short story, in which she uses a deceptively simple style to produce complex, layered, and emotionally potent effects, has influenced many of her English-language contemporaries, both within and outside Canada. In addition to one novel, Lives of Girls and Women (1972), she published numerous collections of short stories, including Dance of the Happy Shades (1968), Something I’ve Been Meaning to Tell You (1974), The Moons of Jupiter (1982), Friend of My Youth (1990), The Love of a Good Woman (1998), Hateship, Friendship, Courtship, Loveship, Marriage (2001), Runaway (2004), Carried Away (2006), The View from Castle Rock (2006), Too Much Happiness (2009), and Dear Life (2012). She won the Man Booker International Prize in 2009 and the Nobel Prize in Literature in 2013.

Many of Munro’s stories are written in the first person, often from the perspective of women whose voices and experiences suggest the author’s history. She was born Alice Anne Laidlaw to a low-income family in Wingham, Ontario, and her parents’ struggles with a variety of rural occupations continued throughout her childhood. She began writing in her teens and in 1949 enrolled in the University of Western Ontario; she left the university two years later to marry and raise three daughters. She typically set her stories in small towns where poverty stamps itself on all facets of life, and where women confront—often in a spirit that combines resignation with stubborn resistance—the triple binds of economic, gender, and cultural confinement. Through a precise and particular emphasis on setting and character, Munro evokes rural Canadian life in the decades following midcentury, when modernity and the promise of the future are often crowded out by a hardening sense of the past.

In an early writing, Munro describes an approach to the outside world that effectively captures her sense of the mystery within the ordinary—the hallmark of her realist style: “It seems as if there are feelings that have to be translated into a next-door language, which might blow them up and burst them altogether; or else they have to be let alone. The truth about them is always suspected, never verified, the light catches but doesn’t define them. . . . Yet there is the feeling—I have the feeling—that at some level these things open; fragments, moments, suggestions, open, full of power.” This aura of openness and suggestion, conveyed through “next-door language,” gives Munro’s stories their haunting aspect, their quality of movement, rippling and widening from the small-scale to the magnificent. The story included here, “Walker Brothers Cowboy,” exemplifies her ability to imbue “fragments, moments, suggestions” with fullness and power, as we view through a young girl’s eyes both the pathos and the degradation of men and women whose lives have fallen into a potentially deadening cycle of promise and decay.

Walker Brothers Cowboy¹

After supper my father says, "Want to go down and see if the Lake's still there?" We leave my mother sewing under the dining-room light, making clothes for me against² the opening of school. She has ripped up for this purpose an old suit and an old plaid wool dress of hers, and she has to cut and match very cleverly and also make me stand and turn for endless fittings, sweaty, itching from the hot wool, ungrateful. We leave my brother in bed in the little screened porch at the end of the front veranda, and sometimes he kneels on his bed and presses his face against the screen and calls mournfully, "Bring me an ice-cream cone!" but I call back, "You will be asleep," and do not even turn my head.

Then my father and I walk gradually down a long, shabby sort of street, with Silverwoods Ice Cream signs standing on the sidewalk, outside tiny, lighted stores. This is in Tuppertown, an old town on Lake Huron,³ an old grain port. The street is shaded, in some places, by maple trees whose roots have cracked and heaved the sidewalk and spread out like crocodiles into the bare yards. People are sitting out, men in shirtsleeves and undershirts and women in aprons—not people we know but if anybody looks ready to nod and say, "Warm night," my father will nod too and say something the same. Children are still playing. I don't know them either because my mother keeps my brother and me in our own yard, saying he is too young to leave it and I have to mind him. I am not so sad to watch their evening games because the games themselves are ragged, dissolving. Children, of their own will, draw apart, separate into islands of two or one under the heavy trees, occupying themselves in such solitary ways as I do all day, planting pebbles in the dirt or writing in it with a stick.

Presently we leave these yards and houses behind; we pass a factory with boarded-up windows, a lumberyard whose high wooden gates are locked for the night. Then the town falls away in a defeated jumble of sheds and small junkyards, the sidewalk gives up and we are walking on a sandy path with burdocks, plantains, humble nameless weeds all around. We enter a vacant lot, a kind of park really, for it is kept clear of junk and there is one bench with a slat missing on the back, a place to sit and look at the water. Which is generally gray in the evening, under a lightly overcast sky, no sunsets, the horizon dim. A very quiet, washing noise on the stones of the beach. Further along, towards the main part of town, there is a stretch of sand, a water slide, floats bobbing around the safe swimming area, a lifeguard's rickety throne. Also a long dark-green building, like a roofed veranda, called the Pavilion, full of farmers and their wives, in stiff good clothes, on Sundays. That is the part of the town we used to know when we lived at Dungannon and came here three or four times a summer, to the Lake. That, and the docks where we would go and look at the grain boats, ancient, rusty, wallowing, making us wonder how they got past the breakwater let alone to Fort William.

Tramps hang around the docks and occasionally on these evenings wander up the dwindling beach and climb the shifting, precarious path boys have made, hanging on to dry bushes, and say something to my father which, being frightened of tramps, I am too alarmed to catch. My father says he is a bit hard up himself. "I'll roll you a cigarette if it's any use to you," he says, and he shakes tobacco out carefully on one of the thin butterfly papers, flicks it with his tongue, seals it and hands it to the tramp, who takes it and walks away. My father also rolls and lights and smokes one cigarette of his own.

He tells me how the Great Lakes came to be. All where Lake Huron is now, he says, used to be flat land, a wide flat plain. Then came the ice, creeping down from the North, pushing deep into the low places. Like that—and he shows me his hand with his spread fingers pressing the rock-hard ground where we are sitting. His fingers make hardly any impression at all and he says, "Well, the old ice cap had a lot more power behind it than this hand has." And then the ice went back, shrank back towards the North Pole where it came from, and left its fingers of ice in the deep places it had gouged, and ice turned to lakes and there they were today. They were new, as time went. I try to see that plain before me, dinosaurs walking on it, but I am not able even to imagine the shore of the Lake when the Indians were there, before Tuppertown. The tiny share we have of time appalls me, though my father seems to regard it with tranquillity. Even my father, who sometimes seems to me to have been at home in the world as long as it has lasted, has really lived on this earth only a little longer than I have, in terms of all the time there has been to live in. He has not known a time, any more than I, when automobiles and electric lights did not at least exist. He was not alive when this century started. I will be barely alive—old, old—when it ends. I do not like to think of it. I wish the Lake to be always just a lake, with the safe-swimming floats marking it, and the breakwater and the lights of Tuppertown.

My father has a job, selling for Walker Brothers. This is a firm that sells almost entirely in the country, the back country. Sunshine, Boylesbridge, Turnaround—that is all his territory. Not Dungannon where we used to live, Dungannon is too near town and my mother is grateful for that. He sells cough medicine, iron tonic, corn plasters, laxatives, pills for female disorders, mouthwash, shampoo, liniment, salves, lemon and orange and raspberry concentrate for making refreshing drinks, vanilla, food coloring, black and green tea, ginger, cloves, and other spices, rat poison. He has a song about it, with these two lines:

And have all liniments and oils,
For everything from corns to boils. . . .

Not a very funny song, in my mother's opinion. A peddler's song, and that is what he is, a peddler knocking at backwoods kitchens. Up until last winter we had our own business, a fox farm. My father raised silver foxes and sold their pelts to the people who make them into capes and coats and muffs. Prices fell, my father hung on hoping they would get better next year, and they fell again, and he hung on one more year and one more and finally it was not possible to hang on anymore, we owed everything to the feed company. I have heard my mother explain this, several times, to Mrs. Oliphant, who is the only neighbor she talks to. (Mrs. Oliphant also has come down in the world, being a schoolteacher who married the janitor.) We poured all we had into it, my mother says, and we came out with nothing. Many people could say the same thing, these days, but my mother has no time for the national calamity, only ours. Fate has flung us onto a street of poor people (it does not matter that we were poor before; that was a different sort of poverty), and the only way to take this, as she sees it, is with dignity, with bitterness, with no reconciliation. No bathroom with a claw-footed tub and a flush toilet is going to comfort her, nor water on tap and sidewalks past the house and milk in bottles, not even the two movie theatres and the Venus Restaurant and Woolworths so marvellous it has live birds singing in its fan-cooled corners and fish as tiny as fingernails, as bright as moons, swimming in its green tanks. My mother does not care.

In the afternoons she often walks to Simon's Grocery and takes me with her to help carry things. She wears a good dress, navy blue with little flowers, sheer, worn over a navy-blue slip. Also a summer hat of white straw, pushed down on the side of the head, and white shoes I have just whitened on a newspaper on the back steps. I have my hair freshly done in long damp curls which the dry air will fortunately soon loosen, a stiff large hair ribbon on top of my head. This is entirely different from going out after supper with my father. We have not walked past two houses before I feel we have become objects of universal ridicule. Even the dirty words chalked on the sidewalk are laughing at us. My mother does not seem to notice. She walks serenely like a lady shopping, like a lady shopping, past the housewives in loose beltless dresses torn under the arms. With me her creation, wretched curls and flaunting hair bow, scrubbed knees and white socks—all I do not want to be. I loathe even my name when she says it in public, in a voice so high, proud, and ringing, deliberately different from the voice of any other mother on the street.

My mother will sometimes carry home, for a treat, a brick of ice cream—pale Neapolitan; and because we have no refrigerator in our house we wake my brother and eat it at once in the dining room, always darkened by the wall of the house next door. I spoon it up tenderly, leaving the chocolate till last, hoping to have some still to eat when my brother's dish is empty. My mother tries then to imitate the conversations we used to have at Dungannon, going back to our earliest, most leisurely days before my brother was born, when she would give me a little tea and a lot of milk in a cup like hers and we would sit out on the step facing the pump, the lilac tree, the fox pens beyond. She is not able to keep from mentioning those days. "Do you remember when we put you in your sled and Major pulled you?" (Major our dog, that we had to leave with neighbors when we moved.) "Do you remember your sandbox outside the kitchen window?" I pretend to remember far less than I do, wary of being trapped into sympathy or any unwanted emotion.

My mother has headaches. She often has to lie down. She lies on my brother's narrow bed in the little screened porch, shaded by heavy branches. "I look up at that tree and I think I am at home," she says.

"What you need," my father tells her, "is some fresh air and a drive in the country." He means for her to go with him, on his Walker Brothers route.

That is not my mother's idea of a drive in the country.

"Can I come?"

"Your mother might want you for trying on clothes."

"I'm beyond sewing this afternoon," my mother says.

"I'll take her then. Take both of them, give you a rest."

What is there about us that people need to be given a rest from? Never mind. I am glad enough to find my brother and make him go to the toilet and get us both into the car, our knees unscrubbed, my hair unringleted. My father brings from the house his two heavy brown suitcases, full of bottles, and sets them on the back seat. He wears a white shirt, brilliant in the sunlight, a tie, light trousers belonging to his summer suit (his other suit is black, for funerals, and belonged to my uncle before he died), and a creamy straw hat. His salesman's outfit, with pencils clipped in the shirt pocket. He goes back once again, probably to say goodbye to my mother, to ask her if she is sure she doesn't want to come, and hear her say, "No. No thanks, I'm better just to lie here with my eyes closed." Then we are backing out of the driveway with the rising hope of adventure, just the little hope that takes you over the bump into the street, the hot air starting to move, turning into a breeze, the houses growing less and less familiar as we follow the shortcut my father knows, the quick way out of town. Yet what is there waiting for us all afternoon but hot hours in stricken farmyards, perhaps a stop at a country store and three ice-cream cones or bottles of pop, and my father singing? The one he made up about himself has a title—"The Walker Brothers Cowboy"—and it starts out like this:

Old Ned Fields, he now is dead,
So I am ridin' the route instead. . . .

Who is Ned Fields? The man he has replaced, surely, and if so he really is dead; yet my father's voice is mournful-jolly, making his death some kind of nonsense, a comic calamity. "Wisht I was back on the Rio Grande,⁴ plungin' through the dusky sand." My father sings most of the time while driving the car. Even now, heading out of town, crossing the bridge and taking the sharp turn onto the highway, he is humming something, mumbling a bit of a song to himself, just tuning up, really, getting ready to improvise, for out along the highway we pass the Baptist Camp, the Vacation Bible Camp, and he lets loose:

Where are the Baptists, where are the Baptists, where are all the Baptists today?
They're down in the water, in Lake Huron water, with their sins all a-gittin' washed away.

My brother takes this for straight truth and gets up on his knees trying to see down to the Lake. "I don't see any Baptists," he says accusingly. "Neither do I, son," says my father. "I told you, they're down in the Lake."

No roads paved when we left the highway. We have to roll up the windows because of dust. The land is flat, scorched, empty. Bush lots at the back of the farms hold shade, black pine-shade like pools nobody can ever get to. We bump up a long lane and at the end of it what could look more unwelcoming, more deserted than the tall unpainted farmhouse with grass growing uncut right up to the front door, green blinds down, and a door upstairs opening on nothing but air? Many houses have this door, and I have never yet been able to find out why. I ask my father and he says they are for walking in your sleep. What? Well, if you happen to be walking in your sleep and you want to step outside. I am offended, seeing too late that he is joking, as usual, but my brother says sturdily, "If they did that they would break their necks."

The 1930s. How much this kind of farmhouse, this kind of afternoon seem to me to belong to that one decade in time, just as my father's hat does, his bright flared tie, our car with its wide running board (an Essex, and long past its prime). Cars somewhat like it, many older, none dustier, sit in the farmyards. Some are past running and have their doors pulled off, their seats removed for use on porches. No living things to be seen, chickens or cattle. Except dogs. There are dogs lying in any kind of shade they can find, dreaming, their lean sides rising and sinking rapidly. They get up when my father opens the car door, he has to speak to them. "Nice boy, there's a boy, nice old boy." They quiet down, go back to their shade. He should know how to quiet animals, he has held desperate foxes with tongs around their necks. One gentling voice for the dogs and another, rousing, cheerful, for calling at doors. "Hello there, missus, it's the Walker Brothers man and what are you out of today?" A door opens, he disappears. Forbidden to follow, forbidden even to leave the car, we can just wait and wonder what he says. Sometimes trying to make my mother laugh, he pretends to be himself in a farm kitchen, spreading out his sample case. "Now then, missus, are you troubled with parasitic life? Your children's scalps, I mean. All those crawly little things we're too polite to mention that show up on the heads of the best of families? Soap alone is useless, kerosene is not too nice a perfume, but I have here—" Or else, "Believe me, sitting and driving all day the way I do I know the value of these fine pills. Natural relief. A problem common to old folks too, once their days of activity are over—How about you, Grandma?" He would wave the imaginary box of pills under my mother's nose and she would laugh finally, unwillingly. "He doesn't say that really, does he?" I said, and she said no of course not, he was too much of a gentleman.

One yard after another, then, the old cars, the pumps, dogs, views of gray barns and falling-down sheds and unturning windmills. The men, if they are working in the fields, are not in any fields that we can see. The children are far away, following dry creek beds or looking for blackberries, or else they are hidden in the house, spying at us through cracks in the blinds. The car seat has grown slick with our sweat. I dare my brother to sound the horn, wanting to do it myself but not wanting to get the blame. He knows better. We play I Spy, but it is hard to find many colors. Gray for the barns and sheds and toilets and houses, brown for the yard and fields, black or brown for the dogs. The rusting cars show rainbow patches, in which I strain to pick out purple or green; likewise I peer at doors for shreds of old peeling paint, maroon or yellow. We can't play with letters, which would be better, because my brother is too young to spell. The game disintegrates anyway. He claims my colors are not fair, and wants extra turns.

In one house no door opens, though the car is in the yard. My father knocks and whistles, calls, "Hullo there! Walker Brothers man!" but there is not a stir of reply anywhere. This house has no porch, just a bare, slanting slab of cement on which my father stands. He turns around, searching the barnyard, the barn whose mow must be empty because you can see the sky through it, and finally he bends to pick up his suitcases. Just then a window is opened upstairs, a white pot appears on the sill, is tilted over and its contents splash down the outside wall. The window is not directly above my father's head, so only a stray splash would catch him. He picks up his suitcases with no particular hurry and walks, no longer whistling, to the car. "Do you know what that was?" I say to my brother. "Pee." He laughs and laughs.

My father rolls and lights a cigarette before he starts the car. The window has been slammed down, the blind drawn, we never did see a hand or face. "Pee, pee," sings my brother ecstatically. "Somebody dumped down pee!" "Just don't tell your mother that," my father says. "She isn't liable to see the joke." "Is it in your song?" my brother wants to know. My father says no but he will see what he can do to work it in.

I notice in a little while that we are not turning in any more lanes, though it does not seem to me that we are headed home. "Is this the way to Sunshine?" I ask my father, and he answers, "No, ma'am, it's not." "Are we still in your territory?" He shakes his head. "We're going fast," my brother says approvingly, and in fact we are bouncing along through dry puddle-holes so that all the bottles in the suitcases clink together and gurgle promisingly.

Another lane, a house, also unpainted, dried to silver in the sun.

"I thought we were out of your territory."

"We are."

"Then what are we going in here for?"

"You'll see."

In front of the house a short, sturdy woman is picking up washing, which had been spread on the grass to bleach and dry. When the car stops she stares at it hard for a moment, bends to pick up a couple more towels to add to the bundle under her arm, comes across to us and says in a flat voice, neither welcoming nor unfriendly, "Have you lost your way?"

My father takes his time getting out of the car. "I don't think so," he says. "I'm the Walker Brothers man."

"George Golley is our Walker Brothers man," the woman says, "and he was out here no more than a week ago. Oh, my Lord God," she says harshly, "it's you."

"It was, the last time I looked in the mirror," my father says.

The woman gathers all the towels in front of her and holds on to them tightly, pushing them against her stomach as if it hurt. "Of all the people I never thought to see. And telling me you were the Walker Brothers man."

"I'm sorry if you were looking forward to George Golley," my father says humbly.

"And look at me, I was prepared to clean the henhouse. You'll think that's just an excuse but it's true. I don't go round looking like this every day." She is wearing a farmer's straw hat, through which pricks of sunlight penetrate and float on her face, a loose, dirty print smock, and canvas shoes. "Who are those in the car, Ben? They're not yours?"

"Well, I hope and believe they are," my father says, and tells our names and ages. "Come on, you can get out. This is Nora, Miss Cronin. Nora, you better tell me, is it still Miss, or have you got a husband hiding in the woodshed?"

"If I had a husband that's not where I'd keep him, Ben," she says, and they both laugh, her laugh abrupt and somewhat angry. "You'll think I got no manners, as well as being dressed like a tramp," she says. "Come on in out of the sun. It's cool in the house."

We go across the yard ("Excuse me taking you in this way but I don't think the front door has been opened since Papa's funeral, I'm afraid the hinges might drop off"), up the porch steps, into the kitchen, which really is cool, high-ceilinged, the blinds of course down, a simple, clean, threadbare room with waxed worn linoleum, potted geraniums, drinking-pail and dipper, a round table with scrubbed oilcloth. In spite of the cleanness, the wiped and swept surfaces, there is a faint sour smell—maybe of the dishrag or the tin dipper or the oilcloth, or the old lady, because there is one, sitting in an easy chair under the clock shelf. She turns her head slightly in our direction and says, "Nora? Is that company?"

"Blind," says Nora in a quick explaining voice to my father. Then, "You won't guess who it is, Momma. Hear his voice."

My father goes to the front of her chair and bends and says hopefully, "Afternoon, Mrs. Cronin."

"Ben Jordan," says the old lady with no surprise. "You haven't been to see us in the longest time. Have you been out of the country?"

My father and Nora look at each other.

"He's married, Momma," says Nora cheerfully and aggressively. "Married and got two children and here they are." She pulls us forward, makes each of us touch the old lady's dry, cool hand while she says our names in turn. Blind! This is the first blind person I have ever seen close up. Her eyes are closed, the eyelids sunk away down, showing no shape of the eyeball, just hollows. From one hollow comes a drop of silver liquid, a medicine, or a miraculous tear.

"Let me get into a decent dress," Nora says. "Talk to Momma. It's a treat for her. We hardly ever see company, do we, Momma?"

"Not many makes it out this road," says the old lady placidly. "And the ones that used to be around here, our old neighbors, some of them have pulled out."

"True everywhere," my father says.

"Where's your wife then?"

"Home. She's not too fond of the hot weather, makes her feel poorly."

"Well." This is a habit of country people, old people, to say "well," meaning, "Is that so?" with a little extra politeness and concern.

Nora's dress, when she appears again—stepping heavily on Cuban heels down the stairs in the hall—is flowered more lavishly than anything my mother owns, green and yellow on brown, some sort of floating sheer crêpe, leaving her arms bare. Her arms are heavy, and every bit of her skin you can see is covered with little dark freckles like measles. Her hair is short, black, coarse and curly, her teeth very white and strong. "It's the first time I knew there was such a thing as green poppies," my father says, looking at her dress.

"You would be surprised all the things you never knew," says Nora, sending a smell of cologne far and wide when she moves and displaying a change of voice to go with the dress, something more sociable and youthful. "They're not poppies anyway, they're just flowers. You go and pump me some good cold water and I'll make these children a drink." She gets down from the cupboard a bottle of Walker Brothers Orange syrup.

"You telling me you were the Walker Brothers man!"

"It's the truth, Nora. You go and look at my sample cases in the car if you don't believe me. I got the territory directly south of here."

"Walker Brothers? Is that a fact? You selling for Walker Brothers?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"We always heard you were raising foxes over Dungannon way."

"That's what I was doing, but I kind of run out of luck in that business."

"So where're you living? How long've you been out selling?"

"We moved into Tuppertown. I been at it, oh, two, three months. It keeps the wolf from the door. Keeps him as far away as the back fence."

Nora laughs. "Well, I guess you count yourself lucky to have the work. Isabel's husband in Brantford, he was out of work the longest time. I thought if he didn't find something soon I was going to have them all land in here to feed, and I tell you I was hardly looking forward to it. It's all I can manage with me and Momma."

"Isabel married," my father says. "Muriel married too?"

"No, she's teaching school out West. She hasn't been home for five years. I guess she finds something better to do with her holidays. I would if I was her." She gets some snapshots out of the table drawer and starts showing him. "That's Isabel's oldest boy, starting school. That's the baby sitting in her carriage. Isabel and her husband. Muriel. That's her roommate with her. That's a fellow she used to go around with, and his car. He was working in a bank out there. That's her school, it has eight rooms. She teaches Grade Five." My father shakes his head. "I can't think of her any way but when she was going to school, so shy I used to pick her up on the road—

I'd be on my way to see you—and she would not say one word, not even to agree it was a nice day."

"She's got over that."

"Who are you talking about?" says the old lady.

"Muriel. I said she's got over being shy."

"She was here last summer."

"No, Momma, that was Isabel. Isabel and her family were here last summer. Muriel's out West."

"I meant Isabel."

Shortly after this the old lady falls asleep, her head on the side, her mouth open. "Excuse her manners," Nora says. "It's old age." She fixes an afghan over her mother and says we can all go into the front room where our talking won't disturb her.

"You two," my father says. "Do you want to go outside and amuse yourselves?"

Amuse ourselves how? Anyway, I want to stay. The front room is more interesting than the kitchen, though barer. There is a gramophone and a pump organ and a picture on the wall of Mary, Jesus' mother—I know that much—in shades of bright blue and pink with a spiked band of light around her head. I know that such pictures are found only in the homes of Roman Catholics and so Nora must be one. We have never known any Roman Catholics at all well, never well enough to visit in their houses. I think of what my grandmother and my Aunt Tena, over in Dungannon, used to always say to indicate that somebody was a Catholic. So-and-so digs with the wrong foot, they would say. She digs with the wrong foot. That was what they would say about Nora.⁵

Nora takes a bottle, half full, out of the top of the organ and pours some of what is in it into the two glasses that she and my father have emptied of the orange drink.

"Keep it in case of sickness?" my father says.

"Not on your life," says Nora. "I'm never sick. I just keep it because I keep it. One bottle does me a fair time, though, because I don't care for drinking alone. Here's luck!" She and my father drink and I know what it is. Whisky. One of the things my mother has told me in our talks together is that my father never drinks whisky. But I see he does. He drinks whisky and he talks of people whose names I have never heard before. But after a while he turns to a familiar incident. He tells about the chamberpot that was emptied out the window. "Picture me there," he says, "hollering my heartiest. Oh, lady, it's your Walker Brothers man, anybody home?" He does himself hollering, grinning absurdly, waiting, looking up in pleased expectation, and then—oh, ducking, covering his head with his arms, looking as if he begged for mercy (when he never did anything like that, I was watching), and Nora laughs, almost as hard as my brother did at the time.

"That isn't true! That's not a word true!"

"Oh, indeed it is, ma'am. We have our heroes in the ranks of Walker Brothers. I'm glad you think it's funny," he says sombrely.

I ask him shyly, "Sing the song."

"What song? Have you turned into a singer on top of everything else?"

Embarrassed, my father says, "Oh, just this song I made up while I was driving around, it gives me something to do, making up rhymes."

But after some urging he does sing it, looking at Nora with a droll, apologetic expression, and she laughs so much that in places he has to stop and wait for her to get over laughing so he can go on, because she makes him laugh too. Then he does various parts of his salesman's spiel. Nora when she laughs squeezes her large bosom under her folded arms. "You're crazy," she says. "That's all you are." She sees my brother peering into the gramophone and she jumps up and goes over to him. "Here's us sitting enjoying ourselves and not giving you a thought, isn't it terrible?" she says. "You want me to put a record on, don't you? You want to hear a nice record? Can you dance? I bet your sister can, can't she?"

I say no. "A big girl like you and so good-looking and can't dance!" says Nora. "It's high time you learned. I bet you'd make a lovely dancer. Here, I'm going to put on a piece I used to dance to and even your daddy did, in his dancing days. You didn't know your daddy was a dancer, did you? Well, he is a talented man, your daddy!".⁶

Round and round the linoleum, me proud, intent, Nora laughing and moving with great buoyancy, wrapping me in her strange gaiety, her smell of whisky, cologne, and sweat. Under the arms her dress is damp, and little drops form along her upper lip, hang in the soft black hairs at the corners of her mouth. She whirls me around in front of my father—causing me to stumble, for I am by no means so swift a pupil as she pretends—and lets me go, breathless.

"Dance with me, Ben."

"I'm the world's worst dancer, Nora, and you know it."

"I certainly never thought so."

"You would now."

She stands in front of him, arms hanging loose and hopeful, her breasts, which a moment ago embarrassed me with their warmth and bulk, rising and falling under her loose flowered dress, her face shining with the exercise, and delight.

"Ben."

My father drops his head and says quietly, "Not me, Nora."

So she can only go and take the record off. "I can drink alone but I can't dance alone," she says. "Unless I am a whole lot crazier than I think I am."

"Nora," says my father, smiling. "You're not crazy."

"Stay for supper."

"Oh, no. We couldn't put you to the trouble."

"It's no trouble. I'd be glad of it."

"And their mother would worry. She'd think I'd turned us over in a ditch."

"Oh, well. Yes."

"We've taken a lot of your time now."

"Time," says Nora bitterly. "Will you come by ever again?"

"I will if I can," says my father.

"Bring the children. Bring your wife."

"Yes, I will," says my father. "I will if I can."

When she follows us to the car he says, "You come to see us too, Nora. We're right on Grove Street, left-hand side going in, that's north, and two doors this side—east—of Baker Street."

Nora does not repeat these directions. She stands close to the car in her soft, brilliant dress. She touches the fender, making an unintelligible mark in the dust there.

On the way home my father does not buy any ice cream or pop, but he does go into a country store and get a package of licorice, which he shares with us. She digs with the wrong foot, I think, and the words seem sad to me as never before, dark, perverse. My father does not say anything to me about not mentioning things at home, but I know, just from the thoughtfulness, the pause when he passes the licorice, that there are things not to be mentioned. The whisky, maybe the dancing. No worry about my brother, he does not notice enough. At most he might remember the blind lady, the picture of Mary.

"Sing," my brother commands my father, but my father says gravely, "I don't know, I seem to be fresh out of songs. You watch the road and let me know if you see any rabbits."

So my father drives and my brother watches the road for rabbits and I feel my father's life flowing back from our car in the last of the afternoon, darkening and turning strange, like a landscape that has an enchantment on it, making it kindly, ordinary and familiar while you are looking at it, but changing it, once your back is turned, into something you will never know, with all kinds of weathers, and distances you cannot imagine.

When we get closer to Tuppertown the sky becomes gently overcast, as always, nearly always, on summer evenings by the Lake.

1968

Endnotes

- Note 1: Refers to a traveling salesman for a Canadian company, which is probably modeled on the American direct marketer Watkins Products.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: In time for.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: One of the Great Lakes, bordering on Ontario and eastern Michigan. Place-names are both real and invented.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: River that begins in Colorado and flows south, becoming the border between Mexico and the United States.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Relations between Protestants and Catholics within the Irish population in southern Ontario were often strained.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: From the popular song “Whispering,” whose original 1920 release was one of the first records to sell a million copies.Return to reference 6

GEOFFREY HILL

1932–2016

Geoffrey Hill, born in the Worcestershire village of Bromsgrove, educated at its high school and at Keble College, Oxford, was a professor of English at Leeds University, a lecturer at Cambridge, and a professor at Boston University. In 2010 he was elected Professor of Poetry at Oxford. As a boy he was drawn to the Metaphysical poets' "fusion of intellectual strength with simple, sensuous, and passionate immediacy," and his own poems offer something of the same fusion. What he said of "Annunciations: 2" might have been said of many of his poems: "But I want the poem to have this dubious end; because I feel dubious; and the whole business is dubious." He was a religious poet but a poet of religious doubt—a skeptic confronting the extremes of human experience, "man's inhumanity to man," on the cross and in the concentration camps—or delight in the abundance of the natural world: pain and pleasure alike rendered with a Keatsian richness and specificity, a modernist allusiveness and syntactic contortion. Distinctively resonant as is the voice of Hill's poems, they are consistently impersonal. Even when the poet's earlier self is conflated with that of historical figures, subjectivity is dissolved in the objective projection of a historical imagination of great range and power. The Holocaust poem "September Song" elegizes a victim of the Nazi concentration camps born the day after the poet was born, implicitly contrasting their divergent fates. Hill was at once one of the most ambitious, most difficult, and most rewarding contemporary poets writing in English.

In Memory of Jane Fraser

When snow like sheep lay in the fold[°]
And winds went begging at each door,
And the far hills were blue with cold,
And a cold shroud lay on the moor,
5 She kept the siege. And every day
We watched her brooding over death
Like a strong bird above its prey.
The room filled with the kettle's breath.
Damp curtains glued against the pane
10 Sealed time away. Her body froze
As if to freeze us all, and chain
Creation to a stunned repose.
She died before the world could stir.
In March the ice unloosed the brook
15 And water ruffled the sun's hair.
Dead cones upon the alder shook.

1959

Notes

- °: shelter for sheepReturn to reference °

Requiem for the Plantagenet Kings¹

For whom the possessed sea littered, on both shores,

Ruinous arms; being fired, and for good,
To sound the constitution of just wars,
Men, in their eloquent fashion, understood.

5 Relieved of soul, the dropping-back of dust,
Their usage, pride, admitted within doors;
At home, under caved chantries,² set in trust,
With well-dressed alabaster and proved spurs
They lie; they lie; secure in the decay
10 Of blood, blood-marks, crowns hacked and coveted,
Before the scouring fires of trial-day
Alight on men; before sleeked groin, gored head,
Budge through the clay and gravel, and the sea
Across daubed rock evacuates its dead.

1959

Endnotes

- Note 1: Dynastic succession of 12th- to 15th-century English kings, beginning with Henry II, who was followed in turn by Richard I, John, Henry III, Edward I, Edward II, Edward III, and Richard II. They ruled not only over England but also over much of France ("on both shores"). The last Plantagenet king was Richard III, who was killed at the Battle of Bosworth on Aug. 22, 1485. Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Chapels endowed for priests to sing Masses for the souls of those who founded them. Many chantries have cavelike ceilings of vaulted stone and contain effigies—sometimes in alabaster—of their founders.Return to reference 2

September Song¹

born 19.6.32—deported 24.9.42

Undesirable you may have been, untouchable
you were not. Not forgotten or passed over at the proper time.

5 As estimated, you died. Things marched, sufficient, to that end.
Just so much Zyklon and leather, patented terror, so many routine cries.

10 (I have made an elegy for myself it is true)²

September fattens on vines. Roses flake from the wall. The smoke of harmless fires drifts to my eyes.

This is plenty. This is more than enough.

1968

Endnotes

- Note 1:
The poem is about the gassing of Jews in German extermination camps; Zyklon-B was the gas used. Hill's fellow poet Jon Silkin has drawn attention to the kind of wit involved in the subtitle, "where the natural event of birth is placed, simply, beside the human and murderous 'deported' as if the latter were of the same order and inevitability for the victim"; he discusses, too, "the irony of conjoined meanings between 'undesirable' (touching on both sexual desire and racism) and 'untouchable,' which exploits a similar ambiguity but reverses the emphases" and is "unusually dense and simple."

Return to reference 1

- Note 2: As the critic Christopher Ricks pointed out, Hill was born on 18.6.32 (June 18, 1932). Return to reference 2

Broken Hierarchies

When to depict rain—heavy rain—it stands in dense verticals diagonally lashed, chalk-white yet with the chalk translucent;

5 the roadway sprouts ten thousand flowerets, storm-paddies instantly reaped, replenished,
and again cut down:

the holding burden of a wisteria
drape amid drape, the sodden
copia^o of all things flashing and drying:

10 first here after the storm these butterflies fixed on each jinking^o run, probing, priming, then leaping back,

a babble of silent tongues;
and the flint church also choiring
into dazzle

15

. . .

like Appalachian music, those aureate^o stark sounds plucked or bowed, a wild patience replete with loss,

the twankled dulcimer,
20 scrawny rich fiddle gnawing;

a man's low voice that looms out of the drone:
the humming bird that is not of these climes; and the great 25 wanderers like the albatross;

the ocean, ranging-in, laying itself down on our alien shore.

2006

Notes

- °: abundanceReturn to reference °
- °: zigzaggingReturn to reference °
- °: goldenReturn to reference °

V. S. NAIPAUL

1932–2018

Widely regarded in his lifetime as the most accomplished novelist from the English-speaking Caribbean, Vidiadhar Surajprasad Naipaul was born to a family of Indian descent in Trinidad and educated at Queen's Royal College, Port of Spain, and at University College, Oxford. After settling in England, he became editor of the Caribbean Voices program for the British Broadcasting Corporation (1954–56) and fiction reviewer for the New Statesman (1957–61). The recipient of many prestigious prizes and awards, he won the Booker Prize in 1971 for In a Free State, was knighted in 1990, and received the Nobel Prize in Literature in 2001.

Naipaul's first three books, The Mystic Masseur (1957), The Suffrage of Elvira (1958), and Miguel Street (short stories, 1959), are comedies of manners, set in a Trinidad viewed with an exile's acute and ironic eye. These early works present a starkly satiric vision, but a more modulated tone appears in Naipaul's first major novel, partly based on his father's experience, A House for Mr. Biswas (1961). Following the declining fortunes of its gentle hero from cradle to grave, this tragicomic novel traces the disintegration of a traditional way of life on something approaching an epic scale. Subsequent novels, including The Mimic Men (1967), Guerrillas (1973), The Enigma of Arrival (1987), and Half a Life (2001), continued to explore the desperate and destructive conditions facing individuals as they struggle with cultures in complicated states of transition and development. Because of his often bitter, even withering critiques of so-called Third World states and societies, Naipaul was controversial among readers of postcolonial fiction.

Naipaul also produced essays on a variety of themes, including a travel narrative about the southern United States, A Turn in the South (1988), another about African belief, The Masque of Africa (2010), and two studies—what he called “cultural explorations”—of Islam: Among the Believers: An Islamic Journey (1981) and Beyond Belief: Islamic Excursions among the Converted Peoples (1998). Like his novels, these writings range widely, carrying readers to Africa, England, the Indian subcontinent, the Middle East, South and North America. With the years, Naipaul’s vision of the human condition grew darker and more pessimistic, as he brilliantly laid bare the insensitivities and disconnections that bedevil relations among individuals, races, and nations.

Such tremendous disjunctions and dire consequences are revealed in “One Out of Many,” the second of three stories that, with two linking diary entries, make up In a Free State, a bleakly ironic yet emotionally engaging study of what it means to be enslaved and what it means to be free. The story—its title playing on the American motto “E pluribus unum” (“from many, one”)—follows the fortunes of Santosh, an Indian immigrant to the United States, whose sense of self changes dramatically in relation to various liberating and imprisoning spaces and various ethnic, cultural, and sexual others. In contrast to narratives of immigration as empowerment, the story represents the promise of more freedom, more status, more economic opportunity in America as coming at the price of an intensified isolation and alienation. As in the literary journeys of other innocents abroad, Santosh’s immersion in America satirically reveals as much about the culture he assumes as about the culture he leaves behind.

One Out of Many

I am now an American citizen and I live in Washington, capital of the world. Many people, both here and in India, will feel that I have done well. But.

I was so happy in Bombay. I was respected, I had a certain position. I worked for an important man. The highest in the land came to our bachelor chambers and enjoyed my food and showered compliments on me. I also had my friends. We met in the evenings on the pavement below the gallery of our chambers. Some of us, like the tailor's bearer¹ and myself, were domestics who lived in the street. The others were people who came to that bit of pavement to sleep. Respectable people; we didn't encourage riff-raff.

In the evenings it was cool. There were few passers-by and, apart from an occasional double-decker bus or taxi, little traffic. The pavement was swept and sprinkled, bedding brought out from daytime hiding-places, little oil-lamps lit. While the folk upstairs chattered and laughed, on the pavement we read newspapers, played cards, told stories and smoked. The clay pipe passed from friend to friend; we became drowsy. Except of course during the monsoon,² I preferred to sleep on the pavement with my friends, although in our chambers a whole cupboard below the staircase was reserved for my personal use.

It was good after a healthy night in the open to rise before the sun and before the sweepers came. Sometimes I saw the street lights go off. Bedding was rolled up; no one spoke much; and soon my friends were hurrying in silent competition to secluded lanes and alleys and open lots to relieve themselves. I was spared this competition; in our chambers I had facilities.³

Afterwards for half an hour or so I was free simply to stroll. I liked walking beside the Arabian Sea, waiting for the sun to come up. Then the city and the ocean gleamed like gold. Alas for those morning walks, that sudden ocean dazzle, the moist salt breeze on my face, the flap of my shirt, that first cup of hot sweet tea from a stall, the taste of the first leaf-cigarette.

Observe the workings of fate. The respect and security I enjoyed were due to the importance of my employer. It was this very importance which now all at once destroyed the pattern of my life.

My employer was seconded⁴ by his firm to Government service and was posted to Washington. I was happy for his sake but frightened for mine. He was to be away for some years and there was nobody in Bombay he could second me to. Soon, therefore, I was to be out of a job and out of the chambers. For many years I had considered my life as settled. I had served my apprenticeship, known my hard times. I didn't feel I could start again. I despaired. Was there a job for me in Bombay? I saw myself having to return to my village in the hills, to my wife and children there, not just for a holiday but for good. I saw myself again becoming a porter during the tourist season, racing after the buses as they arrived at the station and shouting with forty or fifty others for luggage. Indian luggage, not this lightweight American stuff! Heavy metal trunks!

I could have cried. It was no longer the sort of life for which I was fitted. I had grown soft in Bombay and I was no longer young. I had acquired possessions, I was used to the privacy of my cupboard. I had become a city man, used to certain comforts.

My employer said, "Washington is not Bombay, Santosh. Washington is expensive. Even if I was able to raise your fare, you wouldn't be able to live over there in anything like your present style."

But to be barefoot in the hills, after Bombay! The shock, the disgrace! I couldn't face my friends. I stopped sleeping on the pavement and spent as much of my free time as possible in my cupboard among my possessions, as among things which were soon to be taken from me.

My employer said, "Santosh, my heart bleeds for you."

I said, "Sahib,⁵ if I look a little concerned it is only because I worry about you. You have always been fussy, and I don't see how you will manage in Washington."

"It won't be easy. But it's the principle. Does the representative of a poor country like ours travel about with his cook? Will that create a good impression?"

"You will always do what is right, sahib."

He went silent.

After some days he said, "There's not only the expense, Santosh. There's the question of foreign exchange. Our rupee⁶ isn't what it was."

"I understand, sahib. Duty is duty."

A fortnight later, when I had almost given up hope, he said, "Santosh, I have consulted Government. You will accompany me. Government has sanctioned, will arrange accommodation. But no expenses. You will get your passport and your P form. But I want you to think, Santosh. Washington is not Bombay."

I went down to the pavement that night with my bedding.

I said, blowing down my shirt, "Bombay gets hotter and hotter."

"Do you know what you are doing?" the tailor's bearer said. "Will the Americans smoke with you? Will they sit and talk with you in the evenings? Will they hold you by the hand and walk with you beside the ocean?"

It pleased me that he was jealous. My last days in Bombay were very happy.

I packed my employer's two suitcases and bundled up my own belongings in lengths of old cotton. At the airport they made a fuss about my bundles. They said they couldn't accept them as luggage for the hold because they didn't like the responsibility. So when the time came I had to climb up to the aircraft with all my bundles. The girl at the top, who was smiling at everybody else, stopped smiling when she saw me. She made me go right to the back of the plane, far from my employer. Most of the seats there were empty, though, and I was able to spread my bundles around and, well, it was comfortable.

It was bright and hot outside, cool inside. The plane started, rose up in the air, and Bombay and the ocean tilted this way and that. It was very nice. When we settled down I looked around for people like myself, but I could see no one among the Indians or the foreigners who looked like a domestic. Worse, they were all dressed as though they were going to a wedding and, brother, I soon saw it wasn't they who were conspicuous. I was in my ordinary Bombay clothes, the loose long-tailed shirt, the wide-waisted pants held up with a piece of string. Perfectly respectable domestic's wear, neither dirty nor clean, and in Bombay no one would have looked. But now on the plane I felt heads turning whenever I stood up.

I was anxious. I slipped off my shoes, tight even without the laces, and drew my feet up. That made me feel better. I made myself a little betel-nut⁷ mixture and that made me feel better still. Half the pleasure of betel, though, is the spitting; and it was only when I had worked up a good mouthful that I saw I had a problem. The airline girl saw too. That girl didn't like me at all. She spoke roughly to me. My mouth was full, my cheeks were bursting, and I couldn't say anything. I could only look at her. She went and called a man in uniform and he came and stood over me. I put my shoes back on and swallowed the betel juice. It made me feel quite ill.

The girl and the man, the two of them, pushed a little trolley of drinks down the aisle. The girl didn't look at me but the man said, "You want a drink, chum?" He wasn't a bad fellow. I pointed at random to a bottle. It was a kind of soda drink, nice and sharp at first but then not so nice. I was worrying about it when the girl said, "Five shillings sterling or sixty cents U.S." That took me by surprise. I had no money, only a few rupees. The girl stamped, and I thought she was going to hit me with her pad when I stood up to show her who my employer was.

Presently my employer came down the aisle. He didn't look very well. He said, without stopping, "Champagne, Santosh? Already we are overdoing?" He went on to the lavatory. When he passed back he said, "Foreign exchange, Santosh! Foreign exchange!" That was all. Poor fellow, he was suffering too.

The journey became miserable for me. Soon, with the wine I had drunk, the betel juice, the movement and the noise of the aeroplane, I was vomiting all over my bundles, and I didn't care what the girl said or did. Later there were more urgent and terrible needs. I felt I would choke in the tiny, hissing room at the back. I had a shock when I saw my face in the mirror. In the fluorescent light it was the colour of a corpse. My eyes were strained, the sharp air hurt my nose and seemed to get into my brain. I climbed up on the lavatory seat and squatted. I lost control of myself. As quickly as I could I ran back out into the comparative openness of the cabin and hoped no one had noticed. The lights were dim now; some people had taken off their jackets and were sleeping. I hoped the plane would crash.

The girl woke me up. She was almost screaming. "It's you, isn't it? Isn't it?"

I thought she was going to tear the shirt off me. I pulled back and leaned hard on the window. She burst into tears and nearly tripped on her sari as she ran up the aisle to get the man in uniform.

Nightmare. And all I knew was that somewhere at the end, after the airports and the crowded lounges where everybody was dressed up, after all those takeoffs and touchdowns, was the city of Washington. I wanted the journey to end but I couldn't say I wanted to arrive at Washington. I was already a little scared of that city, to tell the truth. I wanted only to be off the plane and to be in the open again, to stand on the ground and breathe and to try to understand what time of day it was.

At last we arrived. I was in a daze. The burden of those bundles! There were more closed rooms and electric lights. There were questions from officials.

"Is he diplomatic?"⁸

"He's only a domestic," my employer said.

"Is that his luggage? What's in that pocket?"

I was ashamed.

"Santosh," my employer said.

I pulled out the little packets of pepper and salt, the sweets, the envelopes with scented napkins, the toy tubes of mustard. Airline trinkets. I had been collecting them throughout the journey, seizing a handful, whatever my condition, every time I passed the galley.

"He's a cook," my employer said.

"Does he always travel with his condiments?"

"Santosh, Santosh," my employer said in the car afterwards, "in Bombay it didn't matter what you did. Over here you represent your country. I must say I cannot understand why your behaviour has already gone so much out of character."

"I am sorry, sahib."

"Look at it like this, Santosh. Over here you don't only represent your country, you represent me."

For the people of Washington it was late afternoon or early evening, I couldn't say which. The time and the light didn't match, as they did in Bombay. Of that drive I remember green fields, wide roads, many motor cars travelling fast, making a steady hiss, hiss, which wasn't at all like our Bombay traffic noise. I remember big buildings and wide parks; many bazaar areas; then smaller houses without fences and with gardens like bush, with the *hubshi*⁹ standing about or sitting down, more usually sitting down, everywhere. Especially I remember the hubshi. I had heard about them in stories and had seen one or two in Bombay. But I had never dreamt that this wild race existed in such numbers in Washington and were permitted to roam the streets so freely. O father, what was this place I had come to?

I wanted, I say, to be in the open, to breathe, to come to myself, to reflect. But there was to be no openness for me that evening. From the aeroplane to the airport building to the motor car to the apartment block to the elevator to the corridor to the apartment itself, I was forever enclosed, forever in the hissing, hissing sound of air-conditioners.

I was too dazed to take stock of the apartment. I saw it as only another halting place. My employer went to bed at once, completely exhausted, poor fellow. I looked around for my room. I couldn't find it and gave up. Aching for the Bombay ways, I spread my bedding in the carpeted corridor just outside our apartment door. The corridor was long: doors, doors. The illuminated ceiling was decorated with stars of different sizes; the colours were grey and blue and gold. Below that imitation sky I felt like a prisoner.

Waking, looking up at the ceiling, I thought just for a second that I had fallen asleep on the pavement below the gallery of our Bombay chambers. Then I realized my loss. I couldn't tell how much time had passed or whether it was night or day. The only clue was that newspapers now lay outside some doors. It disturbed me to think that while I had been sleeping, alone and defenceless, I had been observed by a stranger and perhaps by more than one stranger.

I tried the apartment door and found I had locked myself out. I didn't want to disturb my employer. I thought I would get out into the open, go for a walk. I remembered where the elevator was. I got in and pressed the button. The elevator dropped fast and silently and it was like being in the aeroplane again. When the elevator stopped and the blue metal door slid open I saw plain concrete corridors and blank walls. The noise of machinery was very loud. I knew I was in the basement and the main floor was not far above me. But I no longer wanted to try; I gave up ideas of the open air. I thought I would just go back up to the apartment. But I hadn't noted the number and didn't even know what floor we were on. My courage flowed out of me. I sat on the floor of the elevator and felt the tears come to my eyes. Almost without noise the elevator door closed, and I found I was being taken up silently at great speed.

The elevator stopped and the door opened. It was my employer, his hair uncombed, yesterday's dirty shirt partly unbuttoned. He looked frightened.

"Santosh, where have you been at this hour of morning? Without your shoes."

I could have embraced him. He hurried me back past the newspapers to our apartment and I took the bedding inside. The wide window showed the early morning sky, the big city; we were high up, way above the trees.

I said, "I couldn't find my room."

"Government sanctioned," my employer said. "Are you sure you've looked?"

We looked together. One little corridor led past the bathroom to his bedroom; another, shorter corridor led to the big room and the kitchen. There was nothing else.

"Government sanctioned," my employer said, moving about the kitchen and opening cupboard doors. "Separate entrance, shelving. I have the correspondence." He opened another door and looked inside. "Santosh, do you think it is possible that this is what Government meant?"

The cupboard he had opened was as high as the rest of the apartment and as wide as the kitchen, about six feet. It was about three feet deep. It had two doors. One door opened into the kitchen; another door, directly opposite, opened into the corridor.

"Separate entrance," my employer said. "Shelving, electric light, power point, fitted carpet."

"This must be my room, sahib."

"Santosh, some enemy in Government has done this to me."

"Oh no, sahib. You mustn't say that. Besides, it is very big. I will be able to make myself very comfortable. It is much bigger than my little cubby-hole in the chambers. And it has a nice flat ceiling. I wouldn't hit my head."

"You don't understand, Santosh. Bombay is Bombay. Here if we start living in cupboards we give the wrong impression. They will think we all live in cupboards in Bombay."

"O sahib, but they can just look at me and see I am dirt."

"You are very good, Santosh. But these people are malicious. Still, if you are happy, then I am happy."

"I am very happy, sahib."

And after all the upset, I was. It was nice to crawl in that evening, spread my bedding and feel protected and hidden. I slept very well.

In the morning my employer said, "We must talk about money, Santosh. Your salary is one hundred rupees a month. But Washington isn't Bombay. Everything is a little bit more expensive here, and I am going to give you a Dearness Allowance. As from today you are getting one hundred and fifty rupees."

"Sahib."

"And I'm giving you a fortnight's pay in advance. In foreign exchange. Seventy-five rupees. Ten cents to the rupee, seven hundred and fifty cents. Seven fifty U.S. Here, Santosh. This afternoon you go out and have a little walk and enjoy. But be careful. We are not among friends, remember."

So at last, rested, with money in my pocket, I went out in the open. And of course the city wasn't a quarter as frightening as I had thought. The buildings weren't particularly big, not all the streets were busy, and there were many lovely trees. A lot of the hubshi were about, very wild-looking some of them, with dark glasses and their hair frizzed out, but it seemed that if you didn't trouble them they didn't attack you.

I was looking for a café or a tea-stall where perhaps domestics congregated. But I saw no domestics, and I was chased away from the place I did eventually go into. The girl said, after I had been waiting some time, "Can't you read? We don't serve hippies or bare feet here."

O father! I had come out without my shoes. But what a country, I thought, walking briskly away, where people are never allowed to dress normally but must forever wear their very best! Why must they wear out shoes and fine clothes for no purpose? What occasion are they honouring? What waste, what presumption! Who do they think is noticing them all the time?

And even while these thoughts were in my head I found I had come to a roundabout with trees and a fountain where—and it was like a fulfilment in a dream, not easy to believe—there were many people who looked like my own people. I tightened the string around my loose pants, held down my flapping shirt and ran through the traffic to the green circle.

Some of the hubshi were there, playing musical instruments and looking quite happy in their way. There were some Americans sitting about on the grass and the fountain and the kerb. Many of them were in rough, friendly-looking clothes; some were without shoes; and I felt I had been over hasty in condemning the entire race. But it wasn't these people who had attracted me to the circle. It was the dancers. The men were bearded, barefooted and in saffron robes, and the girls were in saris and canvas shoes that looked like our own Bata shoes.¹ They were shaking little cymbals and chanting and lifting their heads up and down and going round in a circle, making a lot of dust. It was a little bit like a Red Indian dance in a cowboy movie, but they were chanting Sanskrit words in praise of Lord Krishna.²

I was very pleased. But then a disturbing thought came to me. It might have been because of the half-caste³ appearance of the dancers; it might have been their bad Sanskrit pronunciation and their accent. I thought that these people were now strangers, but that perhaps once upon a time they had been like me. Perhaps, as in some story, they had been brought here among the hubshi as captives a long time ago and had become a lost people, like our own wandering gipsy folk, and had forgotten who they were. When I thought that, I lost my pleasure in the dancing; and I felt for the dancers the sort of distaste we feel when we are faced with something that should be kin but turns out not to be, turns out to be degraded, like a deformed man, or like a leper, who from a distance looks whole.

I didn't stay. Not far from the circle I saw a café which appeared to be serving bare feet. I went in, had a coffee and a nice piece of cake and bought a pack of cigarettes; matches they gave me free with the cigarettes. It was all right, but then the bare feet began looking at me, and one bearded fellow came and sniffed loudly at me and smiled and spoke some sort of gibberish, and then some others of the bare feet came and sniffed at me. They weren't unfriendly, but I didn't appreciate the behaviour; and it was a little frightening to find, when I left the place, that two or three of them appeared to be following me. They weren't unfriendly, but I didn't want to take any chances. I passed a cinema; I went in. It was something I wanted to do anyway. In Bombay I used to go once a week.

And that was all right. The movie had already started. It was in English, not too easy for me to follow, and it gave me time to think. It was only there, in the darkness, that I thought about the money I had been spending. The prices had seemed to me very reasonable, like Bombay prices. Three for the movie ticket, one fifty in the café, with tip. But I had been thinking in rupees and paying in dollars. In less than an hour I had spent nine days' pay.

I couldn't watch the movie after that. I went out and began to make my way back to the apartment block. Many more of the hubshi were about now and I saw that where they congregated the pavement was wet, and dangerous with broken glass and bottles. I couldn't think of cooking when I got back to the apartment. I couldn't bear to look at the view. I spread my bedding in the cupboard, lay down in the darkness and waited for my employer to return.

When he did I said, "Sahib, I want to go home."

"Santosh, I've paid five thousand rupees to bring you here. If I send you back now, you will have to work for six or seven years without salary to pay me back."

I burst into tears.

"My poor Santosh, something has happened. Tell me what has happened."

"Sahib, I've spent more than half the advance you gave me this morning. I went out and had a coffee and cake and then I went to a movie."

His eyes went small and twinkly behind his glasses. He bit the inside of his top lip, scraped at his moustache with his lower teeth, and he said, "You see, you see. I told you it was expensive."

I understood I was a prisoner. I accepted this and adjusted. I learned to live within the apartment, and I was even calm.

My employer was a man of taste and he soon had the apartment looking like something in a magazine, with books and Indian paintings and Indian fabrics and pieces of sculpture and bronze statues of our gods. I was careful to take no delight in it. It was of course very pretty, especially with the view. But the view remained foreign and I never felt that the apartment was real, like the shabby old Bombay chambers with the cane chairs, or that it had anything to do with me.

When people came to dinner I did my duty. At the appropriate time I would bid the company goodnight, close off the kitchen behind its folding screen and pretend I was leaving the apartment. Then I would lie down quietly in my cupboard and smoke. I was free to go out; I had my separate entrance. But I didn't like being out of the apartment. I didn't even like going down to the laundry room in the basement.

Once or twice a week I went to the supermarket on our street. I always had to walk past groups of hubshi men and children. I tried not to look, but it was hard. They sat on the pavement, on steps and in the bush around their redbrick houses, some of which had boarded-up windows. They appeared to be very much a people of the open air, with little to do; even in the mornings some of the men were drunk.

Scattered among the hubshi houses were others just as old but with gas-lamps that burned night and day in the entrance. These were the houses of the Americans. I seldom saw these people; they didn't spend much time on the street. The lighted gas-lamp was the American way of saying that though a house looked old outside it was nice and new inside. I also felt that it was like a warning to the hubshi to keep off.

Outside the supermarket there was always a policeman with a gun. Inside, there were always a couple of hubshi guards with truncheons, and, behind the cashiers, some old hubshi beggar men in rags. There were also many young hubshi boys, small but muscular, waiting to carry parcels, as once in the hills I had waited to carry Indian tourists' luggage.

These trips to the supermarket were my only outings, and I was always glad to get back to the apartment. The work there was light. I watched a lot of television and my English improved. I grew to like certain commercials very much. It was in these commercials I saw the Americans whom in real life I so seldom saw and knew only by their gas-lamps. Up there in the apartment, with a view of the white domes and towers and greenery of the famous city, I entered the homes of the Americans and saw them cleaning those homes. I saw them cleaning floors and dishes. I saw them buying clothes and cleaning clothes, buying motor cars and cleaning motor cars. I saw them cleaning, cleaning.

The effect of all this television on me was curious. If by some chance I saw an American on the street I tried to fit him or her into the commercials; and I felt I had caught the person in an interval between his television duties. So to some extent Americans have remained to me, as people not quite real, as people temporarily absent from television.

Sometimes a hubshi came on the screen, not to talk of hubshi things, but to do a little cleaning of his own. That wasn't the same. He was too different from the hubshi I saw on the street and I knew he was an actor. I knew that his television duties were only make-believe and that he would soon have to return to the street.

One day at the supermarket, when the hubshi girl took my money, she sniffed and said, "You always smell sweet, baby."

She was friendly, and I was at last able to clear up that mystery, of my smell. It was the poor country weed I smoked. It was a peasant taste of which I was slightly ashamed, to tell the truth; but the cashier was encouraging. As it happened, I had brought a quantity of the weed with me from Bombay in one of my bundles, together with a hundred razor blades, believing both weed and blades to be purely Indian things. I made an offering to the girl. In return she taught me a few words of English. "Me black and beautiful"⁴ was the first thing she taught me. Then she pointed to the policeman with the gun outside and taught me: "He pig."

My English lessons were taken a stage further by the hubshi maid who worked for someone on our floor in the apartment block. She too was attracted by my smell, but I soon began to feel that she was also attracted by my smallness and strangeness. She herself was a big woman, broad in the face, with high cheeks and bold eyes and lips that were full but not pendulous. Her largeness disturbed me; I found it better to concentrate on her face. She misunderstood; there were times when she frolicked with me in a violent way. I didn't like it, because I couldn't fight her off as well as I would have liked and because in spite of myself I was fascinated by her appearance. Her smell mixed with the perfumes she used could have made me forget myself.

She was always coming into the apartment. She disturbed me while I was watching the Americans on television. I feared the smell she left behind. Sweat, perfume, my own weed: the smells lay thick in the room, and I prayed to the bronze gods my employer had installed as living-room ornaments that I would not be dishonoured. Dishonoured, I say; and I know that this might seem strange to people over here, who have permitted the hubshi to settle among them in such large numbers and must therefore esteem them in certain ways. But in our country we frankly do not care for the hubshi. It is written in our books, both holy and not so holy, that it is indecent and wrong for a man of our blood to embrace the hubshi woman. To be dishonoured in this life, to be born a cat or a monkey or a hubshi in the next!

But I was falling. Was it idleness and solitude? I was found attractive: I wanted to know why. I began to go to the bathroom of the apartment simply to study my face in the mirror. I cannot easily believe it myself now, but in Bombay a week or a month could pass without my looking in the mirror; then it wasn't to consider my looks but to check whether the barber had cut off too much hair or whether a pimple was about to burst. Slowly I made a discovery. My face was handsome. I had never thought of myself in this way. I had thought of myself as unnoticeable, with features that served as identification alone.

The discovery of my good looks brought its strains. I became obsessed with my appearance, with a wish to see myself. It was like an illness. I would be watching television, for instance, and I would be surprised by the thought: are you as handsome as that man? I would have to get up and go to the bathroom and look in the mirror.

I thought back to the time when these matters hadn't interested me, and I saw how ragged I must have looked, on the aeroplane, in the airport, in that café for bare feet, with the rough and dirty clothes I wore, without doubt or question, as clothes befitting a servant. I was choked with shame. I saw, too, how good people in Washington had been, to have seen me in rags and yet to have taken me for a man.

I was glad I had a place to hide. I had thought of myself as a prisoner. Now I was glad I had so little of Washington to cope with: the apartment, my cupboard, the television set, my employer, the walk to the supermarket, the hubshi woman. And one day I found I no longer knew whether I wanted to go back to Bombay. Up there, in the apartment, I no longer knew what I wanted to do.

I became more careful of my appearance. There wasn't much I could do. I bought laces for my old black shoes, socks, a belt. Then some money came my way. I had understood that the weed I smoked was of value to the hubshi and the bare feet; I disposed of what I had, disadvantageously as I now know, through the hubshi girl at the supermarket. I got just under two hundred dollars. Then, as anxiously as I had got rid of my weed, I went out and bought some clothes.

I still have the things I bought that morning. A green hat, a green suit. The suit was always too big for me. Ignorance, inexperience; but I also remember the feeling of presumption. The salesman wanted to talk, to do his job. I didn't want to listen. I took the first suit he showed me and went into the cubicle and changed. I couldn't think about size and fit. When I considered all that cloth and all that tailoring I was proposing to adorn my simple body with, that body that needed so little, I felt I was asking to be destroyed. I changed back quickly, went out of the cubicle and said I would take the green suit. The salesman began to talk; I cut him short; I asked for a hat. When I got back to the apartment I felt quite weak and had to lie down for a while in my cupboard.

I never hung the suit up. Even in the shop, even while counting out the precious dollars, I had known it was a mistake. I kept the suit folded in the box with all its pieces of tissue paper. Three or four times I put it on and walked about the apartment and sat down on chairs and lit cigarettes and crossed my legs, practising. But I couldn't bring myself to wear the suit out of doors. Later I wore the pants, but never the jacket. I never bought another suit; I soon began wearing the sort of clothes I wear today, pants with some sort of zippered jacket.

Once I had had no secrets from my employer; it was so much simpler not to have secrets. But some instinct told me now it would be better not to let him know about the green suit or the few dollars I had, just as instinct had already told me I should keep my growing knowledge of English to myself.

Once my employer had been to me only a presence. I used to tell him then that beside him I was as dirt. It was only a way of talking, one of the courtesies of our language, but it had something of truth. I meant that he was the man who adventured in the world for me, that I experienced the world through him, that I was content to be a small part of his presence. I was content, sleeping on the Bombay pavement with my friends, to hear the talk of my employer and his guests upstairs. I was more than content, late at night, to be identified among the sleepers and greeted by some of those guests before they drove away.

Now I found that, without wishing it, I was ceasing to see myself as part of my employer's presence, and beginning at the same time to see him as an outsider might see him, as perhaps the people who came to dinner in the apartment saw him. I saw that he was a man of my own age, around thirty-five; it astonished me that I hadn't noticed this before. I saw that he was plump, in need of exercise, that he moved with short, fussy steps; a man with glasses, thinning hair, and that habit, during conversation, of scraping at his moustache with his teeth and nibbling at the inside of his top lip; a man who was frequently anxious, took pains over his work, was subjected at his own table to unkind remarks by his office colleagues; a man who looked as uneasy in Washington as I felt, who acted as cautiously as I had learned to act.

I remember an American who came to dinner. He looked at the pieces of sculpture in the apartment and said he had himself brought back a whole head from one of our ancient temples; he had got the guide to hack it off.

I could see that my employer was offended. He said, "But that's illegal."

"That's why I had to give the guide two dollars. If I had a bottle of whisky he would have pulled down the whole temple for me."

My employer's face went blank. He continued to do his duties as host but he was unhappy throughout the dinner. I grieved for him.

Afterwards he knocked on my cupboard. I knew he wanted to talk. I was in my underclothes but I didn't feel underdressed, with the American gone. I stood in the door of my cupboard; my employer paced up and down the small kitchen; the apartment felt sad.

"Did you hear that person, Santosh?"

I pretended I hadn't understood, and when he explained I tried to console him. I said, "Sahib, but we know these people are Franks⁵ and barbarians."

"They are malicious people, Santosh. They think that because we are a poor country we are all the same. They think an official in Government is just the same as some poor guide scraping together a few rupees to keep body and soul together, poor fellow."

I saw that he had taken the insult only in a personal way, and I was disappointed. I thought he had been thinking of the temple.

A few days later I had my adventure. The hubshi woman came in, moving among my employer's ornaments like a bull. I was greatly provoked. The smell was too much; so was the sight of her armpits. I fell. She dragged me down on the couch, on the saffron spread which was one of my employer's nicest pieces of Punjabi folk-weaving. I saw the moment, helplessly, as one of dishonour. I saw her as Kali,⁶ goddess of death and destruction, coal-black, with a red tongue and white eyeballs and many powerful arms. I expected her to be wild and fierce; but she added insult to injury by being very playful, as though, because I was small and strange, the act was not real. She laughed all the time. I would have liked to withdraw, but the act took over and completed itself. And then I felt dreadful.

I wanted to be forgiven, I wanted to be cleansed, I wanted her to go. Nothing frightened me more than the way she had ceased to be a visitor in the apartment and behaved as though she possessed it. I looked at the sculpture and the fabrics and thought of my poor employer, suffering in his office somewhere.

I bathed and bathed afterwards. The smell would not leave me. I fancied that the woman's oil was still on that poor part of my poor body. It occurred to me to rub it down with half a lemon. Penance and cleansing; but it didn't hurt as much as I expected, and I extended the penance by rolling about naked on the floor of the bathroom and the sitting-room and howling. At last the tears came, real tears, and I was comforted.

It was cool in the apartment; the air-conditioning always hummed; but I could see that it was hot outside, like one of our own summer days in the hills. The urge came upon me to dress as I might have done in my village on a religious occasion. In one of my bundles I had a dhoti⁷-length of new cotton, a gift from the tailor's bearer that I had never used. I draped this around my waist and between my legs, lit incense sticks, sat down cross-legged on the floor and tried to meditate and become still. Soon I began to feel hungry. That made me happy; I decided to fast.

Unexpectedly my employer came in. I didn't mind being caught in the attitude and garb of prayer; it could have been so much worse. But I wasn't expecting him till late afternoon.

"Santosh, what has happened?"

Pride got the better of me. I said, "Sahib, it is what I do from time to time."

But I didn't find merit in his eyes. He was far too agitated to notice me properly. He took off his lightweight fawn jacket, dropped it on the saffron spread, went to the refrigerator and drank two tumblers of orange juice, one after the other. Then he looked out at the view, scraping at his moustache.

"Oh, my poor Santosh, what are we doing in this place? Why do we have to come here?"

I looked with him. I saw nothing unusual. The wide window showed the colours of the hot day: the pale-blue sky, the white, almost colourless, domes of famous buildings rising out of dead-green foliage; the untidy roofs of apartment blocks where on Saturday and Sunday mornings people sunbathed; and, below, the fronts and backs of houses on the tree-lined street down which I walked to the supermarket.

My employer turned off the air-conditioning and all noise was absent from the room. An instant later I began to hear the noises outside: sirens far and near. When my employer slid the window open the roar of the disturbed city rushed into the room. He closed the window and there was near-silence again. Not far from the supermarket I saw black smoke, uncurling, rising, swiftly turning colourless. This was not the smoke which some of the apartment blocks gave off all day. This was the smoke of a real fire.

"The hubshi have gone wild, Santosh. They are burning down Washington."

I didn't mind at all. Indeed, in my mood of prayer and repentance, the news was even welcome. And it was with a feeling of release that I watched and heard the city burn that afternoon and watched it burn that night. I watched it burn again and again on television; and I watched it burn in the morning. It burned like a famous city and I didn't want it to stop burning. I wanted the fire to spread and spread and I wanted everything in the city, even the apartment block, even the apartment, even myself, to be destroyed and consumed. I wanted escape to be impossible; I wanted the very idea of escape to become absurd. At every sign that the burning was going to stop I felt disappointed and let down.

For four days my employer and I stayed in the apartment and watched the city burn. The television continued to show us what we could see and what, whenever we slid the window back, we could hear. Then it was over. The view from our window hadn't changed. The famous buildings stood; the trees remained. But for the first time since I had understood that I was a prisoner I found that I wanted to be out of the apartment and in the streets.

The destruction lay beyond the supermarket. I had never gone into this part of the city before, and it was strange to walk in those long wide streets for the first time, to see trees and houses and shops and advertisements, everything like a real city, and then to see that every signboard on every shop was burnt or stained with smoke, that the shops themselves were black and broken, that flames had burst through some of the upper windows and scorched the red bricks. For mile after mile it was like that. There were hubshi groups about, and at first when I passed them I pretended to be busy, minding my own business, not at all interested in the ruins. But they smiled at me and I found I was smiling back. Happiness was on the faces of the hubshi. They were like people amazed they could do so much, that so much lay in their power. They were like people on holiday. I shared their exhilaration.

The idea of escape was a simple one, but it hadn't occurred to me before. When I adjusted to my imprisonment I had wanted only to get away from Washington and to return to Bombay. But then I had become confused. I had looked in the mirror and seen myself, and I knew it wasn't possible for me to return to Bombay to the sort of job I had had and the life I had lived. I couldn't easily become part of someone else's presence again. Those evening chats on the pavement, those morning walks: happy times, but they were like the happy times of childhood: I didn't want them to return.

I had taken, after the fire, to going for long walks in the city. And one day, when I wasn't even thinking of escape, when I was just enjoying the sights and my new freedom of movement, I found myself in one of those leafy streets where private houses had been turned into business premises. I saw a fellow countryman superintending the raising of a signboard on his gallery. The signboard told me that the building was a restaurant, and I assumed that the man in charge was the owner. He looked worried and slightly ashamed, and he smiled at me. This was unusual, because the Indians I had seen on the streets of Washington pretended they hadn't seen me; they made me feel that they didn't like the competition of my presence or didn't want me to start asking them difficult questions.

I complimented the worried man on his signboard and wished him good luck in his business. He was a small man of about fifty and he was wearing a double-breasted suit with old-fashioned wide lapels. He had dark hollows below his eyes and he looked as though he had recently lost a little weight. I could see that in our country he had been a man of some standing, not quite the sort of person who would go into the restaurant business. I felt at one with him. He invited me in to look around, asked my name and gave his. It was Priya.

Just past the gallery was the loveliest and richest room I had ever seen. The wallpaper was like velvet; I wanted to pass my hand over it. The brass lamps that hung from the ceiling were in a lovely cut-out pattern and the bulbs were of many colours. Priya looked with me, and the hollows under his eyes grew darker, as though my admiration was increasing his worry at his extravagance. The restaurant hadn't yet opened for customers and on a shelf in one corner I saw Priya's collection of good-luck objects: a brass plate with a heap of uncooked rice, for prosperity; a little copybook and a little diary pencil, for good luck with the accounts; a little clay lamp, for general good luck.

"What do you think, Santosh? You think it will be all right?"

"It is bound to be all right, Priya."

"But I have enemies, you know, Santosh. The Indian restaurant people are not going to appreciate me. All mine, you know, Santosh. Cash paid. No mortgage or anything like that. I don't believe in mortgages. Cash or nothing."

I understood him to mean that he had tried to get a mortgage and failed, and was anxious about money.

"But what are you doing here, Santosh? You used to be in Government or something?"

"You could say that, Priya."

"Like me. They have a saying here. If you can't beat them, join them. I joined them. They are still beating me." He sighed and spread his arms on the top of the red wall-seat. "Ah, Santosh, why do we do it? Why don't we renounce and go and meditate on the riverbank?" He waved about the room. "The yemblems⁸ of the world, Santosh. Just yemblems."

I didn't know the English word he used, but I understood its meaning; and for a moment it was like being back in Bombay, exchanging stories and philosophies with the tailor's bearer and others in the evening.

"But I am forgetting, Santosh. You will have some tea or coffee or something?"

I shook my head from side to side to indicate that I was agreeable, and he called out in a strange harsh language to someone behind the kitchen door.

"Yes, Santosh. Yem-blems!" And he sighed and slapped the red seat hard.

A man came out from the kitchen with a tray. At first he looked like a fellow countryman, but in a second I could tell he was a stranger.

"You are right," Priya said, when the stranger went back to the kitchen. "He is not of Bharat. He is a Mexican. But what can I do? You get fellow countrymen, you fix up their papers and everything.

And then? Then they run away. Run-run-runaway. Crooks this side, crooks that side, I can't tell you. Listen, Santosh. I was in cloth business before. Buy for fifty rupees that side, sell for fifty dollars this side. Easy. But then. Caftan, everybody wants caftan. Caftan-aftan, I say, I will settle your caftan. I buy one thousand, Santosh. Delays India-side,⁹ of course. They come one year later. Nobody wants caftan then. We're not organized, Santosh. We don't do enough consumer research. That's what the fellows at the embassy tell me. But if I do consumer research, when will I do my business? The trouble, you know, Santosh, is that this shopkeeping is not in my blood. The damn thing goes against my blood. When I was in cloth business I used to hide sometimes for shame when a customer came in. Sometimes I used to pretend I was a shopper myself. Consumer research! These people make us dance, Santosh. You and I, we will renounce. We will go together and walk beside Potomac and meditate."

I loved his talk. I hadn't heard anything so sweet and philosophical since the Bombay days. I said, "Priya, I will cook for you, if you want a cook."

"I feel I've known you a long time, Santosh. I feel you are like a member of my own family. I will give you a place to sleep, a little food to eat and a little pocket money, as much as I can afford."

I said, "Show me the place to sleep."

He led me out of the pretty room and up a carpeted staircase. I was expecting the carpet and the new paint to stop somewhere, but it was nice and new all the way. We entered a room that was like a smaller version of my employer's apartment.

"Built-in cupboards and everything, you see, Santosh."

I went to the cupboard. It had a folding door that opened outward. I said, "Priya, it is too small. There is room on the shelf for my belongings. But I don't see how I can spread my bedding inside here. It is far too narrow."

He giggled nervously. "Santosh, you are a joker. I feel that we are of the same family already."

Then it came to me that I was being offered the whole room. I was stunned.

Priya looked stunned too. He sat down on the edge of the soft bed. The dark hollows under his eyes were almost black and he looked very small in his double-breasted jacket. "This is how they make us dance over here, Santosh. You say staff quarters and they say staff quarters. This is what they mean."

For some seconds we sat silently, I fearful, he gloomy, meditating on the ways of this new world.

Someone called from downstairs, "Priya!"

His gloom gone, smiling in advance, winking at me, Priya called back in an accent of the country, "Hi, Bab!"

I followed him down.

"Priya," the American said, "I've brought over the menus."

He was a tall man in a leather jacket, with jeans that rode up above thick white socks and big rubber-soled shoes. He looked like someone about to run in a race. The menus were enormous; on the cover there was a drawing of a fat man with a moustache and a plumed turban, something like the man in the airline advertisements.

"They look great, Bab."

"I like them myself. But what's that, Priya? What's that shelf doing there?"

Moving like the front part of a horse, Bab walked to the shelf with the rice and the brass plate and the little clay lamp. It was only then that I saw that the shelf was very roughly made.

Priya looked penitent and it was clear he had put the shelf up himself. It was also clear he didn't intend to take it down.

"Well, it's yours," Bab said. "I suppose we had to have a touch of the East somewhere. Now, Priya—"

"Money-money-money, is it?" Priya said, racing the words together as though he was making a joke to amuse a child. "But, Bab, how can you ask me for money? Anybody hearing you would believe that this restaurant is mine. But this restaurant isn't mine, Bab. This restaurant is yours."

It was only one of our courtesies, but it puzzled Bab and he allowed himself to be led to other matters.

I saw that, for all his talk of renunciation and business failure, and for all his jumpiness, Priya was able to cope with Washington. I admired this strength in him as much as I admired the richness of his talk. I didn't know how much to believe of his stories, but I liked having to guess about him. I liked having to play with his words in my mind. I liked the mystery of the man. The mystery came from his solidity. I knew where I was with him. After the apartment and the green suit and the hubshi woman and the city burning for four days, to be with Priya was to feel safe. For the first time since I had come to Washington I felt safe.

I can't say that I moved in. I simply stayed. I didn't want to go back to the apartment even to collect my belongings. I was afraid that something might happen to keep me a prisoner there. My employer might turn up and demand his five thousand rupees. The hubshi woman might claim me for her own; I might be condemned to a life among the hubshi. And it wasn't as if I was leaving behind anything of value in the apartment. The green suit I was even happy to forget. But.

Priya paid me forty dollars a week. After what I was getting, three dollars and seventy-five cents, it seemed a lot; and it was more than enough for my needs. I didn't have much temptation to spend, to tell the truth. I knew that my old employer and the hubshi woman would be wondering about me in their respective ways and I thought I should keep off the streets for a while. That was no hardship; it was what I was used to in Washington. Besides, my days at the restaurant were pretty full; for the first time in my life I had little leisure.

The restaurant was a success from the start, and Priya was fussy. He was always bursting into the kitchen with one of those big menus in his hand, saying in English, "Prestige job, Santosh, prestige." I didn't mind. I liked to feel I had to do things perfectly; I felt I was earning my freedom. Though I was in hiding, and though I worked every day until midnight, I felt I was much more in charge of myself than I had ever been.

Many of our waiters were Mexicans, but when we put turbans on them they could pass. They came and went, like the Indian staff. I didn't get on with these people. They were frightened and jealous of one another and very treacherous. Their talk amid the biryanis and the pillaus¹ was all of papers and green cards. They were always about to get green cards or they had been cheated out of green cards or they had just got green cards. At first I didn't know what they were talking about. When I understood I was more than depressed.

I understood that because I had escaped from my employer I had made myself illegal in America. At any moment I could be denounced, seized, jailed, deported, disgraced. It was a complication. I had no green card; I didn't know how to set about getting one; and there was no one I could talk to.

I felt burdened by my secrets. Once I had none; now I had so many. I couldn't tell Priya I had no green card. I couldn't tell him I had broken faith with my old employer and dishonoured myself with a hubshi woman and lived in fear of retribution. I couldn't tell him that I was afraid to leave the restaurant and that nowadays when I saw an Indian I hid from him as anxiously as the Indian hid from me. I would have felt foolish to confess. With Priya, right from the start, I had pretended to be strong; and I wanted it to remain like that. Instead, when we talked now, and he grew philosophical, I tried to find bigger causes for being sad. My mind fastened on to these causes, and the effect of this was that my sadness became like a sickness of the soul.

It was worse than being in the apartment, because now the responsibility was mine and mine alone. I had decided to be free, to act for myself. It pained me to think of the exhilaration I had felt during the days of the fire; and I felt mocked when I remembered that in the early days of my escape I had thought I was in charge of myself.

The year turned. The snow came and melted. I was more afraid than ever of going out. The sickness was bigger than all the causes. I saw the future as a hole into which I was dropping. Sometimes at night when I awakened my body would burn and I would feel the hot perspiration break all over.

I leaned on Priya. He was my only hope, my only link with what was real. He went out; he brought back stories. He went out especially to eat in the restaurants of our competitors.

He said, "Santosh, I never believed that running a restaurant was a way to God. But it is true. I eat like a scientist. Every day I eat like a scientist. I feel I have already renounced."

This was Priya. This was how his talk ensnared me and gave me the bigger causes that steadily weakened me. I became more and more detached from the men in the kitchen. When they spoke of their green cards and the jobs they were about to get I felt like asking them: Why? Why?

And every day the mirror told its own tale. Without exercise, with the sickening of my heart and my mind, I was losing my looks. My face had become pudgy and sallow and full of spots; it was becoming ugly. I could have cried for that, discovering my good looks only to lose them. It was like a punishment for my presumption, the punishment I had feared when I bought the green suit.

Priya said, "Santosh, you must get some exercise. You are not looking well. Your eyes are getting like mine. What are you pining for? Are you pining for Bombay or your family in the hills?"

But now, even in my mind, I was a stranger in those places.

Priya said one Sunday morning, "Santosh, I am going to take you to see a Hindi movie today. All the Indians of Washington will be there, domestics and everybody else."

I was very frightened. I didn't want to go and I couldn't tell him why. He insisted. My heart began to beat fast as soon as I got into the car. Soon there were no more houses with gas-lamps in the entrance, just those long wide burnt-out hubshi streets, now with fresh leaves on the trees, heaps of rubble on bulldozed, fenced-in lots, boarded-up shop windows, and old smoke-stained signboards announcing what was no longer true. Cars raced along the wide roads; there was life only on the roads. I thought I would vomit with fear.

I said, "Take me back, sahib."

I had used the wrong word. Once I had used the word a hundred times a day. But then I had considered myself a small part of my employer's presence, and the word was not servile; it was more like a name, like a reassuring sound, part of my employer's dignity and therefore part of mine. But Priya's dignity could never be mine; that was not our relationship. Priya I had always called Priya; it was his wish, the American way, man to man. With Priya the word was servile. And he responded to the word. He did as I asked; he drove me back to the restaurant. I never called him by his name again.

I was good-looking; I had lost my looks. I was a free man; I had lost my freedom.

One of the Mexican waiters came into the kitchen late one evening and said, "There is a man outside who wants to see the chef."

No one had made this request before, and Priya was at once agitated. "Is he an American? Some enemy has sent him here. Sanitary-anitary, health-ealth, they can inspect my kitchens at any time."

"He is an Indian," the Mexican said.

I was alarmed. I thought it was my old employer; that quiet approach was like him. Priya thought it was a rival. Though Priya regularly ate in the restaurants of his rivals he thought it unfair when they came to eat in his. We both went to the door and peeked through the glass window into the dimly lit dining-room.

"Do you know that person, Santosh?"

"Yes, sahib."

It wasn't my old employer. It was one of his Bombay friends, a big man in Government, whom I had often served in the chambers. He was by himself and seemed to have just arrived in Washington. He had a new Bombay haircut, very close, and a stiff dark suit, Bombay tailoring. His shirt looked blue, but in the dim multi-coloured light of the dining-room everything white looked blue. He didn't look unhappy with what he had eaten. Both his elbows were on the curry-spotted tablecloth and he was picking his teeth, half closing his eyes and hiding his mouth with his cupped left hand.

"I don't like him," Priya said. "Still, big man in Government and so on. You must go to him, Santosh."

But I couldn't go.

"Put on your apron, Santosh. And that chef's cap. Prestige. You must go, Santosh."

Priya went out to the dining-room and I heard him say in English that I was coming.

I ran up to my room, put some oil on my hair, combed my hair, put on my best pants and shirt and my shining shoes. It was so, as a man about town rather than as a cook, I went to the dining-room.

The man from Bombay was as astonished as Priya. We exchanged the old courtesies, and I waited. But, to my relief, there seemed little more to say. No difficult questions were put to me; I was grateful to the man from Bombay for his tact. I avoided talk as much as possible. I smiled. The man from Bombay smiled back. Priya smiled uneasily at both of us. So for a while we were, smiling in the dim blue-red light and waiting.

The man from Bombay said to Priya, "Brother, I just have a few words to say to my old friend Santosh."

Priya didn't like it, but he left us.

I waited for those words. But they were not the words I feared. The man from Bombay didn't speak of my old employer. We continued to exchange courtesies. Yes, I was well and he was well and everybody else we knew was well; and I was doing well and he was doing well. That was all. Then, secretively, the man from Bombay gave me a dollar. A dollar, ten rupees, an enormous tip for Bombay. But, from him, much more than a tip: an act of graciousness, part of the sweetness of the old days. Once it would have meant so much to me. Now it meant so little. I was saddened and embarrassed. And I had been anticipating hostility!

Priya was waiting behind the kitchen door. His little face was tight and serious, and I knew he had seen the money pass. Now, quickly, he read my own face, and without saying anything to me he hurried out into the dining-room.

I heard him say in English to the man from Bombay, "Santosh is a good fellow. He's got his own room with bath and everything. I am giving him a hundred dollars a week from next week. A thousand rupees a week. This is a first-class establishment."

A thousand chips a week! I was staggered. It was much more than any man in Government got, and I was sure the man from Bombay was also staggered, and perhaps regretting his good gesture and that precious dollar of foreign exchange.

"Santosh," Priya said, when the restaurant closed that evening, "that man was an enemy. I knew it from the moment I saw him. And because he was an enemy I did something very bad, Santosh."

"Sahib."

"I lied, Santosh. To protect you. I told him, Santosh, that I was going to give you seventy-five dollars a week after Christmas."

"Sahib."

"And now I have to make that lie true. But, Santosh, you know that is money we can't afford. I don't have to tell you about overheads and things like that. Santosh, I will give you sixty."

I said, "Sahib, I couldn't stay on for less than a hundred and twenty-five."

Priya's eyes went shiny and the hollows below his eyes darkened. He giggled and pressed out his lips. At the end of that week I got a hundred dollars. And Priya, good man that he was, bore me no grudge.

Now here was a victory. It was only after it happened that I realized how badly I had needed such a victory, how far, gaining my freedom, I had begun to accept death not as the end but as the goal. I revived. Or rather, my senses revived. But in this city what was there to feed my senses? There were no walks to be taken, no idle conversations with understanding friends. I could buy new clothes. But then? Would I just look at myself in the mirror? Would I go walking, inviting passers-by to look at me and my clothes? No, the whole business of clothes and dressing up only threw me back into myself.

There was a Swiss or German woman in the cake-shop some doors away, and there was a Filipino woman in the kitchen. They were neither of them attractive, to tell the truth. The Swiss or German could have broken my back with a slap, and the Filipino, though young, was remarkably like one of our older hill women. Still, I felt I owed something to the senses, and I thought I might frolic with these women. But then I was frightened of the responsibility. Goodness, I had learned that a woman is not just a roll and a frolic but a big creature weighing a hundred-and-so-many pounds who is going to be around afterwards.

So the moment of victory passed, without celebration. And it was strange, I thought, that sorrow lasts and can make a man look forward to death, but the mood of victory fills a moment and then is over. When my moment of victory was over I discovered below it, as if waiting for me, all my old sickness and fears: fear of my illegality, my former employer, my presumption, the hubshi woman. I saw then that the victory I had had was not something I had worked for, but luck; and that luck was only fate's cheating, giving an illusion of power.

But that illusion lingered, and I became restless. I decided to act, to challenge fate. I decided I would no longer stay in my room and hide. I began to go out walking in the afternoons. I gained courage; every afternoon I walked a little farther. It became my ambition to walk to that green circle with the fountain where, on my first day out in Washington, I had come upon those people in Hindu costumes, like domestics abandoned a long time ago, singing their Sanskrit gibberish and doing their strange Red Indian dance. And one day I got there.

One day I crossed the road to the circle and sat down on a bench. The hubshi were there, and the bare feet, and the dancers in saris and the saffron robes. It was mid-afternoon, very hot, and no one was active. I remembered how magical and inexplicable that circle had seemed to me the first time I saw it. Now it seemed so ordinary and tired: the roads, the motor cars, the shops, the trees, the careful policemen: so much part of the waste and futility that was our world. There was no longer a mystery. I felt I knew where everybody had come from and where those cars were going. But I also felt that everybody there felt like me, and that was soothing. I took to going to the circle every day after the lunch rush and sitting until it was time to go back to Priya's for the dinners.

Late one afternoon, among the dancers and the musicians, the hubshi and the bare feet, the singers and the police, I saw her. The hubshi woman. And again I wondered at her size; my memory had not exaggerated. I decided to stay where I was. She saw me and smiled. Then, as if remembering anger, she gave me a look of great hatred; and again I saw her as Kali, many-armed, goddess of death and destruction. She looked hard at my face; she considered my clothes. I thought: is it for this I bought these clothes? She got up. She was very big and her tight pants made her much more appalling. She moved towards me. I got up and ran. I ran across the road and then, not looking back, hurried by devious ways to the restaurant.

Priya was doing his accounts. He always looked older when he was doing his accounts, not worried, just older, like a man to whom life could bring no further surprises. I envied him.

"Santosh, some friend brought a parcel for you."

It was a big parcel wrapped in brown paper. He handed it to me, and I thought how calm he was, with his bills and pieces of paper, and the pen with which he made his neat figures, and the book in which he would write every day until that book was exhausted and he would begin a new one.

I took the parcel up to my room and opened it. Inside there was a cardboard box; and inside that, still in its tissue paper, was the green suit.

I felt a hole in my stomach. I couldn't think. I was glad I had to go down almost immediately to the kitchen, glad to be busy until midnight. But then I had to go up to my room again, and I was alone. I hadn't escaped; I had never been free. I had been abandoned. I was like nothing; I had made myself nothing. And I couldn't turn back.

In the morning Priya said, "You don't look very well, Santosh."

His concern weakened me further. He was the only man I could talk to and I didn't know what I could say to him. I felt tears coming to my eyes. At that moment I would have liked the whole world to be reduced to tears. I said, "Sahib, I cannot stay with you any longer."

They were just words, part of my mood, part of my wish for tears and relief. But Priya didn't soften. He didn't even look surprised. "Where will you go, Santosh?"

How could I answer his serious question?

"Will it be different where you go?"

He had freed himself of me. I could no longer think of tears. I said, "Sahib, I have enemies."

He giggled. "You are a joker, Santosh. How can a man like yourself have enemies? There would be no profit in it. I have enemies. It is part of your happiness and part of the equity of the world that you cannot have enemies. That's why you can run-run-runaway." He smiled and made the running gesture with his extended palm.

So, at last, I told him my story. I told him about my old employer and my escape and the green suit. He made me feel I was telling him nothing he hadn't already known. I told him about the hubshi woman. I was hoping for some rebuke. A rebuke would have meant that he was concerned for my honour, that I could lean on him, that rescue was possible.

But he said, "Santosh, you have no problems. Marry the hubshi. That will automatically make you a citizen. Then you will be a free man."

It wasn't what I was expecting. He was asking me to be alone forever. I said, "Sahib, I have a wife and children in the hills at home."

"But this is your home, Santosh. Wife and children in the hills, that is very nice and that is always there. But that is over. You have to do what is best for you here. You are alone here. Hubshi-ubshi, nobody worries about that here, if that is your choice. This isn't Bombay. Nobody looks at you when you walk down the street. Nobody cares what you do."

He was right. I was a free man; I could do anything I wanted. I could, if it were possible for me to turn back, go to the apartment and beg my old employer for forgiveness. I could, if it were possible for me to become again what I once was, go to the police and say, "I am an illegal immigrant here. Please deport me to Bombay." I could run away, hang myself, surrender, confess, hide. It didn't matter what I did, because I was alone. And I didn't know what I wanted to do. It was like the time when I felt my senses revive and I wanted to go out and enjoy and I found there was nothing to enjoy.

To be empty is not to be sad. To be empty is to be calm. It is to renounce. Priya said no more to me; he was always busy in the mornings. I left him and went up to my room. It was still a bare room, still like a room that in half an hour could be someone else's. I had never thought of it as mine. I was frightened of its spotless painted walls and had been careful to keep them spotless. For just such a moment.

I tried to think of the particular moment in my life, the particular action, that had brought me to that room. Was it the moment with the hubshi woman, or was it when the American came to dinner and insulted my employer? Was it the moment of my escape, my sight of Priya in the gallery, or was it when I looked in the mirror and bought the green suit? Or was it much earlier, in that other life, in Bombay, in the hills? I could find no one moment; every moment seemed important. An endless chain of action had brought me to that room. It was frightening; it was burdensome. It was not a time for new decisions. It was time to call a halt.

I lay on the bed watching the ceiling, watching the sky. The door was pushed open. It was Priya.

"My goodness, Santosh! How long have you been here? You have been so quiet I forgot about you."

He looked about the room. He went into the bathroom and came out again.

"Are you all right, Santosh?"

He sat on the edge of the bed and the longer he stayed the more I realized how glad I was to see him. There was this: when I tried to think of him rushing into the room I couldn't place it in time; it seemed to have occurred only in my mind. He sat with me. Time became real again. I felt a great love for him. Soon I could have laughed at his agitation. And later, indeed, we laughed together.

I said, "Sahib, you must excuse me this morning. I want to go for a walk. I will come back about tea time."

He looked hard at me, and we both knew I had spoken truly.

"Yes, yes, Santosh. You go for a good long walk. Make yourself hungry with walking. You will feel much better."

Walking, through streets that were now so simple to me, I thought how nice it would be if the people in Hindu costumes in the circle were real. Then I might have joined them. We would have taken to the road; at midday we would have halted in the shade of big trees; in the late afternoon the sinking sun would have turned the dust clouds to gold; and every evening at some village there would have been welcome, water, food, a fire in the night. But that was a dream of another life. I had watched the people in the circle long enough to know that they were of their city; that their television life awaited them; that their renunciation was not like mine. No television life awaited me. It didn't matter. In this city I was alone and it didn't matter what I did.

As magical as the circle with the fountain the apartment block had once been to me. Now I saw that it was plain, not very tall, and faced with small white tiles. A glass door; four tiled steps down; the desk to the right, letters and keys in the pigeonholes; a carpet to the left, upholstered chairs, a low table with paper flowers in the vase;

the blue door of the swift, silent elevator. I saw the simplicity of all these things. I knew the floor I wanted. In the corridor, with its illuminated star-decorated ceiling, an imitation sky, the colours were blue, grey and gold. I knew the door I wanted. I knocked.

The hubshi woman opened. I saw the apartment where she worked. I had never seen it before and was expecting something like my old employer's apartment, which was on the same floor. Instead, for the first time, I saw something arranged for a television life.

I thought she might have been angry. She looked only puzzled. I was grateful for that.

I said to her in English, "Will you marry me?"

And there, it was done.

"It is for the best, Santosh," Priya said, giving me tea when I got back to the restaurant. "You will be a free man. A citizen. You will have the whole world before you."

I was pleased that he was pleased.

So I am now a citizen, my presence is legal, and I live in Washington. I am still with Priya. We do not talk together as much as we did. The restaurant is one world, the parks and green streets of Washington are another, and every evening some of these streets take me to a third. Burnt-out brick houses, broken fences, overgrown gardens; in a levelled lot between the high brick walls of two houses, a sort of artistic children's playground which the hubshi children never use; and then the dark house in which I now live.

Its smells are strange, everything in it is strange. But my strength in this house is that I am a stranger. I have closed my mind and heart to the English language, to newspapers and radio and television, to the pictures of hubshi runners and boxers and musicians on the wall. I do not want to understand or learn any more.

I am a simple man who decided to act and see for himself, and it is as though I have had several lives. I do not wish to add to these. Some afternoons I walk to the circle with the fountain. I see the dancers but they are separated from me as by glass. Once, when there were rumours of new burnings, someone scrawled in white paint on the pavement outside my house: Soul Brother. I understand the words; but I feel, brother to what or to whom? I was once part of the flow, never thinking of myself as a presence. Then I looked in the mirror and decided to be free. All that my freedom has brought me is the knowledge that I have a face and have a body, that I must feed this body and clothe this body for a certain number of years. Then it will be over.

1971

Endnotes

- Note 1: Servant.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Rainy season.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: That is, a toilet.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Temporarily transferred.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Master (Urdu).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Indian currency, at this time worth ten cents.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Evergreen plant, the leaves of which are chewed in the East with areca-nut parings, as a mild stimulant.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: That is, in the Diplomatic Corps.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Derogatory Indian term for Black Africans (Hindustani).Return to reference 9
- Note 1: That is, from the Bata Shoe Company.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Great Hindu deity.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Mixed-race, usually in India, descended from or born to an Indian mother and a European father.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: See the 1960s slogan "Black is Beautiful."Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Here, foreigners of Western origin.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Great Hindu deity.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Loincloth (Hindi).Return to reference 7

- Note 8: Emblems.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: In India. "Caftan": long loose tunic or shirt (Turkish).Return to reference 9
- Note 1: "Biryani" and "pillaus": Indian rice dishes.Return to reference 1

WOLE SOYINKA

b. 1934

When Wole Soyinka received the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1986, the first Black African to be so honored, he stood at the forefront of a cadre of writers who shaped African literature in English. While Soyinka is primarily known as a playwright, with some thirty dramatic works to his credit, he has also made significant contributions to the genres of prose fiction, poetry, critical essays, and memoir. Throughout this diverse oeuvre, a number of recurring themes and concerns emerge, among them the responsibility borne by the living for past and future generations; the pathologies of political power and authoritarianism; the formation of an African sense of identity based not on an idealized, mythical past but on fundamental truths embedded in indigenous cultures and cosmologies; and the fusion of Western theatrical traditions with subject matter and dramatic techniques rooted in the folklore and religion of the Yoruba people of West Africa.

As related in his autobiographical Aké: The Years of Childhood (1981), Soyinka was steeped in both Yoruba and European cultures and modes of thought from his boyhood in Abeokuta, an outpost of the British Empire in southwest Nigeria, roughly equidistant from Lagos and Ibadan. Although his devoutly Anglican parents ranked among the city's social elite, other family members adhered to ancient Yoruba beliefs and practices. Soyinka's secondary education took place at highly selective institutions in Ibadan patterned after British public schools and similarly oriented toward producing civil servants in the European mold. It was at University College that the aspiring writer acquired a solid grounding in English literature and wrote his first play, featuring a Yoruba boy who longs to visit the College Zoo. His interest in the theater blossomed when he transferred to the University of Leeds, in northern England, at age twenty. After earning his bachelor's degree in English in 1957, Soyinka moved to London, where for the next two years he worked as a play reader for the adventurous Royal Court Theatre. Rubbing shoulders with the "angry young men" of British theater left a lasting influence on his own decidedly avant-garde conception of dramatic language and technique.

The Nigeria to which Soyinka returned in 1959, a few months before Britain formally relinquished its claim to his homeland, was awash in social and political ferment and impatient to turn a new page in its history. Skeptical by nature, Soyinka cast himself in the role of critic and spoiler: his play A Dance of the Forest (1960), ostensibly written in celebration of Nigerian independence, satirized the sanitized, feel-good version of Africa's past put forth by its postcolonial leaders. Six decades later he would return to this theme in his novel Chronicles from the Land of the Happiest People on Earth (2021), which pillories the self-serving machinations of the ruling class in contemporary Nigeria. Soyinka's outspokenness inevitably brought him into conflict with the authorities. As a consequence of protesting the government's war against the Biafran rebels in 1967, he was detained as a political prisoner for almost two years, an experience that bore fruit in Poems from Prison and The Man Died: Prison Notes (both 1972). In 1994 he was briefly forced into exile after speaking out against the country's military dictatorship; this is the subject of his memoir The Open Sore of a Continent: A Personal Narrative of the Nigerian Crisis (1996).

Despite his long record of political activism, Soyinka eschews overt politicization in his plays and novels. Instead, he positions himself as an exposé of foibles and debunker of myths. In the essay collection Myth, Literature and the African World (1976), Soyinka explored the nature of literary truth, a metaphysical reality that he saw as transcending the mundane factuality of day-to-day living. Death and the King's Horseman, written one year earlier, offers a metaphysical perspective on a real-life episode from Nigeria's colonial era in which British authorities prevented the ritual suicide of a horseman to a Yoruba king. Despite this precipitating event, Soyinka's preface to the play discouraged readers from misconstruing it as about "the clash of cultures." He resisted the imposition of such a cliché on his work because it implied that cultures met on equal footing. In fact, British officers had occupied Yoruban soil and imposed their political and cultural norms upon a once autonomous society. The culture clash interpretation also overlooked the core encounter of the play between Elesin, the titular protagonist, and the "universe of the Yoruba mind—the world of the living, the dead and the unborn, and the numinous passage which links all: transition."

Death and the King's Horseman (1975) follows a five-act structure that blends aspects of Greek tragedy with the musicality of African drumming and figurative density of Yoruba proverbs. As a play, it continually foregrounds theatricality, role-playing, and performance—of one's duty, of ritual, of another culture, and of gender roles. Elesin is a flawed hero, driven by carnal desire to wed on the very same day that he is expected to commit ritual suicide. The women of the play, particularly Iyaloja, call attention to the impropriety of the decision but are loathe to contradict a man of Elesin's stature. This conflict between sensual pleasure and spiritual duty, internal to the Yoruba community, is interrupted by the officious and culturally obtuse British administrator Simon Pilkings who imprisons Elesin to prevent his suicide. While Pilkings believes he is helping to reform a primitive culture, Soyinka shows how his interference disrupts the cosmic order and thus the play takes its metaphysical turn. For Elesin, ritual suicide is both noble and obligatory: only by sacrificing himself can he ensure that his spirit will be able to accompany his departed master on the path to immortality and prevent him from doing harm to his earthly subjects.

Elesin's son Olunde—who, like Soyinka, has returned to Nigeria after a period of study in Europe—attempts to restore cosmic order, but sets in motion a series of events that play havoc with the sacred transition between life and death.

Death and the King's Horseman

Characters

PRAISE-SINGER¹

ELESIN Horseman of the King

IYALOJA 'Mother'² of the market

SIMON PILKINGS District Officer

JANE PILKINGS his wife

SERGEANT AMUSA

JOSEPH houseboy to the Pilkingses

BRIDE

H.R.H.³ THE PRINCE

THE RESIDENT

AIDE-DE-CAMP⁴

OLUNDE eldest son of Elesin

DRUMMERS, WOMEN, YOUNG GIRLS, DANCERS AT THE BALL

The play should run without an interval. For rapid scene changes, one adjustable outline set is very appropriate.

Endnotes

- Note 1: Court poet; serves as a trusted advisor to nobility and is the keeper of historical and ancestral memory. Praise songs are an important oral form of African literature.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Leader of the market women.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: His Royal Highness.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Military officer who assists a senior officer.Return to reference 4

1

A passage through a market in its closing stages. The stalls are being emptied, mats folded. A few WOMEN pass through on their way home, loaded with baskets. On a cloth-stand, bolts of cloth are taken down, display pieces folded and piled on a tray. ELESIN OBA enters along a passage before the market, pursued by his DRUMMERS and PRAISE-SINGERS. He is a man of enormous vitality, speaks, dances and sings with that infectious enjoyment of life which accompanies all his actions.

PRAISE-SINGER Elesin o! Elesin Oba! Howu!⁵ What tryst is this the cockerel⁶ goes to keep with such haste that he must leave his tail behind?

ELESIN [slows down a bit, laughing] A tryst where the cockerel needs no adornment.

PRAISE-SINGER O-oh, you hear that my companions? That's the way the world goes. Because the man approaches a brand-new bride he forgets the long faithful mother of his children.

ELESIN When the horse sniffs the stable does he not strain at the bridle? The market is the long-suffering home of my spirit and the women are packing up to go. That Esu⁷-harassed day slipped into the stewpot while we feasted. We ate it up with the rest of the meat. I have neglected my women.

PRAISE-SINGER We know all that. Still it's no reason for shedding your tail on this day of all days. I know the women will cover you in damask and *alar*⁸ but when the wind blows cold from behind, that's when the fowl knows his true friends.

ELESIN Olohun-iyo!⁹

PRAISE-SINGER Are you sure there will be one like me on the other side?

ELESIN Olohun-iyo!

PRAISE-SINGER Far be it for me to belittle the dwellers of that place but, a man is either born to his art or he isn't. And I don't know for certain that you'll meet my father, so who is going to sing these deeds in accents that will pierce the deafness of the ancient ones. I have prepared my going—just tell me: Olohun-iyo, I need you on this journey and I shall be behind you.

ELESIN You're like a jealous wife. Stay close to me, but only on this side. My fame, my honour are legacies to the living; stay behind and let the world sip its honey from your lips.

PRAISE-SINGER Your name will be like the sweet berry a child places under his tongue to sweeten the passage of food. The world will never spit it out.

ELESIN Come then. This market is my roost. When I come among the women I am a chicken with a hundred mothers. I become a monarch whose palace is built with tenderness and beauty.

PRAISE-SINGER They love to spoil you but beware. The hands of women also weaken the unwary.

ELESIN This night I'll lay my head upon their lap and go to sleep. This night I'll touch feet with their feet in a dance that is no longer of this earth. But the smell of their flesh, their sweat, the smell of indigo¹ on their cloth, this is the last air I wish to breathe as I go to meet my great forebears.

PRAISE-SINGER In their time the world was never tilted from its groove, it shall not be in yours.

ELESIN The gods have said No.

PRAISE-SINGER In their time the great wars came and went, the little wars came and went; the white slavers came and went, they took away the heart of our race, they bore away the mind and muscle of our race.² The city fell and was rebuilt; the city fell and our people trudged through mountain and forest to found a new home³ but—Elesin Oba do you hear me?

ELESIN I hear your voice Olohun-iyo.

PRAISE-SINGER Our world was never wrenched from its true course.

ELESIN The gods have said No.

PRAISE-SINGER There is only one home to the life of a river-mussel; there is only one home to the life of a tortoise; there is only one shell to the soul of man; there is only one world to the spirit of our race. If that world leaves its course and smashes on boulders of the great void,⁴ whose world will give us shelter?

ELESIN It did not in the time of my forebears, it shall not in mine.

PRAISE-SINGER The cockerel must not be seen without his feathers.

ELESIN Nor will the Not-I bird⁵ be much longer without his nest.

PRAISE-SINGER [stopped in his lyric stride] The Not-I bird, Elesin?

ELESIN I said, the Not-I bird.

PRAISE-SINGER All respect to our elders but, is there really such a bird?

ELESIN What! Could it be that he failed to knock on your door?

PRAISE-SINGER [smiling] Elesin's riddles are not merely the nut in the kernel⁶ that breaks human teeth; he also buries the kernel in hot embers and dares a man's fingers to draw it out.

ELESIN I am sure he called on you, Olohun-iyó. Did you hide in the loft and push out the servant to tell him you were out?

[ELESIN executes a brief, half-taunting dance. The DRUMMER moves in and draws a rhythm out of his steps. ELESIN dances towards the market-place as he chants the story of the Not-I bird, his voice changing dexterously to mimic his characters. He performs like a born raconteur, infecting his retinue with his humour and energy. More WOMEN arrive during his recital, including IYALOJA.]

Death came calling.

Who does not know his rasp of reeds?

A twilight whisper in the leaves before

The great araba⁷ falls? Did you hear it?

Not I! swears the farmer. He snaps

His fingers round his head, abandons

A hard-worn harvest and begins

A rapid dialogue with his legs.

'Not I,' shouts the fearless hunter, 'but—

It's getting dark, and this night-lamp

Has leaked out all its oil. I think

It's best to go home and resume my hunt
Another day.' But now he pauses, suddenly Lets out a wail: 'Oh foolish mouth, calling
Down a curse on your own head! Your lamp
Has leaked out all its oil, has it?'
Forwards or backwards now he dare not move.
To search for leaves and make *etutu*⁸
On that spot? Or race home to the safety
Of his hearth? Ten market-days⁹ have passed
My friends, and still he's rooted there
Rigid as the plinth of Orayan.¹

The mouth of the courtesan² barely
Opened wide enough to take a ha'penny *robo*³
When she wailed: 'Not I.' All dressed she was
To call upon my friend the Chief Tax Officer.
But now she sends her go-between instead:
'Tell him I'm ill: my period has come suddenly
But not—I hope—my time.'

Why is the pupil crying?
His hapless head was made to taste
The knuckles of my friend the Mallam:⁴
'If you were then reciting the Koran
Would you have ears for idle noises
Darkening the trees, you child of ill omen?'
He shuts down school before its time
Runs home and rings himself with amulets.

And take my good kinsman Ifawomi.
His hands were like a carver's, strong
And true. I saw them
Tremble like wet wings of a fowl
One day he cast his time-smoothed *opele*⁵
Across the divination board.⁶ And all because

The suppliant looked him in the eye and asked,
'Did you hear that whisper in the leaves?'
'Not I,' was his reply; 'perhaps I'm growing deaf—
Good-day.' And Ifa spoke no more that day
The priest locked fast his doors,
Sealed up his leaking roof—but wait!
This sudden care was not for Fawomi⁷
But for Osanyin,⁸ courier-bird of Ifa's
Heart of wisdom. I did not know a kite⁹
Was hovering in the sky
And Ifa now a twittering chicken in
The brood of Fawomi the Mother Hen.

Ah, but I must not forget my evening
Courier from the abundant palm, whose groan
Became Not I, as he constipated down
A wayside bush. He wonders if Elegbara¹
Has tricked his buttocks to discharge
Against a sacred grove. Hear him
Mutter spells to ward off penalties
For an abomination he did not intend.
If any here
Stumbles on a gourd of wine, fermenting
Near the road, and nearby hears a stream
Of spells issuing from a crouching form,
Brother to a sigidi,² bring home my wine,
Tell my tapper³ I have ejected
Fear from home and farm. Assure him,
All is well.

PRAISE-SINGER In your time we do not doubt the peace of farmstead and home, the peace of road and hearth, we do not doubt the peace of the forest.

ELESIN There was fear in the forest too.
Not-I was lately heard even in the lair

Of beasts. The hyena cackled loud Not I,
The civet⁴ twitched his fiery tail and glared:
Not I. Not-I became the answering-name
Of the restless bird, that little one Whom Death found nesting in the leaves
When whisper of his coming ran
Before him on the wind. Not-I
Has long abandoned home. This same dawn
I heard him twitter in the gods' abode.
Ah, companions of this living world
What a thing this is, that even those
We call immortal
Should fear to die.

IYALOA But you, husband of multitudes?

ELESIN I, when that Not-I bird perched
Upon my roof, bade him seek his nest again,
Safe, without care or fear. I unrolled
My welcome mat for him to see. Not-I Flew happily away, you'll hear his voice
No more in this lifetime—You all know
What I am.

PRAISE-SINGER That rock which turns its open lodes
Into the path of lightning. A gay
Thoroughbred whose stride disdains
To falter though an adder⁵ reared
Suddenly in his path.

ELESIN My rein is loosened.
I am master of my Fate. When the hour comes Watch me dance along the narrowing path
Glazed by the soles of my great precursors.
My soul is eager. I shall not turn aside.

WOMEN You will not delay?

ELESIN Where the storm pleases, and when, it directs
The giants of the forest. When friendship summons
Is when the true comrade goes.

WOMEN Nothing will hold you back?

ELESIN Nothing. What! Has no one told you yet?

I go to keep my friend and master company.
Who says the mouth does not believe in 'No, I have chewed all that before?' I say I have.
The world is not a constant honey-pot.
Where I found little I made do with little.
Where there was plenty I gorged myself.
My master's hands and mine have always
Dipped together and, home or sacred feast,
The bowl was beaten bronze, the meats
So succulent our teeth accused us of neglect.
We shared the choicest of the season's Harvest of yams. How my friend would read Desire in my eyes before I knew the cause—
However rare, however precious, it was mine.

WOMEN The town, the very land was yours.

ELESIN The world was mine. Our joint hands
Raised houseposts of trust that withstood
The siege of envy and the termites of time.
But the twilight hour brings bats and rodents—
Shall I yield them cause to foul the rafters?

PRAISE-SINGER Elesin Oba! Are you not that man who Looked out of doors that stormy day
The god of luck⁶ limped by, drenched
To the very lice that held
His rags together? You took pity upon
His sores and wished him fortune.
Fortune was footloose this dawn, he replied,
Till you trapped him in a heartfelt wish
That now returns to you. Elesin Oba!
I say you are that man who Chanced upon the calabash⁷ of honour
You thought it was palm wine and Drained its contents to the final drop.

ELESIN Life has an end. A life that will outlive
Fame and friendship begs another name.
What elder takes his tongue to his plate,
Licks it clean of every crumb? He will encounter Silence when he calls on children to fulfill
The smallest errand! Life is honour.
It ends when honour ends.

WOMEN We know you for a man of honour.

ELESIN Stop! Enough of that!

WOMEN [puzzled, they whisper among themselves, turning mostly to IYALOJA] What is it? Did we say something to give offence? Have we slighted him in some way?

ELESIN Enough of that sound I say. Let me hear no more in that vein. I've heard enough.

IYALOJA We must have said something wrong. [Comes forward a little.] Elesin Oba, we ask forgiveness before you speak.

ELESIN I am bitterly offended.

IYALOJA Our unworthiness has betrayed us. All we can do is ask your forgiveness. Correct us like a kind father.

ELESIN This day of all days . . .

IYALOJA It does not bear thinking. If we offend you now we have mortified the gods. We offend heaven itself. Father of us all, tell us where we went astray. [She kneels, the other women follow.]

ELESIN Are you not ashamed? Even a tear-veiled Eye preserves its function of sight.
Because my mind was raised to horizons
Even the boldest man lowers his gaze
In thinking of, must my body here
Be taken for a vagrant's?

IYALOJA Horseman of the King, I am more baffled than ever.

PRAISE-SINGER The strictest father unbends his brow when the child is penitent, Elesin. When time is short, we do not spend it prolonging the riddle. Their shoulders are bowed with the weight of fear lest they have marred your day beyond repair. Speak now in plain words and let us pursue the ailment to the home of remedies.

ELESIN Words are cheap. 'We know you for
A man of honour.' Well tell me, is this how
A man of honour should be seen?
Are these not the same clothes in which
I came among you a full half-hour ago?

[He roars with laughter and the WOMEN, relieved, rise and rush into stalls to fetch rich cloths.]

WOMEN The gods are kind. A fault soon remedied is soon forgiven.
Elesin Oba, even as we match our words with deed, let your heart forgive us completely.

ELESIN You who are breath and giver of my being
How shall I dare refuse you forgiveness
Even if the offence were real.

IYALOJA [dancing round him. Sings]
He forgives us. He forgives us.
What a fearful thing it is when
The voyager sets forth
But a curse remains behind.

WOMEN For a while we truly feared
Our hands had wrenched the world adrift
In emptiness.

IYALOJA Richly, richly, robe him richly
The cloth of honour is alari
*Sanyan*⁸ is the band of friendship
Boa-skin⁹ makes slippers of esteem

WOMEN For a while we truly feared
Our hands had wrenched the world adrift
In emptiness.

PRAISE-SINGER He who must, must voyage forth
The world will not roll backwards
It is he who must, with one
Great gesture overtake the world.

WOMEN For a while we truly feared
Our hands had wrenched the world

In emptiness.

PRAISE-SINGER The gourd you bear is not for shrieking.

The gourd is not for setting down

At the first crossroad or wayside grove.

Only one river may know its contents

WOMEN We shall all meet at the great market¹

We shall all meet at the great market

He who goes early takes the best bargains

But we shall meet, and resume our banter.

[ELESIN stands resplendent in rich clothes, cap, shawl, etc. His sash is of a bright red alari cloth. The WOMEN dance round him. Suddenly, his attention is caught by an object off-stage.]

ELESIN The world I know is good.

WOMEN We know you'll leave it so.

ELESIN The world I know is the bounty

Of hives after bees have swarmed.

No goodness teems with such open hands

Even in the dreams of deities.

WOMEN And we know you'll leave it so.

ELESIN I was born to keep it so. A hive

Is never known to wander. An anthill²

Does not desert its roots. We cannot see

The still great womb of the world—

No man beholds his mother's womb—

Yet who denies it's there? Coiled

To the navel of the world is that

Endless cord that links us all

To the great origin. If I lose my way

The trailing cord will bring me to the roots.

WOMEN The world is in your hands.

[The earlier distraction, a beautiful YOUNG GIRL, comes along the passage through which ELESIN first made his entry.]

ELESIN I embrace it. And let me tell you, women—

I like this farewell that the world designed,

Unless my eyes deceive me, unless
We are already parted, the world and I,
And all that breeds desire is lodged
Among our tireless ancestors. Tell me friends,
Am I still earthed in that beloved market
Of my youth? Or could it be my will
Has outleapt the conscious act and I have come
Among the great departed?

PRAISE-SINGER Elesin-Oba why do your eyes roll like a bush-rat who sees his fate like his father's spirit, mirrored in the eye of a snake?
And all these questions! You're standing on the same earth you've always stood upon. This voice you hear is mine, Oluhuniyo, not that of an acolyte³ in heaven.

ELESIN How can that be? In all my life
As Horseman of the King, the juiciest
Fruit on every tree was mine. I saw,
I touched, I wooed, rarely was the answer No.
The honour of my place, the veneration I Received in the eye of man or woman
Prospered my suit and Played havoc with my sleeping hours.
And they tell me my eyes were a hawk
In perpetual hunger. Split an iroko⁴ tree
In two, hide a woman's beauty in its heartwood⁵
And seal it up again—Elesin, journeying by,
Would make his camp beside that tree
Of all the shades in the forest.

PRAISE-SINGER Who would deny your reputation, snake-on-the-loose in dark passages of the market! Bed-bug who wages war on the mat and receives the thanks of the vanquished! When caught with his bride's own sister he protested—but I was only prostrating myself to her as becomes a grateful in-law. Hunter who carries his powder-horn⁶ on the hips and fires crouching or standing! Warrior who never makes that excuse of the whining coward—but how can I go to battle without my trousers?—trouserless or shirtless it's all one to him. Oka⁷-rearing-from-a-camouflage-of-leaves, before he strikes the victim is already prone! Once they told him, Howu, a stallion does not feed on the grass beneath him: he replied, true, but surely he can roll on it!

WOMEN Ba-a-a-ba O!

PRAISE-SINGER Ah, but listen yet. You know there is the leaf-nibbling grub and there is the cola-chewing beetle; the leaf-nibbling grub lives on the leaf, the cola-chewing beetle lives in the colanut.⁸
Don't we know what our man feeds on when we find him
cocooned in a woman's wrapper?

ELESIN Enough, enough, you all have cause
To know me well. But, if you say this earth
Is still the same as gave birth to those songs,
Tell me who was that goddess through whose lips
I saw the ivory pebbles of Oya's⁹ river-bed.
Iyaloja, who is she? I saw her enter
Your stall; all your daughters I know well.
No, not even Ogun¹-of-the-farm toiling
Dawn till dusk on his tuber patch
Not even Ogun with the finest hoe he ever Forged at the anvil could have shaped
That rise of buttocks, not though he had
The richest earth between his fingers.
Her wrapper was no disguise
For thighs whose ripples shamed the river's Coils around the hills of Ilesì.² Her eyes
Were new-laid eggs glowing in the dark.
Her skin . . .

IYALOJA Elesin Oba . . .

ELESIN What! Where do you all say I am?

IYALOJA Still among the living.

ELESIN And that radiance which so suddenly Lit up this market I could boast
I knew so well?

IYALOJA Has one step already in her husband's home. She is betrothed.

ELESIN [irritated] Why do you tell me that?

[IYALOJA falls silent. The WOMEN shuffle uneasily.]

IYALOJA Not because we dare give you offence Elesin. Today is your day and the whole world is yours. Still, even those who leave town to make a new dwelling elsewhere like to be remembered by what they leave behind.

ELESIN Who does not seek to be remembered?
Memory is Master of Death, the chink
In his armour of conceit. I shall leave
That which makes my going the sheerest
Dream of an afternoon. Should voyagers
Not travel light? Let the considerate traveller Shed, of his excessive load, all
That may benefit the living.

WOMEN [relieved] Ah Elesin Oba, we knew you for a man of honour.

ELESIN Then honour me. I deserve a bed of honour to lie upon.

IYALOJA The best is yours. We know you for a man of honour. You are not one who eats and leaves nothing on his plate for children. Did you not say it yourself? Not one who blights the happiness of others for a moment's pleasure.

ELESIN Who speaks of pleasure? O women, listen!
Pleasure palls. Our acts should have meaning.
The sap of the plantain³ never dries.
You have seen the young shoot swelling
Even as the parent stalk begins to wither.
Women, let my going be likened to
The twilight hour of the plantain.

WOMEN What does he mean Iyaloja? This language is the language of our elders, we do not fully grasp it.

IYALOJA I dare not understand you yet Elesin.

ELESIN All you who stand before the spirit that dares
The opening of the last door of passage,
Dare to rid my going of regrets! My wish

Transcends the blotting out of thought
In one mere moment's tremor of the senses.
Do me credit. And do me honour.
I am girded for the route beyond
Burdens of waste and longing.
Then let me travel light. Let Seed that will not serve the stomach
On the way remain behind. Let it take root
In the earth of my choice, in this earth
I leave behind.

IYALOJA [turns to WOMEN] The voice I hear is already touched by the waiting fingers of our departed. I dare not refuse.

WOMAN But Iyaloja . . .

IYALOJA The matter is no longer in our hands.

WOMAN But she is betrothed to your own son. Tell him.

IYALOJA My son's wish is mine. I did the asking for him, the loss can be remedied. But who will remedy the blight of closed hands on the day when all should be openness and light? Tell him, you say!
You wish that I burden him with knowledge that will sour his wish and lay regrets on the last moments of his mind. You pray to him who is your intercessor to the world—don't set this world adrift in your own time; would you rather it was my hand whose sacrilege⁴ wrenched it loose?

WOMAN Not many men will brave the curse of a dispossessed husband.

IYALOJA Only the curses of the departed are to be feared. The claims of one whose foot is on the threshold of their abode surpasses even the claims of blood. It is impiety even to place hindrances in their ways.

ELESIN What do my mothers say? Shall I step
Burdened into the unknown?

IYALOJA Not we, but the very earth says No. The sap in the plantain does not dry. Let grain that will not feed the voyager at his passage drop here and take root as he steps beyond this earth and us. Oh you who fill the home from hearth to threshold with the voices of children, you who now bestride the hidden gulf and pause to draw the right foot across and into the resting-home of the great forebears, it is good that your loins be drained into the earth we know, that your last strength be ploughed back into the womb that gave you being.

PRAISE-SINGER Iyaloja, mother of multitudes in the teeming market of the world, how your wisdom transfigures you!

IYALOJA [smiling broadly, completely reconciled] Elesin, even at the narrow end of the passage I know you will look back and sigh a last regret for the flesh that flashed past your spirit in flight. You always had a restless eye. Your choice has my blessing. [To the WOMEN.] Take the good news to our daughter and make her ready. [Some WOMEN go off.]

ELESIN Your eyes were clouded at first.

IYALOJA Not for long. It is those who stand at the gateway of the great change to whose cry we must pay heed. And then, think of this—it makes the mind tremble. The fruit of such a union is rare. It will be neither of this world nor of the next. Nor of the one behind us. As if the timelessness of the ancestor world and the unborn have joined spirits to wring an issue of the elusive being of passage . . . Elesin!

ELESIN I am here. What is it?

IYALOJA Did you hear all I said just now?

ELESIN Yes.

IYALOJA The living must eat and drink. When the moment comes, don't turn the food to rodents' droppings in their mouth. Don't let them taste the ashes of the world when they step out at dawn to breathe the morning dew.

ELESIN This doubt is unworthy of you Iyaloja.

IYALOJA Eating the awusa⁵ nut is not so difficult as drinking water afterwards.

ELESIN The waters of the bitter stream are honey to a man Whose tongue has savoured all.

IYALOJA No one knows when the ants desert their home; they leave the mound intact. The swallow is never seen to peck holes in its nest when it is time to move with the season. There are always throngs of humanity behind the leave-taker. The rain should not come through the roof for them, the wind must not blow through the walls at night.

ELESIN I refuse to take offence.

IYALOJA You wish to travel light. Well, the earth is yours. But be sure the seed you leave in it attracts no curse.

ELESIN You really mistake my person Iyaloja.

IYALOJA I said nothing. Now we must go prepare your bridal chamber. Then these same hands will lay your shrouds.

ELESIN [exasperated] Must you be so blunt? [Recovers.] Well, weave your shrouds, but let the fingers of my bride seal my eyelids with earth and wash my body.

IYALOJA Prepare yourself Elesin.

[She gets up to leave. At that moment the WOMEN return, leading the BRIDE. ELESIN's face glows with pleasure. He flicks the sleeves of his agbada⁶ with renewed confidence and steps forward to meet the group. As the girl kneels before IYALOJA, lights fade out on the scene.]

Endnotes

- Note 5: Why have you come? (Yoruba). Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A young male chicken. "Tryst": a romantic rendezvous. Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The Yoruba trickster god; often associated with doubleness, ambivalence, and duplicity. He is also a messenger between the realms of gods and humans. Return to reference 7
- Note 8: A rich, woven cloth, brightly coloured [Soyinka's glossary]. "Damask": woven patterned fabric with a satiny finish. Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Praise-singer. Return to reference 9
- Note 1: A deep violet-blue dye obtained from plants; associated with royalty and power. Return to reference 1

- Note 2: A reference to the transatlantic slave trade, which began in Nigeria in the late 15th century (with the complicity of local African rulers), and to the wars between Yoruba kingdoms in the 18th and 19th centuries.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: As it attempted to consolidate its authority in the 16th century, the Yoruba kingdom of Oyo had to rebuild its capital several times.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The space of transition between life and death.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: A bird whose chirping sounds as if it is saying “Not I” in Yoruba.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The soft, edible part of a palm nut.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The kapok or silk-cotton tree, cultivated for its cottonlike seed fiber.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Placatory rites or medicine [Soyinka’s glossary].Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Considered the equivalent of one week.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: King Orayan was one of the children of Odudawa, the founder of the Yoruba people. According to Yoruba history, a commemorative obelisk, or plinth, was erected in his honor in Ile-Ife, the Yoruba ancestral home.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The mistress of a wealthy or high-born man.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: A delicacy made from crushed melon seeds, fried in tiny balls [Soyinka’s glossary]. “Ha’penny”: halfpenny, a low-denomination British coin.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Muslim teacher.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: String of beads used in Ifa divination [Soyinka’s glossary]. “Divination”: the art of trying to foretell the future or to discover hidden knowledge through supernatural means.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The carved board on which divination beads are thrown and then interpreted.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Contraction of “Ifawomi,” meaning “Ifa watches over me.” “Ifa”: the Yoruba god of divination.Return to reference 7

- Note 8: Patron deity of diviners and medicine men in Yoruba culture.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: A bird of prey.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Another name for Esu (see n. 7, p. 865).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: A squat, carved figure, endowed with the powers of an incubus [Soyinka's glossary]. "Incubus": an imaginary evil spirit that descends on people when they are asleep.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: A person whose profession is to tap palm trees for their sap, which is fermented into a wine.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Catlike carnivorous mammal whose glandular secretion is used in making perfume.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Snake.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Possibly another reference to Esu Elegba, the trickster god, who, especially in Caribbean and South American versions, limps because one foot is in the human world and the other in the spiritual world.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Half of a hollow gourd often used to serve food or water.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: A richly valued woven cloth [Soyinka's glossary].Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Skin from a large nonvenomous snake that usually kills its victims by constriction and suffocation.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: In the afterlife.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: A mound of earth formed by a colony of ants in the construction of their underground nests.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: An attendant in a religious service.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: An African teak, a large tree believed, in Yoruba folklore, to be inhabited by a roguish fairy or spirit.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The heartwood, or inside, of the iroko tree is made up of a variety of colors.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Yoruba hunters carry their gunpowder in the hollowed-out horn of an animal.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Python.Return to reference 7

- Note 8: The caffeinated seed of the cola (kola) nut tree was used as a ritual symbol of welcome.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Goddess of the Niger River, Africa's third-longest waterway, and patron of fishermen and sailors.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: God of iron and war, of hunters, soldiers, and blacksmiths; also considered to be the patron of artists.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: A district and town in Oyo, western Nigeria.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: A variety of banana, a staple of the tropical regions of Africa.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Disrespect of something held to be sacred.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: A climbing plant, also known as Nigerian walnut.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Large flowing robe usually worn by men and often embroidered at the neck and chest.Return to reference 6

2

The verandah of the District Officer's bungalow.⁷ A tango is playing from an old hand-cranked gramophone and, glimpsed through the wide windows and doors which open onto the forestage verandah are the shapes of SIMON PILKINGS and his wife, JANE, tangoing in and out of shadows in the living-room. They are wearing what is immediately apparent as some form of fancy-dress. The dance goes on for some moments and then the figure of a 'NATIVE ADMINISTRATION' POLICEMAN⁸ emerges and climbs up the steps onto the verandah. He peeps through and observes the dancing couple, reacting with what is obviously a long-standing bewilderment. He stiffens suddenly, his expression changes to one of disbelief and horror. In his excitement he upsets a flowerpot and attracts the attention of the couple. They stop dancing.

PILKINGS Is there anyone out there?

JANE I'll turn off the gramophone.

PILKINGS [approaching the verandah] I'm sure I heard something fall over. [The CONSTABLE retreats slowly, open-mouthed as PILKINGS approaches the verandah.] Oh it's you Amusa. Why didn't you just knock instead of knocking things over?

AMUSA [stammers badly and points a shaky finger at his dress]

Mista Prinkin . . . Mista Prinkin . . .

PILKINGS What is the matter with you?

JANE [emerging] Who is it dear? Oh, Amusa . . .

PILKINGS Yes it's Amusa, and acting most strangely.

AMUSA [his attention now transferred to MRS PILKINGS] Mammadam . . . you too!

PILKINGS What the hell is the matter with you man!

JANE Your costume darling. Our fancy dress.

PILKINGS Oh hell, I'd forgotten all about that. [Lifts the face mask over his head showing his face. His wife follows suit.]

JANE I think you've shocked his big pagan heart bless him.

PILKINGS Nonsense, he's a Moslem. Come on Amusa, you don't believe in all this nonsense do you? I thought you were a good Moslem.

AMUSA Mista Pirinkin, I beg you sir, what you think you do with that dress? It belong to dead cult, not for human being.

PILKINGS Oh Amusa, what a let down you are. I swear by you at the club you know—thank God for Amusa, he doesn't believe in any mumbo-jumbo⁹ And now look at you!

AMUSA Mista Pirinkin, I beg you, take it off. Is not good for man like you to touch that cloth.

PILKINGS Well, I've got it on. And what's more Jane and I have bet on it we're taking first prize at the ball. Now, if you can just pull yourself together and tell me what you wanted to see me about . .

AMUSA Sir, I cannot talk this matter to you in that dress. I no fit.

PILKINGS What's that rubbish again?

JANE He is dead earnest too Simon. I think you'll have to handle this delicately.

PILKINGS Delicately my . . . ! Look here Amusa, I think this little joke has gone far enough hm? Let's have some sense. You seem to forget that you are a police officer in the service of His Majesty's Government. I order you to report your business at once or face disciplinary action.

AMUSA Sir, it is a matter of death. How can man talk against death to person in uniform of death? Is like talking against government to person in uniform of police. Please sir, I go and come back.

PILKINGS [roars] Now! [AMUSA switches his gaze to the ceiling suddenly, remains mute.]

JANE Oh Amusa, what is there to be scared of in the costume? You saw it confiscated last month from those *egungun*¹ men who were creating trouble in town. You helped arrest the cult leaders yourself—if the juju² didn't harm you at the time how could it possibly harm you now? And merely by looking at it?

AMUSA [without looking down] Madam, I arrest the ringleaders who make trouble but me I no touch egungun. That egungun itself, I no touch. And I no abuse 'am. I arrest ringleader but I treat egungun with respect.

PILKINGS It's hopeless. We'll merely end up missing the best part of the ball. When they get this way there is nothing you can do. It's simply hammering against a brick wall. Write your report or whatever it is on that pad Amusa and take yourself out of here. Come on Jane. We only upset his delicate sensibilities by remaining here.

[AMUSA waits for them to leave, then writes in the notebook, somewhat laboriously. Drumming from the direction of the town wells up. AMUSA listens, makes a movement as if he wants to recall PILKINGS but changes his mind. Completes his note and goes. A few moments later PILKINGS emerges, picks up the pad and reads.]

PILKINGS Jane!

JANE [from the bedroom] Coming darling. Nearly ready.

PILKINGS Never mind being ready, just listen to this.

JANE What is it?

PILKINGS Amusa's report. Listen. 'I have to report that it come to my information that one prominent chief, namely, the Elesin Oba, is to commit death tonight as a result of native custom. Because this is criminal offence I await further instruction at charge office. Sergeant Amusa.'

[JANE comes out onto the verandah while he is reading.]

JANE Did I hear you say commit death?

PILKINGS Obviously he means murder.

JANE You mean a ritual murder?

PILKINGS Must be. You think you've stamped it all out but it's always lurking under the surface somewhere.

JANE Oh. Does it mean we are not getting to the ball at all?

PILKINGS No-o. I'll have the man arrested. Everyone remotely involved. In any case there may be nothing to it. Just rumours.

JANE Really? I thought you found Amusa's rumours generally reliable.

PILKINGS That's true enough. But who knows what may have been giving him the scare lately. Look at his conduct tonight.

JANE [laughing] You have to admit he had his own peculiar logic. [Deepens her voice.] How can man talk against death to person in uniform of death? [Laughs.] Anyway, you can't go into the police station dressed like that.

PILKINGS I'll send Joseph with instructions. Damn it, what a confounded nuisance!

JANE But don't you think you should talk first to the man, Simon?

PILKINGS Do you want to go to the ball or not?

JANE Darling, why are you getting rattled? I was only trying to be intelligent. It seems hardly fair just to lock up a man—and a chief at that—simply on the er . . . what is the legal word again?—uncorroborated word of a sergeant.

PILKINGS Well, that's easily decided. Joseph!

JOSEPH [from within] Yes master.

PILKINGS You're quite right of course, I am getting rattled. Probably the effect of those bloody drums. Do you hear how they go on and on?

JANE I wondered when you'd notice. Do you suppose it has something to do with this affair?

PILKINGS Who knows? They always find an excuse for making a noise . . . [Thoughtfully.] Even so . . .

JANE Yes Simon?

PILKINGS It's different Jane. I don't think I've heard this particular—sound—before. Something unsettling about it.

JANE I thought all bush drumming sounded the same.

PILKINGS Don't tease me now Jane. This may be serious.

JANE I'm sorry. [Gets up and throws her arms around his neck. Kisses him. The HOUSEBOY enters, retreats and knocks.]

PILKINGS [wearily] Oh, come in Joseph! I don't know where you pick up all these elephantine³ notions of tact. Come over here.

JOSEPH Sir?

PILKINGS Joseph, are you a christian or not?

JOSEPH Yessir.

PILKINGS Does seeing me in this outfit bother you?

JOSEPH No sir, it has no power.

PILKINGS Thank God for some sanity at last. Now Joseph, answer me on the honour of a christian—what is supposed to be going on in town tonight?

JOSEPH Tonight sir? You mean the chief who is going to kill himself?

PILKINGS What?

JANE What do you mean, kill himself?

PILKINGS You do mean he is going to kill somebody don't you?

JOSEPH No master. He will not kill anybody and no one will kill him. He will simply die.

JANE But why Joseph?

JOSEPH It is native law and custom. The King die last month. Tonight is his burial. But before they can bury him, the Elesin must die so as to accompany him to heaven.

PILKINGS I seem to be fated to clash more often with that man than with any of the other chiefs.

JOSEPH He is the King's Chief Horseman.

PILKINGS [in a resigned way] I know.

JANE Simon, what's the matter?

PILKINGS It would have to be him!

JANE Who is he?

PILKINGS Don't you remember? He's that chief with whom I had a scrap some three or four years ago. I helped his son get to a medical school in England, remember? He fought tooth and nail to prevent it.

JANE Oh now I remember. He was that very sensitive young man. What was his name again?

PILKINGS Olunde. Haven't replied to his last letter come to think of it. The old pagan wanted him to stay and carry on some family tradition or the other. Honestly I couldn't understand the fuss he made. I literally had to help the boy escape from close confinement and load him onto the next boat. A most intelligent boy, really bright.

JANE I rather thought he was much too sensitive you know. The kind of person you feel should be a poet munching rose petals in

Bloomsbury.⁴

PILKINGS Well, he's going to make a first-class doctor. His mind is set on that. And as long as he wants my help he is welcome to it.

JANE [after a pause] Simon.

PILKINGS Yes?

JANE This boy, he was the eldest son wasn't he?

PILKINGS I'm not sure. Who could tell with that old ram?

JANE Do you know, Joseph?

JOSEPH Oh yes madam. He was the eldest son. That's why Elesin cursed master good and proper. The eldest son is not supposed to travel away from the land.

JANE [giggling] Is that true Simon? Did he really curse you good and proper?

PILKINGS By all accounts I should be dead by now.

JOSEPH Oh no, master is white man. And good christian. Black man juju can't touch master.

JANE If he was his eldest, it means that he would be the Elesin to the next king. It's a family thing isn't it Joseph?

JOSEPH Yes madam. And if this Elesin had died before the King, his eldest son must take his place.

JANE That would explain why the old chief was so mad you took the boy away.

PILKINGS Well it makes me all the more happy I did.

JANE I wonder if he knew.

PILKINGS Who? Oh, you mean Olunde?

JANE Yes. Was that why he was so determined to get away? I wouldn't stay if I knew I was trapped in such a horrible custom.

PILKINGS [thoughtfully] No, I don't think he knew. At least he gave no indication. But you couldn't really tell with him. He was rather close you know, quite unlike most of them. Didn't give much away, not even to me.

JANE Aren't they all rather close, Simon?

PILKINGS These natives here? Good gracious. They'll open their mouths and yap with you about their family secrets before you can stop them. Only the other day . . .

JANE But Simon, do they really give anything away? I mean, anything that really counts. This affair for instance, we didn't know they still practised that custom did we?

PILKINGS Ye-e-es, I suppose you're right there. Sly, devious bastards.

JOSEPH [stiffly] Can I go now master? I have to clean the kitchen.

PILKINGS What? Oh, you can go. Forgot you were still there.

[JOSEPH goes.]

JANE Simon, you really must watch your language. Bastard isn't just a simple swear-word in these parts, you know.

PILKINGS Look, just when did you become a social anthropologist, that's what I'd like to know.

JANE I'm not claiming to know anything. I just happen to have overheard quarrels among the servants. That's how I know they consider it a smear.

PILKINGS I thought the extended family system⁵ took care of all that. Elastic family, no bastards.

JANE [shrugs] Have it your own way.

[Awkward silence. The drumming increases in volume. JANE gets up suddenly, restless.]

That drumming Simon, do you think it might really be connected with this ritual? It's been going on all evening.

PILKINGS Let's ask our native guide. Joseph! Just a minute Joseph.

[JOSEPH re-enters.] What's the drumming about?

JOSEPH I don't know master.

PILKINGS What do you mean you don't know? It's only two years since your conversion. Don't tell me all that holy water nonsense also wiped out your tribal memory.

JOSEPH [visibly shocked] Master!

JANE Now you've done it.

PILKINGS What have I done now?

JANE Never mind. Listen Joseph, just tell me this. Is that drumming connected with dying or anything of that nature?

JOSEPH Madam, this is what I am trying to say: I am not sure. It sounds like the death of a great chief and then, it sounds like the wedding of a great chief. It really mix me up.

PILKINGS Oh get back to the kitchen. A fat lot of help you are.

JOSEPH Yes master. [Goes.]

JANE Simon . . .

PILKINGS Alright, alright. I'm in no mood for preaching.

JANE It isn't my preaching you have to worry about, it's the preaching of the missionaries who preceded you here. When they make converts they really convert them. Calling holy water nonsense to our Joseph is really like insulting the Virgin Mary before a Roman Catholic. He's going to hand in his notice tomorrow you mark my word.

PILKINGS Now you're being ridiculous.

JANE Am I? What are you willing to bet that tomorrow we are going to be without a steward-boy?⁶ Did you see his face?

PILKINGS I am more concerned about whether or not we will be one native chief short by tomorrow. Christ! Just listen to those drums. [He strides up and down, undecided.]

JANE [getting up] I'll change and make us some supper.

PILKINGS What's that?

JANE Simon, it's obvious we have to miss this ball.

PILKINGS Nonsense. It's the first bit of real fun the European club⁷ has managed to organise for over a year, I'm damned if I'm going to miss it. And it is a rather special occasion. Doesn't happen every day.

JANE You know this business has to be stopped Simon. And you are the only man who can do it.

PILKINGS I don't have to stop anything. If they want to throw themselves off the top of a cliff or poison themselves for the sake of some barbaric custom what is that to me? If it were ritual murder or something like that I'd be duty-bound to do something. I can't keep an eye on all the potential suicides in this province. And as for that man—believe me it's good riddance.

JANE [laughs] I know you better than that Simon. You are going to have to do something to stop it—after you’ve finished blustering.

PILKINGS [shouts after her] And suppose after all it’s only a wedding. I’d look a proper fool if I interrupted a chief on his honeymoon, wouldn’t I? [Resumes his angry stride, slows down.] Ah well, who can tell what those chiefs actually do on their honeymoon anyway? [He takes up the pad and scribbles rapidly on it.] Joseph! Joseph! Joseph! [Some moments later JOSEPH puts in a sulky appearance.] Did you hear me call you? Why the hell didn’t you answer?

JOSEPH I didn’t hear master.

PILKINGS You didn’t hear me! How come you are here then?

JOSEPH [stubbornly] I didn’t hear master.

PILKINGS [controls himself with an effort] We’ll talk about it in the morning. I want you to take this note directly to Sergeant Amusa. You’ll find him at the charge office.⁸ Get on your bicycle and race there with it. I expect you back in twenty minutes exactly. Twenty minutes, is that clear?

JOSEPH Yes master. [Going.]

PILKINGS Oh er . . . Joseph.

JOSEPH Yes master?

PILKINGS [between gritted teeth] Er . . . forget what I said just now. The holy water is not nonsense. I was talking nonsense.

JOSEPH Yes master. [Goes.]

JANE [pokes her head round the door] Have you found him?

PILKINGS Found who?

JANE Joseph. Weren’t you shouting for him?

PILKINGS Oh yes, he turned up finally.

JANE You sounded desperate. What was it all about?

PILKINGS Oh nothing. I just wanted to apologise to him. Assure him that the holy water isn’t really nonsense.

JANE Oh? And how did he take it?

PILKINGS Who the hell gives a damn! I had a sudden vision of our Very Reverend Macfarlane drafting another letter of complaint to the Resident about my unchristian language towards his parishioners.

JANE Oh I think he's given up on you by now.

PILKINGS Don't be too sure. And anyway, I wanted to make sure Joseph didn't 'lose' my note on the way. He looked sufficiently full of the holy crusade to do some such thing.

JANE If you've finished exaggerating, come and have something to eat.

PILKINGS No, put it all away. We can still get to the ball.

JANE Simon . . .

PILKINGS Get your costume back on. Nothing to worry about. I've instructed Amusa to arrest the man and lock him up.

JANE But that station is hardly secure Simon. He'll soon get his friends to help him escape.

PILKINGS A-ah, that's where I have out-thought you. I'm not having him put in the station cell. Amusa will bring him right here and lock him up in my study. And he'll stay with him till we get back. No one will dare come here to incite him to anything.

JANE How clever of you darling. I'll get ready.

PILKINGS Hey.

JANE Yes darling.

PILKINGS I have a surprise for you. I was going to keep it until we actually got to the ball.

JANE What is it?

PILKINGS You know the Prince is on a tour of the colonies don't you? Well, he docked in the capital only this morning but he is already at the Residency.⁹ He is going to grace the ball with his presence later tonight.

JANE Simon! Not really.

PILKINGS Yes he is. He's been invited to give away the prizes and he has agreed. You must admit old Engleton is the best Club Secretary we ever had. Quick off the mark that lad.

JANE But how thrilling.

PILKINGS The other provincials are going to be damned envious.

JANE I wonder what he'll come as.

PILKINGS Oh I don't know. As a coat-of-arms¹ perhaps. Anyway it won't be anything to touch this.

JANE Well that's lucky. If we are to be presented I won't have to start looking for a pair of gloves. It's all sewn on.

PILKINGS [laughing] Quite right. Trust a woman to think of that. Come on, let's get going.

JANE [rushing off] Won't be a second. [Stops.] Now I see why you've been so edgy all evening. I thought you weren't handling this affair with your usual brilliance—to begin with that is.

PILKINGS [his mood is much improved] Shut up woman and get your things on.

JANE Alright boss, coming.

[PILKINGS suddenly begins to hum the tango to which they were dancing before. Starts to execute a few practice steps. Lights fade.]

Endnotes

- Note 7: A one-story house generally surrounded by a “verandah,” a large covered porch, favored by colonial officials as a protection against the tropical heat. Both words are of Indian (Hindi) origin.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: A policeman belonging to a unit charged with the policing of Africans and considered inferior to the regular police.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: An object of superstitious veneration. The term may derive from a West African word for a masked male dancer in religious ceremonies.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Ancestral masquerade [Soyinka's glossary]. The masked figures in the masquerade embody the reincarnated spirits of ancestors; they appear at traditional celebrations, festivals, and funerals, and bridge the world of the living and the dead.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Magic, usually associated with an object like an amulet or charm.Return to reference 2

- Note 3: Ponderous or clumsy.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: A fashionable district in central London associated with literature, art, and high culture.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The domestic system in which the distinction between the nuclear family and other relatives is not strictly maintained.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A domestic servant.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: A club reserved for Europeans.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The office in a police station where the names of criminal suspects are recorded.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The governor's official residence.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Crest.Return to reference 1

3

A swelling, agitated hum of women's voices rises immediately in the background. The lights come on and we see the frontage of a converted cloth stall in the market. The floor leading up to the entrance is covered in rich velvets and woven cloth. The WOMEN come on stage, borne backwards by the determined progress of Sergeant AMUSA and his two CONSTABLES who already have their batons out and use them as a pressure against the WOMEN. At the edge of the cloth-covered floor however the WOMEN take a determined stand and block all further progress of the men. They begin to tease them mercilessly.

AMUSA I am tell you women for last time to commot my road.² I am here on official business.

WOMAN Official business you white man's eunuch? Official business is taking place where you want to go and it's a business you wouldn't understand.

WOMAN [makes a quick tug at the CONSTABLE's baton] That doesn't fool anyone you know. It's the one you carry under your government knickers³ that counts. [She bends low as if to peep under the baggy shorts. The embarrassed CONSTABLE quickly puts his knees together. The WOMEN roar.]

WOMAN You mean there is nothing there at all?

WOMAN Oh there was something. You know that handbell which the whiteman uses to summon his servants . . . ?

AMUSA [he manages to preserve some dignity throughout] I hope you women know that interfering with officer in execution of his duty is criminal offence.

WOMAN Interfere? He says we're interfering with him. You foolish man we're telling you there's nothing to interfere with.

AMUSA I am order you now to clear the road.

WOMAN What road? The one your father built?

WOMAN You are a Policeman not so? Then you know what they call trespassing in court. Or—[Pointing to the cloth-lined steps—do you think that kind of road is built for every kind of feet.

WOMAN Go back and tell the white man who sent you to come himself.

AMUSA If I go I will come back with reinforcement. And we will all return carrying weapons.

WOMAN Oh, now I understand. Before they can put on those knickers the white man first cuts off their weapons.

WOMAN What a cheek! You mean you come here to show power to women and you don't even have a weapon.

AMUSA [shouting above the laughter] For the last time I warn you women to clear the road.

WOMAN To where?

AMUSA To that hut. I know he dey dere.

WOMAN Who?

AMUSA The chief who call himself Elesin Oba.

WOMAN You ignorant man. It is not he who calls himself Elesin Oba, it is his blood that says it. As it called out to his father before him and will to his son after him. And that is in spite of everything your white man can do.

WOMAN Is it not the same ocean that washes this land and the white man's land? Tell your white man he can hide our son away as long as he likes. When the time comes for him, the same ocean will bring him back.

AMUSA The government say dat kin' ting⁴ must stop.

WOMAN Who will stop it? You? Tonight our husband and father will prove himself greater than the laws of strangers.

AMUSA I tell you nobody go prove anyting tonight or anytime. Is ignorant and criminal to prove dat kin' prove.

IYALOJA [entering, from the hut. She is accompanied by a group of YOUNG GIRLS who have been attending the BRIDE] What is it Amusa? Why do you come here to disturb the happiness of others.

AMUSA Madame Iyaloja, I glad you come. You know me, I no like trouble but duty is duty. I am here to arrest Elesin for criminal intent. Tell these women to stop obstructing me in the performance of my duty.

IYALOJA And you? What gives you the right to obstruct our leader of men in the performance of his duty?

AMUSA What kin' duty be dat one Iyaloja.

IYALOJA What kin' duty? What kin' duty does a man have to his new bride?

AMUSA [bewildered, looks at the WOMEN and at the entrance to the hut] Iyaloja, is it wedding you call dis kin' ting?

IYALOJA You have wives haven't you? Whatever the white man has done to you he hasn't stopped you having wives. And if he has, at least he is married. If you don't know what a marriage is, go and ask him to tell you.

AMUSA This no to wedding.

IYALOJA And ask him at the same time what he would have done if anyone had come to disturb him on his wedding night.

AMUSA Iyaloja, I say dis no to wedding.

IYALOJA You want to look inside the bridal chamber? You want to see for yourself how a man cuts the virgin knot?⁵

AMUSA Madam . . .

WOMAN Perhaps his wives are still waiting for him to learn.

AMUSA Iyaloja, make you tell dese women make den no insult me again. If I hear dat kin' insult once more . . .

GIRL [pushing her way through] You will do what?

GIRL He's out of his mind. It's our mothers you're talking to, do you know that? Not to any illiterate villager you can bully and terrorise. How dare you intrude here anyway?

GIRL What a cheek, what impertinence!

GIRL You've treated them too gently. Now let them see what it is to tamper with the mothers of this market.

GIRL Your betters dare not enter the market when the women say no!

GIRL Haven't you learnt that yet, you jester in khaki and starch?

IYALOJA Daughters . . .

GIRL No no Iyaloja, leave us to deal with him. He no longer knows his mother, we'll teach him.

[With a sudden movement they snatch the batons of the two CONSTABLES. They begin to hem them in.]

GIRL What next? We have your batons? What next? What are you going to do?

[With equally swift movements they knock off their hats.]

GIRL Move if you dare. We have your hats, what will you do about it? Didn't the white man teach you to take off your hats before women?

IYALOJA It's a wedding night. It's a night of joy for us. Peace . . .

GIRL Not for him. Who asked him here?

GIRL Does he dare go to the Residency without an invitation?

GIRL Not even where the servants eat the left-overs.

GIRL [in turn. In an 'English' accent] Well well it's Mister Amusa. Were you invited? [Play-acting to one another. The older WOMEN encourage them with their titters.]

—Your invitation card please?

—Who are you? Have we been introduced?

—And who did you say you were?

—Sorry, I didn't quite catch your name.

—May I take your hat?

—If you insist. May I take yours? [Exchanging the POLICEMEN'S hats.]

—How very kind of you.

—Not at all. Won't you sit down?

—After you.

—Oh no.

—I insist.

—You're most gracious.

—And how do you find the place?

—The natives are alright.

—Friendly?

—Tractable.

—Not a teeny-weeny bit restless?

—Well, a teeny-weeny bit restless.

—One might even say, difficult?

—Indeed one might be tempted to say, difficult.
—But you do manage to cope?
—Yes indeed I do. I have a rather faithful ox called Amusa.
—He's loyal?
—Absolutely.
—Lay down his life for you what?
—Without a moment's thought.
—Had one like that once. Trust him with my life.
—Mostly of course they are liars.
—Never known a native to tell the truth.
—Does it get rather close around here?
—It's mild for this time of the year.
—But the rains may still come.
—They are late this year aren't they?
—They are keeping African time.
—Ha ha ha ha
—Ha ha ha ha
—The humidity is what gets me.
—It used to be whisky.
—Ha ha ha ha
—Ha ha ha ha
—What's your handicap⁶ old chap?
—Is there racing by golly?
—Splendid golf course, you'll like it.
—I'm beginning to like it already.
—And a European club, exclusive.
—You've kept the flag flying.
—We do our best for the old country.
—It's a pleasure to serve.
—Another whisky old chap?
—You are indeed too too kind.
—Not at all sir. Where is that boy? [With a sudden bellow.]
Sergeant!
AMUSA [snaps to attention] Yessir!

[The WOMEN collapse with laughter.]

GIRL Take your men out of here.

AMUSA [realising the trick, he rages from loss of face] I'm give you warning . . .

GIRL Alright then. Off with his knickers! [They surge slowly forward.]

IYALOJA Daughters, please.

AMUSA [squaring himself for defence] The first woman wey touch me . . .

IYALOJA My children, I beg of you . . .

GIRL Then tell him to leave this market. This is the home of our mothers. We don't want the eater of white left-overs at the feast their hands have prepared.

IYALOJA You heard them Amusa. You had better go.

GIRL Now!

AMUSA [commencing his retreat] We dey go now, but make you no say we no warn you.

GIRL Now!

GIRL Before we read the riot act—you should know all about that.

AMUSA Make we go. [They depart, more precipitately.]

[The WOMEN strike their palms across in the gesture of wonder.]

WOMEN Do they teach you all that at school?

WOMAN And to think I nearly kept Apinke away from the place.

WOMAN Did you hear them? Did you see how they mimicked the white man?

WOMAN The voices exactly. Hey, there are wonders in this world!

IYALOJA Well, our elders have said it: Dada may be weak, but he has a younger sibling who is truly fearless.⁷

WOMAN The next time the white man shows his face in this market I will set Wuraola⁸ on his tail.

[*A WOMAN bursts into song and dance of euphoria—Tani l'awa o l'ogbeja? Kayi! A l'ogbeja. Omo Kekere l'ogbeja.*⁹ The rest of the WOMEN join in, some placing the GIRLS on their back like infants, others dancing round them. The dance becomes general, mounting in excitement. ELESIN appears, in wrapper only. In his hands a white velvet cloth folded loosely as if it held some delicate object. He cries out.]

ELESIN Oh you mothers of beautiful brides! [The dancing stops. They turn and see him, and the object in his hands. IYALOJA approaches and gently takes the cloth from him.] Take it. It is no mere virgin stain, but the union of life and the seeds of passage. My vital flow, the last from this flesh is intermingled with the promise of future life. All is prepared. Listen! [A steady drum-beat from the distance.] Yes. It is nearly time. The King's dog has been killed. The King's favourite horse is about to follow his master. My brother chiefs know their task and perform it well. [He listens again.]

[The BRIDE emerges, stands shyly by the door. He turns to her.]

Our marriage is not yet wholly fulfilled. When earth and passage wed, the consummation is complete only when there are grains of earth on the eyelids of passage. Stay by me till then. My faithful drummers, do me your last service. This is where I have chosen to do my leave-taking, in this heart of life, this hive which contains the swarm of the world in its small compass. This is where I have known love and laughter away from the palace. Even the richest food cloy¹ when eaten days on end; in the market, nothing ever cloy. Listen. [They listen to the drums.] They have begun to seek out the heart of the King's favourite horse. Soon it will ride in its bolt of raffia² with the dog at its feet. Together they will ride on the shoulders of the King's grooms through the pulse centres of the town. They know it is here I shall await them. I have told them. [His eyes appear to cloud. He passes his hand over them as if to clear his sight. He gives a faint smile.] It promises well; just then I felt my spirit's eagerness. The kite makes for wide spaces and the wind creeps up behind its tail; can the kite say less than—thank you, the quicker the better? But wait a while my spirit. Wait.

Wait for the coming of the courier of the King. Do you know, friends, the horse is born to this one destiny, to bear the burden that is man upon its back. Except for this night, this night alone when the spotless stallion will ride in triumph on the back of man. In the time of my father I witnessed the strange sight. Perhaps tonight also I shall see it for the last time. If they arrive before the drums beat for me, I shall tell them to let the Alafin³ know I follow swiftly. If they come after the drums have sounded, why then, all is well for I have gone ahead. Our spirits shall fall in step along the great passage. [He listens to the drums. He seems again to be falling into a state of semi-hypnosis; his eyes scan the sky but it is in a kind of daze. His voice is a little breathless.] The moon has fed, a glow from its full stomach fills the sky and air, but I cannot tell where is that gateway through which I must pass. My faithful friends, let our feet touch together this last time, lead me into the other market with sounds that cover my skin with down yet make my limbs strike earth like a thoroughbred. Dear mothers, let me dance into the passage even as I have lived beneath your roofs. [*He comes down progressively among them. They make way for him, the DRUMMERS playing. His dance is one of solemn, regal motions, each gesture of the body is made with a solemn finality. The WOMEN join him, their steps a somewhat more fluid version of his. Beneath the PRAISE-SINGER's exhortations the women dirge 'Alẹlẹlẹ, awo mi lọ.*⁴]

PRAISE-SINGER Elesin Alfain, can you hear my voice?

ELESIN Faintly, my friend, faintly.

PRAISE-SINGER Elesin Alafin, can you hear my call?

ELESIN Faintly my king, faintly.

PRAISE-SINGER Is your memory sound Elesin?

 Shall my voice be a blade of grass and Tickle the armpit of the past?

ELESIN My memory needs no prodding but

 What do you wish to say to me?

PRAISE-SINGER Only what has been spoken. Only what concerns

The dying wish of the father of all.

ELESIN It is buried like seed-yam in my mind.

This is the season of quick rains, the harvest
Is this moment due for gathering.

PRAISE-SINGER If you cannot come, I said, swear You'll tell my favourite horse. I shall Ride on through the gates alone.

ELESIN Elesin's message will be read
Only when his loyal heart no longer beats.

PRAISE-SINGER If you cannot come Elesin, tell my dog.
I cannot stay the keeper too long
At the gate.

ELESIN A dog does not outrun the hand
That feeds it meat. A horse that throws its rider
Slows down to a stop. Elesin Alafin Trusts no beasts with messages between
A king and his companion.

PRAISE-SINGER If you get lost my dog will track
The hidden path to me.

ELESIN The seven-way crossroads⁵ confuses
Only the stranger. The Horseman of the King
Was born in the recesses of the house.

PRAISE-SINGER I know the wickedness of men. If there is Weight on the loose end of your sash, such weight
As no mere man can shift; if your sash is earthed
By evil minds who mean to part us at the last . . .

ELESIN My sash is of the deep purple alari;
It is no tethering-rope. The elephant
Trails no tethering-rope; that king
Is not yet crowned who will peg an elephant—
Not even you my friend and King.

PRAISE-SINGER And yet this fear will not depart from me
The darkness of this new abode is deep—
Will your human eyes suffice?

ELESIN In a night which falls before our eyes

However deep, we do not miss our way.

PRAISE-SINGER Shall I now not acknowledge I have stood
Where wonders met their end? The elephant deserves
Better than that we say 'I have caught
A glimpse of something'. If we see the tamer
Of the forest let us say plainly, we have seen An elephant.

ELESIN [his voice is drowsy]

I have freed myself of earth and now
It's getting dark. Strange voices guide my feet.

PRAISE-SINGER The river is never so high that the eyes
Of a fish are covered. The night is not so dark
That the albino⁶ fails to find his way. A child
Returning homewards craves no leading by the hand.
Gracefully does the mask regain his grove at the end of the day .

. .

Gracefully. Gracefully does the mask dance
Homeward at the end of the day, gracefully . . .

[ELESIN's *trance*⁷ appears to be deepening, his steps heavier.]

IYALOJA It is the death of war that kills the valiant,
Death of water is how the swimmer goes
It is the death of markets that kills the trader
And death of indecision takes the idle away
The trade of the cutlass blunts its edge
And the beautiful die the death of beauty.
It takes an Elesin to die the death of death . . .
Only Elesin . . . dies the unknowable death of death . . .
Gracefully, gracefully does the horseman regain
The stables at the end of day, gracefully . . .

PRAISE-SINGER How shall I tell what my eyes have seen? The Horseman gallops on before the courier, how shall I tell what my eyes have seen? He says a dog may be confused by new scents of beings he never dreamt of, so he must precede the dog to heaven. He says a horse may stumble on strange boulders and be lamed, so he races on before the horse to heaven. It is best, he says, to trust no messenger who may falter at the outer gate; oh how shall I tell what my ears have heard? But do you hear me still Elesin, do you hear your faithful one?

[ELESIN in his motions appears to feel for a direction of sound, subtly, but he only sinks deeper into his trance-dance.]

Elesin Alafin, I no longer sense your flesh. The drums are changing now but you have gone far ahead of the world. It is not yet noon in heaven; let those who claim it is begin their own journey home. So why must you rush like an impatient bride: why do you race to desert your Olohun-iyo?

[ELESIN is now sunk fully deep in his trance, there is no longer sign of any awareness of his surroundings.]

Does the deep voice of *gbedu*⁸ cover you then, like the passage of royal elephants? Those drums that brook no rivals, have they blocked the passage to your ears that my voice passes into wind, a mere leaf floating in the night? Is your flesh lightened Elesin, is that lump of earth I slid between your slippers to keep you longer slowly sifting from your feet? Are the drums on the other side now tuning skin to skin with ours in osugbo?⁹ Are there sounds there I cannot hear, do footsteps surround you which pound the earth like gbedu, roll like thunder round the dome of the world? Is the darkness gathering in your head Elesin? Is there now a streak of light at the end of the passage, a light I dare not look upon? Does it reveal whose voices we often heard, whose touches we often felt, whose wisdoms come suddenly into the mind when the wisest have shaken their heads and murmured; It cannot be done? Elesin Alafin, don't think I do not know why your lips are heavy, why your limbs are drowsy as palm oil in the cold of harmattan.¹ I would call you back but when the elephant heads for the jungle, the tail is too small a handhold for the hunter that would pull him back. The sun that heads for the sea no longer heeds the prayers of the farmer. When the river begins to taste the salt of the ocean, we no longer know what deity to call on, the river-god or Olokun.² No arrow flies back to the string, the child does not return through the same passage that gave it birth. Elesin Oba, can you hear me at all? Your eyelids are glazed like a courtesan's, is it that you see the dark groom and master of life? And will you see my father? Will you tell him that I stayed with you to the last? Will my voice ring in your ears awhile, will you remember Olohun-iyo even if the music on the other side surpasses his mortal craft? But will they know you over there? Have they eyes to gauge your worth, have they the heart to love you, will they know what thoroughbred prances towards them in caparisons of honour? If they do not Elesin, if any there cuts your yam with a small knife, or pours you wine in a small calabash, turn back and return to welcoming hands. If the world were not greater than the wishes of Olohun-iyo, I would not let you go . . .

[He appears to break down. ELESIN dances on, completely in a trance. The dirge wells up louder and stronger. ELESIN's dance does not lose its elasticity but his gestures become, if possible, even more weighty. Lights fade slowly on the scene.]

Endnotes

- Note 2: Get out of my way; literally translated from pidgin English as "come out of my road."Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Women's underwear. The reference here is to the khaki shorts won by colonial policemen.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: That kind of thing (pidgin English).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The hymen.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: In sports, an advantage given to a less competitive player to level the playing field.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Dada, the mythical king of Oyo and patron god of newborns, is reputed to have abdicated in favor of his fierce younger brother Shango, the god of thunder and lightning in the Yoruba pantheon.Return to reference 7

- Note 8: Rich Gold (Yoruba), a common name for a girl.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Who says we haven't a defender? Silence! We have our defenders. Little children are our champions [Soyinka's translation].Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Becomes uninteresting or distasteful.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The fiber from raffia palms, used in making skirts for ceremonial masks.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: King or emperor of Oyo.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Night has fallen, the seasoned initiate is leaving.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: In Yoruba cosmology, Esu Elegba, the god of confusion and doubleness, is often found at the crossroads.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A person with pale skin resulting from a lack of melanin pigmentation.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: A hypnotic condition; in another sense, the word refers to a passageway.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: A deep-timbred royal drum [Soyinka's glossary].Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Secret 'executive' cult of the Yoruba; its meeting place [Soyinka's glossary].Return to reference 9
- Note 1: In West Africa, a dry breeze blows from November to March and carries dust from the Sahara Desert.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: God of the ocean, worshiped by fishermen and sailors.Return to reference 2

A Masque.³ The front side of the stage is part of a wide corridor around the great hall of the Residency extending beyond vision into the rear and wings. It is redolent of the tawdry decadence of a far-flung but key imperial frontier. The couples in a variety of fancy-dress are ranged around the walls, gazing in the same direction. The guest-of-honour is about to make an appearance. A portion of the local police brass band with its white conductor is just visible. At last, the entrance of Royalty. The band plays 'Rule Britannia',⁴ badly, beginning long before he is visible. The couples bow and curtsy as he passes by them. Both he and his companions are dressed in seventeenth-century European costume. Following behind are the RESIDENT and his partner similarly attired. As they gain the end of the hall where the orchestra dais begins the music comes to an end. The PRINCE bows to the guests. The band strikes up a Viennese waltz and the PRINCE formally opens the floor. Several bars later the RESIDENT and his companion follow suit. Others follow in appropriate pecking order. The orchestra's waltz rendition is not of the highest musical standard.

Some time later the PRINCE dances again into view and is settled into a corner by the RESIDENT who then proceeds to select couples as they dance past for introduction, sometimes threading his way through the dancers to tap the lucky couple on the shoulder. Desperate efforts from many to ensure that they are recognised in spite of, perhaps, their costume. The ritual of introductions soon takes in PILKINGS and his wife. The PRINCE is quite fascinated by their costume and they demonstrate the adaptations they have made to it, pulling down the mask to demonstrate how the egungun normally appears, then showing the various press-button controls they have innovated for the face flaps, the sleeves, etc. They demonstrate the dance steps and the guttural⁵ sounds made by the egungun, harass other dancers in the hall, MRS PILKINGS playing the 'restrainer'⁶ to PILKINGS 'manic darts. Everyone is highly entertained, the Royal Party especially who lead the applause.

At this point a liveried⁷ footman comes in with a note on a salver⁸ and is intercepted almost absent-mindedly by the RESIDENT who takes the note and reads it. After polite coughs he succeeds in excusing the PILKINGS from the PRINCE and takes them aside. The PRINCE considerably offers the RESIDENT's wife his hand and dancing is resumed.

On their way out the RESIDENT gives an order to his AIDE-DE-CAMP.⁹ They come into the side corridor where the RESIDENT hands the note to PILKINGS.

RESIDENT As you see it says 'emergency' on the outside. I took the liberty of opening it because His Highness was obviously enjoying the entertainment. I didn't want to interrupt unless really necessary.

PILKINGS Yes, yes of course, sir.

RESIDENT Is it really as bad as it says? What's it all about?

PILKINGS Some strange custom they have sir. It seems because the King is dead some important chief has to commit suicide.

RESIDENT The King? Isn't it the same one who died nearly a month ago?

PILKINGS Yes sir.

RESIDENT Haven't they buried him yet?

PILKINGS They take their time about these things, sir. The preburial ceremonies last nearly thirty days. It seems tonight is the final night.

RESIDENT But what has it got to do with the market women? Why are they rioting? We've waived that troublesome tax¹ haven't we?

PILKINGS We don't quite know that they are exactly rioting yet sir. Sergeant Amusa is sometimes prone to exaggerations.

RESIDENT He sounds desperate enough. That comes out even in his rather quaint grammar. Where is the man anyway? I asked my aide-de-camp to bring him here.

PILKINGS They are probably looking in the wrong verandah. I'll fetch him myself.

RESIDENT No no you stay here. Let your wife go and look for them.
Do you mind my dear . . . ?

JANE Certainly not, your Excellency. [Goes.]

RESIDENT You should have kept me informed, Pilkings. You realise how disastrous it would have been if things had erupted while His Highness was here.

PILKINGS I wasn't aware of the whole business until tonight sir.

RESIDENT Nose to the ground Pilkings, nose to the ground. If we all let these little things slip past us where would the empire be eh? Tell me that. Where would we all be?

PILKINGS [low voice] Sleeping peacefully at home I bet.

RESIDENT What did you say Pilkings?

PILKINGS It won't happen again sir.

RESIDENT It mustn't Pilkings. It mustn't. Where is that damned sergeant? I ought to get back to His Highness as quickly as possible and offer him some plausible explanation for my rather abrupt conduct. Can you think of one, Pilkings?

PILKINGS You could tell him the truth, sir.

RESIDENT I could? No no no Pilkings, that would never do. What! Go and tell him there is a riot just two miles away from him? This is supposed to be a secure colony of His Majesty, Pilkings.

PILKINGS Yes, sir.

RESIDENT Ah, there they are. No, these are not our native police. Are these the ring-leaders of the riot?

PILKINGS Sir, these are my police officers.

RESIDENT Oh, I beg your pardon officers. You do look a little . . . I say, isn't there something missing in their uniform? I think they used to have some rather colourful sashes. If I remember rightly I recommended them myself in my young days in the service. A bit of colour always appeals to the natives, yes, I remember putting that in my report. Well well well, where are we? Make your report man.

PILKINGS [moves close to AMUSA, between his teeth] And let's have no more superstitious nonsense from you Amusa or I'll throw you in the guardroom for a month and feed you pork!

RESIDENT What's that? What has pork to do with it?

PILKINGS Sir, I was just warning him to be brief. I'm sure you are most anxious to hear his report.

RESIDENT Yes yes yes of course. Come on man, speak up. Hey, didn't we give them some colourful fez hats with all those wavy things, yes, pink tassels . . .

PILKINGS Sir, I think if he was permitted to make his report we might find that he lost his hat in the riot.

RESIDENT Ah yes indeed. I'd better tell His Highness that. Lost his hat in the riot, ha ha. He'll probably say well, as long as he didn't lose his head. [Chuckles to himself.] Don't forget to send me a report first thing in the morning young Pilkings.

PILKINGS No sir.

RESIDENT And whatever you do, don't let things get out of hand. Keep a cool head and—nose to the ground Pilkings. [Wanders off in the general direction of the hall.]

PILKINGS Yes, sir.

AIDE-DE-CAMP Would you be needing me sir?

PILKINGS No thanks Bob. I think His Excellency's need of you is greater than ours.

AIDE-DE-CAMP We have a detachment of soldiers from the capital sir. They accompanied His Highness up here.

PILKINGS I doubt if it will come to that but, thanks, I'll bear it in mind. Oh, could you send an orderly with my cloak.

AIDE-DE-CAMP Very good sir. [Goes.]

PILKINGS Now sergeant.

AMUSA Sir . . . [Makes an effort, stops dead. Eyes to the ceiling.]

PILKINGS Oh, not again.

AMUSA I cannot against death to dead cult. This dress get power of dead.

PILKINGS Alright, let's go. You are relieved of all further duty Amusa. Report to me first thing in the morning.

JANE Shall I come Simon?

PILKINGS No, there's no need for that. If I can get back later I will. Otherwise get Bob to bring you home.

JANE Be careful Simon . . . I mean, be clever.

PILKINGS Sure I will. You two, come with me. [As he turns to go, the clock in the Residency begins to chime. PILKINGS looks at his watch then turns, horror-stricken, to stare at his wife. The same thought clearly occurs to her. He swallows hard. An orderly brings his cloak.] It's midnight. I had no idea it was that late.

JANE But surely . . . they don't count the hours the way we do. The moon, or something . . .

PILKINGS I am . . . not so sure.

[He turns and breaks into a sudden run. The two CONSTABLES follow, also at a run. AMUSA, who has kept his eyes on the ceiling throughout waits until the last of the footsteps has faded out of hearing. He salutes suddenly, but without once looking in the direction of the woman.]

AMUSA Goodnight madam.

JANE Oh. [She hesitates.] Amusa . . . [He goes off without seeming to have heard.] Poor Simon . . . [A figure emerges from the shadows, a young black man dressed in a sober western suit. He peeps into the hall, trying to make out the figures of the dancers.] Who is that?

OLUNDE [emerging into the light] I didn't mean to startle you madam. I am looking for the District Officer.

JANE Wait a minute . . . don't I know you? Yes, you are Olunde, the young man who . . .

OLUNDE Mrs Pilkings! How fortunate. I came here to look for your husband.

JANE Olunde! Let's look at you. What a fine young man you've become. Grand but solemn. Good God, when did you return? Simon never said a word. But you do look well Olunde. Really!

OLUNDE You are . . . well, you look quite well yourself Mrs Pilkings. From what little I can see of you.

JANE Oh, this. It's caused quite a stir I assure you, and not all of it very pleasant. You are not shocked I hope?

OLUNDE Why should I be? But don't you find it rather hot in there? Your skin must find it difficult to breathe.

JANE Well, it is a little hot I must confess, but it's all in a good cause.

OLUNDE What cause Mrs Pilkings?

JANE All this. The ball. And His Highness being here in person and all that.

OLUNDE [mildly] And that is the good cause for which you desecrate an ancestral mask?

JANE Oh, so you are shocked after all. How disappointing.

OLUNDE No I am not shocked Mrs Pilkings. You forget that I have now spent four years among your people. I discovered that you have no respect for what you do not understand.

JANE Oh. So you've returned with a chip on your shoulder. That's a pity Olunde. I am sorry.

[An uncomfortable silence follows.]

I take it then that you did not find your stay in England altogether edifying.

OLUNDE I don't say that. I found your people quite admirable in many ways, their conduct and courage in this war² for instance.

JANE Ah yes, the war. Here of course it is all rather remote. From time to time we have a black-out drill just to remind us that there is a war on. And the rare convoy passes through on its way somewhere or on manoeuvres. Mind you there is the occasional bit of excitement like that ship that was blown up in the harbour.

OLUNDE Here? Do you mean through enemy action?

JANE Oh no, the war hasn't come that close. The captain did it himself. I don't quite understand it really. Simon tried to explain. The ship had to be blown up because it had become dangerous to the other ships, even to the city itself. Hundreds of the coastal population would have died.

OLUNDE Maybe it was loaded with ammunition and had caught fire. Or some of those lethal gases they've been experimenting on.

JANE Something like that. The captain blew himself up with it. Deliberately. Simon said someone had to remain on board to light the fuse.

OLUNDE It must have been a very short fuse.

JANE [shrugs] I don't know much about it. Only that there was no other way to save lives. No time to devise anything else. The captain took the decision and carried it out.

OLUNDE Yes . . . I quite believe it. I met men like that in England.

JANE Oh just look at me! Fancy welcoming you back with such morbid news. Stale³ too. It was at least six months ago.

OLUNDE I don't find it morbid at all. I find it rather inspiring. It is an affirmative commentary on life.

JANE What is?

OLUNDE That captain's self-sacrifice.

JANE Nonsense. Life should never be thrown deliberately away.

OLUNDE And the innocent people round the harbour?

JANE Oh, how does one know? The whole thing was probably exaggerated anyway.

OLUNDE That was a risk the captain couldn't take. But please Mrs Pilkings, do you think you could find your husband for me? I have to talk to him.

JANE Simon? Oh. [As she recollects for the first time the full significance of OLUNDE's presence.] Simon is . . . there is a little problem in town. He was sent for. But . . . when did you arrive? Does Simon know you're here?

OLUNDE [suddenly earnest] I need your help Mrs Pilkings. I've always found you somewhat more understanding than your husband. Please find him for me and when you do, you must help me talk to him.

JANE I'm afraid I don't quite . . . follow you. Have you seen my husband already?

OLUNDE I went to your house. Your houseboy told me you were here. [He smiles.] He even told me how I would recognise you and Mr Pilkings.

JANE Then you must know what my husband is trying to do for you.

OLUNDE For me?

JANE For you. For your people. And to think he didn't even know you were coming back! But how do you happen to be here? Only this evening we were talking about you. We thought you were still four thousand miles away.

OLUNDE I was sent a cable.

JANE A cable? Who did? Simon? The business of your father didn't begin till tonight.

OLUNDE A relation sent it weeks ago, and it said nothing about my father. All it said was, Our King is dead. But I knew I had to return home at once so as to bury my father. I understood that.

JANE Well, thank God you don't have to go through that agony. Simon is going to stop it.

OLUNDE That's why I want to see him. He's wasting his time. And since he has been so helpful to me I don't want him to incur the enmity of our people. Especially over nothing.

JANE [sits down open-mouthed] You . . . you Olunde!

OLUNDE Mrs Pilkings, I came home to bury my father. As soon as I heard the news I booked my passage home. In fact we were fortunate. We travelled in the same convoy as your Prince, so we had excellent protection.

JANE But you don't think your father is also entitled to whatever protection is available to him?

OLUNDE How can I make you understand? He has protection. No one can undertake what he does tonight without the deepest protection the mind can conceive. What can you offer him in place of his peace of mind, in place of the honour and veneration of his own people? What would you think of your Prince if he refused to accept the risk of losing his life on this voyage? This . . . showing-the-flag tour of colonial possessions.

JANE I see. So it isn't just medicine you studied in England.

OLUNDE Yet another error into which your people fall. You believe that everything which appears to make sense was learnt from you.

JANE Not so fast Olunde. You have learnt to argue I can tell that, but I never said you made sense. However clearly you try to put it, it is still a barbaric custom. It is even worse—it's feudal!⁴ The king dies and a chieftain must be buried with him. How feudalistic can you get!

OLUNDE [waves his hand towards the background. The PRINCE is dancing past again—to a different step—and all the guests are bowing and curtseying as he passes] And this? Even in the midst of a devastating war, look at that. What name would you give to that?

JANE Therapy, British style. The preservation of sanity in the midst of chaos.

OLUNDE Others would call it decadence. However, it doesn't really interest me. You white races know how to survive; I've seen proof of that. By all logical and natural laws this war should end with all the white races wiping out one another, wiping out their so-called civilisation for all time and reverting to a state of primitivism the like of which has so far only existed in your imagination when you thought of us. I thought all that at the beginning. Then I slowly realised that your greatest art is the art of survival. But at least have the humility to let others survive in their own way.

JANE Through ritual suicide?

OLUNDE Is that worse than mass suicide? Mrs Pilkings, what do you call what those young men are sent to do by their generals in this war? Of course you have also mastered the art of calling things by names which don't remotely describe them.

JANE You talk! You people with your long-winded, roundabout way of making conversation.

OLUNDE Mrs Pilkings, whatever we do, we never suggest that a thing is the opposite of what it really is. In your newsreels⁵ I heard defeats, thorough, murderous defeats described as strategic victories. No wait, it wasn't just on your newsreels. Don't forget I was attached to hospitals all the time. Hordes of your wounded passed through those wards. I spoke to them. I spent long evenings by their bedsides while they spoke terrible truths of the realities of that war. I know now how history is made.

JANE But surely, in a war of this nature, for the morale of the nation you must expect . . .

OLUNDE That a disaster beyond human reckoning be spoken of as a triumph? No. I mean, is there no mourning in the home of the bereaved that such blasphemy is permitted?

JANE [after a moment's pause] Perhaps I can understand you now. The time we picked for you was not really one for seeing us at our best.

OLUNDE Don't think it was just the war. Before that even started I had plenty of time to study your people. I saw nothing, finally, that gave you the right to pass judgement on other peoples and their ways. Nothing at all.

JANE [hesitantly] Was it the . . . colour thing? I know there is some discrimination.

OLUNDE Don't make it so simple, Mrs Pilkings. You make it sound as if when I left, I took nothing at all with me.

JANE Yes . . . and to tell the truth, only this evening, Simon and I agreed that we never really knew what you left with.

OLUNDE Neither did I. But I found out over there. I am grateful to your country for that. And I will never give it up.

JANE Olunde please . . . promise me something. Whatever you do, don't throw away what you have started to do. You want to be a doctor. My husband and I believe you will make an excellent one, sympathetic and competent. Don't let anything make you throw away your training.

OLUNDE [genuinely surprised] Of course not. What a strange idea. I intend to return and complete my training. Once the burial of my father is over.

JANE Oh, please . . . !

OLUNDE Listen! Come outside. You can't hear anything against that music.

JANE What is it?

OLUNDE The drums. Can you hear the changes? Listen.

[The drums come over, still distant but more distinct. There is a change of rhythm, it rises to a crescendo and then, suddenly, it is cut off. After a silence, a new beat begins, slow and resonant.]

There, it's all over.

JANE You mean he's . . .

OLUNDE Yes, Mrs Pilkings, my father is dead. His will-power has always been enormous; I know he is dead.

JANE [screams] How can you be so callous! So unfeeling! You announce your father's own death like a surgeon looking down on some strange . . . stranger's body! You're just a savage like all the rest.

AIDE-DE-CAMP [rushing out] Mrs Pilkings. Mrs Pilkings. [She breaks down, sobbing.] Are you all right, Mrs Pilkings?

OLUNDE She'll be all right. [Turns to go.]

AIDE-DE-CAMP Who are you? And who the hell asked your opinion?

OLUNDE You're quite right, nobody. [Going.]

AIDE-DE-CAMP What the hell! Did you hear me ask you who you were?

OLUNDE I have business to attend to.

AIDE-DE-CAMP I'll give you business in a moment you impudent nigger. Answer my question!

OLUNDE I have a funeral to arrange. Excuse me. [Going.]

AIDE-DE-CAMP I said stop! Orderly!

JANE No, no, don't do that. I'm alright. And for heaven's sake don't act so foolishly. He's a family friend.

AIDE-DE-CAMP Well he'd better learn to answer civil questions when he's asked them. These natives put a suit on and they get high opinions of themselves.

OLUNDE Can I go now?

JANE No no don't go. I must talk to you. I'm sorry about what I said.

OLUNDE It's nothing, Mrs Pilkings. And I'm really anxious to go. I couldn't see my father before, it's forbidden for me, his heir and successor, to set eyes on him from the moment of the king's death. But now . . . I would like to touch his body while it is still warm.

JANE You will. I promise I shan't keep you long. Only, I couldn't possibly let you go like that. Bob, please excuse us.

AIDE-DE-CAMP If you're sure . . .

JANE Of course I'm sure. Something happened to upset me just then, but I'm alright now. Really.

[The AIDE-DE-CAMP goes, somewhat reluctantly.]

OLUNDE I mustn't stay long.

JANE Please, I promise not to keep you. It's just that . . . oh you saw yourself what happens to one in this place. The Resident's man thought he was being helpful, that's the way we all react. But I can't go in among that crowd just now and if I stay by myself somebody will come looking for me. Please, just say something for a few moments and then you can go. Just so I can recover myself.

OLUNDE What do you want me to say?

JANE Your calm acceptance for instance, can you explain that? It was so unnatural. I don't understand that at all. I feel a need to understand all I can.

OLUNDE But you explained it yourself. My medical training perhaps. I have seen death too often. And the soldiers who returned from the front, they died on our hands all the time.

JANE No. It has to be more than that. I feel it has to do with the many things we don't really grasp about your people. At least you can explain.

OLUNDE All these things are part of it. And anyway, my father has been dead in my mind for nearly a month. Ever since I learnt of the King's death. I've lived with my bereavement so long now that I cannot think of him alive. On that journey on the boat, I kept my mind on my duties as the one who must perform the rites over his body. I went through it all again and again in my mind as he himself had taught me. I didn't want to do anything wrong, something which might jeopardise the welfare of my people.

JANE But he had disowned you. When you left he swore publicly you were no longer his son.

OLUNDE I told you, he was a man of tremendous will. Sometimes that's another way of saying stubborn. But among our people, you don't disown a child just like that. Even if I had died before him I would still be buried like his eldest son. But it's time for me to go.

JANE Thank you. I feel calmer. Don't let me keep you from your duties.

OLUNDE Goodnight, Mrs Pilkings.

JANE Welcome home. [She holds out her hand. As he takes it footsteps are heard approaching the drive. A short while later a woman's sobbing is also heard.]

PILKINGS [off] Keep them here till I get back. [He strides into view, reacts at the sight of OLUNDE but turns to his wife.] Thank goodness you're still here.

JANE Simon, what happened?

PILKINGS Later Jane, please. Is Bob still here?

JANE Yes, I think so. I'm sure he must be.

PILKINGS Try and get him out here as quickly as you can. Tell him it's urgent.

JANE Of course. Oh Simon, you remember . . .

PILKINGS Yes yes. I can see who it is. Get Bob out here. [She runs off.] At first I thought I was seeing a ghost.

OLUNDE Mr Pilkings, I appreciate what you tried to do. I want you to believe that. I can tell you it would have been a terrible calamity if you'd succeeded.

PILKINGS [opens his mouth several times, shuts it] You . . . said what?

OLUNDE A calamity for us, the entire people.

PILKINGS [sighs] I see. Hm.

OLUNDE And now I must go. I must see him before he turns cold.

PILKINGS Oh ah . . . em . . . but this is a shock to see you. I mean er thinking all this while you were in England and thanking God for that.

OLUNDE I came on the mail boat. We travelled in the Prince's convoy.

PILKINGS Ah yes, a-ah, hm . . . er well . . .

OLUNDE Goodnight. I can see you are shocked by the whole business. But you must know by now there are things you cannot understand—or help.

PILKINGS Yes. Just a minute. There are armed policemen that way and they have instructions to let no one pass. I suggest you wait a little. I'll er . . . give you an escort.

OLUNDE That's very kind of you. But do you think it could be quickly arranged?

PILKINGS Of course. In fact, yes, what I'll do is send Bob over with some men to the er . . . place. You can go with them. Here he comes now. Excuse me a minute.

AIDE-DE-CAMP Anything wrong sir?

PILKINGS [takes him to one side] Listen Bob, that cellar in the disused annexe of the Residency, you know, where the slaves were stored before being taken down to the coast . . . 6

AIDE-DE-CAMP Oh yes, we use it as a storeroom for broken furniture.

PILKINGS But it's still got the bars on it?

AIDE-DE-CAMP Oh yes, they are quite intact.

PILKINGS Get the keys please. I'll explain later. And I want a strong guard over the Residency tonight.

AIDE-DE-CAMP We have that already. The detachment from the coast . . .

PILKINGS No, I don't want them at the gates of the Residency. I want you to deploy them at the bottom of the hill, a long way from the main hall so they can deal with any situation long before the sound carries to the house.

AIDE-DE-CAMP Yes of course.

PILKINGS I don't want His Highness alarmed.

AIDE-DE-CAMP You think the riot will spread here?

PILKINGS It's unlikely but I don't want to take a chance. I made them believe I was going to lock the man up in my house, which was what I had planned to do in the first place. They are probably assailing it by now. I took a roundabout route here so I don't think there is any danger at all. At least not before dawn. Nobody is to leave the premises of course—the native employees I mean. They'll soon smell something is up and they can't keep their mouths shut.

AIDE-DE-CAMP I'll give instructions at once.

PILKINGS I'll take the prisoner down myself. Two policemen will stay with him throughout the night. Inside the cell.

AIDE-DE-CAMP Right sir. [Salutes and goes off at the double.]

PILKINGS Jane. Bob is coming back in a moment with a detachment. Until he gets back please stay with Olunde. [He makes an extra warning gesture with his eyes.]

OLUNDE Please, Mr Pilkings . . .

PILKINGS I hate to be stuffy old son, but we have a crisis on our hands. It has to do with your father's affair if you must know. And it happens also at a time when we have His Highness here. I am responsible for security so you'll simply have to do as I say. I hope that's understood. [Marches off quickly, in the direction from which he made his first appearance.]

OLUNDE What's going on? All this can't be just because he failed to stop my father killing himself.

JANE I honestly don't know. Could it have sparked off a riot?

OLUNDE No. If he'd succeeded that would be more likely to start the riot. Perhaps there were other factors involved. Was there a chieftancy dispute?

JANE None that I know of.

ELESIN [an animal bellow⁷ from off] Leave me alone! Is it not enough that you have covered me in shame! White man, take your hand from my body!

[OLUNDE stands frozen to the spot. JANE, understanding at last, tries to move him.]

JANE Let's go in. It's getting chilly out here.

PILKINGS [off] Carry him.

ELESIN Give me back the name you have taken away from me you ghost from the land of the nameless!

PILKINGS Carry him! I can't have a disturbance here. Quickly! stuff up his mouth.

JANE Oh God! Let's go in. Please Olunde. [OLUNDE does not move.]

ELESIN Take your albino's⁸ hand from me you . . .

[Sounds of a struggle. His voice chokes as he is gagged.]

OLUNDE [quietly] That was my father's voice.

JANE Oh you poor orphan, what have you come home to?

[There is a sudden explosion of rage from off-stage and powerful steps come running up the drive.]

PILKINGS You bloody fools, after him!

[Immediately ELESIN, in handcuffs, comes pounding in the direction of JANE and OLUNDE, followed some moments afterwards by PILKINGS and the CONSTABLES. ELESIN, confronted by the seeming statue of his son, stops dead. ELESIN, confronted by the seeming statue of his son, stops dead. OLUNDE stares above his head into the distance. The CONSTABLES try to grab him. JANE screams at them.]

JANE Leave him alone! Simon, tell them to leave him alone.

PILKINGS All right, stand aside you. [Shrugs.] Maybe just as well. It might help to calm him down.

[For several moments they hold the same position. ELESIN moves a step forward, almost as if he's still in doubt.]

ELESIN Olunde? [He moves his head, inspecting him from side to side.] Olunde! [He collapses slowly at OLUNDE's feet.] Oh son, don't let the sight of your father turn you blind!

OLUNDE [he moves for the first time since he heard his voice, brings his head slowly down to look on him] I have no father, eater of left-overs.

[He walks slowly down the way his father had run. Light fades out on ELESIN, sobbing into the ground.]

Endnotes

- Note 3: An elaborate masked ball long associated with the English court.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: A patriotic British anthem composed in 1740.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Harsh and throaty sound.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The person who controls the movements of the dancing mask when its movements seem excessive.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Uniformed.Return to reference 7

- Note 8: A tray of silver or glass.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: A military assistant to a civilian administrator.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Taxes levied on market women often sparked riots in colonial West Africa, such as the “Women’s War” that erupted in Nigeria in 1929.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: World War II. Some 45,000 Nigerian soldiers served in the British Army, helping to fuel the country’s postwar independence movement.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Old or out of date.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: System of government in which vassals lived on the land of nobility and paid homage in return for protection; also a term connoting an outmoded way of life.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Tapes of news and features shown in movie houses before the main features. This was common before the age of television and prominent during World War II.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The area historically known as Africa’s Slave Coast extended from Nigeria to present-day Ghana.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: A loud, hollow sound usually associated with animals, especially cows; in some cases, it was considered to be a feature of the language of egungun and other masked figures.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Albino is a term of abuse when used in reference to a White person.Return to reference 8

5

A wide iron-barred gate stretches almost the whole width of the cell in which ELESIN is imprisoned. His wrists are encased in thick iron bracelets, chained together; he stands against the bars, looking out. Seated on the ground to one side on the outside is his recent bride, her eyes bent perpetually to the ground. Figures of the two GUARDS can be seen deeper inside the cell, alert to every movement ELESIN makes, PILKINGS now in a police officer's uniform, enters noiselessly, observes him a while. Then he coughs ostentatiously and approaches. Leans against the bars near a corner, his back to ELESIN. He is obviously trying to fall in mood with him. Some moments' silence.

PILKINGS You seem fascinated by the moon.

ELESIN [after a pause] Yes, ghostly one. Your twin-brother up there engages my thoughts.

PILKINGS It is a beautiful night.

ELESIN Is that so?

PILKINGS The light on the leaves, the peace of the night . . .

ELESIN The night is not at peace, District Officer.

PILKINGS No? I would have said it was. You know, quiet . . .

ELESIN And does quiet mean peace for you?

PILKINGS Well, nearly the same thing. Naturally there is a subtle difference . . .

ELESIN The night is not at peace, ghostly one. The world is not at peace. You have shattered the peace of the world for ever. There is no sleep in the world tonight.

PILKINGS It is still a good bargain if the world should lose one night's sleep as the price of saving a man's life.

ELESIN You did not save my life, District Officer. You destroyed it.

PILKINGS Now come on . . .

ELESIN And not merely my life but the lives of many. The end of the night's work is not over. Neither this year nor the next will see it. If I wished you well, I would pray that you do not stay long enough on our land to see the disaster you have brought upon us.

PILKINGS Well, I did my duty as I saw it. I have no regrets.

ELESIN No. The regrets of life always come later.

[Some moments' pause.]

You are waiting for dawn white man. I hear you saying to yourself: only so many hours until dawn and then the danger is over. All I must do is to keep him alive tonight. You don't quite understand it all but you know that tonight is when what ought to be must be brought about. I shall ease your mind even more, ghostly one. It is not an entire night but a moment of the night, and that moment is past. The moon was my messenger and guide. When it reached a certain gateway in the sky, it touched that moment for which my whole life has been spent in blessings. Even I do not know the gateway. I have stood here and scanned the sky for a glimpse of that door but, I cannot see it. Human eyes are useless for a search of this nature. But in the house of osugbo, those who keep watch through the spirit recognised the moment, they sent word to me through the voice of our sacred drums to prepare myself. I heard them and I shed all thoughts of earth. I began to follow the moon to the abode of the gods . . . servant of the white king, that was when you entered my chosen place of departure on feet of desecration.

PILKINGS I'm sorry, but we all see our duty differently.

ELESIN I no longer blame you. You stole from me my first-born, sent him to your country so you could turn him into something in your own image. Did you plan it all beforehand? There are moments when it seems part of a larger plan. He who must follow my footsteps is taken from me, sent across the ocean. Then, in my turn, I am stopped from fulfilling my destiny. Did you think it all out before, this plan to push our world from its course and sever the cord that links us to the great origin?

PILKINGS You don't really believe that. Anyway, if that was my intention with your son, I appear to have failed.

ELESIN You did not fail in the main thing ghostly one. We know the roof covers the rafters,⁹ the cloth covers blemishes; who would have known that the white skin covered our future, preventing us from seeing the death our enemies had prepared for us. The world is set adrift and its inhabitants are lost. Around them, there is nothing but emptiness.

PILKINGS Your son does not take so gloomy a view.

ELESIN Are you dreaming now, white man? Were you not present at the reunion of shame? Did you not see when the world reversed itself and the father fell before his son, asking forgiveness?

PILKINGS That was in the heat of the moment. I spoke to him and . . . if you want to know, he wishes he could cut out his tongue for uttering the words he did.

ELESIN No. What he said must never be unsaid. The contempt of my own son rescued something of my shame at your hands. You have stopped me in my duty but I know now that I did give birth to a son. Once I mistrusted him for seeking the companionship of those my spirit knew as enemies of our race. Now I understand. One should seek to obtain the secrets of his enemies. He will avenge my shame, white one. His spirit will destroy you and yours.

PILKINGS That kind of talk is hardly called for. If you don't want my consolation . . .

ELESIN No white man, I do not want your consolation.

PILKINGS As you wish. Your son, anyway, sends his consolation. He asks your forgiveness. When I asked him not to despise you his reply was: I cannot judge him, and if I cannot judge him, I cannot despise him. He wants to come to you and say goodbye and to receive your blessing.

ELESIN Goodbye? Is he returning to your land?

PILKINGS Don't you think that's the most sensible thing for him to do? I advised him to leave at once, before dawn, and he agrees that is the right course of action.

ELESIN Yes, it is best. And even if I did not think so, I have lost the father's place of honour. My voice is broken.

PILKINGS Your son honours you. If he didn't he would not ask your blessing.

ELESIN No. Even a thoroughbred is not without pity for the turf he strikes with his hoof. When is he coming?

PILKINGS As soon as the town is a little quieter. I advised it.

ELESIN Yes white man, I am sure you advised it. You advise all our lives although on the authority of what gods, I do not know.

PILKINGS [opens his mouth to reply, then appears to change his mind. Turns to go. Hesitates and stops again] Before I leave you, may I ask just one thing of you?

ELESIN I am listening.

PILKINGS I wish to ask you to search the quiet of your heart and tell me—do you not find great contradictions in the wisdom of your own race?

ELESIN Make yourself clear, white one.

PILKINGS I have lived among you long enough to learn a saying or two. One came to my mind tonight when I stepped into the market and saw what was going on. You were surrounded by those who egged you on with song and praises. I thought, are these not the same people who say: the elder grimly approaches heaven and you ask him to bear your greetings yonder; do you really think he makes the journey willingly? After that, I did not hesitate.

[A pause. ELESIN sighs. Before he can speak a sound of running feet is heard.]

JANE [off] Simon! Simon!

PILKINGS What on earth . . . ! [Runs off.]

[ELESIN turns to his new wife, gazes on her for some moments.]

ELESIN My young bride, did you hear the ghostly one? You sit and sob in your silent heart but say nothing to all this. First I blamed the white man, then I blamed my gods for deserting me. Now I feel I want to blame you for the mystery of the sapping of my will. But blame is a strange peace offering for a man to bring a world he has deeply wronged, and to its innocent dwellers. Oh little mother, I have taken countless women in my life but you were more than a desire of the flesh. I needed you as the abyss across which my body must be drawn, I filled it with earth and dropped my seed in it at the moment of preparedness for my crossing. You were the final gift of the living to their emissary to the land of the ancestors, and perhaps your warmth and youth brought new insights of this world to me and turned my feet leaden on this side of the abyss. For I confess to you, daughter, my weakness came not merely from the abomination of the white man who came violently into my fading presence, there was also a weight of longing on my earth-held limbs. I would have shaken it off, already my foot had begun to lift but then, the white ghost entered and all was defiled.

[Approaching voices of PILKINGS and his wife.]

JANE Oh Simon, you will let her in won't you?

PILKINGS I really wish you'd stop interfering.

[They come into view. JANE is in a dressing-gown. PILKINGS is holding a note to which he refers from time to time.]

JANE Good gracious, I didn't initiate this. I was sleeping quietly, or trying to anyway, when the servant brought it. It's not my fault if one can't sleep undisturbed even in the Residency.

PILKINGS He'd have done the same thing if we were sleeping at home so don't sidetrack the issue. He knows he can get round you or he wouldn't send you the petition in the first place.

JANE Be fair Simon. After all he was thinking of your own interests. He is grateful you know, you seem to forget that. He feels he owes you something.

PILKINGS I just wish they'd leave this man alone tonight, that's all.

JANE Trust him Simon. He's pledged his word it will all go peacefully.

PILKINGS Yes, and that's the other thing. I don't like being threatened.

JANE Threatened? [Takes the note.] I didn't spot any threat.

PILKINGS It's there. Veiled, but it's there. The only way to prevent serious rioting tomorrow—what a cheek!

JANE I don't think he's threatening you Simon.

PILKINGS He's picked up the idiom alright. Wouldn't surprise me if he's been mixing with commies¹ or anarchists over there. The phrasing sounds too good to be true. Damn! If only the Prince hadn't picked this time for his visit.

JANE Well, even so Simon, what have you got to lose? You don't want a riot on your hands, not with the Prince here.

PILKINGS [going up to ELESIN] Let's see what he has to say. Chief Elesin, there is yet another person who wants to see you. As she is not a next-of-kin I don't really feel obliged to let her in. But your son sent a note with her, so it's up to you.

ELESIN I know who that must be. So she found out your hiding-place. Well, it was not difficult. My stench of shame is so strong, it requires no hunter's dog to follow it.

PILKINGS If you don't want to see her, just say so and I'll send her packing.

ELESIN Why should I not want to see her? Let her come. I have no more holes in my rag of shame. All is laid bare.

PILKINGS I'll bring her in. [Goes off.]

JANE [hesitates, then goes to ELESIN] Please, try and understand. Everything my husband did was for the best.

ELESIN [he gives her a long strange stare, as if he is trying to understand who she is] You are the wife of the District Officer?

JANE Yes. My name, is Jane.

ELESIN That is my wife sitting down there. You notice how still and silent she sits? My business is with your husband.

[PILKINGS returns with IYALOJA.]

PILKINGS Here she is. Now first I want your word of honour that you will try nothing foolish.

ELESIN Honour? White one, did you say you wanted my word of honour?

PILKINGS I know you to be an honourable man. Give me your word of honour you will receive nothing from her.

ELESIN But I am sure you have searched her clothing as you would never dare touch your own mother. And there are these two lizards of yours who roll their eyes even when I scratch.

PILKINGS And I shall be sitting on that tree trunk watching even how you blink. Just the same I want your word that you will not let her pass anything to you.

ELESIN You have my honour already. It is locked up in that desk in which you will put away your report of this night's events. Even the honour of my people you have taken already; it is tied together with those papers of treachery which make you masters in this land.

PILKINGS Alright. I am trying to make things easy but if you must bring in politics we'll have to do it the hard way. Madam, I want you to remain along this line and move no nearer to the cell door. Guards! [They spring to attention.] If she moves beyond this point, blow your whistle. Come on Jane. [They go off.]

IYALOJA How boldly the lizard struts before the pigeon when it was the eagle itself he promised us he would confront.

ELESIN I don't ask you to take pity on me Iyaloja. You have a message for me or you would not have come. Even if it is the curses of the world, I shall listen.

IYALOJA You made so bold with the servant of the white king who took your side against death. I must tell your brother chiefs when I return how bravely you waged war against him. Especially with words.

ELESIN I more than deserve your scorn.

IYALOJA [with sudden anger] I warned you, if you must leave a seed behind, be sure it is not tainted with the curses of the world. Who are you to open a new life when you dared not open the door to a new existence? I say who are you to make so bold? [The BRIDE sobs and IYALOJA notices her. Her contempt noticeably increases as she turns back to ELESIN.] Oh you self-vaunted² stem of the plantain, how hollow it all proves. The pith is gone in the parent stem, so how will it prove with the new shoot?³ How will it go with that earth that bears it? Who are you to bring this abomination on us!

ELESIN My powers deserted me. My charms, my spells, even my voice lacked strength when I made to summon the powers that would lead me over the last measure of earth into the land of the fleshless. You saw it, Iyaloja. You saw me struggle to retrieve my will from the power of the stranger whose shadow fell across the doorway and left me floundering and blundering in a maze I had never before encountered. My senses were numbed when the touch of cold iron⁴ came upon my wrists. I could do nothing to save myself.

IYALOJA You have betrayed us. We fed you sweetmeats⁵ such as we hoped awaited you on the other side. But you said No, I must eat the world's left-overs. We said you were the hunter who brought the quarry down; to you belonged the vital portions of the game. No, you said, I am the hunter's dog and I shall eat the entrails of the game and the faeces of the hunter. We said you were the hunter returning home in triumph, a slain buffalo pressing down on his neck; you said wait, I first must turn up this cricket hole with my toes. We said yours was the doorway at which we first spy the tapper when he comes down from the tree, yours was the blessing of the twilight wine,⁶ the purl that brings night spirits out of doors to steal their portion before the light of day. We said yours was the body of wine whose burden shakes the tapper like a sudden gust on his perch. You said, No, I am content to lick the dregs⁷ from each calabash when the drinkers are done. We said, the dew on earth's surface was for you to wash your feet along the slopes of honour. You said No, I shall step in the vomit of cats and the droppings of mice; I shall fight them for the left-overs of the world.

ELESIN Enough Iyaloja, enough.

IYALOJA We called you leader and oh, how you led us on. What we have no intention of eating should not be held to the nose.

ELESIN Enough, enough. My shame is heavy enough.

IYALOJA Wait. I came with a burden.

ELESIN You have more than discharged it.

IYALOJA I wish I could pity you.

ELESIN I need neither your pity nor the pity of the world. I need understanding. Even I need to understand. You were present at my defeat. You were part of the beginnings. You brought about the renewal of my tie to earth, you helped in the binding of the cord.

IYALOJA I gave you warning. The river which fills up before our eyes does not sweep us away in its flood.

ELESIN What were warnings beside the moist contact of living earth between my fingers? What were warnings beside the renewal of famished embers lodged eternally in the heart of man. But even that, even if it overwhelmed one with a thousandfold temptations to linger a little while, a man could overcome it. It is when the alien hand pollutes the source of will,⁸ when a stranger force of violence shatters the mind's calm resolution, this is when a man is made to commit the awful treachery of relief, commit in his thought the unspeakable blasphemy of seeing the hand of the gods in this alien rupture of his world. I know it was this thought that killed me, sapped my powers and turned me into an infant in the hands of unnamable strangers. I made to utter my spells anew but my tongue merely rattled in my mouth. I fingered hidden charms and the contact was d there was no spark left to sever the life-strings that should stretch from every finger-tip. My will was squelched in the spittle⁹ of an alien race, and all because I had committed this blasphemy of thought—that there might be the hand of the gods in a stranger's intervention.

IYALOJA Explain it how you will, I hope it brings you peace of mind. The bush-rat fled his rightful cause, reached the market and set up a lamentation. 'Please save me!'—are these fitting words to hear from an ancestral mask? 'There's a wild beast at my heels' is not becoming language from a hunter.

ELESIN May the world forgive me.

IYALOJA I came with a burden I said. It approaches the gates which are so well guarded by those jackals whose spittle will from this day be on your food and drink. But first, tell me, you who were once Elesin Oba, tell me, you who know so well the cycle of the plantain: is it the parent shoot which withers to give sap¹ to the younger or, does your wisdom see it running the other way?

ELESIN I don't see your meaning Iyaloja?

IYALOJA Did I ask you for a meaning? I asked a question. Whose trunk withers to give sap to the other? The parent shoot or the younger?

ELESIN The parent.

IYALOJA Ah. So you do know that. There are sights in this world which say different Elesin. There are some who choose to reverse the cycle of our being. Oh, you emptied bark² that the world once saluted for a pith-laden being, shall I tell you what the gods have claimed of you?

[In her agitation she steps beyond the line indicated by PILKINGS and the air is rent by piercing whistles. The two GUARDS also leap forward and place safe-guarding hands on ELESIN. IYALOJA stops, astonished. PILKINGS comes racing in, followed by JANE.]

PILKINGS What is it? Did they try something?

GUARD She stepped beyond the line.

ELESIN [in a broken voice] Let her alone. She meant no harm.

IYALOJA Oh Elesin, see what you've become. Once you had no need to open your mouth in explanation because evil-smelling goats, itchy of hand and foot, had lost their senses. And it was a brave man indeed who dared lay hands on you because Iyaloja stepped from one side of the earth onto another. Now look at the spectacle of your life. I grieve for you.

PILKINGS I think you'd better leave. I doubt you have done him much good by coming here. I shall make sure you are not allowed to see him again. In any case we are moving him to a different place before dawn, so don't bother to come back.

IYALOJA We foresaw that. Hence the burden I trudged here to lay beside your gates.

PILKINGS What was that you said?

IYALOJA Didn't our son explain? Ask that one. He knows what it is.

At least we hope the man we once knew as Elesin remembers the lesser Oaths he need not break.

PILKINGS Do you know what she is talking about?

ELESIN Go to the gates, ghostly one. Whatever you find there, bring it to me.

IYALOJA Not yet. It drags behind me on the slow, weary feet of women. Slow as it is Elesin, it has long overtaken you. It rides ahead of your laggard³ will.

PILKINGS What is she saying now? Christ! Must your people forever speak in riddles?

ELESIN It will come white man, it will come. Tell your men at the gates to let it through.

PILKINGS [dubiously] I'll have to see what it is.

IYALOJA You will. [Passionately.] But this is one oath he cannot shirk. White one, you have a king here, a visitor from your land. We know of his presence here. Tell me, were he to die would you leave his spirit roaming restlessly on the surface of earth? Would you bury him here among those you consider less than human? In your land have you no ceremonies of the dead?

PILKINGS Yes. But we don't make our chiefs commit suicide to keep him company.

IYALOJA Child, I have not come to help your understanding. [Points to ELESIN.] This is the man whose weakened understanding holds us in bondage to you. But ask him if you wish. He knows the meaning of a king's passage; he was not born yesterday. He knows the peril to the race when our dead father, who goes as intermediary, waits and waits and knows he is betrayed. He knows when the narrow gate was opened and he knows it will not stay for laggards who drag their feet in dung and vomit, whose lips are reeking of the left-overs of lesser men. He knows he has condemned our King to wander in the void of evil with beings who are enemies of life.

PILKINGS Yes er . . . but look here . . .

IYALOJA What we ask is little enough. Let him release our King so he can ride on homewards alone. The messenger is on his way on the backs of women. Let him send word through the heart that is folded up within the bolt. It is the least of all his oaths, it is the easiest fulfilled.

[The AIDE-DE-CAMP runs in.] PILKINGS Bob?

AIDE-DE-CAMP Sir, there's a group of women chanting up the hill.

PILKINGS [rounding on IYALOJA] If you people want trouble . . .

JANE Simon, I think that's what Olunde referred to in his letter.

PILKINGS He knows damned well I can't have a crowd here! Damn it, I explained the delicacy of my position to him. I think it's about time I got him out of town. Bob, send a car and two or three soldiers to bring him in. I think the sooner he takes his leave of his father and gets out the better.

IYALOJA Save your labour white one. If it is the father of your prisoner you want, Olunde, he who until this night we knew as Elesin's son, he comes soon himself to take his leave. He has sent the women ahead, so let them in.

[PILKINGS remains undecided.]

AIDE-DE-CAMP What do we do about the invasion? We can still stop them far from here.

PILKINGS What do they look like?

AIDE-DE-CAMP They're not many. And they seem quite peaceful.

PILKINGS No men?

AIDE-DE-CAMP Mm, two or three at the most.

JANE Honestly, Simon, I'd trust Olunde. I don't think he'll deceive you about their intentions.

PILKINGS He'd better not. Alright then, let them in Bob. Warn them to control themselves. Then hurry Olunde here. Make sure he brings his baggage because I'm not returning him into town.

AIDE-DE-CAMP Very good, sir. [Goes.]

PILKINGS [to IYALOJA] I hope you understand that if anything goes wrong it will be on your head. My men have orders to shoot at the first sign of trouble.

IYALOJA To prevent one death you will actually make other deaths?

Ah, great is the wisdom of the white race. But have no fear. Your Prince will sleep peacefully. So at long last will ours. We will disturb you no further, servant of the white King. Just let Elesin fulfil his oath and we will retire home and pay homage to our King.

JANE I believe her Simon, don't you?

PILKINGS Maybe.

ELESIN Have no fear ghostly one. I have a message to send my King and then you have nothing more to fear.

IYALOJA Olunde would have done it. The chiefs asked him to speak the words but he said no, not while you lived.

ELESIN Even from the depths to which my spirit has sunk, I find some joy that this little has been left to me.

[The WOMEN enter, intoning the dirge 'Alẹ lẹ lẹ' and swaying from side to side. On their shoulders is borne a longish object roughly like a cylindrical bolt, covered in cloth. They set it down on the spot where IYALOJA had stood earlier, and form a semi-circle round it. The PRAISE-SINGER and DRUMMER stand on the inside of the semi-circle but the drum is not used at all. The DRUMMER intones under the PRAISE-SINGER's invocations.]

PILKINGS [as they enter] What is that?

IYALOJA The burden you have made white one, but we bring it in peace.

PILKINGS I said what is it?

ELESIN White man, you must let me out. I have a duty to perform.

PILKINGS I most certainly will not.

ELESIN There lies the courier of my King. Let me out so I can perform what is demanded of me.

PILKINGS You'll do what you need to do from inside there or not at all. I've gone as far as I intend to with this business.

ELESIN The worshipper who lights a candle in your church to bear a message to his god bows his head and speaks in a whisper to the flame. Have I not seen it ghostly one? His voice does not ring out to the world. Mine are no words for anyone's ears. They are not words even for the bearers of this load. They are words I must speak secretly, even as my father whispered them in my ears and I in the ears of my first-born. I cannot shout them to the wind and the open night-sky.

JANE Simon . . .

PILKINGS Don't interfere. Please!

IYALOJA They have slain the favourite horse of the King and slain his dog. They have borne them from pulse to pulse centre of the land receiving prayers for their King. But the rider has chosen to stay behind. Is it too much to ask that he speak his heart to heart of the waiting courier? [PILKINGS turns his back on her.] So be it, Elesin Oba, you see how even the mere leavings⁴ are denied you.

[She gestures to the PRAISE-SINGER.]

PRAISE-SINGER Elesin Oba! I call you by that name only this last time. Remember when I said, if you cannot come, tell my horse.

[Pause.] What? I cannot hear you? I said, if you cannot come, whisper in the ears of my horse. Is your tongue severed from the roots Elesin? I can hear no response. I said, if there are boulders you cannot climb, mount my horse's back, this spotless black stallion, he'll bring you over them. [Pauses.] Elesin Oba, once you had a tongue that darted like a drummer's stick. I said, if you get lost my dog will track a path to me. My memory fails me but I think you replied: My feet have found the path, Alafin.

[The dirge rises and falls.]

I said at the last, if evil hands hold you back, just tell my horse there is weight on the hem of your smock. I dare not wait too long.

[The dirge rises and falls.]

There lies the swiftest ever messenger of a king, so set me free with the errand of your heart. There lie the head and heart of the favourite of the gods, whisper in his ears. Oh my companion, if you had followed when you should, we would not say that the horse preceded its rider. If you had followed when it was time, we would not say the dog has raced beyond and left his master behind. If you had raised your will to cut the thread of life at the summons of the drums, we would not say your mere shadow fell across the gateway and took its owner's place at the banquet. But the hunter, laden with slain buffalo, stayed to root in the cricket's hole with his toes. What now is left? If there is a dearth of bats, the pigeon must serve us for the offering. Speak the words over your shadow which must now serve in your place.

ELESIN I cannot approach. Take off the cloth. I shall speak my message from heart to heart of silence.

IYALOJA [moves forward and removes the covering] Your courier Elesin, cast your eyes on the favoured companion of the King.

[Rolled up in the mat, his head and feet showing at either end, is the body of OLUNDE.]

There lies the honour of your household and of our race. Because he could not bear to let honour fly out of doors, he stopped it with his life. The son has proved the father, Elesin, and there is nothing left in your mouth to gnash but infant gums.

PRAISE-SINGER Elesin, we placed the reins of the world in your hands yet you watched it plunge over the edge of the bitter precipice. You sat with folded arms while evil strangers tilted the world from its course and crashed it beyond the edge of emptiness—you muttered, there is little that one man can do, you left us floundering in a blind future. Your heir has taken the burden on himself. What the end will be, we are not gods to tell. But this young shoot has poured its sap into the parent stalk, and we know this is not the way of life. Our world is tumbling in the void of strangers, Elesin.

[ELESIN has stood rock-still, his knuckles taut on the bars, his eyes glued to the body of his son. The stillness seizes and paralyses everyone, including PILKINGS who has turned to look.

Suddenly ELESIN flings one arm round his neck, once, and with the loop of the chain, strangles himself in a swift, decisive pull. The GUARDS rush forward to stop him but they are only in time to let his body down. PILKINGS has leapt to the door at the same time and struggles with the lock. He rushes within, fumbles with the handcuffs and unlocks them, raises the body to a sitting position while he tries to give resuscitation. The WOMEN continue their dirge, unmoved by the sudden event.]

IYALOJA Why do you strain yourself? Why do you labour at tasks for which no one, not even the man lying there, would give you thanks? He is gone at last into the passage but oh, how late it all is. His son will feast on the meat and throw him bones. The passage is clogged with droppings from the King's stallion; he will arrive all stained in dung.

PILKINGS [in a tired voice] Was this what you wanted?

IYALOJA No child, it is what you brought to be, you who play with strangers' lives, who even usurp the vestments of our dead, yet believe that the stain of death will not cling to you. The gods demanded only the old expired plantain but you cut down the sap-laden shoot to feed your pride. There is your board⁵ filled to overflowing. Feast on it. [She screams at him suddenly, seeing that PILKINGS is about to close ELESIN's staring eyes.] Let him alone! However sunk he was in debt he is no pauper's carrion⁶ abandoned on the road. Since when have strangers donned clothes of indigo before the bereaved cries out his loss?

[She turns to the BRIDE who has remained motionless throughout.]

Child.

[The girl takes up a little earth, walks calmly into the cell and closes ELESIN's eyes. She then pours some earth over each eyelid and comes out again.]

IYALOJA Now forget the dead, forget even the living. Turn your mind only to the unborn.

[She goes off, accompanied by the BRIDE. The dirge rises in volume and the WOMEN continue their sway. Lights fade to a black-out.]

THE END

1975

Endnotes

- Note 9: Timbers supporting the roof of a house.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: A disapproving term for communists. The Communist Party of Great Britain peaked in popularity in the late 1940s, particularly among Black immigrants from Africa and the Caribbean.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Excessively self-praising, vain.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The young plant that grows directly from the parent, not from a seed. "Pith": the inner part of a plant; its fiber or core.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: A reference to a very sharp knife or razor.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Pastries or candies made with sugar or honey.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Palm wine tapped before dawn is considered fresh and potent.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The sediment of leftover liquids; hence, considered impure.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: In Yoruba cosmology, will is the life source that makes everything happen.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Saliva.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The vital liquid or juice circulating in a tree or plant, the equivalent of blood.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The external covering or skin of a tree.Return to reference 2

- Note 3: Slow, sluggish, spent.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Remains or leftovers, usually of food.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Food.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The rotting flesh of a dead animal.Return to reference 6

CARYL CHURCHILL

b. 1938

Born in London, Churchill grew up an only child in a creative home in the Lake District, one that influenced her approach to theater. Her father was a political cartoonist, and she has said, "Cartoons are really so much like plays—an image with somebody saying something." Her mother worked variously as a secretary, model, and film actress, and Churchill's earliest exposure to theater was the Christmas pantomimes, which she would then act out at home. Her family moved to Montreal, Canada, when she was ten, but she returned to England for university. She studied English at Lady Margaret Hall, a women's college at Oxford, where she began to write plays, which were produced by student companies. Churchill has discussed the period after graduation in 1960 as grounded in family life and yet also solitary and politicizing. While raising her children, she struggled to carve out time for writing. She managed to develop short radio plays for the BBC, including The Ants (1962), Lovesick (1967), and Abortive (1971), but in the 1970s and 1980s her literary output grew prolific and increasingly experimental.

Churchill's first professional stage production, Owners (1972), premiered at the Royal Court Theatre where she would go on to serve as resident dramatist in 1974–75. Churchill's work, renowned for its exploration of gender and power, is unpredictable in its use of dialogue, casting, and props. Cloud Nine, perhaps her best-known play before Top Girls, debuted in England in 1979 and premiered off-

Broadway in New York in 1981. A comedic parody of the Victorian Empire, the first act is set in colonial Africa, the second in 1979 London. In her time-bending plot and cross-casting specifications, Churchill challenges her audience's concepts of race, class, and gender. The role of Joshua, a Black African servant, was played by a White man, and the roles of Victorian-era Betty, her son Edward, and Cathy, a little girl, were all cast opposite gender, with an adult man playing Cathy. A rag doll sufficed to represent Edward's sister Victoria. These incongruities call attention, often hilariously, to unconscious expectations around masculinity and femininity and disrupt any easy alignments among race, gender, and bodily presentation.

Churchill regularly writes plays inspired by current events, including Serious Money (1987), about the excesses of the financial industry, and the science-fictional A Number (2002), in which a father must come to terms with his three sons, two of whom are clones of the first. The play engaged the conversation around biotechnology and ethics sparked by the 1996 cloning of Dolly the sheep. Love and Information (2012), a work about modern forms of communication, introduced randomization into its staging. The play involves one hundred characters played by fifteen actors and is made up of scenes that range from twenty-five seconds to a few minutes long. These scenes unfold across seven sections of the play, but can be staged in different orders within each section at the discretion of the director. Churchill's experiments with length continue in Ding Dong the Wicked (2013), a full-length play, which lasts just twenty minutes, and What If If Only, another twenty-minute play, which explores grief and loss while evoking a Scrooge-like character confronted by ghosts from the future. Many of Churchill's works have been revived: Cloud Nine in 2015 in New York City; the one-acts Blue Kettle (1997) and Here We Go (2015) in 2018 by the Boston Commonwealth Shakespeare Company; Top Girls in 2019 at the National Theatre; A Number in 2022 at the Old Vic for its twentieth anniversary. The Royal Court Theatre mounted a seventieth-birthday retrospective in 2008 with readings from her plays. Churchill has won five Obies, including one for lifetime achievement, two Lucille Lortel Awards, and a Drama Critics' Circle Award.

Top Girls, included here, premiered at the Royal Court in 1982, and follows a surreal structure. The first act invites its audience to a dinner party featuring notable women from different continents and centuries. The scene recalls a famous work of installation art, The Dinner Party (1974–79) by American artist Judy Chicago, which gathered women from mythology and history around a table whose place settings contain biographical details of each woman ornamented by strikingly vulvar forms. Chicago's piece sought to celebrate iconic women excluded from or diminished by history books. The Top Girls dinner party draws on but complicates such a celebration. Here, historical, mythic, and fictional women parade into a restaurant, one by one, to mark the achievement of their host, Marlene, who has been promoted to managing director of the Top Girls employment agency in early 1980s England. The lives of these guests cannot be contained by a place setting, and as they tell their stories, details spill out on top of each other in overlapping dialogue—a technique that Churchill pioneered. Two characters are historical: Isabella Bird, a Scots-English explorer from the Victorian era, and Lady Nijo, a Japanese courtesan who has become a Buddhist monk. One is fictional: the long-suffering Patient Griselda from Chaucer's "Clerk's Tale." Another is an artist's subject: Dull Gret, a folkloric figure ready to invade Hell in Bruegel's Flemish Renaissance oil painting. Another is the stuff of legend: Pope Joan, who passed as a boy—and then Pope—until she gave birth and was martyred.

As theater critic Ben Brantley wryly noted in the New York Times, Churchill "saved her best for first," as this anachronistic procession of accomplished, trailblazing women, in historical dress, speak with and over each other in a raucous, energized symphony of stories. Churchill explains in "The Layout" her approach to characters' speech: it is marked typographically to indicate when a character interrupts, talks through another character's speech, or continues from a speech begun several characters earlier. Churchill choreographs a dizzying verbal dance, dramatizing on the stage the intersections between language and the women's shared experiences. The play is typically double cast with the actresses playing the notable characters in scene 1 later becoming Marlene's 1980s-era contemporaries: co-workers, job-seekers, family members. This strategy visualizes the connection between mythic and modern women's lives and draws attention to how historical representations of female ambition and sacrifice infiltrate the more ordinary but pressing concerns of women crossing between the home and the office. Churchill moves between these settings as much as she ranges across time. The final scene of Top Girls, set in the kitchen of Marlene's sister Joyce, takes place a year earlier than the penultimate scene, giving the last word to the daughter that Marlene left behind in the pursuit of career advancement.

As the play moves into modern-day England, Churchill yokes complex portrayals of female empowerment to the ideological shift toward self-reliance and economic individualism enshrined in the positions of Margaret Thatcher, the first female prime minister of the United Kingdom and leader of the Conservative Party. From 1979 until 1990, Thatcher oversaw the dismantling of the English welfare state, and five years after Top Girls premiered, famously declared "There is no such thing as society. There are individual men and women and there are families." Churchill's play recognizes and wrestles with the values embedded in Thatcher's legacy as well the divisiveness inspired by the Iron Lady herself.

Top Girls

PRODUCTION NOTE

The seating order for ACT I SCENE 1 in the original production at the Royal Court was (from R.) GRET, NIJO, MARLENE, JOAN, GRISELDA, ISABELLA.

The Characters

ISABELLA BIRD (1831–1904)—lived in Edinburgh,¹ travelled extensively between the ages of 40 and 70.

LADY NIJO (b. 1258)—Japanese, was an Emperor's courtesan and later a Buddhist nun who travelled on foot through Japan.

DULL GRET—is the subject of the Brueghel painting Dulle Griet,² in which a woman in an apron and armour leads a crowd of women charging through hell and fighting the devils.

POPE JOAN³—disguised as a man, is thought to have been Pope between 854–856.

PATIENT GRISELDA—is the obedient wife whose story is told by Chaucer in "The Clerk's Tale" of The Canterbury Tales.

The Layout

A speech usually follows the one immediately before it BUT:

- 1) When one character starts speaking before the other has finished, the point of interruption is marked / . e.g.

ISABELLA. This is the Emperor of Japan? / I once met the Emperor of Morocco.

NIJO. In fact he was the ex-Emperor.

- 2) A character sometimes continues speaking right through another's speech: e.g.

ISABELLA. When I was forty I thought my life was over. / Oh I was pitiful. I was

NIJO. I didn't say I felt it for twenty years. Not every minute ISABELLA. sent on a cruise for my health and felt even worse. Pains in my bones, pins and needles . . . etc.

3) Sometimes a speech follows on from a speech earlier than the one immediately before it, and continuity is marked *. e.g.

GRISELDA. I'd seen him riding by, we all had. And he'd seen me in the fields with the sheep. *

ISABELLA. I would have been well suited to minding sheep.

NIJO. And Mr Nugent went riding by.

ISABELLA. Of course not, Nijo, I mean a healthy life in the open air.

JOAN. *He just rode up while you were minding the sheep and asked you to marry him?

where "in the fields with the sheep" is the cue to both "I would have been" and "He just rode up."

Endnotes

- Note 1: City in Scotland.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: 1563 painting by Flemish artist Pieter Brueghel the Elder (ca. 1525–1569).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: While her reign was widely believed in and storied, scholars believe her to have been fictional.Return to reference 3

Act One

SCENE 1

Restaurant. Saturday night. There is a table with a white cloth set for dinner with six places. The lights come up on MARLENE and the Waitress.

MARLENE Excellent, yes, table for six. One of them's going to be late but we won't wait. I'd like a bottle of Frascati⁴ straight away if you've got one really cold. [The Waitress goes. ISABELLA BIRD arrives.] Here we are. Isabella.

ISABELLA Congratulations, my dear.

MARLENE Well, it's a step. It makes for a party. I haven't time for a holiday. I'd like to go somewhere exotic like you but I can't get away. I don't know how you could bear to leave Hawaii. / I'd like to lie

ISABELLA I did think of settling.

MARLENE in the sun forever, except of course I can't bear sitting still.

ISABELLA I sent for my sister Hennie to come and join me. I said, Hennie we'll live here forever and help the natives. You can buy two sirloins of beef for what a pound of chops cost in Edinburgh. And Hennie wrote back, the dear; that yes, she would come to Hawaii if I wished, but I said she had far better stay where she was. Hennie was suited to life in Tobermory.⁵

MARLENE Poor Hennie.

ISABELLA Do you have a sister?

MARLENE Yes in fact.

ISABELLA Hennie was happy. She was good. I did miss its face, my own pet. But I couldn't stay in Scotland. I loathed the constant murk.

[LADY NIJO arrives.]

MARLENE [seeing her] Ah! Nijo! [The Waitress enters with the wine.]

NIJO Marlene! [to ISABELLA] So excited when Marlene told me / you were coming.

ISABELLA I'm delighted / to meet you.

MARLENE I think a drink while we wait for the others. I think a drink anyway. What a week. [MARLENE seats NIJO. The Waitress pours the wine.]

NIJO It was always the men who used to get so drunk. I'd be one of the maidens, passing the sake.

ISABELLA I've had sake. Small hot drink. Quite fortifying after a day in the wet.

NIJO One night my father proposed three rounds of three cups, which was normal, and then the Emperor should have said three rounds of three cups, but he said three rounds of nine cups, so you can imagine.⁶ Then the Emperor passed his sake cup to my father and said, "Let the wild goose come to me this spring."

MARLENE Let the what?

NIJO It's a literary allusion to a tenth-century epic.⁷ His Majesty was very cultured.

ISABELLA This is the Emperor of Japan? / I once met the Emperor of Morocco.⁸

NIJO In fact he was the ex-Emperor.⁹

MARLENE But he wasn't old? / Did you, Isabella?

NIJO Twenty-nine.

ISABELLA Oh it's a long story.

MARLENE Twenty-nine's an excellent age.

NIJO Well I was only fourteen and I knew he meant something but I didn't know what. He sent me an eight-layered gown and I sent it back. So when the time came I did nothing but cry. My thin gowns were badly ripped. But even that morning when he left / —he'd a green

MARLENE Are you saying he raped you?

NIJO robe with a scarlet lining and very heavily embroidered trousers, I already felt different about him. It made me uneasy. No, of course not, Marlene, I belonged to him, it was what I was brought up for from a baby. I soon found I was sad if he stayed away. It was depressing day after day not knowing when he would come. I never enjoyed taking other women to him.

ISABELLA I certainly never saw my father drunk. He was a clergyman. / And I didn't get married till I was fifty. [The Waitress brings the menus.]

NIJO Oh, my father was a very religious man. Just before he died he said to me, "Serve His Majesty, be respectful, if you lose his favour enter holy orders."

MARLENE But he meant stay in a convent, not go wandering round the country.

NIJO Priests were often vagrants, so why not a nun? You think I shouldn't / I still did what my father wanted.

MARLENE No no, I think you should. / I think it was wonderful.

[DULL GRET arrives.]

ISABELLA I tried to do what my father wanted.

MARLENE Gret, good. Nijo. Gret / I know Griselda's going to be late, but should we wait for Joan? / Let's get you a drink.

ISABELLA Hello, Gret! [She continues to NIJO.] I tried to be a clergyman's daughter. Needlework, music, charitable schemes. I had a tumour removed from my spine and spent a great deal of time on the sofa. I studied the metaphysical poets and hymnology¹ / I thought I enjoyed intellectual pursuits.

NIJO Ah, you like poetry. I come of a line of eight generations of poets. Father had a poem / in the anthology.

ISABELLA My father taught me Latin although I was a girl. / But really I was.

MARLENE They didn't have Latin at my school.

ISABELLA more suited to manual work. Cooking, washing, mending, riding horses. / Better than reading

NIJO Oh but I'm sure you're very clever.

ISABELLA books, eh Gret? A rough life in the open air.

NIJO I can't say I enjoyed my rough life. What I enjoyed most was being the Emperor's favourite / and wearing thin silk.

ISABELLA Did you have any horses, Gret?

GRET Pig.

[POPE JOAN arrives.]

MARLENE Oh Joan, thank God, we can order. Do you know everyone?
We were just talking about learning Latin and being clever girls.
Joan way by way of an infant prodigy. Of course you were. What excited you when you were ten?

JOAN Because angels are without matter they are not individuals.
Every angel is a species.²

MARLENE There you are. [They laugh. They look at the menus.]

ISABELLA Yes, I forgot all my Latin. But my father was the mainspring of my life and when he died I was so grieved. I'll have the chicken, please, / and the soup.

NIJO Of course you were grieved. My father was saying his prayers and he dozed off in the sun. So I touched his knee to rouse him.
"I wonder what will happen," he said, and then he was dead before he finished the sentence. / If he'd

MARLENE What a shock.

NIJO died saying his prayers he would have gone straight to heaven. / Waldorf salad³

JOAN Death is the return of all creatures to God.

NIJO I shouldn't have woken him.

JOAN Damnation only means ignorance of the truth. I was always attracted by the teachings of John the Scot,⁴ though he was inclined to confuse / God and the world.

ISABELLA Grief always overwhelmed me at the time.

MARLENE What I fancy is a rare steak. Gret?

ISABELLA I am of course a member of the / Church of England.⁵

MARLENE Gret?

GRET Potatoes.

MARLENE I haven't been to church for years. / I like Christmas carols.

ISABELLA Good works matter more than church attendance.

MARLENE Make that two steaks and a lot of potatoes. Rare. But I don't do good works either.

JOAN Canelloni,⁶ please, / and a salad.

ISABELLA Well, I tried, but oh dear. Hennie did good works.

NIJO The first half of my life was all sin and the second / all repentance.*

MARLENE Oh what about starters?

GRET Soup.

JOAN *And which did you like best?

MARLENE Were your travels just a penance? Avocado vinaigrette.

Didn't you / enjoy yourself?

JOAN Nothing to start with for me, thank you.

NIJO Yes, but I was very unhappy. / It hurt to remember the past.

MARLENE And the wine list.

NIJO I think that was repentance.

MARLENE Well I wonder.

NIJO I might have just been homesick.

MARLENE Or angry.

NIJO Not angry, no, / why angry?

GRET Can we have some more bread?

MARLENE Don't you get angry? I get angry.

NIJO But what about?

MARLENE Yes let's have two more Frascati. And some more bread, please. [The Waitress exits.]

ISABELLA I tried to understand Buddhism when I was in Japan but all this birth and death succeeding each other through eternities just filled me with the most profound melancholy. I do like something more active.

NIJO You couldn't say I was inactive. I walked every day for twenty years.

ISABELLA I don't mean walking. / I mean in the head.

NIJO I vowed to copy five Mahayana sutras.⁷ / Do you know how long they are?

MARLENE I don't think religious beliefs are something we have in common. Activity yes. [GRET empties the bread basket into her apron.]

NIJO My head was active. / My head ached.

JOAN It's no good being active in heresy.

ISABELLA What heresy? She's calling the Church of England / a heresy.

JOAN There are some very attractive / heresies.

NIJO I had never heard of Christianity. Never / heard of it.
Barbarians.

MARLENE Well I'm not a Christian. / And I'm not a Buddhist.

ISABELLA You have heard of it?

MARLENE We don't all have to believe the same.

ISABELLA I knew coming to dinner with a Pope we should keep off religion.

JOAN I always enjoy a theological argument. But I won't try to convert you, I'm not a missionary. Anyway I'm a heresy myself.

ISABELLA There are some barbaric practices in the east.

NIJO Barbaric?

ISABELLA Among the lower classes.

NIJO I wouldn't know.

ISABELLA Well theology always made my head ache.

MARLENE Oh good, some food. [The Waitress brings the first course, serves it during the following, then exits.]

NIJO How else could I have left the court if I wasn't a nun? When father died I had only His Majesty. So when I fell out of favour I had nothing. Religion is a kind of nothing / and I dedicated what was left of me to nothing.

ISABELLA That's what I mean about Buddhism. It doesn't brace.

MARLENE Come on, Nijo, have some wine.

NIJO Haven't you ever felt like that? You've all felt / like that.
Nothing will ever happen again. I am dead already.

ISABELLA You thought your life was over but it wasn't.

JOAN You wish it was over.

GRET Sad.

MARLENE Yes, when I first came to London I sometimes . . . and when I got back from America I did. But only for a few hours. Not twenty years.

ISABELLA When I was forty I thought my life was over. / Oh I was pitiful. I was sent

NIJO I didn't say I felt it for twenty years. Not every minute.

ISABELLA on a cruise for my health and I felt even worse. Pains in my bones, pins and needles in my hands, swelling behind the ears, and—oh, stupidity. I shook all over, indefinable terror. And Australia seemed to me a hideous country, the acacias⁸ stank like drains. / I

NIJO You were homesick. [GRET steals a bottle of wine.]

ISABELLA had a photograph taken for Hennie but I told her I wouldn't send it, my hair had fallen out and my clothes were crooked, I looked completely insane and suicidal.

NIJO So did I, exactly, dressed as a nun. / I was wearing walking shoes for the first time.

ISABELLA I longed to go home, / but home to what? Houses are so perfectly dismal.*

NIJO I longed to go back ten years.

MARLENE *I thought travelling cheered you both up.

ISABELLA Oh it did / of course. It was on NIJO I'm not a cheerful person, Marlene. I just laugh a lot.

ISABELLA the trip from Australia to the Sandwich Isles,⁹ I fell in love with the sea. There were rats in the cabin and ants in the food but suddenly it was like a new world. I woke up every morning happy, knowing there would be nothing to annoy me. No nervousness. No dressing.

NIJO Don't you like getting dressed? I adored my clothes. / When I was chosen

MARLENE You had prettier colours than Isabella.

NIJO to give sake to His Majesty's brother, the Emperor Kameyana,¹ on his formal visit, I wore raw silk pleated trousers and a seven-layered gown in shades of red, and two outer garments, / yellow lined with green

MARLENE Yes, all that silk must have been very—[The Waitress enters, clears the first course and exits.]

JOAN I dressed as a boy when I left home.*

NIJO and a light green jacket. Lady Betto² had a five-layered gown in shades of green and purple.

ISABELLA *You dressed as a boy?

MARLENE Of course, / for safety.

JOAN It was easy, I was only twelve. / Also women weren't allowed in the library. We wanted to study in Athens.³

MARLENE You ran away alone?

JOAN No, not alone, I went with my friend. / He was NIJO Ah, an elopement.

JOAN sixteen but I thought I knew more science than he did and almost as much philosophy.

ISABELLA Well I always travelled as a lady and I repudiated strongly any suggestion in the press that I was other than feminine.

MARLENE I don't wear trousers in the office. / I could but I don't.

ISABELLA There was no great danger to a woman of my age and appearance.

MARLENE And you got away with it, Joan?

JOAN I did then. [The Waitress brings in the main course.]

MARLENE And nobody noticed anything?

JOAN They noticed I was a very clever boy. / And MARLENE I couldn't have kept pretending for so long.

JOAN when I shared a bed with my friend, that was ordinary—two poor students in a lodging house. I think I forgot I was pretending.

ISABELLA Rocky Mountain Jim, Mr Nugent,⁴ showed me no disrespect. He found it interesting, I think, that I could make scones and also lasso cattle. Indeed he declared his love for me, which was most distressing.

NIJO What did he say? / We always sent poems first.

MARLENE What did you say?

ISABELLA I urged him to give up whisky, / but he said it was too late.

MARLENE Oh Isabella.

ISABELLA He had lived alone in the mountains for many years.

MARLENE But did you—? [The Waitress goes.]

ISABELLA Mr Nugent was a man that any woman might love but none could marry. I came back to England.

NIJO Did you write him a poem when you left? / Snow on the mountains. My sleeves

MARLENE Did you never see him again?

ISABELLA No, never.

NIJO are wet with tears. In England no tears, no snow.

ISABELLA Well, I say never. One morning very early in Switzerland, it was a year later, I had a vision of him as I last saw him / in his trapper's clothes with his NIJO A ghost!

ISABELLA hair round his face, and that was the day, / I learnt later, he died with a NIJO Ah!

ISABELLA bullet in his brain. / He just bowed to me and vanished.

MARLENE Oh Isabella.

NIJO When your lover dies—One of my lovers died. / The priest Ariake.⁵

JOAN My friend died. Have we all got dead lovers?

MARLENE Not me, sorry.

NIJO [to ISABELLA] I wasn't a nun, I was still at court, but he was a priest, and when he came to me he dedicated his whole life to hell. / He knew that when he died he would fall into one of the three lower realms. And he died, he did die.

JOAN [to MARLENE] I'd quarrelled with him over the teachings of John the Scot, who held that our ignorance of God is the same as his ignorance of himself. He only knows what he creates because he creates everything he knows but he himself is above being—do you follow?

MARLENE No, but go on.

NIJO I couldn't bear to think / in what shape would he be reborn.*

JOAN St Augustine maintained that the Neo-Platonic Ideas are indivisible⁶

ISABELLA *Buddhism is really most uncomfortable.

JOAN from God, but I agreed with John that the created world is essences derived from Ideas which derived from God. As Denys the Areopagite said—the pseudo-Denys—first we give God a name, then deny it, / then reconcile the contradiction

NIJO In what shape would he return?

JOAN by looking beyond / those terms—

MARLENE Sorry, what? Denys said what?

JOAN Well we disagreed about it, we quarrelled. And next day he was ill, / I was so annoyed with him

NIJO Misery in this life and worse in the next, all because of me.

JOAN all the time I was nursing him I kept going over the arguments in my mind. Matter is not a means of knowing the essence. The source of the species is the Idea. But then I realized he'd never understand my arguments again, and that night he died. John the Scot held that the individual disintegrates / and there is no personal immortality.

ISABELLA I wouldn't have you think I was in love with Jim Nugent. It was yearning to save him that I felt.

MARLENE [to JOAN] So what did you do?

JOAN First I decided to stay a man. I was used to it. And I wanted to devote my life to learning. Do you know why I went to Rome? Italian men didn't have beards.

ISABELLA The loves of my life were Hennie, my own pet, and my dear husband the doctor, who nursed Hennie in her last illness. I knew it would be terrible when Hennie died but I didn't know how terrible. I felt half of myself had gone. How could I go on my travels without that sweet soul waiting at home for my letters? It was Doctor Bishop's devotion to her in her last illness that made me decide to marry him. He and Hennie had the same sweet character. I had not.

NIJO I thought His Majesty had sweet character because when he found out about Ariake he was so kind. But really it was because he no longer cared for me. One night he even sent me out to a man who had been pursuing me. / He lay awake on the other side of the screens and listened.

ISABELLA I did wish marriage had seemed more of a step. I tried very hard to cope with the ordinary drudgery of life. I was ill again with carbuncles⁷ on the spine and nervous prostration. I ordered a tricycle, that was my idea of adventure then. And John himself fell ill, with erysipelas and anaemia.⁸ I began to love him with my whole heart but it was too late. He was a skeleton with transparent white hands. I wheeled him on various seafronts in a bathchair. And he faded and left me. There was nothing in my life. The doctors said I had gout / and my heart was much affected.

NIJO There was nothing in my life, nothing, without the Emperor's favour. The Empress had always been my enemy, Marlene, she said I had no right to wear three-layered gowns. / But I was the adopted daughter of my grandfather the Prime Minister. I had been publicly granted permission to wear thin silk.

JOAN There was nothing in my life except my studies. I was obsessed with pursuit of the truth. I taught at the Greek School in Rome, which St Augustine had made famous. I was poor, I worked hard, I spoke apparently brilliantly, I was still very young, I was a stranger, suddenly I was quite famous, I was everyone's favourite. Huge crowds came to hear me. The day after they made me cardinal I fell ill and lay two weeks without speaking, full of terror and regret. / But then I got up determined to MARLENE Yes, success is very . . .

JOAN go on. I was seized again / with a desperate longing for the absolute.

ISABELLA Yes, yes, to go on. I sat in Tobermory among Hennie's flowers and sewed a complete outfit in Jaeger flannel.⁹ I was fifty-six years old.

NIJO Out of favour but I didn't die. I left on foot, nobody saw me go. For the next twenty years I walked through Japan.

GRET Walking is good. [Meanwhile, the Waitress enters, pours lots of wine, then shows MARLENE the empty bottle.]

JOAN Pope Leo¹ died and I was chosen. All right then. I would be Pope. I would know God. I would know everything.

ISABELLA I determined to leave my grief behind and set off for Tibet.

MARLENE Magnificent all of you. We need some more wine, please, two bottles I think, Griselda isn't even here yet, and I want to drink a toast to you all. [The Waitress exits.]

ISABELLA To yourself surely, / we're here to celebrate your success.

NIJO Yes, Marlene.

JOAN Yes, what is it exactly, Marlene?

MARLENE Well it's not Pope but it is managing director.*

JOAN And you find work for people.

MARLENE Yes, an employment agency.

NIJO *Over all the women you work with. And the men.

ISABELLA And very well deserved too. I'm sure it's just the beginning of something extraordinary.

MARLENE Well it's worth a party.

ISABELLA To Marlene.*

MARLENE And all of us.

JOAN *Marlene.

NIJO Marlene.

GRET Marlene.

MARLENE We've all come a long way. To our courage and the way we changed our lives and our extraordinary achievements. [They laugh and drink a toast.]

ISABELLA Such adventures. We were crossing a mountain pass at seven thousand feet, the cook was all to pieces, the muleteers suffered fever and snow blindness.² But even though my spine was agony I managed very well.*

MARLENE Wonderful.

NIJO *Once I was ill for four months lying alone at an inn. Nobody to offer a horse to Buddha. I had to live for myself, and I did live.

ISABELLA Of course you did. It was far worse returning to Tobermory. I always felt dull when I was stationary. / That's why I could never stay anywhere.

NIJO Yes, that's it exactly. New sights. The shrine by the beach, the moon shining on the sea. The goddess had vowed to save all living things. / She would even save the fishes. I was full of hope.

JOAN I had thought the Pope would know everything. I thought God would speak to me directly. But of course he knew I was a woman.

MARLENE But nobody else even suspected? [The Waitress brings more wine and then exits.]

JOAN In the end I did take a lover again.*

ISABELLA In the vatican?³

GRET *Keep you warm.

NIJO *Ah, lover.

MARLENE *Good for you.

JOAN He was one of my chamberlains.⁴ There are such a lot of servants when you're Pope. The food's very good. And I realized I did know the truth. Because whatever the Pope says, that's true.

NIJO What was he like, the chamberlain?*

GRET Big cock.

ISABELLA Oh, Gret.

MARLENE *Did he fancy you when he thought you were a fella?

NIJO What was he like?

JOAN He could keep a secret.

MARLENE So you did know everything.

JOAN Yes, I enjoyed being Pope. I consecrated bishops and let people kiss my feet. I received the King of England when he came to submit to the church. Unfortunately there were earthquakes, and some village reported it had rained blood, and in France there was a plague of giant grasshoppers, but I don't think that can have been my fault, do you?*

⁵ [laughter] The grasshoppers fell on the English Channel / and were washed up on shore NIJO I once went to sea. It was very lonely. I realized it made very little difference where I went.

JOAN and their bodies rotted and poisoned the air and everyone in those parts died. [laughter]

ISABELLA *Such superstition! I was nearly murdered in China by a howling mob. They thought the barbarians ate babies and put them under railway sleepers to make the tracks steady, and ground up their eyes to make the lenses of cameras. / So they were shouting,

MARLENE And you had a camera!

ISABELLA "Child-eater, child-eater." Some people tried to sell girl babies to Europeans for cameras or stew! [laughter]

MARLENE So apart from the grasshoppers it was a great success.

JOAN Yes, if it hadn't been for the baby I expect I'd have lived to an old age like Theodora of Alexandria,⁶ who lived as a monk. She was accused by a girl / who fell in love with her of being the father of her child and—

NIJO But tell us what happened to your baby. I had some babies.

MARLENE Didn't you think of getting rid of it?

JOAN Wouldn't that be a worse sin than having it? / But a Pope with a child was about as bad as possible.

MARLENE I don't know, you're the Pope.

JOAN But I wouldn't have known how to get rid of it.

MARLENE Other Popes had children, surely.

JOAN They didn't give birth to them.

NIJO Well you were a woman.

JOAN Exactly and I shouldn't have been a woman. Women, children and lunatics can't be Pope.

MARLENE So the only thing to do / was to get rid of it somehow.

NIJO You had to have it adopted secretly.

JOAN But I didn't know what was happening. I thought I was getting fatter, but then I was eating more and sitting about, the life of a Pope is quite luxurious. I don't think I'd spoken to a woman since I was twelve. The chamberlain was the one who realized.

MARLENE And by then it was too late.

JOAN Oh I didn't want to pay attention. It was easier to do nothing.

NIJO But you had to plan for having it. You had to say you were ill and go away.

JOAN That's what I should have done I suppose.

MARLENE Did you want them to find out?

NIJO I too was often in embarrassing situations, there's no need for a scandal. My first child was His Majesty's, which unfortunately died, but my second was Akebono's. I was seventeen. He was in love with me when I was thirteen, he was very upset when I had to go to the Emperor, it was very romantic, a lot of poems. Now His Majesty hadn't been near me for two months so he thought I was four months pregnant when I was really six, so when I reached the ninth month / I announced I was seriously ill,

JOAN I never knew what month it was.

NIJO and Akebono announced he had gone on a religious retreat. He held me round the waist and lifted me up as the baby was born. He cut the cord with a short sword, wrapped the baby in white and took it away. It was only a girl but I was sorry to lose it. Then I told the Emperor that the baby had miscarried because of my illness, and there you are. The danger was past.

JOAN But, Nijo, I wasn't used to having a woman's body.

ISABELLA So what happened?

JOAN I didn't know of course that it was near the time. It was Rogation Day,² there was always a procession. I was on the horse dressed in my robes and a cross was carried in front of me, and all the cardinals were following, and all the clergy of Rome, and a huge crowd of people. / We set off from St Peter's to go

MARLENE Total Pope. [GRET pours the wine and steals the bottle.]

JOAN to St John's. I had felt a slight pain earlier, I thought it was something I'd eaten, and then it came back, and came back more often. I thought when this is over I'll go to bed. There were still long gaps when I felt perfectly all right and I didn't want to attract attention to myself and spoil the ceremony. Then I suddenly realized what it must be. I had to last out till I could get home and hide. Then something changed, my breath started to catch, I couldn't plan things properly any more. We were in a little street that goes between St Clement's and the Colosseum, and I just had to get off the horse and sit down for a minute. Great waves of pressure were going through my body, I heard sounds like a cow lowing, they came out of my mouth. Far away I heard people screaming, "The Pope is ill, the Pope is dying." And the baby just slid out on to the road.*

MARLENE The cardinals / won't have known where to put themselves.

NIJO Oh dear, Joan, what a thing to do! In the street!

ISABELLA *How embarrassing.

GRET In a field, yah. [They are laughing.]

JOAN One of the cardinals said, "The Antichrist!" and fell over in a faint. [They all laugh.]

MARLENE So what did they do? They weren't best pleased.

JOAN They took me by the feet and dragged me out of town and stoned me to death. [They stop laughing.]

MARLENE Joan, how horrible.

JOAN I don't really remember.

NIJO And the child died too?

JOAN Oh yes, I think so, yes. [The Waitress enters to clear the plates. Pause. They start talking very quietly.]

ISABELLA [to JOAN] I never had any children. I was very fond of horses.

NIJO [to MARLENE] I saw my daughter once. She was three years old. She wore a plum-red / small sleeved gown. Akebono's⁸ wife ISABELLA Birdie was my favourite. A little Indian bay mare⁹ I rode in the Rocky Mountains.

NIJO had taken the child because her own died. Everyone thought I was just a visitor. She was being brought up carefully so she could be sent to the palace like I was. [GRET steals her empty plate.]

ISABELLA Legs of iron and always cheerful, and such a pretty face. If a stranger led her she reared up like a bronco.

NIJO I never saw my third child after he was born, the son of Ariake the priest. Ariake held him on his lap the day he was born and talked to him as if he could understand, and cried. My fourth child was Ariake's too. Ariake died before he was born. I didn't want to see anyone, I stayed alone in the hills. It was a boy again, my third son. But oddly enough I felt nothing for him.

MARLENE How many children did you have, Gret?

GRET Ten.

ISABELLA Whenever I came back to England I felt I had so much to atone for. Hennie and John were so good. I did no good in my life. I spent years in self-gratification. So I hurled myself into committees, I nursed the people of Tobermory in the epidemic of influenza, I lectured the Young Women's Christian Association on Thrift.¹ I talked and talked explaining how the East was corrupt and vicious. My travels must do good to someone beside myself. I wore myself out with good causes.

MARLENE [pause] Oh God, why are we all so miserable?

JOAN [pause] The procession never went down that street again.

MARLENE They rerouted it specially?

JOAN Yes they had to go all round to avoid it. And they introduced a pierced chair.²

MARLENE A pierced chair?

JOAN Yes, a chair made out of solid marble with a hole in the seat / and it was

MARLENE You're not serious.

JOAN in the Chapel of the Saviour, and after he was elected the Pope had to sit in it.

MARLENE And someone looked up his skirts? / Not really!

ISABELLA What an extraordinary thing.

JOAN Two of the clergy / made sure he was a man.

NIJO On their hands and knees!

MARLENE A pierced chair!

GRET Balls!

[GRISelda arrives unnoticed.]

NIJO Why couldn't he just pull up his robe?

JOAN He had to sit there and look dignified.

MARLENE You could have made all your chamberlains sit in it.*

GRET Big one. Small one.

NIJO Very useful chair at court.

ISABELLA *Or the Laird of Tobermory in his kilt.³

[They are quite drunk. They get the giggles. MARLENE notices GRISelda and gets up to welcome her. The others go on talking and laughing. GRET crosses to JOAN and ISABELLA and pours them wine from her stolen bottles. The Waitress gives out the menus.]

MARLENE Griselda! / There you are. Do you want to eat?

GRISelda I'm sorry I'm so late. No, no, don't bother.

MARLENE Of course it's no bother. / Have you eaten?

GRISelda No really, I'm not hungry.

MARLENE Well have some pudding.

GRISELDA I never eat pudding.

MARLENE Griselda, I hope you're not anorexic.⁴ We're having pudding, I am, and getting nice and fat.

GRISELDA Oh if everyone is. I don't mind.

MARLENE Now who do you know? This is Joan who was Pope in the ninth century, and Isabella Bird, the Victorian traveller, and Lady Nijo from Japan, Emperor's concubine and Buddhist nun, thirteenth century, nearer your own time, and Gret who was painted by Brueghel. Griselda's in Boccaccio and Petrarch and Chaucer because of her extraordinary marriage.⁵ I'd like profiteroles⁶ because they're disgusting.

JOAN Zabaglione,⁷ please.

ISABELLA Apple pie / and cream.

NIJO What's this?

MARLENE Zabaglione, it's Italian, it's what Joan's having, / it's delicious.

NIJO A Roman Catholic / dessert? Yes please.

MARLENE Gret?

GRET Cake.

GRISELDA Just cheese and biscuits, thank you. [The Waitress exits.]

MARLENE Yes, Griselda's life is like a fairy story, except it starts with marrying the prince.

GRISELDA He's only a marquis, Marlene.

MARLENE Well everyone for miles around is his liege and he'd absolute lord of life and death and you were the poor but beautiful peasant girl and he whisked you off. / Near enough a prince.

NIJO How old were you?

GRISELDA Fifteen.

NIJO I was brought up in court circles and it was still a shock. Had you ever seen him before?

GRISELDA I'd seen him riding by, we all had. And he'd seen me in the fields with the sheep.*

ISABELLA I would have been well suited to minding sheep.

NIJO And Mr Nugent riding by.

ISABELLA Of course not, Nijo, I mean a healthy life in the open air.

JOAN *He just rode up while you were minding the sheep and asked you to marry him?

GRISELDA No, no, it was on the wedding day. I was waiting outside the door to see the procession. Everyone wanted him to get married so there'd be an heir to look after us when he died, / and at last he MARLENE I don't think Walter wanted to get married. It is Walter? Yes.

GRISELDA announced a day for the wedding but nobody knew who the bride was, we thought it must be a foreign princess, we were longing to see her. Then the carriage stopped outside our cottage and we couldn't see the bride anywhere. And he came and spoke to my father.

NIJO And your father told you to serve the Prince.

GRISELDA My father could hardly speak. The Marquis said it wasn't an order, I could say no, but if I said yes I must always obey him in everything.

MARLENE That's when you should have suspected.

GRISELDA But of course a wife must obey her husband. / And of course I must obey the Marquis.*

ISABELLA I swore to obey dear John, of course, but it didn't seem to arise. Naturally I wouldn't have wanted to go abroad while I was married.

MARLENE *Then why bother to mention it at all? He'd got a thing about it, that's why.

GRISELDA I'd rather obey the Marquis than a boy from the village.

MARLENE Yes, that's a point.

JOAN I never obeyed anyone. They all obeyed me.

NIJO And what did you wear? He didn't make you get married in your own clothes? That would be perverse.*

MARLENE Oh, you wait.

GRISELDA *He had ladies with him who undressed me and they had a white silk dress and jewels for my hair.

MARLENE And at first he seemed perfectly normal?

GRISELDA Marlene, you're always so critical of him. / Of course he was normal, he was very kind.

MARLENE But, Griselda, come on, he took your baby.
GRISELDA Walter found it hard to believe I loved him. He couldn't believe I would always obey him. He had to prove it.
MARLENE I don't think Walter likes women.
GRISELDA I'm sure he loved me, Marlene, all the time.
MARLENE He just had a funny way / of showing it.
GRISELDA It was hard for him too.
JOAN How do you mean he took away your baby?
NIJO Was it a boy?
GRISELDA No, the first one was a girl.
NIJO Even so it's hard when they take it away. Did you see it at all?
GRISELDA Oh yes, she was six weeks old.
NIJO Much better to do it straight away.
ISABELLA But why did your husband take the child?
GRISELDA He said all the people hated me because I was just one of them. And now I had a child they were restless. So he had to get rid of the child to keep them quiet. But he said he wouldn't snatch her, I had to agree and obey and give her up. So when I was feeding her a man came in and took her away. I thought he was going to kill her even before he was out of the room.
MARLENE But you let him take her? You didn't struggle?
GRISELDA I asked him to give her back so I could kiss he. And I asked him to bury her where no animals could dig her up. / It was Walter's child to do what he ISABELLA Oh, my dear.
GRISELDA liked with.*
MARLENE Walter was bonkers.
GRET Bastard.
ISABELLA *But surely, murder.
GRISELDA I had promised.
MARLENE I can't stand this. I'm going for a pee.

[MARLENE goes out. The Waitress brings the dessert, serves it during the following, then exits.]

NIJO No, I understand. Of course you had to, he was your life. And were you in favour after that?

GRISELDA Oh yes, we were very happy together. We never spoke about what had happened.

ISABELLA I can see you were doing what you thought was your duty. But didn't it make you ill?

GRISELDA No, I was very well, thank you.

NIJO And you had another child?

GRISELDA Not for four years, but then I did, yes, a boy.

NIJO Ah a boy. / So it all ended happily.

GRISELDA Yes he was pleased. I kept my son till he was two years old. A peasant's grandson. It made the people angry. Walter explained.

ISABELLA But surely he wouldn't kill his children / just because—

GRISELDA Oh it wasn't true. Walter would never give in to the people. He wanted to see if I loved him enough.

JOAN He killed his children / to see if you loved him enough?

NIJO Was it easier the second time or harder?

GRISELDA It was always easy because I always knew I would do what he said. [Pause. They start to eat.]

ISABELLA I hope you didn't have any more children.

GRISELDA Oh no, no more. It was twelve years till he tested me again.

ISABELLA So whatever did he do this time? / My poor John, I never loved him enough, and he would never have dreamt . . .

GRISELDA He sent me away. He said the people wanted him to marry someone else who'd give him an heir and he'd got special permission from the Pope. So I said I'd go home to my father. I came with nothing / so I went with nothing. I took NIJO Better to leave if your master doesn't want you.

GRISELDA off my clothes. He let me keep a slip so he wouldn't be shamed. And I walked home barefoot. My father came out in tears. Everyone was crying except me.

NIJO At least your father wasn't dead. / I had nobody.

ISABELLA Well it can be a relief to come home. I loved to see Hennie's sweet face again.

GRISELDA Oh yes, I was perfectly content. And quite soon he sent for me again.

JOAN I don't think I would have gone.

GRISELDA But he told me to come. I had to obey him. He wanted me to help prepare his wedding. He was getting married to a young girl from France / and nobody except me knew how to arrange things the way he liked them.

NIJO It's always hard taking him another woman. [MARLENE comes back.]

JOAN I didn't live a woman's life. I don't understand it.

GRISELDA The girl was sixteen and far more beautiful than me. I could see why he loved her. / She had her younger brother with her as a page. [The Waitress enters.]

MARLENE Oh God, I can't bear it. I want some coffee. Six coffees. Six brandies. / Double brandies. Straightaway. [The Waitress exits.]

GRISELDA They all went into the feast I'd prepared. And he stayed behind and put his arms round me and kissed me. / I felt half asleep with the shock.

NIJO Oh, like a dream.

MARLENE And he said, "This is your daughter and your son."

GRISELDA Yes.

JOAN What?

NIJO Oh. Oh I see. You got them back.

ISABELLA I did think it was remarkably barbaric to kill them but you learn not to say anything. / So he had them brought up secretly I suppose.

MARLENE Walter's a monster. Weren't you angry? What did you do?

GRISELDA Well I fainted. Then I cried and kissed the children. / Everyone was making a fuss of me.

NIJO But did you feel anything for them?

GRISELDA What?

NIJO Did you feel anything for the children?

GRISELDA Of course, I loved them.

JOAN So you forgave him and lived with him?

GRISELDA He suffered so much all those years.

ISABELLA Hennie had the same sweet nature.

NIJO So they dressed you again?

GRISELDA Cloth of gold.

JOAN I can't forgive anything.

MARLENE You really are exceptional, Griselda.

NIJO Nobody gave me back my children. [She cries.]

[The Waitress brings the brandies and then exits. During the following, JOAN goes to NIJO.]

ISABELLA I can never be like Hennie. I was always so busy in England, a kind of business I detested. The very presence of people exhausted my emotional reserves. I could not be like Hennie however I tried. I tried Full p. F-921 Shorter p. 1517 and was as ill as could be. The doctor suggested a steel net to support my head, the weight of my own head was too much for my diseased spine. It is dangerous to put oneself in depressing circumstances. Why should I do it?

JOAN [to NIJO] Don't cry.

NIJO My father and the Emperor both died in the autumn. So much pain.

JOAN Yes, but don't cry.

NIJO They wouldn't let me into the palace when he was dying. I hid in the room with his coffin, then I couldn't find where I'd left my shoes, I ran after the funeral procession in bare feet, I couldn't keep up. When I got there it was over, a few wisps of smoke in the sky, that's all that was left of him. What I want to know is, if I'd still been at court, would I have been allowed to wear full mourning?

MARLENE I'm sure you would.

NIJO Why do you say that? You don't know anything about it. Would I have been allowed to wear full mourning?

ISABELLA How can people live in this dim pale island and wear our hideous clothes? I cannot and will not live the life of a lady.

NIJO I'll tell you something that made me angry. I was eighteen, at the Full Moon Ceremony. They make a special rice gruel and stir it with their sticks, and then they beat their women across the loins so they'll have sons and not daughters. So the Emperor beat us all / very hard as

MARLENE What a sod. [The Waitress enters with the coffees.]

NIJO usual—that's not it, Marlene, that's normal, what made us angry he told his attendants they could beat us too. Well they had a wonderful time. / So Lady Genki and I made a plan, and the ladies

MARLENE I'd like another brandy, please. Better make it six. [The Waitress exits.]

NIJO all hid in his rooms, and Lady Mashimizu⁸ stood guard with a stick at the door, and when His Majesty came in Genki seized him and I beat him till he cried out and promised he would never order anyone to hit us again. Afterwards there was a terrible fuss. The nobles were horrified. "We wouldn't even dream of stepping on Your Majesty's shadow." And I had hit him with a stick. Yes, I hit him with a stick.

[The Waitress brings the brandy bottle and tops up the glasses. JOAN crosses in front of the table and back to her place while drunkenly reciting:]

JOAN Suave, mari magno turantibus aequora ventis, e terra magnum alterius spectare laborem;
non quia vexari quemquamst iucunda voluptas,
sed quibus ipse malis careas quia cernere suave est.
Suave etiam belli certamina magna tueri per campos instructa tua sine parte pericli.
Sed nil dulcius est, bene quam munita tenere
edita doctrina sapientum templa serena, despicere unde queas alios passimque videre
errare atque viam palantis quaerere vitae,

GRISELDA I do think—I do wonder—it would have been nicer if Walter hadn't had to.

ISABELLA Why should I? Why should I?

MARLENE Of course not.

NIJO I hit him with a stick.

JOAN certare ingenio, contendere nobilitate, noctes atque dies niti praestante labore
ad summas emergere opes rerumque potiri.
O miseras hominum mentis, / o pectora caeca!*

ISABELLA O miseras!

NIJO *Pectora caeca!

JOAN qualibus in tenebris vitae quantisque periclis degitur hoc aevi quoducmquest! / none videre nil aliud sibi naturam latrare, nisi utqui corpore seiunctus dolor absit, mente fruatur . . . [She subsides.]⁹

GRET We come to hell through a big mouth. Hell's black and red. / It's MARLENE [to JOAN] Shut up, pet.

GRISELDA Hush, please.

ISABELLA Listen, she's been to hell.

GRET like the village where I come from. There's a river and a bridge and houses. There's places on fire like when the soldiers come. There's a big devil sat on a roof with a big hole in his arse and he's scooping stuff out of it with a big ladle and it's falling down on us, and it's money, so a lot of the women stop and get some. But most of us is fighting the devils. There's lots of little devils, our size, and we get them down all right and give them a beating. There's lots of funny creatures round your feet, you don't like to look, like rats and lizards, and nasty things, a bum with a face, and fish with legs, and faces on things that don't have faces on. But they don't hurt, you just keep going. Well we'd had worse, you see, we'd had the Spanish.¹ We'd all had family killed. My big son die on a wheel. Birds eat him. My baby, a soldier run her through with a sword. I'd had enough, I was mad, I hate the bastards. I come out of my front door that morning and shout till my neighbours come out and I said, "Come on, we're going where the evil come from and pay the bastards out." And they all come out just as they was / from baking or

NIJO All the ladies come.

GRET washing in their aprons, and we push down the street and the ground opens up and we go through a big mouth into a street just like ours but in hell. I've got a sword in my hand from somewhere and I fill a basket with gold cups they drink out of down there.

You just keep running on and fighting, / you didn't stop for nothing. Oh we give them devils such a beating.*

NIJO Take that, take that.

JOAN *Something something something mortisque timores tum vaccum pectus—damn.
Quod si ridicula—
something something on and on and on and something splendorem purpureai.²

ISABELLA I thought I would have a last jaunt up the west river in China.³ Why not? But the doctors were so very grave I just went to Morocco. The sea was so wild I had to be landed by ship's crane in a coal bucket. / My horse was a terror to me, a powerful black charger.

GRET Coal bucket good.

JOAN nos in luce timemus something terrorem⁴

[NIJO is laughing and crying. JOAN gets up and is sick. GRISELDA looks after her.]

GRISELDA Can I have some water, please? [The Waitress exits.]

ISABELLA So off I went to visit the Berber sheikhs⁵ in full blue trousers and great brass spurs. I was the only European woman ever to have seen the Emperor of Morocco. I was [The Waitress brings the water.] seventy years old. What lengths to go to for a last chance of joy. I knew my return of vigour was only temporary, but how marvellous while it lasted.

Endnotes

- Note 4: Wine from Frascati, Italy.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: City in Scotland.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A reference to Towazugatari, translated as The Confessions of Lady Nijo, a memoir written by Nijo in which she describes Emperor Go-Fukakusa's proposal of three rounds of nine cups of sake as part of the celebration of her becoming his concubine in place of Nijo's mother.Return to reference 6

- Note 7: The Tales of the Ise. In the poem, the wild goose is a metaphor for a girl offered for marriage by her mother.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Country in western Africa.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Go-Fukakusa abdicated the throne in 1260.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Study of religious songs and hymns. "Metaphysical poets": a group of 17th-century poets who explored religion and philosophy, including figures like John Donne.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Joan is referring to Christian angelology debates. She is likely referring to Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite (ca. 5th–6th century), who is mentioned later in the play, and his conception of angelic hierarchy from his book De Coelesti Hierarchia, or On the Celestial Hierarchy.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: A fruit and nut salad, attributed to the Waldorf Hotel in New York City.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: John Scotus Eriugena (ca. 800–ca. 877), known as John the Scot. Irish philosopher and theologian in the Early Middle Ages.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The church was a product of the English Reformation in the 16th century, when Henry VIII renounced papal authority after being denied a marriage annulment. He aligned himself with Protestants, who had broken away from the Catholic Church, and his son Edward VI further developed the theology of the new Church of England.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Cannelloni, an Italian cylindrical pasta.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Buddhist scriptures.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Type of flowering shrub, known in Australia as a wattle.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The name given to the Hawaiian Islands by James Cook in 1778.Return to reference 9

- Note 1: Emperor Go-Fukakusa abdicated the throne to his brother, Kameyana.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Another concubine of Go-Fukakusa, mentioned by Nijo in her memoir.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: City in Greece. Some reports of Joan's life say she went to Athens dressed as a man with her lover and was educated there.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: James Nugent, known as "Rocky Mountain Jim," a trapper and guide to the Estes Park area in Colorado. Isabella Bird met him when travelling in 1873, and most of what is known about him comes from her writings. It is unclear who shot and killed him, as Isabella references later, though it was likely Griffith Evans, a rival guide in the area.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Ariake no Tsuki, another lover of Nijo's mentioned in her memoir.Return to reference 5
- Note 6:
Neoplatonism, following from Platonism, emerged in the 3rd century and greatly influenced religious scholars in the Middle Ages. While Neoplatonism is a wide set of ideas, most Neoplatonists believe in monism, or that all of reality is derived from "the One." "St Augustine": Christian theologian and philosopher (354–430) who studied Neoplatonism, which influenced his conversion to Christianity.
Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Clusters of boils under infected skin.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: An iron deficiency or lack of red blood cells.
"Erysipelas": a bacterial infection of the skin.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Gustav Jaeger (1832–1917) advocated for the use of clothing made from animal fibers like wool, instead of plant fibers like cotton, for hygienic reasons.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: St. Leo IV, who served as pope before Joan in some accounts. The historical record shows that Benedict III quickly succeeded Leo IV's death, and that she therefore could not have reigned.Return to reference 1

- Note 2: Eye damage or vision loss as a result of overexposure to UV rays, which are reflected by the snow. "Muleteers": drivers of mules.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The seat of the pope.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: A papal attendant.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Reference to a passage in The Chronicles of the Lives of the Popes and the Roman Emperors, published in 1478 and widely reprinted. The text's popularity resulted from attribution to Petrarch, but scholars now agree he was not the author.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A 5th-century saint from Alexandria, Egypt. To do penance for adultery, she disguised herself as a man and joined a monastery. She was discovered to be a woman only after her death. Unlike her, Pope Joan is said to have been discovered as a woman once she gave birth to a child during a procession.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: A day of prayer and fasting.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Yuki no Akebono, another of Nijo's lovers in her memoir.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: A female horse with brown hair and black mane and tail. "Indian": refers to Native American.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Originally a philanthropic group, founded in London in 1855. "Thrift": refers to management and saving of money.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: A legend not believed to be true by historians. Following the reign of a female pope, it was believed that subsequent popes were made to sit on a chair with a hole in the seat, and a cardinal would check to ensure that the pope had male genitalia.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: A Scottish garment for men, resembling a skirt. "Laird": a Scottish owner of an estate.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Referring to anorexia nervosa, an eating disorder characterized by refusing to eat.Return to reference 4
- Note 5:

Griselda is the heroine of the final tale in the Decameron (1351–53), by the Italian writer Giovanni Boccaccio (1313–1375); the story was retold in Latin, as “One Wife’s Mythic Obedience and Faith,” by the Italian poet Francesco Petrarch (1304–1374); Geoffrey Chaucer (ca. 1343–1400) drew on Petrarch’s version in “The Clerk’s Tale.” As the story of her marriage goes, Walter, a man from Italy, marries the peasant Griselda only after she promises to obey him always. He proceeds to test that promise by claiming to kill her two children and contriving to divorce her. She remains patient and obedient, and he finally confesses his deceit, returns her children, and they remain in a loving marriage.

Return to reference 5

- Note 6: Cream puffs. Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Italian custard dessert. Return to reference 7
- Note 8: With Lady Genki, other Imperial courtesans mentioned in Nijo’s memoir. Return to reference 8

- Note 9:

Joan is reciting from Lucretius’s De Rerum Natura, or On the Nature of Things. Translated from the Latin by W. H. D. Rouse: “Pleasant it is, when on the great sea the winds trouble the waters, to gaze from shore upon another’s great tribulation: not because any man’s troubles are a delectable joy, but because to perceive what ills you are free from yourself is pleasant. Pleasant is it also to behold great encounters of warfare arrayed over the plains, with no part of yours in the peril. But nothing is more delightful than to possess lofty sanctuaries serene, well fortified by the teachings of the wise, whence you may look down upon others and behold them all astray, wandering abroad and seeking the path of life:—the strife of wits, the fight for precedence, all labouring night and day with surpassing toil to mount upon the pinnacle of riches and to lay hold on power. O pitiable minds of men, O blind intelligences! In what gloom of life, in how great perils is passed all your poor span of time! not to see that all nature barks for is this, that pain be removed away out of the body, and that the mind, kept away from care and fear, enjoy a feeling of delight!” Joan trails off before the final line of the quotation, leaving out roughly “enjoy a feeling of delight!”

Return to reference 9

- Note 1: Under Charles V, the King of Spain, the Netherland region was united and became part of the Holy Roman Empire. Philip II inherited the lands, and the Netherlands revolted against him in the Eighty Years’ War. In 1648, the Spanish King Philip IV recognized the Independence of the Dutch Republic.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Joan continues to quote Lucretius in broken Latin. What she remembers can be roughly translated as “death’s terrors then leave your heart unpossessed—That if ridiculous—the brightness of the purple.”Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The Xi River.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Let us not fear in the light—terror (Latin).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: An Arab honorific for a leader. “Berber”: the Berbers are an ethnic group of North Africa, including Morocco.Return to reference 5

SCENE 2

"Top Girls" Employment Agency. Monday morning. The Lights come up on MARLENE and JEANINE.

MARLENE Right, Jeanine, you are Jeanine aren't you? Let's have a look. O's and A's.⁶ / No A's, all those JEANINE Six O's.

MARLENE O's you probably could have got an A. / Speeds,⁷ not brilliant, not too bad.

JEANINE I wanted to go to work.

MARLENE Well, Jeanine, what's your present job like?

JEANINE I'm a secretary.

MARLENE Secretary or typist?

JEANINE I did start as a typist but the last six months I've been a secretary.

MARLENE To?

JEANINE To three of them, really, they share me. There's Mr Ashford, he's the office manager, and Mr Philby / is sales, and—

MARLENE Quite a small place?

JEANINE A bit small.

MARLENE Friendly?

JEANINE Oh it's friendly enough.

MARLENE Prospects?

JEANINE I don't think so, that's the trouble. Miss Lewis is secretary to the managing director and she's been there forever, and Mrs Bradford / is—

MARLENE So you want a job with better prospects?

JEANINE I want a change.

MARLENE So you'll take anything comparable?

JEANINE No, I do want prospects. I want more money.

MARLENE You're getting—?

JEANINE Hundred.

MARLENE It's not bad you know. You're what? Twenty?

JEANINE I'm saving to get married.

MARLENE Does that mean you don't want a long-term job, Jeanine?

JEANINE I might do.

MARLENE Because where do the prospects come in? No kids for a bit?

JEANINE Oh no, not kids, not yet.

MARLENE So you won't tell them you're getting married?

JEANINE Had I better not?

MARLENE It would probably help.

JEANINE I'm not wearing a ring. We thought we wouldn't spend on a ring.

MARLENE Saves taking it off.

JEANINE I wouldn't take it off.

MARLENE There's no need to mention it when you go for an interview. / Now, Jeanine, do you have a feel

JEANINE But what if they ask?

MARLENE for any particular kind of company?

JEANINE I thought advertising.

MARLENE People often do think advertising. I have got a few vacancies but I think they're looking for something glossier.

JEANINE You mean how I dress? / I can

MARLENE I mean experience.

JEANINE dress different. I dress like this on purpose for where I am now.

MARLENE I have a marketing department here of a knitwear manufacturer. / Marketing is near enough

JEANINE Knitwear?

MARLENE advertising. Secretary to the marketing manager, he's thirty-five, married, I've sent him a girl before and she was happy, left to have a baby, you won't want to mention marriage there. He's very fair I think, good at his job, you won't have to nurse him along. Hundred and ten, so that's better than you're doing now.

JEANINE I don't know.

MARLENE I've a fairly small concern⁸ here, father and two sons, you'd have more say potentially, secretarial and reception duties, only a hundred but the job's going to grow with the concern and then you'll be in at the top with new girls coming in underneath you.

JEANINE What is it they do?

MARLENE Lampshades. / This would be my first choice for you.

JEANINE Just lampshades?

MARLENE There's plenty of different kinds of lampshade. So we'll send you there, shall we, and the knitwear second choice. Are you free to go for an interview any day they call you?

JEANINE I'd like to travel.

MARLENE We don't have any foreign clients. You'd have to go elsewhere.

JEANINE Yes I know. I don't really . . . I just mean . . .

MARLENE Does your fiancé want to travel?

JEANINE I'd like a job where I was here in London and with him and everything but now and then—I expect it's silly. Are there jobs like that?

MARLENE There's personal assistant to a top executive in a multinational. If that's the idea you need to be planning ahead. Is that where you want to be in ten years?

JEANINE I might not be alive in ten years.

MARLENE Yes but you will be. You'll have children.

JEANINE I can't think about ten years.

MARLENE You haven't got the speeds anyway. So I'll send you to these two shall I? You haven't been to any other agency? Just so we don't get crossed wires. Now, Jeanine, I want you to get one of these jobs, all right? If I send you that means I'm putting myself on the line for you. Your presentation's OK, you look fine, just be confident and go in there convinced that this is the best job for you and you're the best person for the job. If you don't believe it they won't believe it.

JEANINE Do you believe it?

MARLENE I think you could make me believe it if you put your mind to it.

JEANINE Yes, all right.

Endnotes

- Note 6: In the British education system, Ordinary (O) level examinations covered subject areas. After completing the O-Level exams, a student could choose to continue on to Advanced (A) level exams.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Words per minute speed, a measurement of how fast a secretary or typist can type.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: British term for a company.Return to reference 8

SCENE 3

JOYCE's back yard. Sunday afternoon. The house with a back door is US. DS.⁹ is a shelter made of junk, made by children. The Lights come up on two girls, ANGIE and KIT, who are squashed together in the shelter. ANGIE is sixteen, KIT is twelve. They cannot be seen from the house.

JOYCE [off, calling from the house] Angie. Angie, are you out there?

[Silence. They keep still and wait. When nothing else happens they relax.]

ANGIE Wish she was dead.

KIT Wanna watch The Exterminator?¹

ANGIE You're sitting on my leg.

KIT There's nothing on telly.² We can have an ice cream. Angie?

ANGIE Shall I tell you something?

KIT Do you wanna watch The Exterminator?

ANGIE It's X,³ innit?

KIT I can get into Xs.

ANGIE Shall I tell you something?

KIT We'll go to something else. We'll go to Ipswich. What's on the Odeon?⁴

ANGIE She won't let me, will she.

KIT Don't tell her.

ANGIE I've no money.

KIT I'll pay.

ANGIE She'll moan though, won't she.

KIT I'll ask her for you if you like.

ANGIE I've no money, I don't want you to pay.

KIT I'll ask her.

ANGIE She don't like you.

KIT I still got three pounds birthday money. Did she say she don't like me? I'll go by myself then.

ANGIE Your mum don't let you. I got to take you.

KIT She won't know.

ANGIE You'd be scared who'd sit next to you.

KIT No I wouldn't. She does like me anyway. Tell me then.

ANGIE Tell you what?

KIT Its you she doesn't like.

ANGIE Well I don't like her so tough shit.

JOYCE [off] Angie. Angie. Angie. I know you're out there. I'm not coming out after you. You come in here. [Silence. Nothing happens.]

ANGIE Last night when I was in bed. I been thinking yesterday could I make things move. You know, make things move by thinking about them without touching them. Last night I was in bed and suddenly a picture fell down off the wall.

KIT What picture?

ANGIE My gran, that picture. Not the poster. The photograph in the frame.

KIT Had you done something to make it fall down?

ANGIE I must have done.

KIT But were you thinking about it?

ANGIE Not about it, but about something.

KIT I don't think that's very good.

ANGIE You know the kitten?

KIT Which one?

ANGIE There only is one. The dead one.

KIT What about it?

ANGIE I heard it last night.

KIT Where?

ANGIE Out here. In the dark. What I left you here in the dark all night?

KIT You couldn't. I'd go home.

ANGIE You couldn't.

KIT I'd / go home.

ANGIE No you couldn't, not if I said.

KIT I could.

ANGIE Then you wouldn't see anything. You'd just be ignorant.

KIT I can see in the daytime.

ANGIE No you can't. You can't hear it in the daytime.

KIT I don't want to hear it.

ANGIE You're scared that's all.

KIT I'm not scared of anything.

ANGIE You're scared of blood.

KIT It's not the same kitten anyway. You just heard an old cat, / you just heard some old cat.

ANGIE You don't know what I heard. Or what I saw. You don't know nothing because you're a baby.

KIT You're sitting on me.

ANGIE Mind my hair / you silly cunt.

KIT Stupid fucking cow, I hate you.

ANGIE I don't care if you do.

KIT You're horrible.

ANGIE I'm going to kill my mother and you're going to watch.

KIT I'm not playing.

ANGIE You're scared of blood. [KIT puts her hand under dress, brings it out with blood on her finger.]

KIT There, see, I got my own blood, so. [ANGIE takes KIT's hand and licks her finger.]

ANGIE Now I'm a cannibal. I might turn into a vampire now.

KIT That picture wasn't nailed up right.

ANGIE You'll have to do that when I get mine.

KIT I don't have to.

ANGIE You're scared.

KIT I'll do it, I might do it. I don't have to just because you say. I'll be sick on you.

ANGIE I don't care if you are sick on me, I don't mind sick. I don't mind blood. If I don't get away from here I'm going to die.

KIT I'm going home.

ANGIE You can't go through the house. She'll see you.

KIT I won't tell her.

ANGIE Oh great, fine.

KIT I'll say I was by myself. I'll tell her you're at my house and I'm going there to get you.

ANGIE She knows I'm here, stupid.

KIT Then why can't I go through the house?

ANGIE Because I said not.

KIT My mum don't like you anyway.

ANGIE I don't want her to like me. She's a slag.⁵

KIT She is not.

ANGIE She does it with everyone.

KIT She does not.

ANGIE You don't even know what it is.

KIT Yes I do.

ANGIE Tell me then.

KIT We get it all at school, cleverclogs.⁶ It's on television. You haven't done it.

ANGIE How do you know?

KIT Because I know you haven't.

ANGIE You know wrong then because I have.

KIT Who with?

ANGIE I'm not telling you / who with.

KIT You haven't anyway.

ANGIE How do you know?

KIT Who with?

ANGIE I'm not telling you.

KIT You said you told me everything.

ANGIE I was lying wasn't I.

KIT Who with? You can't tell me who with because / you never—

ANGIE Sh.

[JOYCE has come out of the house. She stops half way across the yard and listens. They listen.]

JOYCE You there Angie? Kit? You there Kitty? Want a cup of tea? I've got some chocolate biscuits.⁷ Come on now I'll put the kettle on. Want a choccy biccys, Angie? [They all listen and wait.] Fucking rotten little cunt. You can stay there and die. I'll lock the door.

[They all wait. JOYCE goes back to the house. ANGIE and KIT sit in silence for a while.]

KIT When there's a war, where's the safest place?

ANGIE Nowhere.

KIT New Zealand⁸ is, my mum said. Your skin's burned right off.

Shall we go to New Zealand?

ANGIE I'm not staying here.

KIT Shall we go to New Zealand?

ANGIE You're not old enough.

KIT You're not old enough.

ANGIE I'm old enough to get married.

KIT You don't want to get married.

ANGIE No but I'm old enough.

KIT I'd find out where they were going to drop it and stand right in the place.

ANGIE You couldn't find out.

KIT Better than walking round with your skin dragging on the ground. Eugh. / Would you like walking round with your skin dragging on the ground?

ANGIE You couldn't find out, stupid, it's a secret.

KIT Where are you going?

ANGIE I'm not telling you.

KIT Why?

ANGIE It's a secret.

KIT But you tell me all your secrets.

ANGIE Not the true secrets.

KIT Yes you do.

ANGIE No I don't.

KIT I want to go somewhere away from the war.

ANGIE Just forget the war.

KIT I can't.

ANGIE You have to. It's so boring.

KIT I'll remember it at night.

ANGIE I'm going to do something else anyway.

KIT What? Angie, come on. Angie.

ANGIE It's a true secret.

KIT It can't be worse than the kitten. And killing your mother. And the war.

ANGIE Well I'm not telling you so you can die for all I care.

KIT My mother says there's something wrong with you playing with someone my age. She says why haven't you got friends your own age. People your own age know there's something funny about you. She says you're a bad influence. She says she's going to speak to your mother. [ANGIE twists KIT's arm till she cries out.]

ANGIE Say you're a liar.

KIT She said it not me.

ANGIE Say you eat shit.

KIT You can't make me. [ANGIE lets go.]

ANGIE I don't care anyway. I'm leaving.

KIT Go on then.

ANGIE You'll all wake up one morning and find I've gone.

KIT Good.

ANGIE I'm not telling you when.

KIT Go on then.

ANGIE I'm sorry I hurt you.

KIT I'm tired.

ANGIE Do you like me?

KIT I don't know.

ANGIE You do like me.

KIT I'm going home. [She gets up.]

ANGIE No you're not.

KIT I'm tired.

ANGIE She'll see you.

KIT She'll give me a chocolate biscuit.

ANGIE Kitty.

KIT Tell me where you're going.

ANGIE Sit down.

KIT [sitting down again] Go on then.

ANGIE Swear?

KIT Swear.

ANGIE I'm going to London. To see my aunt.

KIT And what?

ANGIE That's it.

KIT I see my aunt all the time.

ANGIE I don't see my aunt.

KIT What's so special?

ANGIE It is special. She's special.

KIT Why?

ANGIE She is.

KIT Why?

ANGIE She is.

KIT Why?

ANGIE My mother hates her.

KIT Why?

ANGIE Because she does.

KIT Perhaps she's not very nice.

ANGIE She is nice.

KIT How do you know?

ANGIE Because I know her.

KIT You said you never see her.

ANGIE I saw her last year. You saw her.

KIT Did I?

ANGIE Never mind.

KIT I remember her. That aunt. What's so special?

ANGIE She gets people jobs.

KIT What's so special?

ANGIE I think I'm my aunt's child. I think my mother's really my aunt.

KIT Why?

ANGIE Because she goes to America, now shut up.

KIT I've been to London.

ANGIE Now give us a cuddle and shut up because I'm sick.

KIT You're sitting on my arm.

[They curl up in each other's arms. Silence. JOYCE comes out of the house and comes up to them quietly.]

JOYCE Come on.

KIT Oh hello.

JOYCE Time you went home.

KIT We want to go to the Odeon.

JOYCE What time?

KIT Don't know.

JOYCE What's on?

KIT Don't know.

JOYCE Don't know much do you?

KIT That all right then?

JOYCE Angie's got to clean her room first.

ANGIE No I don't.

JOYCE Yes you do, it's a pigsty.

ANGIE Well I'm not.

JOYCE Then you're not going. I don't care.

ANGIE Well I am going.

JOYCE You've no money, have you?

ANGIE Kit's paying anyway.

JOYCE No she's not.

KIT I'll help you with your room.

JOYCE That's nice.

ANGIE No you won't. You wait here.

KIT Hurry then.

ANGIE I'm not hurrying. You just wait. [ANGIE goes slowly into the house. Silence.]

JOYCE I don't know. [silence] How's school then?

KIT All right.

JOYCE What are you now? Third year?

KIT Second year.

JOYCE Your mum says you're good at English. [silence] Maybe Angie should've stayed on.

KIT She didn't like it.

JOYCE I didn't like it. And look at me. If your face fits at school it's going to fit other places too. It wouldn't make no difference to Angie. She's not going to get a job when jobs are hard to get. I'd be sorry for anyone in charge of her. She'd better get married. I don't know who'd have her, mind. She's one of those girls might never leave home. What do you want to be when you grow up, Kit?

KIT Physicist.

JOYCE What?

KIT Nuclear physicist.

JOYCE Whatever for?

KIT I could, I'm clever.

JOYCE I know you're clever, pet. [silence] I'll make a cup of tea.

[silence] Looks like it's going to rain. [silence] Don't you have friends your own age?

KIT Yes.

JOYCE Well then.

KIT I'm old for my age.

JOYCE And Angie's simple is she? She's not simple.

KIT I love Angie.

JOYCE She's clever in her own way.

KIT You can't stop me.

JOYCE I don't want to.

KIT You can't, so.

JOYCE Don't be cheeky, Kitty. She's always kind to little children.

KIT She's coming so you better leave me alone.

[ANGIE comes out. She has changed into an old best dress, slightly small for her.]

JOYCE What you put that on for? Have you done your room? You can't clean you room in that.

ANGIE I looked in the cupboard and it was there.

JOYCE Of course it was there, it's meant to be there. Is that why it was a surprise, finding something in the right place? I should think she's surprised, wouldn't you, Kit, to find something in her room in the right place.

ANGIE I decided to wear it.

JOYCE Not today, why? To clean your room? You're not going to the pictures till you've done your room. You can put your dress on after if you like. [ANGIE picks up a brick.] Have you done your room? You're not getting out of it, you know.

KIT Angie, let's go.

JOYCE She's not going till she's done her room.

KIT It's starting to rain.

JOYCE Come on, come on then. Hurry and do your room, Angie, and then you can go to the cinema with Kit. Oh it's wet, come on. We'll look up the time in the paper. Does your mother know, Kit, it's going to be a late night for you, isn't it? Hurry up, Angie. You'll spoil your dress. You make me sick. [JOYCE and KIT run into the house. ANGIE stays where she is. There is the sound of rain. KIT comes out of the house.]

KIT [shouting] Angie. Angie, come on, you'll get wet. [She comes back to ANGIE.]

ANGIE I put on this dress to kill my mother.

KIT I suppose you thought you'd do it with a brick.

ANGIE You can kill people with a brick. [She puts the brick down.]

KIT Well you didn't, so.

Endnotes

- Note 9: Stage direction for downstage. "us": upstage.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: 1980 American action film, about a Vietnam veteran seeking to cleanse New York of crime.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Television (British slang).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: X-rated, preventing children under the age of 18 from viewing a film.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Odeon Cinemas, a movie theater chain in England. "Ipswich": a town in England.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: A woman with many sexual partners (offensive British slang).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Someone annoyingly smart; a smart aleck (British slang).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: A type of British sweet like a cookie.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Island country in the Pacific Ocean.Return to reference 8

Act Two

SCENE 1

"Top Girls" Employment Agency. Monday morning. There are three desks in the main office and a separate small interviewing area. The Lights come up in the main office on WIN and NELL who have just arrived for work.

NELL Coffee coffee coffee coffee / coffee.

WIN The roses were smashing. / Mermaid.

NELL Ohhh.

WIN Iceberg. He taught me all their names. [NELL has some coffee now.]

NELL Ah. Now then.

WIN He has one of the finest rose gardens in West Sussex.⁹ He exhibits.

NELL He what?

WIN His wife was visiting her mother. It was like living together.

NELL Crafty, you never said.

WIN He rang on Saturday morning.

NELL Lucky you were free.

WIN That's what I told him.

NELL Did you hell.

WIN Have you ever seen a really beautiful rose garden?

NELL I don't like flowers. / I like swimming pools.

WIN Marilyn. Esther's Baby.¹ They're all called after birds.

NELL Our friend's late. Celebrating all weekend I bet you.

WIN I'd call a rose Elvis. Or John Conteh.²

NELL Is Howard in yet?

WIN If he is he'll be bleeping us with a problem.

NELL Howard can just hang on to himself.

WIN Howard's really cut up.

NELL Howard thinks because he's a fella the job was his as of right.

Our Marlene's got far more balls than Howard and that's that.

WIN Poor little bugger.

NELL He'll live.

WIN He'll move on.

NELL I wouldn't mind a change of air myself.
WIN Serious?
NELL I've never been a staying-put lady. Pastures new.
WIN So who's the pirate?
NELL There's nothing definite.
WIN Inquiries?
NELL There's always inquiries. I'd think I'd got bad breath if there stopped being inquiries. Most of them can't afford me. Or you.
WIN I'm all right for the time being. Unless I go to Australia.
NELL There's not a lot of room upward.
WIN Marlene's filled it up.
NELL Good luck to her. Unless there's some prospects moneywise.
WIN You can but ask.
NELL Can always but ask.
WIN So what have we got? I've got a Mr Holden I saw last week.
NELL Any use?
WIN Pushy. Bit of a cowboy.
NELL Goodlooker?
WIN Good dresser.
NELL High flyer?
WIN That's his general idea certainly but I'm not sure he's got it up there.
NELL Prestel wants six flyers and I've only seen two and a half.
WIN He's making a bomb on the road but he thinks it's time for an office. I sent him to IBM³ but he didn't get it.
NELL Prestel's on the road.
WIN He's not overbright.
NELL Can he handle an office?
WIN Provided his secretary can punctuate he should go far.
NELL Bear Prestel in mind then, I might put my head round the door. I've got that poor little nerd I should never had said I could help. Tender heart me.
WIN Tender like old boots. How old?
NELL Yes well forty-five.
WIN Say no more.

NELL He knows his place, he's not after calling himself a manager, he's just a poor little bod⁴ wants a better commission and a bit of sunshine.

WIN Don't we all.

NELL He's just got to relocate. He's got a bungalow in Dymchurch.⁵

WIN And his wife says.

NELL The lady wife wouldn't care to relocate. She's going through the change.⁶

WIN It's his funeral, don't waste your time.

NELL I don't waste a lot.

WIN Good weekend you?

NELL You could say.

WIN Which one?

NELL One Friday, one Saturday.

WIN Aye—aye.

NELL Sunday night I watched telly.

WIN Which of them do you like best really?

NELL Sunday was best, I like the Ovaltine.⁷

WIN Holden, Barker, Gardner, Duke.

NELL I've a lady here thinks she can sell.

WIN Taking her on?

NELL She's had some jobs.

WIN Services?

NELL No, quite heavy stuff, electric.

WIN Tough bird like us.

NELL We could do with a few more here.

WIN There's nothing going here.

NELL No but I always want the tough ones when I see them. Hang on to them.

WIN I think we're plenty.

NELL Derek asked me to marry him again.

WIN He doesn't know when he's beaten.

NELL I told him I'm not going to play house, not even in Ascot.⁸

WIN Mind you, you could play house.

NELL If I chose to play house I would play house ace.⁹

WIN You could marry him and go on working.

NELL I could go on working and not marry him.

[MARLENE arrives.]

MARLENE Morning ladies. [WIN and NELL cheer and whistle.] Mind my head.

NELL Coffee coffee coffee.

WIN We're tactfully not mentioning you're late.

MARLENE Fucking tube.¹

WIN We've heard that one.

NELL We've used that one.

WIN It's the top executive doesn't come in as early as the poor working girl.

MARLENE Pass the sugar and shut your face, pet.

WIN Well I'm delighted.

NELL Howard's looking sick.

WIN Howard is sick. He's got ulcers and heart. He told me.

NELL He'll have to stop then, won't he?

WIN Stop what?

NELL Smoking, drinking, shouting. Working.

WIN Well, working.

NELL We're just looking through the day.

MARLENE I'm doing some of Pam's ladies. They've been piling up while she's away.

NELL Half a dozen little girls and an arts graduate who can't type.

WIN I spent the whole weekend at his place in Sussex.

NELL She fancies his rose garden.

WIN I had to lie down in the back of the car so the neighbours wouldn't see me go in.

NELL You're kidding.

WIN It was funny.

NELL Fuck that for a joke.

WIN It was funny.

MARLENE Anyway they'd see you in the garden.

WIN The garden has extremely high walls.

NELL I think I'll tell the wife.

WIN Like hell.

NELL She might leave him and you could have the rose garden.

WIN The minute it's not a secret I'm out on my ear.

NELL Don't know why you bother.

WIN Bit of fun.

NELL I think it's time you went to Australia.

WIN I think it's pushy Mr Holden time.

NELL If you've any really pretty bastards, Marlene, I want some for Prestel.

MARLENE I might have one this afternoon. This morning it's all Pam's secretarial.

NELL Not long now and you'll be upstairs watching over us all.

MARLENE Do you fell bad about it?

NELL I don't like coming second.

MARLENE Who does?

WIN We'd rather it was you than Howard. We're glad for you, aren't we, Nell?

NELL Oh yes. Aces.

[LOUISE enters the interviewing area. The Lights crossfade to WIN and LOUISE in the interviewing area. NELL exits.]

WIN Now, Louise, hello, I have your details here. You've been very loyal to the one job I see.

LOUISE Yes I have.

WIN Twenty-one years is a long time in one place.

LOUISE I feel it is. I feel it's time to move on.

WIN And you are what age now?

LOUISE I'm in my early forties.

WIN Exactly?

LOUISE Forty-six.

WIN It's not necessarily a handicap, well it is of course we have to face that, but it's not necessarily a disabling handicap, experience does count for something.

LOUISE I hope so.

WIN Now between ourselves is there any trouble, any reason why you're leaving that wouldn't appear on the form?

LOUISE Nothing like that.

WIN Like what?

LOUISE Nothing at all.

WIN No long term understandings come to a sudden end, making for an insupportable atmosphere?

LOUISE I've always completely avoided anything like that at all.

WIN No personality clashes with your immediate superiors or inferiors?

LOUISE I've always taken care to get on very well with everyone.

WIN I only ask because it can affect the reference and it also affects your motivation, I want to be quite clear why you're moving on.

So I take it the job itself no longer satisfies you. Is it the money?

LOUISE It's partly the money. It's not so much the money.

WIN Nine thousand is very respectable. Have you dependants?

LOUISE No, no dependants. My mother died.

WIN So why are you making a change?

LOUISE Other people make changes.

WIN But why are you, now, after spending most of your life in the one place?

LOUISE There you are, I've lived for that company, I've given my life really you could say because I haven't had a great deal of social life, I've worked in the evenings. I haven't had office entanglements for the very reason you just mentioned and if you are committed to your work you don't move in many other circles. I had management status from the age of twenty-seven and you'll appreciate what that means. I've built up a department. And there it is, it works extremely well, and I feel I'm stuck there. I've spent twenty years in middle management. I've seen young men who I trained go on, in my own company or elsewhere, to higher things. Nobody notices me, I don't expect it, I don't attract attention by making mistakes, everybody takes it for granted that my work is perfect. They will notice me when I go, they will be sorry I think to lose me, they will offer me more money of course, I will refuse. They will see when I've gone what I was doing for them.

WIN If they offer you more money you won't stay?

LOUISE No I won't.

WIN Are you the only woman?

LOUISE Apart from the girls of course, yes. There was one, she was my assistant, it was the only time I took on a young woman assistant, I always had my doubts. I don't care greatly for working with women, I think I pass as a man at work. But I did take on this young woman, her qualifications were excellent, and she did well, she got a department of her own, and left the company for a competitor where she's now on the board and good luck to her. She has a different style, she's a new kind of attractive well-dressed—I don't mean I don't dress properly. But there is a kind of woman who is thirty now who grew up in a different climate. They are not so careful. They take themselves for granted. I have had to justify my existence every minute, and I have done so, I have proved—well.

WIN Let's face it, vacancies are ones where you'll be in competition with younger men. And there are companies that will value your experience enough that you'll be in with a chance. There are also fields that are easier for a woman, there is a cosmetic company here where your experience might be relevant. It's eight and a half, I don't know if that appeals.

LOUISE I've proved I can earn money. It's more important to get away. I feel it's now or never. I sometimes / think—

WIN You shouldn't talk too much at an interview.

LOUISE I don't. I don't normally talk about myself. I know very well how to handle myself in an office situation. I only talk to you because it seems to me this is different, it's your job to understand me, surely. You asked the questions.

WIN I think I understand you sufficiently.

LOUISE Well good, that's good.

WIN Do you drink?

LOUISE Certainly not. I'm not a teetotaller,² I think that's very suspect, it's seen as being an alcoholic if you're teetotal. What do you mean? I don't drink. Why?

WIN I drink.

LOUISE I don't.

WIN Good for you.

[The Lights crossfade to the main office with MARLENE sitting at her desk. WIN and LOUISE exit. ANGIE arrives in the main office.]

ANGIE HELLO.

MARLENE Have you an appointment?

ANGIE It's me. I've come.

MARLENE What? It's not Angie?

ANGIE It was hard to find this place. I got lost.

MARLENE How did you get past the receptionist? The girl on the desk, didn't she try to stop you?

ANGIE What desk?

MARLENE Never mind.

ANGIE I just walked in. I was looking for you.

MARLENE Well you found me.

ANGIE Yes.

MARLENE So where's your mum? Are you up in town for the day?

ANGIE Not really.

MARLENE Sit down. Do you feel all right?

ANGIE Yes thank you.

MARLENE So where's Joyce?

ANGIE She's at home.

MARLENE Did you come up on a school trip then?

ANGIE I've left school.

MARLENE Did you come up with a friend?

ANGIE No. There's just me.

MARLENE You came up by yourself, that's fun. What have you been doing? Shopping? Tower of London?

ANGIE No, I just come here. I come to you.

MARLENE That's very nice of you to think of paying your aunty a visit. There's not many nieces make that the first port of call. Would you like a cup of coffee?

ANGIE No thank you.

MARLENE Tea, orange?

ANGIE No thank you.

MARLENE Do you feel all right?

ANGIE Yes thank you.

MARLENE Are you tired from the journey?

ANGIE Yes, I'm tired from the journey.

MARLENE You sit there for a bit then. How's Joyce?

ANGIE She's all right.

MARLENE Same as ever.

ANGIE Oh yes.

MARLENE Unfortunately you've picked a day when I'm rather busy, if there's ever a day when I'm not, or I'd take you out to lunch and we'd go to Madame Tussaud's³ We could go shopping. What time do you have to be back? Have you got a day return?

ANGIE No.

MARLENE So what train are you going back on?

ANGIE I came on the bus.

MARLENE So what bus are you going back on? Are you staying the night?

ANGIE Yes.

MARLENE Who are you staying with? Do you want me to put you up for the night, is that it?

ANGIE Yes please.

MARLENE I haven't got a spare bed.

ANGIE I can sleep on the floor.

MARLENE You can sleep on the sofa.

ANGIE Yes please.

MARLENE I do think Joyce might have phoned me. It's like her.

ANGIE This is where you work is it?

MARLENE It's where I have been working the last two years but I'm going to move into another office.

ANGIE It's lovely.

MARLENE My new office is nicer than this. There's just the one big desk in it for me.

ANGIE Can I see it?

MARLENE Not now, no, there's someone else in it now. But he's leaving at the end of next week and I'm going to do his job.

ANGIE Is that good?

MARLENE Yes, it's very good.

ANGIE Are you going to be in charge?

MARLENE Yes I am.

ANGIE I knew you would be.

MARLENE How did you know?

ANGIE I knew you'd be in charge of everything.

MARLENE Not quite everything.

ANGIE You will be.

MARLENE Well we'll see.

ANGIE Can I see it next week then?

MARLENE Will you still be here next week?

ANGIE Yes.

MARLENE Don't you have to go home?

ANGIE Yes.

MARLENE Don't you have to go home?

ANGIE No.

MARLENE Why not?

ANGIE It's all right.

MARLENE Is it all right?

ANGIE Yes, don't worry about it.

MARLENE Does Joyce know where you are?

ANGIE Yes of course she does.

MARLENE Well does she?

ANGIE Don't worry about it.

MARLENE How long are you planning to stay with me then?

ANGIE You know when you came to see us last year?

MARLENE Yes, that was nice wasn't it.

ANGIE That was the best day of my whole life.

MARLENE So how long are you planning to stay?

ANGIE Don't you want me?

MARLENE Yes yes, I just wondered.

ANGIE I won't stay if you don't want me.

MARLENE No, of course you can stay.

ANGIE I'll sleep on the floor. I won't be any bother.

MARLENE Don't get upset.

ANGIE I'm not, I'm not. Don't worry about it.

[MRS KIDD comes in.]

MRS KIDD Excuse me.

MARLENE Yes.

MRS KIDD Excuse me.

MARLENE Can I help you?

MRS KIDD Excuse me bursting in on you like this but I have to talk to you.

MARLENE I am engaged at the moment. / If you could go to reception—

MRS KIDD I'm Rosemary Kidd, Howard's wife, you don't recognize me but we did meet, I remember you of course / but you wouldn't—

MARLENE Yes of course, Mrs Kidd, I'm sorry, we did meet. Howard's about somewhere I expect, have you looked in his office?

MRS KIDD Howard's not about, no. I'm afraid it's you I've come to see if I could have a minute or two.

MARLENE I do have an appointment in five minutes.

MRS KIDD This won't take five minutes. I'm very sorry. It is a matter of some urgency.

MARLENE Well of course. What can I do for you?

MRS KIDD I just wanted a chat, an informal chat. It's not something I can simply—I'm sorry if I'm interrupting your work. I know office work isn't like housework / which is all interruptions.

MARLENE No no, this is my niece. Angie. Mrs Kidd.

MRS KIDD Very pleased to meet you.

ANGIE Very well thank you.

MRS KIDD Howard's not in today.

MARLENE Isn't he?

MRS KIDD He's feeling poorly.

MARLENE I didn't know. I'm sorry to hear that.

MRS KIDD The fact is he's in a state of shock. About what's happened.

MARLENE What has happened?

MRS KIDD You should know if anyone. I'm referring to you been appointed managing director instead of Howard. He hasn't been at all well all weekend. He hasn't slept for three nights. I haven't slept.

MARLENE I'm sorry to hear that, Mrs Kidd. Has he thought of taking sleeping pills?

MRS KIDD It's very hard when someone has worked all these years.

MARLENE Business life is full of little setbacks. I'm sure Howard knows that. He'll bounce back in a day or two. We all bounce back.

MRS KIDD If you could see him you'd know what I'm talking about. What's it going to do to him working for a woman? I think if it was a man he'd get over it as something normal.

MARLENE I think he's going to have to get over it.

MRS KIDD It's me that bears the brunt. I'm not the one that's been promoted. I put him first every inch of the way. And now what do I get? You women this, you women that. It's not my fault. You're going to have to be very careful how you handle him. He's very hurt.

MARLENE Naturally I'll be tactfull and pleasant to him, you don't start pushing someone around. I'll consult him over any decisions affecting his department. But that's no different, Mrs Kidd, from any of my other colleagues.

MRS KIDD I think it is different, because he's a man.

MARLENE I'm not quite sure why you came to see me.

MRS KIDD I had to do something.

MARLENE Well you've done it, you've seen me. I think that's probably all we've time for. I'm sorry he's been taking it out on you. He really is a shit, Howard.

MRS KIDD But he's got a family to support. He's got three children. It's only fair.

MARLENE Are you suggesting I give up the job to him then?

MRS KIDD It had crossed my mind if you were unavailable after all for some reason, he would be the natural second choice I think, don't you? I'm not asking.

MARLENE Good.

MRS KIDD You mustn't tell him I came. He's very proud.

MARLENE If he doesn't like what's happening here he can go and work somewhere else.

MRS KIDD Is that a threat?

MARLENE I'm sorry but I do have some work to do.

MRS KIDD It's not that easy, a man of Howard's age. You don't care. I thought he was going too far but he's right. You're one of these ballbreakers,⁴ / that's what you

MARLENE I'm sorry but I do have some work to do.

MRS KIDD are. You'll end up miserable and lonely. You're not natural.

MARLENE Could you please piss off?

MRS KIDD I thought if I saw you at least I'd be doing something. [MRS KIDD goes.]

MARLENE I've got to go and do some work now. Will you come back later?

ANGIE I think you were wonderful.

MARLENE I've got to go and do some work now.

ANGIE You told her to piss off.

MARLENE Will you come back later?

ANGIE Can't I stay here?

MARLENE Don't you want to go sightseeing?

ANGIE I'd rather stay here.

MARLENE You can stay here I suppose, if it's not boring.

ANGIE It's where I most want to be in the world.

MARLENE I'll see you later then.

[MARLENE goes. SHONA and NELL enter the interviewing area.

ANGIE sits at WIN's desk. The Lights crossfade to NELL and SHONA in the interviewing area.]

NELL Is this right? You are Shona?

SHONA Yeh.

NELL It says here you're twenty-nine.

SHONA Yeh.

NELL Too many late nights, me. So you've been where you are for four years, Shona, you're earning six basic and three commission.⁵ So what's the problem?

SHONA No problem.

NELL Why do you want a change?

SHONA Just a change.

NELL Change of product, change of area?

SHONA Both.

NELL But you're happy on the road?

SHONA I like driving.

NELL You're not after management status?

SHONA I would like management status.

NELL You'd be interested in titular management status but not come off the road?

SHONA I want to be on the road, yeh.

NELL So how many calls have you been making a day?

SHONA Six.

NELL And what proportion of those are successful?

SHONA Six.

NELL That's hard to believe.

SHONA Four.

NELL You find it easy to get the initial interest do you?

SHONA Oh yeh, I get plenty of initial interest.

NELL And what about closing?

SHONA I close, don't I?

NELL Because that's what an employer is going to have doubts about with a lady as I needn't tell you, whether she's got the guts to push through to a closing situation. They think we're too nice. They think we listen to the buyer's doubts. They think we consider his needs and his feelings.

SHONA I never consider people's feelings.

NELL I was selling for six years, I can sell anything, I've sold in three continents, and I'm jolly as they come but I'm not very nice.

SHONA I'm not very nice.

NELL What sort of time do you have on the road with the other reps? Get on all right? Handle the chat?

SHONA I get on. Keep myself to myself.

NELL Fairly much of a loner are you?

SHONA Sometimes.

NELL So what field are you interested in?

SHONA Computers.

NELL That's a top field as you know and you'll be up against some very slick fellas there, there's some very pretty boys in computers, it's an American-style field.

SHONA That's why I want to do it.

NELL Video systems appeal? That's a high-flying situation.

SHONA Video systems appeal OK.

NELL Because Prestel have half a dozen vacancies I'm looking to fill at the moment. We're talking in the area of ten to fifteen thousand here and upwards.

SHONA Sounds OK.

NELL I've half a mind to go for it myself. But it's good money here if you've got the top clients. Could you fancy it do you think?

SHONA Work here?

NELL I'm not in a position to offer, there's nothing officially going just now, but we're always on the lookout. There's not that many of us. We could keep in touch.

SHONA I like driving.

NELL So the Prestel appeals?

SHONA Yeh.

NELL What about ties?

SHONA No ties.

NELL So relocation wouldn't be a problem.

SHONA No problem.

NELL So just fill me in a bit more could you about what you've been doing.

SHONA What I've been doing. It's all down there.

NELL The bare facts are down here but I've got to present you to an employer.

SHONA I'm twenty-nine years old.

NELL So it says here.

SHONA We look young. Youngness runs in the family in our family.

NELL So just describe your present job for me.

SHONA My present job at present. I have a car. I have a Porsche. I go up the M1 a lot. Burn up the M1 a lot. Straight up the M1 in the fast lane to where the clients are, Staffordshire, Yorkshire,⁶ I do a lot in Yorkshire. I'm selling electric things. Like dishwashers, washing machines, stainless steel tubs are a feature and the reliability of the programme. After sales service, we offer a very good after sales service, spare parts, plenty of spare parts. And fridges, I sell a lot of fridges specially in the summer. People want to buy fridges in the summer because of the heat melting the butter and you get fed up standing the milk in a basin of cold water with a cloth over, stands to reason people don't want to do that in this day and age. So I sell a lot of them. Big ones with big freezers. Big freezers. And I stay in hotels at night when I'm away from home. On my expense account. I stay in various hotels. They know me, the ones I go to. I check in, have a bath, have a shower. Then I go down to the bar, have a gin and tonic, have a chat. Then I go into the dining room and have dinner. I usually have fillet steak and mushrooms, I like mushrooms. I like smoked salmon very much. I like having a salad on the side. Green salad. I don't like tomatoes.

NELL Christ what a waste of time.

SHONA Beg your pardon?

NELL Not a word of this is true, is it?

SHONA How do you mean?

NELL You just filled in the form with a pack of lies.

SHONA Not exactly.

NELL How old are you?

SHONA Twenty-nine.

NELL Nineteen?

SHONA Twenty-one.

NELL And what jobs have you done? Have you done any?

SHONA I could though, I bet you.

[The Lights crossfade to the main office with ANGIE sitting as before. WIN comes in to the main office. SHONA and NELL exit.]

WIN Who's sitting in my chair?

ANGIE What? Sorry.

WIN Who's been eating my porridge?

ANGIE What?

WIN It's all right, I saw Marlene. Angie, isn't it? I'm Win. And I'm not going out for lunch because I'm knackered.⁷ I'm going to set me down here and have a yoghurt. Do you like yoghurt?

ANGIE No.

WIN That's good because I've only got one. Are you hungry?

ANGIE No.

WIN There's a cafe on the corner.

ANGIE No thank you. Do you work here?

WIN How did you guess?

ANGIE Because you look as if you might work here and you're sitting at the desk. Have you always worked here?

WIN No I was headhunted. That means I was working for another outfit like this and this lot came and offered me more money. I broke my contract, there was a hell of a stink. There's not many top ladies about. Your aunty's a smashing bird.⁸

ANGIE Yes I know.

MARLENE Fan are you? Fan of your aunty's?

ANGIE Do you think I could work here?

WIN Not at the moment.

ANGIE How do I start?

WIN What can you do?

ANGIE I don't know. Nothing.

WIN Type?

ANGIE Not very well. The letters jump up when I do capitals. I was going to do a CSE⁹ in commerce but I didn't.

WIN What have you got?

ANGIE What?

WIN CSE's, O's.

ANGIE Nothing, none of that. Did you do all that?

WIN Oh yes, all that, and a science degree funnily enough. I started out doing medical research but there's no money in it. I thought I'd go abroad. Did you know they sell Coca Cola in Russia and Pepsi-Cola in China? You don't have to be qualified as much as you might think. Men are awful bullshitters, they like to make out jobs are harder than they are. Any job I ever did I started doing it better than the rest of the crowd and they didn't like it. So I'd get unpopular and I'd have a drink to cheer myself up. I lived with a fella and supported him for four years, he couldn't get work. After that I went to California. I like the sunshine. Americans know how to live. This country's too slow. Then I went to Mexico, still in sales, but it's no country for a single lady. I came home, went bonkers for a bit, thought I was five different people, got over that all right, the psychiatrist said I was perfectly sane and highly intelligent. Got married in a moment of weakness and he's inside¹ now, he's been inside four years, and I've not been to see him too much this last year. I like this better than sales, I'm not really that aggressive. I started thinking sales was a good job if you want to meet people, but you're meeting people that don't want to meet you. It's no good if you like being liked. Here your clients want to meet you because you're the one doing them some good. They hope. [ANGIE has fallen asleep. NELL comes in.]

NELL You're talking to yourself, sunshine.

WIN So what's new?

NELL Who is this?

WIN Marlene's little niece.

NELL What's she got, brother, sister? She never talks about her family.

WIN I was telling her my life story.

NELL Violins?

WIN No, success story.

NELL You've heard Howard's had a heart attack?

WIN No, when?

NELL I heard just now. He hadn't come in, he was at home, he's gone to hospital. He's not dead. His wife was here, she rushed off in a cab.

WIN Too much butter, too much smoke. We must send him some flowers. [MARLENE comes in.] You've heard about Howard?

MARLENE Poor sod.

NELL Lucky he didn't get the job if that's what his health's like.

MARLENE Is she asleep?

WIN She wants to work here.

MARLENE Packer in Tesco² more like.

WIN She's a nice kid. Isn't she?

MARLENE She's a bit thick. She's a bit funny.

WIN She thinks you're wonderful.

MARLENE She's not going to make it.

Endnotes

- Note 9: County in southeast England. Return to reference 9
- Note 1: "Mermaid," "Iceberg," "Marilyn," and "Esther's Baby" are all names of rose varieties. Return to reference 1
- Note 2: British boxing champion (b. 1951). "Elvis": Elvis Presley (1935–1977), American singer. Return to reference 2
- Note 3: International Business Machines Corporation, multinational technology company established 1911. "Bomb on the road": earning a great deal of money. Return to reference 3
- Note 4: A person (British slang). Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Village in England. Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Likely referring to menopause. Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Flavored powder for milk, made from malt extract. Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Town in England, known for the Royal Ascot horse race, a major social event attended by the British monarchy. Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The best (British slang). Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The subway system in London. Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Someone who practices total abstinence from alcohol. Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Wax museum featuring life-size replicas of celebrities and historical figures. Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Someone, especially a woman, who is demanding of men (slang). Return to reference 4

- Note 5: Likely £600 a month salary, plus £300 a month on commission.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: County in northern England. "Porsche": brand of luxury sports car. "M1": a major highway in England. "Staffordshire": county in western England.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Tired (British slang).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: A great girl (British slang).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Certificate of Secondary Education. It was added to broaden the subjects available for qualifications, and was more vocational.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: In prison.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: British supermarket.Return to reference 2

SCENE 2

JOYCE's kitchen. Sunday evening, a year earlier. The Lights come up on JOYCE, ANGIE and MARLENE, MARLENE is taking presents out of bright carrier bag. ANGIE has already opened a box of chocolates.

MARLENE Just a few little things. / I've

JOYCE There's no need.

MARLENE no memory for birthdays have I, and Christmas seems to slip by. So I think I owe Angie a few presents.

JOYCE What do you say?

ANGIE Thank you very much. Thank you very much, Aunty Marlene [She opens a present. It is the dress from Act One, new.] Oh look, Mum, isn't it lovely?

MARLENE I don't know if it's the right size. She's grown up since I saw her. / I knew she was always ANGIE Isn't it lovely?

MARLENE tall for her age.

JOYCE She's a big lump.

MARLENE Hold it up, Angie, let's see.

ANGIE I'll put it on, shall I?

MARLENE Yes, try it on.

JOYCE Go on to your room then, we don't want / a strip show thank you.

ANGIE Of course I'm going to my room, what do you think. Look, Mum, here's something for you. Open it, go on. What is it? Can I open it for you?

JOYCE Yes, you open it, pet.

ANGIE Don't you want to open it yourself? / Go on.

JOYCE I don't mind, you can do it.

ANGIE It's something hard. It's—what is it? A bottle. Drink is it? No, it's what? Perfume, look. What a lot. Open it, look, let's smell it. Oh it's strong. It's lovely. Put it on me. How do you do it? Put it on me.

JOYCE You're too young.

ANGIE I can play wearing it like dressing up.

JOYCE And you're too old for that. Here, give it here, I'll do it, you'll tip the whole bottle over yourself / and we'll have you smelling all summer.

ANGIE Put it on you. Do I smell? Put it on Auntie too. Put it on Auntie too. Let's all smell.

MARLENE I didn't know what you'd like.

JOYCE There's no danger I'd have it already, / that's one thing.

ANGIE Now we all smell the same.

MARLENE It's a bit nonsense.

JOYCE It's very kind of you Marlene, you shouldn't.

ANGIE Now I'll put on the dress and then we'll see. [ANGIE goes.]

JOYCE You've caught me on the hop³ with the place in the mess. / If you'd let me

MARLENE That doesn't matter.

JOYCE know you was coming I'd have got something in to eat. We had our dinner dinnertime. We're just going to have a cup of tea. You could have an egg.

MARLENE No, I'm not hungry. Tea's fine.

JOYCE I don't expect you take sugar.

MARLENE Why not?

JOYCE You take care of yourself.

MARLENE How do you mean you didn't know I was coming?

JOYCE You could have written. I know we're not on the phone but we're not completely in the dark ages, / we do have a postman.

MARLENE But you asked me to come.

JOYCE How did I ask you to come?

MARLENE Angie said when she phoned up.

JOYCE Angie phoned up, did she.

MARLENE Was it just Angie's idea?

JOYCE What did she say?

MARLENE She said you wanted me to come and see you. / It was a couple of JOYCE Ha.

MARLENE weeks ago. How was I to know that's a ridiculous idea? My diary's always full a couple of weeks ahead so we fixed it for this weekend. I was meant to get here earlier but I was held up. She gave me messages from you.

JOYCE Didn't you wonder why I didn't phone you myself?

MARLENE She said you didn't like using the phone. You're shy on the phone and can't use it. I don't know what you're like, do I?

JOYCE Are there people who can't use the phone?

MARLENE I expect so.

JOYCE I haven't met any.

MARLENE Why should I think she was lying?

JOYCE Because she's like what she's like.

MARLENE How do I know / what she's like?

JOYCE It's not my fault you don't know what she's like. You never come and see her.

MARLENE Well I have now / and you don't seem over the moon.*

JOYCE Good. *Well I'd have got a cake if she'd told me. (pause)

MARLENE I did wonder why you wanted to see me.

JOYCE I didn't want to see you.

MARLENE Yes, I know. Shall I go?

JOYCE I don't mind seeing you.

MARLENE Great, I feel really welcome.

JOYCE You can come and see Angie any time you like, I'm not stopping you. / You

MARLENE Ta ever so.⁴

JOYCE know where we are. You're the one went away, not me. I'm right here where I was. And will be a few years yet I shouldn't wonder.

MARLENE All right. All right. [JOYCE gives MARLENE a cup of tea.]

JOYCE Tea.

MARLENE Sugar? [JOYCE passes MARLENE the sugar.] It's very quiet down here.

JOYCE I expect you'd notice it.

MARLENE The air smells different too.

JOYCE That's the scent.

MARLENE No, I mean walking down the lane.

JOYCE What sort of air you get in London then?

[ANGIE comes in, wearing the dress. It fits.]

MARLENE Oh, very pretty. / You do look pretty, Angie.

JOYCE That fits all right.

MARLENE Do you like the colour?

ANGIE Beautiful. Beautiful.

JOYCE You better take it off, / you'll get it dirty.

ANGIE I want to wear it. I want to wear it.

MARLENE It is for wearing after all. You can't just hang it up and look at it.

ANGIE I love it.

JOYCE Well if you must you must.

ANGIE If someone asks me what's my favourite colour I'll tell them it's this. Thank you very much, Aunty Marlene.

MARLENE You didn't tell your mum you asked me down.

ANGIE I wanted it to be a surprise.

JOYCE I'll give you a surprise / one of these days.

ANGIE I thought you'd like to see her. She hasn't been here since I was nine. People do see their aunts.

MARLENE Is it that long? Doesn't time fly.

ANGIE I wanted to.

JOYCE I'm not cross.

ANGIE Are you glad?

JOYCE I smell nicer anyhow, don't I?

[KIT comes in without saying anything, as if she lived there.]

MARLENE I think it was a good idea, Angie, about time. We are sisters after all. It's a pity to let that go.

JOYCE This is Kitty, / who lives up the road. This is Angie's Aunty Marlene.

KIT What's that?

ANGIE It's a present. Do you like it?

KIT It's all right. / Are you coming out?*

MARLENE Hello, Kitty.

ANGIE *No.

KIT What's that smell?

ANGIE It's a present.

KIT It's horrible. Come on.*

MARLENE Have a chocolate.

ANGIE *No, I'm busy.

KIT Coming out later?

ANGIE No.

KIT [to MARLENE] Hello. [KIT goes without a chocolate.]

JOYCE She's a little girl Angie sometimes plays with because she's the only child lives really close. She's like a little sister to her really. Angie's good with little children.

MARLENE Do you want to work with children, Angie? / Be a teacher or a nursery nurse?

JOYCE I don't think she's ever thought of it.

MARLENE What do you want to do?

JOYCE She hasn't an idea in her head what she wants to do. / Lucky to get anything.

MARLENE Angie?

JOYCE She's not clever like you. [pause]

MARLENE I'm not clever, just pushy.

JOYCE True enough. [MARLENE takes a bottle of whisky out of the bag.] I don't drink spirits.

ANGIE You do at Christmas.

JOYCE It's not Christmas, is it?

ANGIE It's better than Christmas.

MARLENE Glasses?

JOYCE Just a small one then.

MARLENE Do you want some, Angie?

ANGIE I can't, can I?

JOYCE Taste it if you want. You won't like it. [ANGIE tastes it.]

ANGIE Mmm.

MARLENE We got drunk together the night your grandfather died.

JOYCE We did not get drunk.

MARLENE I got drunk. You were just overcome with grief.

JOYCE I still keep up the grave with flowers.

MARLENE Do you really?

JOYCE Why wouldn't I?

MARLENE Have you seen Mother?

JOYCE Of course I've seen Mother.

MARLENE I mean lately.

JOYCE Of course I've seen her lately, I go every Thursday.

MARLENE [to ANGIE] Do you remember your grandfather?

ANGIE He got me out of the bath one night in a towel.

MARLENE Did he? I don't think he ever gave me a bath. Did he give you a bath, Joyce? He probably got soft in his old age. Did you like him?

ANGIE Yes of course.

MARLENE Why?

ANGIE What?

MARLENE So what's the hews? How's Mrs Paisley? Still going crazily / And Dorothy. What happened to Dorothy?*

ANGIE Who's Mrs Paisley?

JOYCE *She went to Canada.

MARLENE Did she? What to do?

JOYCE I don't know. She just went to Canada.

MARLENE Well / good for her.

ANGIE Mr Connolly killed his wife.

MARLENE What, Connolly at Whitegates?

ANGIE They found her body in the garden. / Under the cabbages.

MARLENE He was always so proper.

JOYCE Stuck up git,⁵ Connolly. Best lawyer money could buy but he couldn't get out of it. She was carrying on with Matthew.

MARLENE How old's Matthew then?

JOYCE Twenty-one. / He's got a motorbike.

MARLENE I think he's about six.

ANGIE How can he be six? He's six years older than me. / If he was six I'd be nothing, I'd be just born this minute.

JOYCE You aunty knows that, she's just being silly. She means it's so long since she's been here she's forgotten about Matthew.

ANGIE You were here for my brithday when I was nine. I had a pink cake. Kit was only five then, she was four, she hadn't started school yet. She could read already when she went to school. You remember my birthday / You remember me?

MARLENE Yes, I remember the cake.

ANGIE You remember me?

MARLENE Yes, I remember you.

ANGIE And Mum and Dad was there, and Kit was.

MARLENE Yes, how is your dad? Where is he tonight? Up the pub?

JOYCE No, he's not here.

MARLENE I can see he's not here.

JOYCE He moved out.

MARLENE What? When did he? / Just recently?*

ANGIE Didn't you know that? You don't know much.

JOYCE *No, it must be three years ago. Don't be rude, Angie.

ANGIE I'm not, am I, Aunty? What else don't you know?

JOYCE You was in America or somewhere. You sent a postcard.

ANGIE I've got that in my room. It's the Grand Canyon.⁶ Do you want to see it? Shall I get it? I can get it for you.

MARLENE Yes, all right. [ANGIE goes.]

JOYCE You could be married with twins for all I know. You must have affairs and break up and I don't need to know about any of that so I don't see what the fuss is about.

MARLENE What fuss? [ANGIE comes back with the postcard.]

ANGIE "Driving across the states for a new job in L.A.⁷ It's a long way but the car goes very fast. It's very hot. Wish you were here. Love from Aunty Marlene."

JOYCE Did you make a lot of money?

MARLENE I spent a lot.

ANGIE I want to go to America. Will you take me?

JOYCE She's not going to America, she's been to America, stupid.

ANGIE She might go again, stupid. It's not something you do once. People who go keep going all the time, back and forth on jets. They go on Concorde and Laker⁸ and get jet lag. Will you take me?

MARLENE I'm not planning a trip.

ANGIE Will you let me know?

JOYCE Angie, / you're getting silly.
ANGIE I want to be American.
JOYCE It's time you were in bed.
ANGIE No it's not. / I don't have to go to bed at all tonight.
JOYCE School in the morning.
ANGIE I'll wake up.
JOYCE Come on now, you know how you get.
ANGIE How do I get? / I don't get anyhow.*
JOYCE Angie. *Are you staying the night?
MARLENE Yes, if that's all right. / I'll see you in the morning.
ANGIE You can have my bed. I'll sleep on the sofa.
JOYCE You will not, you'll sleep in your bed. / Think
ANGIE Mum.
JOYCE I can't see through that? I can just see you going to sleep / with us talking.
ANGIE I would, I would go to sleep, I'd love that.
JOYCE I'm going to get cross, Angie.
ANGIE I want to show her something.
JOYCE Then bed.
ANGIE It's a secret.
JOYCE Then I expect it's in your room so off you go. Give us a shout when you're ready for bed and your aunty'll be up and see you.
ANGIE Will you?
MARLENE Yes of course. [ANGIE goes. Silence.] It's cold tonight.
JOYCE Will you be all right on the sofa? You can / have my bed.
MARLENE The sofa's fine.
JOYCE Yes the forecast said rain tonight but it's held off.
MARLENE I was going to walk down to the estuary but I've left it a bit late. Is it just the same?
JOYCE They cut down the hedges a few years back. Is that since you were here?
MARLENE But it's not changed down the end, all the mud? And the reeds? We used to pick them up when they were bigger than us.
Are there still lapwings?⁹

JOYCE You get strangers walking there on a Sunday. I expect they're looking at the mud and the lapwings, yes.

MARLENE You could have left.

JOYCE Who says I wanted to leave?

MARLENE Stop getting at me then, you're really boring.

JOYCE How could I have left?

MARLENE Did you want to?

JOYCE I said how, / how could I?

MARLENE If you'd wanted to you'd have done it.

JOYCE Christ.

MARLENE Are we getting drunk?

JOYCE Do you want something to eat?

MARLENE No, I'm getting drunk.

JOYCE Funny time to visit, Sunday evening.

MARLENE I came this morning. I spent the day—

ANGIE [off] Aunty! Aunty Marlene!

MARLENE I'd better go.

JOYCE Go on then.

MARLENE All right.

ANGIE [off] Aunty! Can you hear me? I'm ready.

[MARLENE goes. JOYCE goes on sitting, clears up, sits again.

MARLENE comes back.]

JOYCE So what's the secret?

MARLENE It's a secret.

JOYCE I know what it is anyway.

MARLENE I bet you don't. You always said that.

JOYCE It's her exercise book.

MARLENE Yes, but you don't know what's in it.

JOYCE It's some game, some secret society she has with Kit.

MARLENE You don't know the password. You don't know the code.

JOYCE You're really in it, aren't you. Can you do the handshake?

MARLENE She didn't mention a handshake.

JOYCE I thought they'd have a special handshake. She spends hours writing that but she's useless at school. She copies things out of books about black magic, and politicians out of the paper. It's a bit childish.

MARLENE I think it's a plot to take over the world.

JOYCE She's been in the remedial class the last two years.

MARLENE I came up this morning and spent the day in Ipswich. I went to see mother.

JOYCE Did she recognize you?

MARLENE Are you trying to be funny?

JOYCE No, she does wander.

MARLENE She wasn't wandering at all, she was very lucid thank you.

JOYCE You were very lucky then.

MARLENE Fucking awful life she's had.

JOYCE Don't tell me.

MARLENE Fucking waste.

JOYCE Don't talk to me.

MARLENE Why shouldn't I talk? Why shouldn't I talk to you? / Isn't she my mother too?

JOYCE Look, you've left, you've gone away, / we can do without you.

MARLENE I left home, so what, I left home. People do leave home / it is normal.

JOYCE We understand that, we can do without you.

MARLENE We weren't happy. Were you happy?

JOYCE Don't come back.

MARLENE So it's just your mother is it, your child, you never wanted me round, / you were jealous

JOYCE Here we go.

MARLENE of me because I was the little one and I was clever.

JOYCE I'm not clever enough for all this psychology / if that's what it is.

MARLENE Why can't I visit my own family / without

JOYCE Aah.

MARLENE all this?

JOYCE Just don't go on about Mum's life when you haven't been to see her for how many years. / I go

MARLENE It's up to me.

JOYCE and see her every week.

MARLENE Then don't go and see her every week.

JOYCE Somebody has to.

MARLENE No they don't. / Why do they?

JOYCE How would I feel if I didn't go?

MARLENE A lot better.

JOYCE I hope you feel better.

MARLENE It's up to me.

JOYCE You couldn't get out of here fast enough. [pause]

MARLENE Of course I couldn't get out of here fast enough. What was I going to do? Marry a dairyman who'd come home pissed? / Don't you fucking this

JOYCE Christ.

MARLENE fucking that fucking bitch fucking tell me what to fucking do fucking.

JOYCE I don't know how you could leave your own child.

MARLENE You were quick enough to take her.

JOYCE What does that mean?

MARLENE You were quick enough to take her.

JOYCE Or what? Have her put in a home? Have some stranger / I take her would you rather?

MARLENE You couldn't have one so you took mine.

JOYCE I didn't know that then.

MARLENE Like hell, / married three years.

JOYCE I didn't know that. Plenty of people / take that long.

MARLENE Well it turned out lucky for you, didn't it?

JOYCE Turned out all right for you by the look of you. You'd be getting a few less thousand a year.

MARLENE Not necessarily.

JOYCE You'd be stuck here / like you said.

MARLENE I could have taken her with me.

JOYCE You didn't want to take her with you. It's no good coming back now, Marlene, / and saying—

MARLENE I know a managing director who's got two children, she breast feeds in the board room, she pays a hundred pounds a week on domestic help alone and she can afford that because she's an extremely high-powered lady earning a great deal of money.

JOYCE So what's that got to do with you at the age of seventeen?

MARLENE Just because you were married and had somewhere to live

—

JOYCE You could have lived at home. / Or live

MARLENE Don't be stupid.

JOYCE with me and Frank. / You

MARLENE You never suggested.

JOYCE said you weren't keeping it. You shouldn't have had it / if you wasn't MARLENE Here we go.

JOYCE going to keep it. You was the most stupid, / for someone so clever you was the most stupid, get yourself pregnant, not go to the doctor, not tell.

MARLENE You wanted it, you said you were glad, I remember the day, you said I'm glad you never got rid of it, I'll look after it, you said that down by the river. So what are you saying, sunshine, you don't want her?

JOYCE Course I'm not saying that.

MARLENE Because I'll take her, / wake her up and pack now.

JOYCE You wouldn't know how to begin to look after her.

MARLENE Don't you want her?

JOYCE Course I do, she's my child.

MARLENE Then what are you going on about / why did I have her?

JOYCE You said I got her off you / when you didn't—

MARLENE I said you were lucky / the way it—

JOYCE Have a child now if you want one. You're not old.

MARLENE I might do.

JOYCE Good. [pause]

MARLENE I've been on the pill¹ so long / I'm probably sterile.

JOYCE Listen when Angie was six months I did get pregnant and I lost it because I was so tired looking after your fucking baby / because she cried so

MARLENE You never told me.

JOYCE much—yes I did tell you—/ and the doctor

MARLENE Well I forgot.

JOYCE said if I'd sat down all day with my feet up I'd've kept it / and that's the only chance I ever had because after that—

MARLENE I've had two abortions, are you interested? Shall I tell you about them? Well I won't, it's boring, it wasn't a problem. I don't like messy talk about blood / and what a bad time we all had. I

JOYCE If I hadn't had your baby. The doctor said.

MARLENE don't want a baby. I don't want to talk about gynaecology.

JOYCE Then stop trying to get Angie off of me.

MARLENE I come down here after six years. All night you've been saying I don't come often enough. If I don't come for another six years she'll be twenty-one, will that be OK?

JOYCE That'll be fine, yes, six years would suit me fine. [pause]

MARLENE I was afraid of this. I only came because I thought you wanted . . . I just want . . . [She cries.]

JOYCE Don't grizzle,² Marlene, for God's sake.

Marly? Come on, pet. Love you really.

Fucking stop it, will you? [She goes to MARLENE.]

MARLENE No, let me cry. I like it. [They laugh, MARLENE begins to stop crying.] I knew I'd cry if I wasn't careful.

JOYCE Everyone's always crying in this house. Nobody takes any notice.

MARLENE You've been wonderful looking after Angie.

JOYCE Don't get carried away.

MARLENE I can't write letters but I do think of you.

JOYCE You're getting drunk. I'm going to make some tea.

MARLENE Love you. [JOYCE goes to make tea.]

JOYCE I can see why you'd want to leave. It's a dump here.

MARLENE So what's this about you and Frank?

JOYCE He was always carrying on, wasn't he. And if I wanted to go out in the evening he'd go mad, even if it was nothing, a class, I was going to go to an evening class. So he had this girlfriend, only twenty-two poor cow, and I said go on, off you go, hoppit.³ I don't think he even likes her.

MARLENE So what about money?

JOYCE I've always said I don't want your money.

MARLENE No, does he send you money?

JOYCE I've got four different cleaning jobs. Adds up. There's not a lot round here.

MARLENE Does Angie miss him?

JOYCE She doesn't say.

MARLENE Does she see him?

JOYCE He was never that fond of her to be honest.

MARLENE He tried to kiss me once. When you were engaged.

JOYCE Did you fancy him?

MARLENE No, he looked like a fish.

JOYCE He was lovely then.

MARLENE Ugh.

JOYCE Well I fancied him. For about three years.

MARLENE Have you got someone else?

JOYCE There's not a lot round here. Mind you, the minute you're on your own, you'd be amazed how your friends' husbands drop by. I'd sooner do without.

MARLENE I don't see why you couldn't take my money.

JOYCE I do, so don't bother about it.

MARLENE Only got to ask.

JOYCE So what about you? Good job?

MARLENE Good for a laugh. / Got back

JOYCE Good for more than a laugh I should think.

MARLENE from the US of A a bit wiped out and slotted into this speedy employment agency and still there.

JOYCE You can always find yourself work then?

MARLENE That's right.

JOYCE And men?

MARLENE Oh there's always men.

JOYCE No-one special?

MARLENE There's fellas who like to be seen with a high-flying lady. Shows they've got something really good in their pants. But they can't take the day to day. They're waiting for me to turn into the little woman. Or maybe I'm just horrible of course.

JOYCE Who needs them.

MARLENE Who needs them. Well I do. But I need adventures more.
So on on into the sunset. I think the eighties are going to be stupendous.

JOYCE Who for?

MARLENE For me. / I think I'm going up up up.

JOYCE Oh for you. Yes, I'm sure they will.

MARLENE And for the country, come to that. Get the economy back on its feet and whoosh. She's a tough lady, Maggie.⁴ I'd give her a job. / She just needs to hang

JOYCE You voted for them, did you?

MARLENE in there. This country needs to stop whining. /
Monetarism⁵ is not

JOYCE Drink your tea and shut up, pet.

MARLENE stupid. It takes time, determination. No more slop. / And JOYCE Well I think they're filthy bastards.

MARLENE who's got to drive it on? First woman prime minister.

Terrifico. Aces. Right on. / You must admit. Certainly gets my vote.

JOYCE What good's first woman if it's her? I suppose you'd have liked Hitler⁶ if he was a woman. Ms Hitler. Got a lot done, Hitlerina. / Great adventures.

MARLENE Bosses still walking on the worker's faces? Still dadda's little parrot? Haven't you learned to think for yourself? I believe in the individual. Look at me.

JOYCE I am looking at you.

MARLENE Come on, Joyce, we're not going to quarrel over politics.

JOYCE We are though.

MARLENE Forget I mentioned it. Not a word about the slimy unions will cross my lips. [pause]

JOYCE You say Mother had a wasted life.

MARLENE Yes I do. Married to that bastard.

JOYCE What sort of life did he have? /

MARLENE Violent life?

JOYCE Working in the fields like an animal. / Why

MARLENE Come off it.

JOYCE wouldn't he want a drink? You want a drink. He couldn't afford whisky.

MARLENE I don't want to talk about him.

JOYCE You started, I was talking about her. She had a rotten life because she had nothing. She went hungry.

MARLENE She was hungry because he drank the money. / He used to hit her.

JOYCE It's not all down to him / Their

MARLENE She didn't hit him.

JOYCE lives were rubbish. They were treated like rubbish. He's dead and she'll die soon and what sort of life / did they have?

MARLENE I saw him one night. I came down.

JOYCE Do you think I didn't? / They

MARLENE I still have dreams.

JOYCE didn't get to America and drive across it in a fast car. / Bad nights, they had bad days.

MARLENE America, America, you're jealous. / I had to get out, I knew when I

JOYCE Jealous?

MARLENE was thirteen, out of their house, out of them, never let that happen to me, / never let him, make my own way, out.

JOYCE Jealous of what you've done, you'd be ashamed of me if I came to your office, your smart friends, wouldn't you, I'm ashamed of you, think of nothing but yourself, you've got on, nothing's changed for most people, / has it?

MARLENE I hate the working class / which is what

JOYCE Yes you do.

MARLENE you're going to go on about now, it doesn't exist any more, it means lazy and stupid. / I don't

JOYCE Come on, now we're getting it.

MARLENE like the way they talk. I don't like beer guts and football⁷ vomit and saucy tits / and brothers and sisters—

JOYCE I spit when I see a Rolls Royce, scratch it with my ring / Mercedes⁸ it was.

MARLENE Oh very mature—

JOYCE I hate the cows I work for / and their dirty dishes with blanquette of fucking veau.⁹

MARLENE and I will not be pulled down to their level by a flying picket and I won't be sent to Siberia¹ / or a loony bin just because I'm original. And I support

JOYCE No, you'll be on a yacht, you'll be head of Coca Cola and you wait, the eighties is going to be stupendous all right because we'll get you lot off our backs—

MARLENE Reagan² even if he is a lousy movie star because the reds are swarming up his map and I want to be free in a free world—

JOYCE What? / What?

MARLENE I know what I mean / by that—not shut up here.

JOYCE So don't be round here when it happens because if someone's kicking you I'll just laugh. [silence]

MARLENE I don't mean anything personal. I don't believe in class.
Anyone can do anything if they've got what it takes.

JOYCE And if they haven't?

MARLENE If they're stupid or lazy or frightened, I'm not going to help them get a job, why should I?

JOYCE What about Angie?

MARLENE What about Angie?

JOYCE She's stupid, lazy and frightened, so what about her?

MARLENE You run her down too much. She'll be all right.

JOYCE I don't expect so, no. I expect her children will say what a wasted life she had. If she has children. Because nothing's changed and it won't with them in.

MARLENE Them, them. / Us and them?

JOYCE And you're one of them.

MARLENE And you're us, wonderful us, and Angie's us / and Mum and Dad's us.

JOYCE Yes, that's right, and you're them.

MARLENE Come on, Joyce, what a night. You've got what it takes.

JOYCE I know I have.

MARLENE I didn't really mean all that.

JOYCE I did.

MARLENE But we're friends anyway.

JOYCE I don't think so, no.

MARLENE Well it's lovely to be out in the country. I really must make the effort to come more often. I want to go to sleep. I want to go to sleep. [JOYCE gets blankets for the sofa.]

JOYCE Goodnight then. I hope you'll be warm enough.

MARLENE Goodnight. Joyce—

JOYCE No, pet. Sorry. [JOYCE goes. MARLENE sits wrapped in a blanket and has another drink. ANGIE comes in.]

ANGIE Mum?

MARLENE Angie? What's the matter?

ANGIE Mum?

MARLENE No, she's gone to bed. It's Aunty Marlene.

ANGIE Frightening.

MARLENE Did you have a bad dream? What happened in it? Well you're awake now, aren't you, pet?

ANGIE Frightening.

End of Play

1979

Endnotes

- Note 3: Unprepared (British slang). Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Thanks (British slang). Return to reference 4
- Note 5: A stuck-up person (British slang). Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Natural wonder in Arizona created by the Colorado River. Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Los Angeles, city in California. Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Laker Airways, one of the first low-cost airlines; it went bankrupt and ceased operating in 1981. "Concorde": a high-speed passenger plane. Return to reference 8
- Note 9: A type of ground-nesting bird. Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Birth control. Return to reference 1

- Note 2: Someone crying or whining, typically a young child (British slang).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Hop to it.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Margaret Thatcher (1925–2013), the first female British prime minister (1979–90).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: An economic school of thought, asserting that monetary supply is the dominant influence on the economy. If the rate of increase of money is controlled, particularly by governments, then growth stabilizes. This was central to Thatcher’s economic policies.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: German dictator and leader of the Nazi Party (1933–45).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: European football, what Americans call soccer.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Luxury car.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: French veal stew.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Region in Russia where the former Soviet Union established prison labor camps.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: President of the United States 1981–89, at the same time as Thatcher, with similar economic policies. He was formerly an actor who starred in many films.Return to reference 2

LES MURRAY

1938–2019

Leslie Allan Murray was born at Nabiac, on the north coast of New South Wales, Australia, and grew up on a dairy farm at nearby Bunyah. He was educated at Taree High School and the University of Sydney, where he studied modern languages. After military service with the Royal Australian Naval Reserve, he worked as a translator in the Australian National University, Canberra, and as an officer in the prime minister's department. He became a full-time writer in 1971.

Remaining true to his roots in the Australian "outback" (despite the global shuttling expected of a major poet in the twenty-first century), Murray emerged as a powerful celebrant of the natural world and agricultural work. His substantial Collected Poems (1998), dedicated "to the glory of God," bears witness to a staunch and highly individual Roman Catholicism. His celebration of nature includes human nature and reveals a sensibility generously attuned to the hopes and fears, hurts and happinesses of ordinary lives.

Murray seemed intent on proving that the provincial farmer living at the margins of the former British Empire can write poetry as learned, authoritative, and technically virtuosic as any from the metropolitan center. The language of his poetry startles and amuses, reveling in the fecundity and elasticity of English. In poems of metaphorical lushness and sonic opulence, he plays on the eddying reflections of homonyms and rhymes, alliterations and consonances, to suggest a profound interconnectedness among things. As Derek

Walcott said of Murray's work: "There is no poetry in the English language so rooted in its sacredness, so broad-leafed in its pleasures, and yet so intimate and conversational."

Morse¹

Tuckett. Bill Tuckett. Telegraph operator, Hall's Creek, which is way out back of the Outback, but he stuck
it,
quite likely liked it, despite heat, glare, dust and the lack of diversion or doctors. Come disaster you trusted to luck,
5 ingenuity and pluck. This was back when nice people said pluck,
the sleevelink and green eyeshade epoch.²
Faced, though,
like Bill Tuckett
with a man needing surgery right on the spot, a lot would have done their dashes. It looked hopeless (dot dot dot)
Lift him up on the table, said Tuckett, running the key hot
10 till Head Office turned up a doctor who coolly instructed up a thousand miles of wire, as Tuckett advanced slit
by slit
with a safety razor blade, pioneering on into the wet, copper-wiring the rivers off, in the first operation conducted along dotted lines, with rum drinkers gripping the patient:
d-d-dash it, take care, Tuck!
15 And the vital spark stayed unshorted.

Yallah!³ breathed the camelmen. Tuckett, you did it,
you did it!
cried the spattered la-de-dah jodhpur⁴-wearing Inspector of Stock.
We imagine, some weeks later, a properly laconic convalescent averring Without you, I'd have kicked the bucket . . .

20 From Chungking to Burrenjuck,⁵ morse keys have mostly gone silent and only old men meet now to chit-chat in their electric bygone dialect. The last letter many will forget is dit-dit-dit-dah,⁶ V for Victory. The coders' hero had speed, resource and a touch. So ditditdit daah for Bill Tuckett.

1983

Endnotes

- Note 1: Morse code was used to transmit messages by sequences of dots and dashes (or dits and dahs) to represent letters and numbers.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: That is, the nineteenth century. "Sleevelink": cuff link.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: God be praised! (Arabic).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Long breeches for riding, close-fitting from knee to ankle.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: That is, from southwest China to southeast Australia.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The first four notes of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, also representing V for victory, the signal by which Morse code operators prefaced messages in World War II.Return to reference 6

Corniche¹

I work all day and hardly drink at all.²
I can reach down and feel if I'm depressed.
I adore the Creator because I made myself and a few times a week a wire jags in my chest.

5 The first time, I'd been coming apart all year, weeping, incoherent; cigars had given me up:
any road round a cliff edge I'd whimper along in low gear
then: cardiac horror. Masking my pulse's calm lub-dub.

10 It was the victim-sickness. Adrenaline howling in my head, the black dog³ was my brain. Come to drown me in my breath
was energy's black hole, depression, compere⁴ of the predawn show
when, returned from a pee, you stew and welter in your death.

15 The rogue space rock is on course to snuff your world,
sure. But go acute, and its oncoming fills your day.
The brave die but once? I could go a hundred times
a week,
clinging to my pulse with the world's edge inches
away.

Laugh, who never shrank around wizened genitals
there or killed themselves to stop dying. The blow that never falls

batters you stupid. Only gradually do you notice a slight scorn in you for what appals.

A self inside self, cool as conscience, one to be erased
in your final night, or faxed, still knows beneath all the mute grand opera and uncaused effect—that death which can be imagined is not true death.

1996

Endnotes

- Note 1: Coastal road.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: See the opening of "Aubade," by the English poet Philip Larkin (1922–1985): "I work all day, and get half drunk at night."Return to reference 2
- Note 3: That is, depression.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Master of ceremonies.Return to reference 4

The Kitchen Grammars

5 The verb in a Sanscrit or Farsi¹ or Latin or Japanese sentence most frequently comes last,
as if the ingredients and spices only after collection, measure and even preservation might get cooked.
To all these cuisines renown attaches.

10 It's the opening of a Celtic² sentence is a verb. And it was more fire and pot for us very often than ingredients.
Had we not fed our severed heads³ on poetry final might have been our fame's starvation.
Upholding cuisine for us are the French to be counting in scores and called Gallic.⁴

15 In English and many more, in Chinese the verb surrounds itself nucleus-fashion with its subjects and qualifiers.
Down every slope of the wok they go to the spitting middle, to be sauced, 20 ladled, lidded, steamed, flipped back up, becoming verbs themselves often

and the calm egg centres the meatloaf.

2006

Endnotes

- Note 1: Persian. Return to reference 1

- Note 2: Ancient family of languages including Breton, Welsh, Irish, and Gaelic.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Sometimes said to have been venerated by the ancient Celts.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Of Gaul, the Roman name for the region of France. In French, 20 ("score") is still a base number from 70 to 99.Return to reference 4

SEAMUS HEANEY

1939–2013

Seamus Heaney was born into a Roman Catholic family in predominantly Protestant North Ireland (or Ulster), and he grew up on a farm in County Derry bordered on one side by a stream that marked the frontier with the largely Catholic Irish Republic (or Eire) to the south. He won scholarships first to St. Columb's College, a Catholic boarding school, and then to Queen's University in Belfast. There he became one of an extraordinary group of Northern Irish poets from both Protestant and Catholic backgrounds, including Michael Longley and Derek Mahon, who read, discussed, and spurred on one another's work. He taught at Queen's University, before moving in 1972 to the Irish Republic, where he became a citizen and full-time writer. He was Boylston Professor of Rhetoric and Oratory at Harvard and Professor of Poetry at Oxford, and in 1995 won the Nobel Prize in Literature.

With "Digging," placed appropriately as the first poem of his first book, Heaney defined his territory. He dug into his memory, uncovering first his father and then, going deeper, his grandfather. This idea of poetry as an archaeological process of recovery took on a darker cast after the eruption of internecine violence—"the Troubles"—in Northern Ireland in 1969, culminating in the 1972 Bloody Sunday killing of thirteen Catholic civilians by British paratroopers during a civil rights march in Derry. Across several volumes, especially North (1975), Heaney wrote a series of grim “bog poems,” about well-preserved Iron Age corpses discovered in the peat of Northern Europe and Ireland. In these poems he sees the bog as a “memory bank,” or unconscious, that preserves everything thrown into it, including the victims of ritual killings. He views contemporary violence through the lens of ancient myths, sacrifices, and feuds, an oblique approach that gives his poetry about the Troubles an unusual depth and resonance. He had discovered emblems for the violence in Northern Ireland in The Bog People, a book by the Danish archaeologist P. V. Glob, published in translation in 1969, “the year the killing started.” Heaney wrote of it:

It was chiefly concerned with preserved bodies of men and women found in the bogs of Jutland, naked, strangled or with their throats cut, disposed under the peat since early Iron Age times. The author . . . argues convincingly that a number of these, and in particular, the Tollund Man, whose head is now preserved near Aarhus in the museum of Silkeborg, were ritual sacrifices to the Mother Goddess, the goddess of the ground who needed new bridegrooms each winter to bed with her in her sacred place, in the spring. Taken in relation to the tradition of Irish political martyrdom for the cause whose icon is Kathleen Ni Houlihan [mythic figure emblematic of Mother Ireland], this is more than an archaic barbarous rite: it is an archetypal pattern. And the unforgettable photographs of these victims blended in my mind with photographs of atrocities, past and present, in the long rites of Irish political and religious struggles. (“Feeling into Words”)

In the bog poems Heaney reflects on the poet’s responsibilities to write about the dead, yet to do so without prettifying or exploiting them. He probes the vexed relations between lyric song and historical suffering, “beauty and atrocity”: the need to be true to his calling as artist, but also to represent the irredeemable carnage of modern political violence—“the actual weight / of each hooded victim / slashed and dumped” (“The Grauballe Man”). The result is a tough-minded witnessing, an ethically scrupulous and self-aware mourning of collective loss and sectarian murder.

From the late 1970s Heaney elegized specific victims of the Troubles, such as his acquaintance Louis O'Neill, in "Casualty," as well as more personal losses, such as the natural death of his mother, in "Clearances." He also wrote poems about domestic love, such as "The Sharping Stone." Heaney was thus both a private poet—skillfully kneading grief, love, and wonder into poems about his family and his humble origins—and a public poet, affirming his affinities with the Catholic civil rights movement, which has struggled for centuries against British and Protestant domination. Even in his public poetry he refused slogans, journalistic reportage, and political pieties, scrutinizing instead the wellsprings of collective identity, the ambivalences of individual response to history. Responding obliquely to the destruction of the Twin Towers on September 11, 2001, he reworked a two-thousand-year-old Latin ode by Horace in "Anything Can Happen," and the bombings of the London underground (subway) on July 7, 2005, reverberate in District and Circle (2006).

An Irishman writing in the language of the British Empire, he translated Gaelic poetry and renewed specifically Irish traditions, such as the aisling, or vision poem, but he was also steeped in the English literary canon, drawing on British poetry from Beowulf (his prize-winning translation appears earlier in this anthology) to the works of William Wordsworth, Gerard Manley Hopkins, and Ted Hughes. Straddling a multiplicity of divisions, transubstantiating crisscross feelings into unexpected images and intricate sonorities, Heaney's work has been embraced by popular audiences for its accessible style and yet also admired by poets and academic critics for its lyric subtlety and rigorous technique.

Formally, Heaney's poetry ranges from strenuous free verse—the clipped lines and unrhymed quatrains of the bog poems—to more traditional forms, such as the modified terza rima of "Station Island" and the sonnet sequence "Clearances." His poems are earthy and matter-of-fact, saturated with the physical textures, sights, smells, and sounds of farm life, and they are also visionary, lit up by hope and spirit, enacting penitential pilgrimages and unbridled imaginings. That Heaney's poetry is both earthbound and airborne, free and formed, public and private helps explain why he is seen by many as the most gifted English-language poet of his generation.

Digging

Between my finger and my thumb
The squat pen rests; snug as a gun.

Under my window, a clean rasping sound
When the spade sinks into gravelly ground:
My father, digging. I look down

5

Till his straining rump among the flowerbeds
Bends low, comes up twenty years away
Stooping in rhythm through potato drills¹
Where he was digging.

10

The coarse boot nestled on the lug, the shaft
Against the inside knee was levered firmly.
He rooted out tall tops, buried the bright edge deep
To scatter new potatoes that we picked
Loving their cool hardness in our hands.

15

By God, the old man could handle a spade.
Just like his old man.

20

My grandfather cut more turf² in a day
Than any other man on Toner's bog.
Once I carried him milk in a bottle
Corked sloppily with paper. He straightened up
To drink it, then fell to right away
Nicking and slicing neatly, heaving sods
Over his shoulder, going down and down
For the good turf. Digging.

25

The cold smell of potato mould, the squelch and slap
Of soggy peat, the curt cuts of an edge

Through living roots awaken in my head.
But I've no spade to follow men like them.

30 Between my finger and my thumb
The squat pen rests.
I'll dig with it.

1966

Endnotes

- Note 1: Small furrows in which seeds are sown. Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Slabs of peat that, when dried, are a common domestic fuel in Ireland. Return to reference 2

The Grauballe Man¹

As if he had been poured
in tar, he lies on a pillow of turf
and seems to weep

5 the black river of himself.
The grain of his wrists
is like bog oak,
the ball of his heel

like a basalt egg.
10 His instep has shrunk
cold as a swan's foot or a wet swamp root.

His hips are the ridge
and purse of a mussel, 15 his spine an eel arrested
under a glisten of mud.

The head lifts,
the chin is a visor
raised above the vent
20 of his slashed throat

that has tanned and toughened.
The cured wound
opens inwards to a dark elderberry place.

25 Who will say 'corpse'
to his vivid cast?

Who will say 'body'
to his opaque repose?

30 And his rusted hair,
a mat unlikely
as a foetus's.
I first saw his twisted face

35 in a photograph, a head and shoulder
out of the peat,
bruised like a forceps baby,

40 but now he lies perfected in my memory,
down to the red horn
of his nails,

45 hung in the scales
with beauty and atrocity:
with the Dying Gaul²
too strictly compassed

on his shield,
with the actual weight
of each hooded victim,
slashed and dumped.

1975

Endnotes

- Note 1: A body exhumed from a Danish bog and photographed in P. V. Glob's book The Bog People. Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Roman marble reproduction of a Greek bronze sculpture depicting a wounded soldier of Gaul, whose matted hair identifies him as a Celt, in Rome's Capitoline Museum.Return to reference 2

Punishment¹

I can feel the tug
of the halter at the nape
of her neck, the wind
on her naked front.

5 It blows her nipples
to amber beads,
it shakes the frail rigging of her ribs.

10 I can see her drowned body in the bog,
the weighing stone,
the floating rods and boughs.

15 Under which at first she was a barked sapling that is dug up
oak-bone, brain-firkin: ^o_u

20 her shaved head like a stubble of black corn,
her blindfold a soiled bandage,
her noose a ring

to store
the memories of love.
Little adultress,
before they punished you

25 you were flaxen-haired, undernourished, and your tar-black face was beautiful.

My poor scapegoat,

I almost love you
30 but would have cast, I know,
the stones of silence.
I am the artful voyeur

of your brain's exposed and darkened combs,
35 your muscles' webbing
and all your numbered bones:

I who have stood dumb
when your betraying sisters,
cauled in tar,
40 wept by the railings,

who would connive
in civilized outrage
yet understand the exact
and tribal, intimate revenge.

1975

Endnotes

- Note 1:
In 1951 the peat-stained body apparently of a young girl, who lived in the late 1st century C.E., was recovered from a bog in Windeby, Germany. As P. V. Glob describes her in The Bog People, she "lay naked in the hole in the peat, a bandage over the eyes and a collar round the neck. The band across the eyes was drawn tight and had cut into the neck and the base of the nose. We may feel sure that it had been used to close her eyes to this world. There was no mark of strangulation on the neck, so that it had not been used for that purpose.” Her hair “had been shaved off with a razor on the left side of the head. . . . When the brain was removed the convolutions and folds of the surface could be clearly seen [Glob reproduces a photograph of her brain]. . . . This girl of only fourteen had had an inadequate winter diet. . . . To keep the young body under, some birch branches and a big stone were laid upon her.” According to the Roman historian Tacitus, the Germanic peoples punished adulterous women by shaving off their hair and then scourging them out of the village or killing them. More recently, her “betraying sisters” were sometimes shaved, stripped, tarred, and handcuffed by the Irish Republican Army (IRA) to the railings of Belfast in punishment for keeping company with British soldiers.

Return to reference 1

Notes

- °: small caskReturn to reference °
- °: valleysReturn to reference °
- °: wrapped, enclosedReturn to reference °

Casualty

1

He would drink by himself
And raise a weathered thumb
Towards the high shelf,
Calling another rum
And blackcurrant, without 5 Having to raise his voice,
Or order a quick stout^o
By a lifting of the eyes
And a discreet dumb-show
Of pulling off the top;
10 At closing time would go
In waders and peaked cap
Into the showery dark,
A dole-kept¹ breadwinner
But a natural for work.
15 I loved his whole manner,
Sure-footed but too sly,
His deadpan sidling tact,
His fisherman's quick eye
And turned observant back.
20 Incomprehensible
To him, my other life.
Sometimes, on his high stool,
Too busy with his knife
At a tobacco plug
25 And not meeting my eye
In the pause after a slug^o
He mentioned poetry.

We would be on our own
And, always politic
30 And shy of condescension,
I would manage by some trick
To switch the talk to eels
Or lore of the horse and cart
Or the Provisionals.²

35 But my tentative art
His turned back watches too:
He was blown to bits
Out drinking in a curfew
Others obeyed, three nights
40 After they shot dead
The thirteen men in Derry.
PARAS THIRTEEN, the walls said,
BOGSIDE NIL.³ That Wednesday
Everybody held
45 His breath and trembled.

2

It was a day of cold
Raw silence, wind-blown
Surplice and soutane:⁴
50 Rained-on, flower-laden
Coffin after coffin
Seemed to float from the door
Of the packed cathedral
Like blossoms on slow water.
The common funeral
55 Unrolled its swaddling band,⁵
Lapping, tightening
Till we were braced and bound
Like brothers in a ring.

60 But he would not be held
At home by his own crowd
Whatever threats were phoned,
Whatever black flags waved.
I see him as he turned 65 In that bombed offending place,
Remorse fused with terror
In his still knowable face,
His cornered outfaced stare
Blinding in the flash.

70 He had gone miles away
For he drank like a fish
Nightly, naturally
Swimming towards the lure
Of warm lit-up places,
The blurred mesh and murmur
75 Drifting among glasses
In the gregarious smoke.
How culpable was he
That last night when he broke
Our tribe's complicity?⁶
80 'Now you're supposed to be
An educated man,'
I hear him say. 'Puzzle me
The right answer to that one.'

3

85 I missed his funeral,
Those quiet walkers
And sideways talkers
Shoaling out of his lane
To the respectable
Purring of the hearse . . .

90 They move in equal pace
With the habitual
Slow consolation
Of a dawdling engine,
The line lifted, hand
95 Over fist, cold sunshine
On the water, the land
Banked under fog: that morning
I was taken in his boat,
The screw^o purling, turning 100 Indolent fathoms white,
I tasted freedom with him.
To get out early, haul
Steadily off the bottom,
Dispraise the catch, and smile
105 As you find a rhythm
Working you, slow mile by mile,
Into your proper haunt
Somewhere, well out, beyond . . .

110 Dawn-sniffing revenant,^z
Plodder through midnight rain,
Question me again.

1979

Endnotes

- Note 1: That is, receiving unemployment benefits.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The Provisional, paramilitary branch of the IRA.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: This graffito records—in the form of a soccer match score—that the British Army’s Parachute Regiment had killed thirteen people; the Roman Catholic inhabitants of Derry’s Bogside district, none. The IRA bombing occurred after the killing of Catholic demonstrators on Bloody Sunday, January 30, 1972.Return to reference 3

- Note 4: Vestments worn by Roman Catholic priests.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Long cloth in which babies were once wrapped to restrain and warm them.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The Roman Catholic community's agreement to obey the curfew (of lines 39–40).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: One returned from the dead.Return to reference 7

Notes

- °: strong dark beerReturn to reference °
- °: gulp of liquorReturn to reference °
- °: propellorReturn to reference °

From Station Island*¹

12

Like a convalescent, I took the hand stretched down from the jetty, sensed again an alien comfort as I stepped on ground

5 to find the helping hand still gripping mine, fish-cold and bony, but whether to guide or to be guided I could not be certain for the tall man in step at my side seemed blind, though he walked straight as a rush upon his ash plant,² his eyes fixed straight ahead.

10 Then I knew him in the flesh out there on the tarmac^o among the cars, wintered hard and sharp as a blackthorn bush.

15 His voice eddying with the vowels of all rivers³ came back to me, though he did not speak yet,
a voice like a prosecutor's or a singer's, cunning,⁴ narcotic, mimic, definite

as a steel nib's downstroke, quick and clean, and suddenly he hit a litter basket

20 with his stick, saying, "Your obligation is not discharged by any common rite.
What you must do must be done on your own so get back in harness. The main thing is to write for the joy of it. Cultivate a work-lust that imagines its haven like your hands at night

25 dreaming the sun in the sunspot of a breast.
You are fasted now, light-headed, dangerous.
Take off from here. And don't be so earnest, let others wear the sackcloth and the ashes.⁵
Let go, let fly, forget.
You've listened long enough. Now strike your note."

30 It was as if I had stepped free into space alone with nothing that I had not known already. Raindrops blew in my face

35 as I came to. "Old father, mother's son, there is a moment in Stephen's diary for April the thirteenth, a revelation set among my stars—that one entry has been a sort of password in my ears,
the collect of a new epiphany,⁶

40 the Feast of the Holy Tundish."⁷ "Who cares," he jeered, "any more? The English language belongs to us. You are raking at dead fires, a waste of time for somebody your age.
That subject⁸ people stuff is a cod's⁹ game,
infantile, like your peasant pilgrimage.

45 You lose more of yourself than you redeem doing the decent thing. Keep at a tangent.
When they make the circle wide, it's time to swim out on your own and fill the element with signatures on your own frequency,

50 echo soundings, searches, probes, allurements, elver-gleams⁸ in the dark of the whole sea.”
 The shower broke in a cloudburst, the tarmac fumed and sizzled. As he moved off quickly

55 the downpour loosed its screens round his straight walk.

1984

Endnotes

- Note 1:
Station Island is a sequence of dream encounters with familiar ghosts, set on Station Island on Lough Derg in Co. Donegal. The island is also known as St. Patrick’s Purgatory because of a tradition that Patrick was the first to establish the penitential vigil of fasting and praying which still constitutes the basis of the three-day pilgrimage. Each unit of the contemporary pilgrim’s exercises is called a ‘station,’ and a large part of each station involves walking barefoot and praying round the ‘beds,’ stone circles which are said to be the remains of early medieval monastic cells [Heaney’s note]. In this last section of the poem, the familiar ghost is that of Heaney’s countryman James Joyce. Compare with the stanza form and encounter with a ghost in T. S. Eliot’s “Little Gidding.”
Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Walking stick made of ash, like the one carried by Stephen Dedalus in Joyce’s Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man and Ulysses. Joyce was almost blind.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The Anna Livia Plurabelle episode of Finnegans Wake resounds with the names of many rivers.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: “The only arms I allow myself to use—silence, exile, and cunning” (Joyce, A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man).Return to reference 4

- Note 5: As worn by penitents in biblical times and later.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Manifestation of a superhuman being, as of the infant Jesus to the Magi (Matthew 2). In the Christian calendar, the Feast of the Epiphany is January 6. "Epiphany" was also Joyce's term for the "sudden revelation of the whatness of a thing."
"Collect": short prayer assigned to a particular day.Return to reference 6
- Note 7:
See the end of James Joyce's Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man [Heaney's note]: "13 April: That tundish [funnel] has been on my mind for a long time. I looked it up and find it English and good old blunt English too. Damn the dean of studies and his funnel! What did he come here for to teach us his own language or to learn it from us? Damn him one way or the other!"
Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Gleams as of young eels.Return to reference 8

Notes

- °: blacktop surfaceReturn to reference °
- °: colonized Return to reference °
- °: fool'sReturn to reference °

Clearances

in memoriam M.K.H.,¹ 1911–1984

*She taught me what her uncle once taught her:
How easily the biggest coal block split
If you got the grain and hammer angled right.*

5 *The sound of that relaxed alluring blow,
Its co-opted and obliterated echo,
Taught me to hit, taught me to loosen,*

*Taught me between the hammer and the block
To face the music. Teach me now to listen,
To strike it rich behind the linear black.*

1

10 A cobble thrown a hundred years ago
Keeps coming at me, the first stone
Aimed at a great-grandmother's turncoat brow.²
The pony jerks and the riot's on.
She's crouched low in the trap
Running the gauntlet that first Sunday
15 Down the brae^o to Mass at a panicked gallop.
He whips on through the town to cries of 'Lundy!'³

20 Call her 'The Convert'. 'The Exogamous⁴ Bride'.
Anyhow, it is a genre piece
Inherited on my mother's side
And mine to dispose with now she's gone.
Instead of silver and Victorian lace,
The exonerating, exonerated stone.

2

Polished linoleum shone there. Brass taps shone.
The china cups were very white and big—
25 An unchipped set with sugar bowl and jug.
The kettle whistled. Sandwich and teascone
Were present and correct. In case it run,
The butter must be kept out of the sun.
And don't be dropping crumbs. Don't tilt your chair.
30 Don't reach. Don't point. Don't make noise when you stir.

It is Number 5, New Row, Land of the Dead,
Where grandfather is rising from his place
With spectacles pushed back on a clean bald head
To welcome a bewildered homing daughter
35 Before she even knocks. 'What's this? What's this?'
And they sit down in the shining room together.

3

When all the others were away at Mass
I was all hers as we peeled potatoes.
They broke the silence, let fall one by one 40 Like solder weeping off the soldering iron:
Cold comforts set between us, things to share
Gleaming in a bucket of clean water.
And again let fall. Little pleasant splashes
From each other's work would bring us to our 45 senses.

So while the parish priest at her bedside
Went hammer and tongs at the prayers for the dying
And some were responding and some crying
I remembered her head bent towards my head,
Her breath in mine, our fluent dipping knives—

50 Never closer the whole rest of our lives.

4

Fear of affectation made her affect Inadequacy whenever it came to Pronouncing words 'beyond her'. *Bertold Brek.*⁵
55 She'd manage something hampered and askew
Every time, as if she might betray
The hampered and inadequate by too
Well-adjusted a vocabulary.
With more challenge than pride, she'd tell me, 'You
60 Know all them things.' So I governed my tongue
In front of her, a genuinely well-adjusted adequate betrayal
Of what I knew better. I'd naw and aye
And decently relapse into the wrong
65 Grammar which kept us allied and at bay.

5

The cool that came off sheets just off the line
Made me think the damp must still be in them
But when I took my corners of the linen
And pulled against her, first straight down the hem
And then diagonally, then flapped and shook 70 The fabric like a sail in a cross-wind,
They made a dried-out undulating thwack.
So we'd stretch and fold and end up hand to hand
For a split second as if nothing had happened
For nothing had that had not always happened
75 Beforehand, day by day, just touch and go,
Coming close again by holding back
In moves where I was x and she was o

Inscribed in sheets she'd sewn from ripped-out flour sacks.

6

80 In the first flush of the Easter holidays
The ceremonies during Holy Week
Were highpoints of our *Sons and Lovers*⁶ phase.
The midnight fire. The paschal candlestick.⁷
Elbow to elbow, glad to be kneeling next
85 To each other up there near the front
Of the packed church, we would follow the text
And rubrics⁸ for the blessing of the font.⁸
*As the hind longs for the streams, so my soul . . .*⁹ Dippings. Towellings. The water breathed on.
The water mixed with chrism¹ and with oil.
90 Cruet² tinkle. Formal incensation
And the psalmist's outcry taken up with pride:
*Day and night my tears have been my bread.*³

7

In the last minutes he said more to her
Almost than in all their life together.
95 'You'll be in New Row on Monday night
And I'll come up for you and you'll be glad
When I walk in the door . . . Isn't that right?'
His head was bent down to her propped-up head.
She could not hear but we were overjoyed.
100 He called her good and girl. Then she was dead,
The searching for a pulsebeat was abandoned
And we all knew one thing by being there.
The space we stood around had been emptied
Into us to keep, it penetrated
Clearances that suddenly stood open.

105 High cries were felled and a pure change happened.

8

I thought of walking round and round a space
Utterly empty, utterly a source
Where the decked chestnut tree had lost its place
110 In our front hedge above the wallflowers.
The white chips jumped and jumped and skited⁴ high.
I heard the hatchet's differentiated
Accurate cut, the crack, the sigh
And collapse of what luxuriated
115 Through the shocked tips and wreckage of it all.
Deep planted and long gone, my coeval⁵
Chestnut from a jam jar in a hole,
Its heft and hush become a bright nowhere,
A soul ramifying and forever
120 Silent, beyond silence listened for.

1987

Endnotes

- Note 1: Margaret Kathleen Heaney, the poet's mother.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Heaney's Protestant great-grandmother married a Catholic.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: That is, traitor. In 1688 the Irish colonel Robert Lundy knew that Derry (or Londonderry) would be invaded by the English, but failed to prepare adequate defenses.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Married outside the group.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Bertolt Brecht (1898–1956), German playwright.Return to reference 5

- Note 6: Novel (1913) by the English writer D. H. Lawrence (1885–1930) that largely centers on the oedipal relationship between a mother and son.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Large candle lit during a ceremony on Holy Saturday, which precedes Easter Sunday.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Receptacle for holy water.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Psalms 42:1.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Mixture of olive oil and balsam.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Small vessel for wine or water.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Psalms 42:3.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Shot off obliquely.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Of the same age.Return to reference 5

Notes

- °: steep slopeReturn to reference °
- °: rulesReturn to reference °

Anything Can Happen

after Horace, Odes, 1, 34¹

Anything can happen. You know how Jupiter²
Will mostly wait for clouds to gather head
Before he hurls the lightning? Well, just now
He galloped his thunder cart and his horses

5 Across a clear blue sky. It shook the earth
And the clogged underearth, the River Styx,³
The winding streams, the Atlantic shore itself.
Anything can happen, the tallest towers

10 Be overturned, those in high places daunted,
Those overlooked regarded. Stropped-beak⁴ Fortune
Swoops, making the air gasp, tearing the crest off
one,
Setting it down bleeding on the next.

15 Ground gives. The heaven's weight
Lifts up off Atlas like a kettle-lid.
Capstones shift, nothing resettles right.
Telluric⁵ ash and fire-spores boil away.

2001, 2006

Endnotes

- Note 1: See Odes (23 B.C.E.), books of lyric poetry by the Roman poet and satirist Horace (65–8 B.C.E.). Although he follows aspects of Horace's poem, Heaney drops Horace's first stanza and adds a new final stanza. Return to reference 1

- Note 2: Supreme Roman god, whose weapon was the thunderbolt.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: In Greek mythology, a river in the underworld, over which the shades of the dead were ferried.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: With a beak with a sharpened edge.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Of the earth or soil. "Atlas": one of the Titans in Greek mythology, he was condemned to hold up the heavens. "Capstones": stones that crown structures, typically walls.Return to reference 5

Environmental Literature and Climate Change

Nature has always been a source of literary inspiration, but the modern Western understanding of the environment as under threat and in need of protection begins with the conservation movements of the late nineteenth century. English social reformer Octavia Hill (1838–1912) advocated for the importance of open spaces and co-founded the National Trust in 1895 to create parks and greenbelts accessible to the public in the United Kingdom. The Open Space movement, named after Hill's essay on the topic, emphasized preservation of nature for human enjoyment, but the priorities of environmental activists shifted in the wake of World War II and with the rise of environmental justice movements across the globe. The atomic fallout of nuclear weapons, the cancerous effects of pesticide use, and the displacement of Indigenous and poor peoples from land earmarked for oil drilling, dam building, and deforestation widened the scope of environmentalism to include matters of social justice and climate change. While environmental literature commemorating the beauty of natural landscapes remains powerful, authors writing in the contemporary era also convey more dystopian, tragic, and surreal views of Earth's habitats.

Since the eighteenth century, humans have been warming the planet by burning fossil fuels, which create atmospheric gases that trap the sun's energy. The latter half of the twentieth century, known among climate scientists as "The Great Acceleration," saw the Earth warming at rates not seen for millennia. In response to the intensification of climate change, biologist Eugene Stoermer and Nobel Prize-winning chemist Paul Crutzen have proposed that human beings are living in a new geological epoch called the "Anthropocene." The Anthropocene remains an unofficial unit of geological time; however, there is now a scientific consensus around the existence of anthropogenic (human-caused) climate change. Such awareness has served as a major rallying point for diverse writers of environmental literature who explore the impact of human beings on Earth systems. The writers featured in this cluster hail from around the English-speaking world, and their fiction, nonfiction, and poetry reveal the interdependence of nature and culture in a world profoundly endangered by human activity.

Stories of natural disaster illustrate ambivalence toward the advances of human civilization and connect traditionally literary fiction to neighboring genres such as science fiction and testimony. J. G. Ballard, a leading author of the "New Wave" movement, brought popular and pulp forms of science fiction into conversation with the literary traditions of modernism and postmodernism. The Drowned World (1962) is the second of his four "elemental novels," dedicated to representing the awesome powers of wind, water, fire, and earth. Although Ballard's novel is not overtly about climate change, his imagery of drowned cities and makeshift boats on city streets supplies an influential iconography for climate-change fiction or cli-fi to come. Bessie Head employs traditionally realist narrative strategies in "Looking for a Rain God" (1977) to depict extreme weather. Chronicling the increasingly desperate plight of villagers in rural Botswana, Head drew on real-world events to offer an anguished portrait of how drought underpins social interactions and rituals of sacrifice.

Industrial development is a central theme in literary fiction preoccupied by environmental and climate justice. Ben Okri's "What the Tapster Saw" (1988) offers a nightmarish vision of the Niger Delta, the site of some of the most damaging oil spills in the world. Okri uses surreal images, at one point transforming an oil spill into a giant snake, to capture the monstrosity of the global petroleum industry's effects on multispecies habitats and local Nigerian industries and trades. Arundhati Roy, like Okri, experiments with narrative perspective and description, to capture the ecological ravaging of a resource-rich, biodiverse place. In The God of Small Things (1997), the protagonist returns to the Kerala backwaters of her youth to discover that its beauty has made it an international tourist attraction and resort destination. Roy uses an abundance of descriptive detail to introduce the fragile networks of life sacrificed for the sake of progress and modernization.

Climate Protests in London, 2019. Students march past the Houses of Parliament during the international school strike for climate.

Nonfiction plays a special role in the history of environmental literature, in particular the genre of nature-writing, which blends elements of memoir, reportage, and travelogue to capture the specificities of place over time. Amitav Ghosh, a novelist, nonfiction writer, and self-described descendant of ecological refugees, argues in The Great Derangement that nonfiction has historically outpaced fiction in its capacity to represent climate change. For Ghosh, traditional forms of literary fiction struggle to register the mundane aspects of environmental damage and the invisible changes to Earth's atmosphere. Nature writing, as evidenced in Robert Macfarlane's Underworld, centralizes land, place, and life cycles in ways that human-centered fictions have not always prioritized.

Ghosh and Macfarlane's recalculations of human time within the deep time of the planet set the stage for a selection of twenty-first-century poems that address climate change. These poems treat the representation of climate change as an aesthetic challenge. To do so is not to minimize the material effects of environmental destruction, but to make their consequences more visible and more palpable.

Underwater Cabinet Meeting in the Maldives. The Maldives is located in the Indian Ocean and, as a low-lying country, faces inundation from rising sea levels. In 2009 the nation's president, Mohamed Nasheed, drew attention to the crisis by convening an underwater cabinet meeting, during which he signed a declaration calling for global action to reduce carbon dioxide emissions.

J. G. BALLARD

James Graham Ballard (1930–2009) was born in Shanghai, China, where his father was the managing director of a printing company. The family lived in an extraterritorial area known as the Shanghai International Settlement, where British residents were not subject to local Chinese law. When Japan invaded this area during World War II, the Ballard family was sent to an internment camp where they lived for two years. Ballard has described the camp as a place where he witnessed extreme violence and yet retained a childish sense of play and imagination. His experience in the camp directly informs his novel Empire of the Sun (1984), but the larger ironies spurred by the co-existence of violence and normalcy also underpin major works like The Atrocity Exhibition (1969), Crash (1973), Concrete Island (1974), and High Rise (1975). These works establish Ballard's fascination with the fallout of new technologies and the effects of hypermodern environments on the psychology of their inhabitants.

Ballard returned to England in 1945 after the end of World War II. He attended the University of Cambridge and planned to become a psychiatrist, but shifted to writing science fiction under the influence of surrealism. The Drowned World (1962), set in a post-apocalyptic future London, illustrates his concept of "inner space," in which external reality merges with the inner workings of the mind, particularly the sex and death drives associated with the work of Sigmund Freud. In the excerpt included here, the scientist-protagonist Kerans attempts to find Lieutenant Hardman, who, after falling ill and possibly going insane, abandons his team of researchers without clear motivation. Ballard defamiliarizes the city, turning it into a "necropolis" in which strange flora and fauna have overtaken landmarks like the British Museum, described in turn through archaic and spectral language. The vision of the end of civilization, in which rising seas reclaim areas of human settlement, has made The Drowned World a classic work of environmental dystopia. Whether the flood is a form of biblical renewal or a psychoanalytic invitation to return to the womb is left ambiguous, but Ballard's inner spaces offer an unusual glimpse into the built environments of modernity and the dark fantasies they hold in check.

From The Drowned World

The Causeways of the Sun

As Kerans had prophesied, they found Hardman among the silt flats.

Descending to three hundred feet above the water, they began to rake up and down the distal¹ five-mile length of the main channel. The huge banks of silt lifted above the surface like the backs of yellow sperm whales. Wherever the hydrodynamic contours of the channel gave the silt banks any degree of permanence, the surrounding jungle spilled from the rooftops and rooted itself in the damp loam, matting the whole morass into an immovable structure. From the hatchway Kerans scrutinised the narrow beaches under the outer edge of the fern trees, watching for the tell-tale signs of a camouflaged raft or makeshift hut.

After twenty minutes, however, and a dozen careful sweeps of the channel, Riggs turned from the hatchway with a rueful shake of his head.

"You're probably right, Robert, but it's a hopeless job. Hardman's no fool, if he wants to hide from us we'll never find him. Even if he were leaning out of a window and waving, ten to one we wouldn't see him."

Kerans murmured in reply, watching the surface below. Each of the tracking runs was about a hundred yards to the starboard of the previous one, and for the last three runs he had been watching the semicircular crescent of what appeared to be a large apartment block standing in the angle between the channel and the southern bank of a small creek which ran off into the surrounding jungle. The upper eight or nine storeys of the block stood above the water, enclosing a low mound of muddy-brown silt. The surface streamed with water draining away from a collection of shallow pools covering it. Two hours earlier the bank had been a sheet of wet mud, but by ten o'clock, as the helicopter flew over, the mud was beginning to dry and grow firm. To Kerans, shielding his eyes from the reflected sunlight, its smooth surface appeared to be scored by two faint parallel lines, about six feet apart, that led across to the jutting roof of an almost submerged balcony. As they swept overhead he tried to see under the concrete slab, but its mouth was choked with refuse and rotting logs.

He touched Riggs' arm and pointed to the tracks, so immersed in tracing their winding progress to the balcony that he almost failed to notice the equally distinct pattern of imprints emerging in the drying surface between the lines, spaced some four feet apart, unmistakably the footsteps of a tall powerful man hauling a heavy load.

As the noise of the helicopter's engine faded out on the roof above them, Riggs and Macready bent down and inspected the crude catamaran hidden behind a screen of bocage² under the balcony. Fashioned from two drop-tanks lashed to either end of a metal bed-frame, its twin grey hulls were still streaked with silt. Clumps of mud from Hardman's feet crossed the room opening on to the balcony and disappeared through the suite into the adjacent corridor.

"This is it without a doubt—agree, Sergeant?" Riggs asked, stepping out into the sunlight to look up at the crescent of apartment blocks. A chain of autonomous units, they were linked by short causeways between the elevator wells at the end of each building. Most of the windows were broken, the cream facing tiles covered by huge patches of fungus, and the whole complex looked like an over-ripe camembert cheese.³

Macready knelt down by one of the hulls, cleaning away the silt, then traced out the code number painted across the bow. "UNAF 22-H-549—that's us, sir. The drop tanks were being cleared out yesterday, we'd stored them on C-Deck. He must have taken a spare bed from the sick-bay after ward-roll."

"Good." Rubbing his hands together with pleasure, Riggs stepped over to Kerans, smiling jauntily, his self-confidence and good humour fully restored. "Excellent, Robert. Superb diagnostic skill. You were quite right, of course." He peered shrewdly at Kerans, as if speculating on the real sources of this remarkable insight, invisibly marking him off. "Cheer up, Hardman will be grateful to you when we take him back."

Kerans stood on the edge of the balcony, the slope of caking silt below him. He looked up at the silent curve of windows, wondering which of the thousand or so rooms would be Hardman's hiding-place. "I hope you're right. You've still got to catch him."

"Don't worry. We will." Riggs began to shout up at the two men on the roof, helping Daley lash down the helicopter. "Wilson, keep a look-out from the south-west end; Caldwell, you work your way across to the north. Keep an eye on both sides, he might try to swim for it."

The two men saluted and moved off, their carbines⁴ held at their hips. Macready cradled a Thompson gun in the crook of his arm, and as Riggs unbuttoned the flap of his holster Kerans said quietly: "Colonel, we're not tracking down a wild dog."

Riggs waved this aside. "Relax, Robert, it's just that I don't want my leg bitten off by some sleeping croc. Though as a matter of interest"—here he flashed Kerans a gleaming smile—"Hardman has got a '45 Colt with him."

Leaving Kerans to digest this, he picked up the electric megaphone.

"Hardman! ! This is Colonel Riggs! !" He bellowed Hardman's name at the silent heat, then winked at Kerans and added: "Dr. Kerans wants to talk to you, Lieutenant! !"

Focused by the crescent of buildings, the sounds echoed away across the swamps and creeks, booming distantly over the great empty mudflats. Around them everything glistened in the immense heat, and the men on the roof fretted nervously under their forage caps. A thick cloacal⁵ stench exuded from the silt flat, a corona of a million insects pulsing and humming hungrily above it, and a sudden spasm of nausea knotted Kerans' gullet, for a moment dizzying him. Pressing a wrist tightly to his forehead, he leaned back against a pillar, listening to the echoes reverberate around him. Four hundred yards away two white-faced clock towers protruded through the vegetation, like the temple spires of some lost jungle religion, and the sounds of his name—"Kerans ... Kerans ... Kerans"—reflected off them seemed to Kerans to toll with an intense premonition of terror and disaster, the meaningless orientation of the clock hands identifying him, more completely than anything he had previously experienced, with all the confused and minatory spectres that cast their shadows more and more darkly through his mind, the myriad-handed mandala⁶ of cosmic time.

His name still echoed faintly in his ears as they began their search of the building. He took up his position at the stairwell at the centre of each corridor while Riggs and Macready inspected the apartments, keeping a look-out as they climbed the floors. The building had been gutted. All the floorboards had rotted or been ripped out, and they moved slowly along the tiled inlays, stepping warily from one concrete tie-beam to another. Most of the plaster had slipped from the walls and lay in grey heaps along the skirting boards. Wherever sunlight filtered through, the bare lathes⁷ were intertwined with creeper and wire-moss, and the original fabric of the building seemed solely supported by the profusion of vegetation ramifying through every room and corridor.

Through the cracks in the floors rose the stench of the greasy water swirling through the windows below. Disturbed for the first time in many years, the bats which hung from the tilting picture rails flew frantically for the windows, dispersing with cries of pain in the brilliant sunlight. Lizards scuttered and darted through the floor cracks, or skated desperately around the dry baths in the bathrooms.

Exacerbated by the heat, Riggs' impatience mounted as they climbed the floors and had covered all but the top two without success.

"Well, where is he?" Riggs rested against the stair-rail, gesturing for quiet, and listened to the silent building, breathing tightly through his teeth. "We'll stand easy for five minutes, Sergeant. Now's the time for caution. He's somewhere around here."

Macready slung his Thompson over his shoulder and climbed to the fan-light on the next landing which let in a thin breeze. Kerans leaned against the wall, the sweat pouring across his back and chest, temples thudding from the exertion of mounting the stairs. It was 11.30, and the temperature outside was well over 120 degrees. He looked down at Riggs' flushed pink face, admiring the Colonel's self-discipline and single-mindedness.

"Don't look so condescending, Robert. I know I'm sweating like a pig, but I haven't had as much rest as you lately."

The two men exchanged glances, each aware of the conflict of attitude towards Hardman, and Kerans, in an effort to resolve the rivalry between them, said quietly: "You'll probably catch him now, Colonel."

Searching for somewhere to sit, he walked off down the corridor and pushed back the door into the first apartment.

As he unlatched the door the frame collapsed weakly into a litter of worm-eaten dust and timbers, and he stepped across it to the wide french windows overlooking the balcony. A little air funnelled through, and Kerans let it play over his face and chest, surveying the jungle below. The promontory on which the crescent of apartment houses stood had at one time been a small hill, and a number of the buildings visible beneath the vegetation on the other side of the silt flat were still above the flood-waters. Kerans stared at the two clock towers jutting up like white obelisks above the fern fronds. The yellow air of the noon high seemed to press down like a giant translucent counterpane on the leafy spread, a thousand motes of light spitting like diamonds whenever a bough moved and deflected the sun's rays. The obscured outline of a classical portico and colonnaded façade below the towers suggested that the buildings were once part of some small municipal centre. One of the clockfaces was without its hands; the other, by coincidence, had stopped at almost exactly the right time—11.35. Kerans wondered whether the clock was not in fact working, tended by some mad recluse clinging to a last meaningless register of sanity, though if the mechanism were still operable Riggs might well perform that role. Several times, before they abandoned one of the drowned cities, he had wound the two-ton mechanism of some rusty cathedral clock and they had sailed off to a last carillon⁸ of chimes across the water. For nights afterwards, in his dreams Kerans had seen Riggs dressed as William Tell, striding about in a huge Dalinian landscape,⁹ planting immense dripping sundials like daggers in the fused sand.

Kerans leaned against the window, waiting as the minutes passed and left behind the clock fixed at 11.35, overtaking it like a vehicle in a faster lane. Or was it not stationary (guaranteed though it would be to tell the time with complete, unquestionable accuracy twice a day—more than most time-pieces) but merely so slow that its motion appeared to be imperceptible? The slower a clock, the nearer it approximated to the infinitely gradual and majestic progression of cosmic time—in fact, by reversing a clock's direction and running it backwards one could devise a timepiece that in a sense was moving even more slowly than the universe, and consequently part of an even greater spatiotemporal system.

Kerans' amusement at this notion was distracted by his discovery among the clutter of debris on the opposite bank of a small cemetery sloping down into the water, its leaning headstones advancing to their crowns like a party of bathers. He remembered again one ghastly cemetery over which they had moored, its ornate Florentine tombs cracked and sprung, corpses floating out in their unravelling winding-sheets in a grim rehearsal of the Day of Judgement.

Averting his eyes, he turned away from the window, with a jolt realised that a tall black-bearded man was standing motionlessly in a doorway behind him. Startled, Kerans stared uncertainly at the figure, with an effort reassembling his thoughts. The big man stood in a slightly stooped but relaxed pose, his heavy arms loosely at his sides. Black mud caked across his wrists and forehead, and clogged his boots and the fabric of his drill trousers, for a moment reminding Kerans of one of the resurrected corpses. His bearded chin was sunk between his broad shoulders, the impression of constraint and fatigue heightened by the medical orderly's blue denim jacket several sizes too small which he wore, the corporal's stripe pulled up over the swell of his deltoid muscles. The expression on his face was one of hungry intensity, but he gazed at Kerans with sombre detachment, his eyes like heavily banked fires, a thin glow of interest in the biologist the only outward show of the energy within.

Kerans waited until his eyes adjusted themselves to the darkness at the rear of the room, looking involuntarily at the bedroom doorway through which the bearded man had stepped. He reached out one hand to him, half-afraid of breaking the spell between them, warning him not to move, and elicited in return an expression of curiously understanding sympathy, almost as if their roles were reversed.

"Hardman!" Kerans whispered.

With a galvanic leap, Hardman flung himself at Kerans, his big frame blocking off half the room, fainted just before they collided and swerved past, before Kerans could regain his balance had jumped out on to the balcony and climbed over the rail.

"Hardman!" As one of the men on the roof shouted the alarm Kerans reached the balcony. Hardman swung himself like an acrobat down the drain-pipe to the parapet below. Riggs and Macready dived into the room. Holding on to his hat, Riggs pivoted out over the rail, swore as Hardman disappeared into the apartment.

"Good man, Kerans. You nearly held him!" Together they ran back into the corridor and raced down the stairway, saw Hardman swinging around the banisters four floors below, hurling himself from one landing to the next in a single stride.

When they reached the lowest floor they were thirty seconds behind Hardman, and a medley of excited shouts were coming from the roof. But Riggs paused stock-still on the balcony.

"Good God, he's trying to drag his raft back into the water!"

Thirty yards away, Hardman was dragging the catamaran across the caking mass of silt, the tow-rope over his shoulders, jerking its bows into the air with demoniac energy.

Riggs buttoned the flap of his holster, sadly shaking his head. There was a full fifty yards to the water's edge, and Hardman was sinking up to his knees in the damper silt, oblivious of the men on the roof looking down at him. Finally he tossed away the tow-rope and seized the bed-frame in both hands, began to wrench it along in slow painful jerks, the denim jacket splitting down his back.

Riggs stepped up on to the balcony, gesturing to Wilson and Caldwell to come down. "Poor devil. He looks all in. Doctor, you stay close; you may be able to pacify him."

Carefully they closed in on Hardman. The five men, Riggs, Macready, the two soldiers and Kerans, advanced down the sloping crust, shielding their eyes from the intense sunlight. Like a wounded water-buffalo, Hardman continued to wrestle in the mud ten yards in front of them. Kerans motioned to the others to stay still and then walked forwards with Wilson, a blond-haired youth who had once been Hardman's orderly. Wondering what to say to Hardman, he cleared the knots of phlegm from his throat.

On the roof behind them there was a sudden staccato roar of exhaust, splitting the silence of the tableau. A few steps behind Wilson, Kerans hesitated, saw Riggs look up in annoyance at the helicopter. Assuming that their mission was now over, Daley had started his engine, and the blades were swinging slowly through the air.

Roused from his attempt to reach the water, Hardman looked around at the group encircling him, released the catamaran and crouched down behind it. Wilson began to wade forward precariously through the soft silt along the water's edge, the carbine held across his chest. As he sank up to his waist he shouted at Kerans, his voice lost in the mounting roar of the engine, exhaust spitting in sharp cracks over their heads. Suddenly Wilson swayed, and before Kerans could steady him Hardman leaned across the catamaran, the big Colt '45 in his hand, and fired at them. The flame from the barrel stabbed through the dazzling air, and with a short cry Wilson fell across the carbine, then rolled back clutching a bloodied elbow, his forage cap cuffed off his head by the discharge wave of the explosion.

As the other men began to retreat up the slope Hardman holstered the revolver in his belt, turned and ran off along the water's edge to the buildings that merged into the jungle a hundred yards away.

Pursued by the ascending roar of the helicopter, they raced after Hardman, Riggs and Kerans helping the injured Wilson, stumbling in and out of the pot-holes left by the men ahead. At the edge of the silt flat the jungle rose in a high green cliff, tier upon tier of fern-trees and giant club moss flowering from the terraces. Without hesitating, Hardman plunged into a narrow interval between two ancient cobbled walls, and disappeared down the alley-way, Macready and Caldwell twenty yards behind him.

"Keep after him, Sergeant!" Riggs bellowed when Macready paused to wait for the Colonel. "We've nearly got him; he's beginning to tire." To Kerans he confided: "God, what a shambles!" He pointed hopelessly at the huge figure of Hardman pounding away in long strides. "What's driving the man on? I've a damn' good mind to let him go and get on with it."

Wilson had recovered sufficiently to walk unaided, and Kerans left him and broke into a run. "He'll be all right, Colonel. I'll try to talk to Hardman; there's a chance I may be able to hold him."

From the alley-way they emerged into a small square, where a group of sedate 19th-century municipal buildings looked down on an ornate fountain. Wild orchids and magnolia entwined themselves around the grey ionic columns of the old courthouse, a miniature sham-Parthenon with a heavy sculptured portico,¹ but otherwise the square had survived intact the assaults of the previous fifty years, its original floor still well above the surrounding water level. Next to the courthouse with the faceless clock tower, was a second colonnaded building, a library or museum,² its white pillars gleaming in the sunlight like a row of huge bleached bones.

Nearing noon, the sun filled this antique forum with a harsh burning light, and Hardman stopped and looked back uncertainly at the men following him, then stumbled up the steps into the courthouse. Signalling to Kerans and Caldwell, Macready backed away among the statues in the square and took up his position behind the bowl of the fountain.

"Doctor, it's too dangerous now! He may not recognise you. We'll wait until the heat lifts; he can't move from there. Doctor —"

Kerans ignored him. He advanced slowly across the cracked flagstones, both forearms up over his eyes, and placed one foot insecurely on the first step. Somewhere among the shadows he could hear Hardman's exhausted breathing, pumping the scalding air into his lungs.

Shaking the square with its noise, the helicopter soared slowly overhead, and Riggs and Wilson hurried up the steps into the museum entrance, watching as the tail rotor turned the machine in a diminishing spiral. Together the noise and the heat drummed at Kerans' brain, bludgeoning him like a thousand clubs, clouds of dust billowing around him. Abruptly the helicopter began to lose lift, with an agonised acceleration of its engine slid out of the air into the square, then picked up just before it touched the ground. Ducking away, Kerans sheltered with Macready behind the fountain, while the aircraft jerked about over their heads. As it revolved, the tail rotor lashed into the portico of the courthouse, in an explosion of splintered marble the helicopter porpoised and plunged heavily on to the cobbles, the shattered tail propeller rotating eccentrically. Cutting his engine, Daley sat back at his controls, half stunned by the impact with the ground and trying helplessly to remove his harness.

Frustrated at this second attempt to catch Hardman, they crouched in the shadows below the portico of the museum, waiting for the noon high to subside. As if illuminated by immense searchlights, a vast white glare lit the grey stone of the buildings around the square, like an over-exposed photograph, reminding Kerans of the chalk-white colonnade of an Egyptian necropolis.³ As the sun mounted to its zenith⁴ the reflected light began to glimmer upwards from the paving stones. Periodically, while he tended Wilson and settled him with a few grains of morphine, Kerans could see the other men as they kept up their watch for Hardman, fanning themselves slowly with their forage caps.

Ten minutes later, shortly after noon, he looked up at the square. Completely obscured by the light and glare, the buildings on the other side of the fountain were no longer continuously visible, looming in and out of the air like the architecture of a spectral city. In the centre of the square, by the edge of the fountain, a tall solitary figure was standing, the pulsing thermal gradients every few seconds inverting the normal perspectives and magnifying him fleetingly. Hardman's sun-burnt face and black beard were now chalk-white, his mud-stained clothes glinting in the blinding sunlight like sheets of gold.

Kerans pulled himself to his knees, waiting for Macready to leap forward at him, but the Sergeant, with Riggs beside him, was huddled against a pillar, his eyes staring blankly at the floor in front of them, as if asleep or entranced.

Stepping away from the fountain, Hardman moved slowly across the square, in and out of the shifting curtains of light. He passed within twenty feet of Kerans, who knelt hidden behind the column, one hand on Wilson's shoulder, quietening the man's low grumbling. Skirting the helicopter, Hardman reached the far end of the courthouse and there left the square, walking steadily up a narrow incline towards the silt banks which stretched along the shore a hundred yards away.

Acknowledging his escape, the intensity of the sunlight diminished fractionally.

"Colonel Riggs!"

Macready plunged down the steps, shielding his eyes from the glare, and pointed off across the silt flat with his Thompson. Riggs followed him, hatless, his thin shoulders pinched together, tired and dispirited.

He put a restraining hand on Macready's elbow. "Let him go, Sergeant. We'll never catch him now. There doesn't seem to be much point, anyway."

Safely two hundred yards away, Hardman was still moving strongly, undeterred by the furnace-like heat. He reached the first crest, partly hidden in the huge palls of steam which hung over the centre of the silt flat, fading into them like a man disappearing into a deep mist. The endless banks of the inland sea stretched out in front of him, merging at their edges into the incandescent sky so that to Kerans he seemed to be walking across dunes of white-hot ash into the very mouth of the sun.

For the next two hours he sat quietly in the museum, waiting for the cutter⁵ to arrive, listening to Riggs' irritated grumbling and Daley's lame excuses. Drained by the heat, Kerans tried to sleep, but the occasional crack of a carbine jolted through his bruised brain like the kick of a leather boot. Attracted by the sounds of the helicopter, a school of iguana had approached, and the reptiles were now sidling around the edges of the square, braying at the men on the steps of the museum. Their harsh shrieking voices filled Kerans with a dull fear that persisted even after the cutter's arrival and their return journey to the base. Sitting in the comparative coolness under the wire hood, the green banks of the channel sliding past, he could hear their raucous barks.

At the base he settled Wilson in the sick-bay, then sought out Dr. Bodkin and described the events of the morning, referring in passing to the voices of the iguanas. Enigmatically, Bodkin only nodded to himself, then remarked: "Bewarned, Robert; you may hear them again."

About Hardman's escape he made no comment.

Kerans' catamaran was still moored across the lagoon, so he decided to spend the night in his cabin at the testing station. There he passed a quiet afternoon, nursing a light fever in his bunk, thinking of Hardman and his strange southward odyssey, and of the silt banks glowing like luminous gold in the meridian⁶ sun, both forbidding and inviting, like the lost but forever beckoning and unattainable shores of the amnionic⁷ paradise.

Endnotes

- Note 1: The outer area.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: A mixed woodland and pasture landscape. “Catamaran”: a type of multi-hulled boat.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: A very soft cheese.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: A type of rifle.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Sewer.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A geometric design with spiritual uses in Hinduism and Buddhism.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: A supporting structure.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Song played by a set of bells in a tower.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Reference to Spanish surrealist painter Salvador Dalí (1904–1989). Dalí painted The Enigma of William Tell in 1933. William Tell was a Swiss folk hero, but the painting is actually of Vladimir Lenin, who is identified with Tell.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: A covered entryway. “Sham-Parthenon”: an imitation of the Parthenon, a Grecian temple dedicated to the goddess Athena, now in ruins.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The British Museum, located in the Bloomsbury area of London.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: An elaborately designed cemetery, of which ancient Egypt had many.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The point when the sun is directly above an observer.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: A type of small boat.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: An imaginary circle passing through the poles and zenith of the Earth.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Like the amnion, the membrane that encloses an embryo and is filled with watery, amniotic fluid.Return to reference 7

BESSIE HEAD

Bessie Head (1937–1986) was born to a White mother and Black father in Pietermaritzburg, South Africa, in the era of apartheid, when interracial relationships were strictly outlawed. Her mother was married to a White Australian immigrant, but the marriage was rocky, and Head was the result of an affair. She never knew her biological father and had little contact with the family that placed her mother in the Fort Napier Mental Institution upon discovering her pregnancy. Head faced hardship from a very young age. Sent to a White foster family as a baby, she was rejected for her mixed-race appearance and placed with a Coloured family (an apartheid-era designation for those of mixed race) with whom she lived for thirteen years, under the misapprehension that they were her biological family. Upon moving to an orphanage school as a teenager, she was informed by a school officer that the woman who raised her was not her mother, that her mother was White, and that her mother had gone insane. This childhood trauma would mark the rest of Head's life. It shaped her writing and self-imposed exile from South Africa to the neighboring nation of Botswana.

Head published four novels in her lifetime, the first of which, Where Rainclouds Gather (1968), drew on her experience working on a farm in Botswana. Head combines psychological realism with fascinatingly detailed accounts of rural and village life. Her later novels Maru (1971) and particularly A Question of Power (1973) connect psychological trauma to changes in weather cycles as if to suggest that cycles of creation, destruction, and rejuvenation in the natural world also shape narratives of human resilience and survival. In "Looking for a Rain God," originally published in the short story collection The Collector of Treasures (1977), Head returns her focus to village life in Botswana, one of the most drought-prone countries in the world. The story depicts the brutality of waiting for a rain that never comes and the desperate acts that bring tribal cultural practices into conflict with official state laws.

Looking for a Rain God

It is lonely at the lands where the people go to plough. These lands are vast clearings in the bush,¹ and the wild bush is lonely too. Nearly all the lands are within walking distance from the village. In some parts of the bush where the underground water is very near the surface, people made little rest camps for themselves and dug shallow wells to quench their thirst while on their journey to their own lands. They experienced all kinds of things once they left the village. They could rest at shady watering places full of lush, tangled trees with delicate pale-gold and purple wild flowers springing up between soft green moss and the children could hunt around for wild figs and any berries that might be in season. But from 1958, a seven-year drought fell upon the land and even the watering places began to look as dismal as the dry open thorn-bush country; the leaves of the trees curled up and withered; the moss became dry and hard and, under the shade of the tangled trees, the ground turned a powdery black and white, because there was no rain. People said rather humorously that if you tried to catch the rain in a cup it would only fill a teaspoon. Towards the beginning of the seventh year of drought, the summer had become an anguish to live through. The air was so dry and moisture-free that it burned the skin. No one knew what to do to escape the heat and tragedy was in the air. At the beginning of that summer, a number of men just went out of their homes and hung themselves to death from trees. The majority of the people had lived off crops, but for two years past they had all returned from the lands with only their rolled-up skin blankets and cooking utensils. Only the charlatans, incanters, and witch-doctors² made a pile of money during this time because people were always turning to them in desperation for little talismans and herbs to rub on the plough for the crops to grow and the rain to fall.

The rains were late that year. They came in early November, with a promise of good rain. It wasn't the full, steady downpour of the years of good rain, but thin, scanty, misty rain. It softened the earth and a rich growth of green things sprang up everywhere for the animals to eat. People were called to the village kgotla³ to hear the proclamation of the beginning of the ploughing season; they stirred themselves and whole families began to move off to the lands to plough.

The family of the old man, Mokgobja, were among those who left early for the lands. They had a donkey cart and piled everything onto it, Mokgobja—who was over seventy years old; two little girls, Neo and Boseyong; their mother Tiro and an unmarried sister, Nesta; and the father and supporter of the family, Ramadi, who drove the donkey cart. In the rush of the first hope of rain, the man, Ramadi, and the two women, cleared the land of thorn-bush and then hedged their vast ploughing area with this same thorn-bush to protect the future crop from the goats they had brought along for milk. They cleared out and deepened the old well with its pool of muddy water and still in this light, misty rain, Ramadi inspanned two oxen and turned the earth over with a hand plough.

The land was ready and ploughed, waiting for the crops. At night, the earth was alive with insects singing and rustling about in search of food. But suddenly, by mid-November, the rain fled away; the rain-clouds fled away and left the sky bare. The sun danced dizzily in the sky, with a strange cruelty. Each day the land was covered in a haze of mist as the sun sucked up the last drop of moisture out of the earth. The family sat down in despair, waiting and waiting. Their hopes had run so high; the goats had started producing milk, which they had eagerly poured on their porridge, now they ate plain porridge with no milk. It was impossible to plant the corn, maize, pumpkin and water-melon seeds in the dry earth. They sat the whole day in the shadow of the huts and even stopped thinking, for the rain had fled away. Only the children, Neo and Boseyong, were quite happy in their little girl world. They carried on with their game of making house like their mother and chattered to each other in light, soft tones. They made children from sticks around which they tied rags, and scolded them severely in an exact imitation of their own mother. Their voices could be heard scolding the day long: 'You stupid thing, when I send you to draw water, why do you spill half of it out of the bucket!' 'You stupid thing! Can't you mind the porridge-pot without letting the porridge burn!' And then they would beat the rag-dolls on their bottoms with severe expressions.

The adults paid no attention to this; they did not even hear the funny chatter; they sat waiting for rain; their nerves were stretched to breaking-point willing the rain to fall out of the sky. Nothing was important, beyond that. All their animals had been sold during the bad years to purchase food, and of all their herd only two goats were left. It was the women of the family who finally broke down under the strain of waiting for rain. It was really the two women who caused the death of the little girls. Each night they started a weird, high-pitched wailing that began on a low, mournful note and whipped up to a frenzy. Then they would stamp their feet and shout as though they had lost their heads. The men sat quiet and self-controlled; it was important for men to maintain their self-control at all times but their nerve was breaking too. They knew the women were haunted by the starvation of the coming year.

Finally, an ancient memory stirred in the old man, Mokgobja. When he was very young and the customs of the ancestors still ruled the land, he had been witness to a rain-making ceremony. And he came alive a little, struggling to recall the details which had been buried by years and years of prayer in a Christian church. As soon as the mists cleared a little, he began consulting in whispers with his youngest son, Ramadi. There was, he said, a certain rain god who accepted only the sacrifice of the bodies of children. Then the rain would fall; then the crops would grow, he said. He explained the ritual and as he talked, his memory became a conviction and he began to talk with unshakable authority. Ramadi's nerves were smashed by the nightly wailing of the women and soon the two men began whispering with the two women. The children continued their game: 'You stupid thing! How could you have lost the money on the way to the shop! You must have been playing again!'

After it was all over and the bodies of the two little girls had been spread across the land, the rain did not fall. Instead, there was a deathly silence at night and the devouring heat of the sun by day. A terror, extreme and deep, overwhelmed the whole family. They packed, rolling up their skin blankets and pots, and fled back to the village.

People in the village soon noted the absence of the two little girls. They had died at the lands and were buried there, the family said. But people noted their ashen, terror-stricken faces and a murmur arose. What had killed the children, they wanted to know? And the family replied that they had just died. And people said amongst themselves that it was strange that the two deaths had occurred at the same time. And there was a feeling of great unease at the unnatural looks of the family. Soon the police came around. The family told them the same story of death and burial at the lands. They did not know what the children had died of. So the police asked to see the graves. At this, the mother of the children broke down and told everything.

Throughout that terrible summer the story of the children hung like a dark cloud of sorrow over the village, and the sorrow was not assuaged when the old man and Ramadi were sentenced to death for ritual murder. All they had on the statute books was that ritual murder was against the law and must be stamped out with the death penalty. The subtle story of strain and starvation and breakdown was inadmissible evidence at court; but all the people who lived off crops knew in their hearts that only a hair's breadth had saved them from sharing a fate similar to that of the Mokgobja family. They could have killed something to make the rain fall.

1977

Endnotes

- Note 1: Term for wilderness or backwoods.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: A type of healer treating illnesses caused by witchcraft, and not witches themselves. “Charlatans”: someone claiming to have a skill they do not possess, a fraud. “Incanters”: spell-casters.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: A public meeting or council.Return to reference 3

BEN OKRI

Ben Okri (b. 1959) spent his early years in England, where he attended primary school while his father pursued a law degree. His family returned to Nigeria in 1968 in the midst of the Nigerian Civil War (1967–70), a conflict that pitted ethnic groups against one another and generated disputes over the control of oil production in the Niger Delta. Okri's memories of this period inspired the Booker Prize-winning The Famished Road (1991), Songs of Enchantment (1993), and Infinite Riches (1998), a trilogy of novels centered on a spirit-child who moves between the mystical and earthly realms of modern Nigeria. Okri, the author of over two dozen novels, short story collections, and books of poetry, rejects the characterization of his work as magical realism as an unhelpful shorthand. Like his compatriot Wole Soyinka, he draws on a mix of African and European philosophies as well as myth and animism to portray reality as more multidimensional than a secular imagination of the world would allow.

Although Okri's novels tend to feature more fantastic elements than his short stories, his spiritual realism is on display in "What the Tapster Saw," from his collection Stars of the New Curfew (1988). The story features a tapster, a man who taps palm trees for sap used in the making of palm wine. The profession, several centuries old, connects the protagonist to a local trade, but his world is turned upside down when he falls from a tree on the newly demarcated property of the Delta Oil Company (a substitute for the British multinational corporation Shell, which dominated the Niger Delta region). The tapster proceeds to have nightmarish visions of a world poisoned by oil; images of deformed animals take the place of known birds; smoke from dynamite used for drilling obscures the tapster's sight and creates a burning sensation in his eyes and nose. Okri weaves obvious, subtle, and hallucinatory markers of oil's destructive effects throughout the story—none more surreal than the rainbow-colored snake slithering from a borehole into the water in an animated recreation of an oil spill. "What the Tapster Saw" blurs the line between dreams and death to bring an otherworldly dimension to environmental crisis.

What the Tapster Saw

There was once an excellent tapster¹ who enjoyed climbing palm-trees as much as the tapping of their wines. One night he dreamt that while tapping for palm-wine he fell from the tree and died. He was so troubled by the dream that late as it was he went to visit his friend, Tabasco, who was a renowned herbalist. But that night Tabasco was too busy to pay much attention to what the tapster was saying. Harassed by the demands of his many wives, the herbalist kept chewing bundles of alligator pepper seeds² and dousing his mouth with palm-wine. When the tapster was about to leave the herbalist drew him aside and, with curious irrelevance, said:

'I used to know a hunter who, one day while hunting, saw a strange antelope. He followed the antelope till it came to an anthill. To his surprise the antelope turned into a woman and then disappeared. The hunter waited near the anthill for the woman to reappear. He fell asleep and when he woke up the ground was full of red water. He looked up and found himself surrounded by nine spirits. He went mad, of course. It took me three weeks to recover after I went inside his head to cure him. A little of his madness entered me. Tomorrow if you bring me three turtles and a big lobe of kola nut³ I will do something about your dream. But tonight I am very busy.'

The tapster agreed and, disappointed, went back home and drank his way through a gourd of palm-wine. He managed to forget his dream by the time he fell asleep.

In the morning he gathered his ropes and magic potions, tied three empty gourds to his bicycle, and rode out into the forest to begin his day's work. He had been riding for some time when he came to a signboard which read: DELTA OIL COMPANY: THIS AREA IS BEING DRILLED. TRESPASSERS IN DANGER. The tapster stared at the signboard without comprehension. Further along he noticed a strange cluster of palm-trees. He rode through thick cobwebs in order to reach them. The smell of their red-green bark intoxicated him. He immediately tied his magic potions to one of the tree-trunks, brought out his rope, and proceeded to climb. Pressing his feet on both sides of the tree, switching the rope high up the rough rungs of the bark, he pulled himself up rapidly, till his chest began to ache. The morning sun, striking him with an oblique glare, blinded him. As the golden lights exploded in his eyes the branches of the palm-tree receded from him. It was the first time he had fallen in thirty years.

When he woke up he was surprised that he felt no pain. He even had the curious feeling that the fall had done him some good. He felt unbelievably light and airy. He walked through spangles of glittering cobwebs without the faintest idea of where he was going. Fireflies darted into his nose and ears and re-emerged from his eyes with their lights undimmed. He walked for a long time. Then he saw another signboard which read: DELTA OIL COMPANY: TRESPASSERS WILL BE PERSECUTED. Around him were earth-mounds, gravestones, a single palm-tree, and flickering mangrove roots. He made a mark on the tree-trunk. Suddenly it became a fully festered wound. As he passed the twisting roots, troubled by the whitish ichors⁴ of the wound, they clasped him round the ankles. They held him down and tickled him. When he began to laugh they let him go.

He came to a river, whose water was viscous and didn't seem to move. Near the river there was a borehole.⁵ Three turtles lazed on the edge of the borehole, watching him. One of the turtles had Tabasco's face. The tapster was about to say something when a multi-coloured snake emerged from the borehole and slithered past him. When the snake slid into the river the colour of the water changed, and it became transparent and luminous. The snake's skin burned with a roseate flame. While the tapster looked on a voice behind him said:

'Don't turn round.'

The tapster stayed still. The three turtles gazed at him with eyes of glass. Then the turtle that had Tabasco's face urinated in the tapster's direction. The turtle seemed to enjoy the act. The ecstasy on its face made it look positively fiendish. The tapster laughed and a heavy object hit him on the head from behind. He turned round swiftly and saw nothing. He laughed again and was whacked even harder. He felt the substance of his being dissolve. The river seemed to heave during the long silence which followed.

'Where am I?' the tapster asked.

There was another silence. The snake, glittering, slid back out of the river. When the snake passed him it lifted its head and spat at him. The snake went on into the borehole, dazzling with the colours of the sun. The tapster began to tremble. After the trembling ceased a curious serenity spread through him. When he looked around he saw that he had multiplied. He was not sure whether it was his mind or his body which flowed in and out of him.

'Where am I?'

The voice did not answer. Then he heard footsteps moving away. He could not even sleep, for he heard other voices talking over him, talking about him, as if he were not there.

In that world the sun did not set, nor did it rise. It was a single unmoving eye. In the evenings the sun was like a large crystal. In the mornings it was incandescent. The tapster was never allowed to shut his eyes. After a day's wandering, when he lay by the borehole, hallucinating about palm-wine, a foul-smelling creature would come and stuff his eyes with cobwebs. This made his eyes itch and seemed a curious preparation for vision. When the tapster tried to sleep, with his eyes open, he saw the world he knew revolving in red lights. He saw women going to the distant marketplaces, followed by sounds which they didn't hear. He saw that the signboards of the world were getting bigger. He saw the employees of the oil company as they tried to level the forests. When he was hungry another creature, which he couldn't see, would come and feed him a mess of pulped chameleons, millepedes and bark. When he was thirsty the creature gave him a leaking calabash⁶ of green liquid. And then later at night another creature, which smelt of rotting agapanthus,⁷ crept above him, copulated with him, and left him the grotesque eggs of their nights together.

Then one day he dared to count the eggs. They were seven. He screamed. The river heaved. The snake stuck its head out from the borehole and the laughter of death roared from the sun. The laughter found him, crashed on him, shook him, and left large empty spaces in his head.

That night he fled. Everything fled with him. Then, after a while, he stopped. He abused the place, its terrible inhabitants, its unchanging landscape. Unable to escape, he cursed it ferociously. He was rewarded with several knocks. Then, as the eggs tormented him with the grating noises within them, as if a horrible birth were cranking away inside their monstrous shapes, he learned patience. He learned to watch the sky, and he saw that it wasn't so different from the skies of his drunkenness. He learned not to listen to the birth groaning within the eggs. He also learned that when he kept still everything else around him reflected his stillness.

And then, on another day, the voice came to him and said:

'Everything in your world has endless counterparts in other worlds. There is no shape, no madness, no ecstasy or revolution which does not have its shadow somewhere else. I could tell you stories which would drive you mad. You humans are so slow—you walk two thousand years behind yourselves.'

The voice was soon gone.

Another voice said to him:

'You have been dead for two days. Wake up.'

A creature came and stuffed his eyes with cobwebs. His eyes itched again and he saw that the wars were not yet over. Bombs which had not detonated for freak reasons, and which had lain hidden in farms, suddenly exploded. And some of those who lived as if the original war was over were blown up while they struggled with poverty. He saw the collapse of bridges that were being repaired. He saw roads that spanned wild tracts of forests and malarial swamps, creeks without names, hills without measurements. He saw the mouth of the roads lined with human skeletons, victims of mindless accidents. He saw dogs that followed people up and down the bushpaths and brooding night-tracks. As soon as the dogs vanished they turned into ghommids⁸ that swallowed up lonely and unfortified travellers.

Then he saw the unsuccessful attempts to level the forest area and drill for oil. He saw the witch-doctors that had been brought in to drive away the spirits from the forest. They also tried to prevent the torrential rains from falling and attempted to delay the setting of the sun. When all this failed the company hired an expatriate who flew in with explosives left over from the last war. The tapster saw the expatriate plant dynamite round the forest area. After the explosion the tapster saw a thick pall of green smoke. When the smoke cleared the tapster watched a weird spewing up of oil and animal limbs from the ground. The site was eventually abandoned. Agapanthus grew there like blood on a battlefield.

The tapster saw people being shot in coups, in secret executions, in armed robberies. He noticed that those who died were felled by bullets which had their names on them. When his eyes stopped itching the tapster wandered beneath the copper bursts of the sky. He noticed that there were no birds around. Streamers of cobweb membranes weaved over the wounded palm tree.

And then one day, fired by memories of ancient heroes, he pursued a course into the borehole. In the strange environment he saw the multi-coloured snake twisted round a soapstone image. He saw alligators in a lake of bubbling green water. He saw an old man who had died in a sitting position while reading a bible upside-down. Everything seemed on fire, but there was no smoke. Thick slimes of oil seeped down the walls. Roseate flames burned everywhere without consuming anything. He heard a noise behind him. He turned and a creature forced a plate containing a messy substance of food into his hands. The creature then indicated that he should eat. The multi-coloured snake uncoiled itself from the soapstone image. While the tapster ate the snake slid over and began to tell him bad jokes. The snake told him stories of how they hang black men in quiet western towns across the great seas, and of how it was possible to strip the skin off a baby without it uttering a sound. The snake laughed. Partly because the snake looked so ridiculous, the tapster laughed as well. Several sharp whacks, as from a steel edge, drummed on his head, and put him out for what could have been aeons of time.

When he recovered he traced his way out of the place. As he passed the man who had died reading the bible upside-down he saw that the man looked exactly like him. He fled from the borehole.

His impatience reached new proportions. He counted the rocks on the ground. He counted the cobwebs, the colours of the sun, the heavings of the river. He counted the number of times the wind blew. He told himself stories. But he found that whatever he told himself that was subversive was simultaneously censored by the knocks. He counted the knocks. He grew used to them.

Then the voice came to him again. It sounded more brutal than usual. The voice said:

‘Do you like it here?’

‘No.’

The tapster waited for a knock. It didn’t arrive.

‘Do you want to leave?’

‘Yes.’

‘What’s stopping you?’

‘I don’t know how.’

The voice was silent.

Another voice said:

‘You have been dead for three days.’

The tapster, who had seen the sky and earth from many angles, who knew the secrets of wine, had learned the most important lesson. He listened without thinking.

‘If you want to leave,’ the voice said, ‘we will have to beat you out.’

‘Why?’

‘Because you humans only understand pain.’

‘We don’t.’

There was another pause. He waited for a knock. It came. His thoughts floated around like cobwebs on the wind. The tapster stayed like that, still, through the purple phases of the sun. After a long while the voice said:

'Here are some thoughts to replace the ones that have been knocked away. Do you want to hear them?'

'Yes.'

The voice coughed and began:

'Even the good things in life eventually poison you. There are three kinds of sounds, two kinds of shadows, one gourd for every cracked head, and seven boreholes for those that climb too high. There is an acid in the feel of things. There is a fire which does not burn, but which dissolves the flesh like common salt. The bigger mouth eats the smaller head. The wind blows back to us what we have blown away. There are several ways to burn in your own fire. There is a particular sound which indicates trouble is coming. And your thoughts are merely the footsteps of you tramping round the disaster area of your own mind.'

'Thank you,' the tapster said.

The voice left. The tapster fell asleep.

When he woke up he saw the three turtles lazing again at the edge of the borehole. The turtle with Tabasco's face had on a pair of horn-rimmed glasses and a stethoscope round his neck. The turtles broke a kola nut, divided it amongst themselves, and discussed gravely like scholars without a text. The multi-coloured snake came out of the borehole and made for the river. It paused when it neared the turtles. The tapster was fascinated by its opal eyes.

'There are six moons tonight,' said the turtle with Tabasco's face.

'Yes, there are six moons tonight,' agreed the other turtles.

The snake, lifting up its head, its eyes glittering at the firmament, said:

'There are seven moons tonight.'

The turtles were silent. The snake moved on towards the river. The turtle with Tabasco's face picked up a little rock and threw it at the snake. The other turtles laughed.

'There are no snakes tonight,' said the turtle with Tabasco's face.

As if it were a cue, the other turtles set upon the snake. Tabasco the turtle grabbed it by the neck and began to strangle it with the stethoscope. The other turtles beat its head with rocks. The snake lashed out with its tail. Tabasco and the snake rolled over and fell into the borehole. Noises were heard below. After a while Tabasco the turtle emerged without his glasses and stethoscope. He took up his place amongst the others. They broke another kola nut. Then Tabasco the turtle began to prepare a pipe. Instead of tobacco, he used alligator pepper seeds. He lit the pipe and motioned to the tapster to come closer. The tapster went and sat amongst the turtles on the edge of the borehole. Tabasco the turtle blew black ticklish smoke into the tapster's face and said:

'You have been dead for six days.'

The tapster didn't understand. The turtles gravely resumed their discussions on the numbers of heavenly bodies in the sky.

After some time the smoke had the effect of making the tapster float into a familiar world. A tickling sensation began in his nose. He floated to a moment in his childhood, when his mother carried him on her back on the day of the Masquerades.⁹ It was a hot day. The Masquerades thundered past, bellowing plumes of red smoke everywhere so that ordinary mortals would be confused about their awesome ritual aspects. All through that day his nose was on fire. And that night he dreamt that all sorts of mythical figures competed as to who could keep his nose on his face. He re-lived the dream. The mythical figures included the famous blacksmith, who could turn water into metal; the notorious tortoise, with his simple madness for complex situations; and the witch-doctors,¹ who did not have the key to mysteries. As they competed his mother came along, drove them away by scattering a plate full of ground hot pepper, worsening the problem of his nose.

And while the tapster floated in that familiar world the voice came and bore down on him. Another voice said:

'It's getting too late. Wake up.'

Invisible knocks fell on him. It was the most unusual moment of the sun, when it changed from purple to the darkness of the inward eye. After the knocks had stopped the tapster relieved himself of the mighty sneeze which had been gathering. When he sneezed the monstrous eggs exploded, the snake lost its opal eyes, and the voice fissioned into the sounds of several mosquitoes dying for a conversation. Green liquids spewed out from the borehole and blew away the snake, the signboard, and the turtles. When the tapster recovered from the upheaval he looked around. A blue cloud passed before his eyes. Tabasco the herbalist stood over him waving a crude censer,² from which issued the most irritating smoke. As soon as their eyes met, Tabasco gave a cry of joy and went to pour a libation on the soapstone image of his shrine. The image had two green glass eyes. At the foot of the shrine there were two turtles in a green basin.

'Where am I?' asked the tapster.

'I'm sorry I didn't pay attention to your dream in the first place,' said the herbalist.

'But where am I?'

'You fell from a palm-tree and you have been dead for seven days. We were going to bury you in the morning. I have been trying to reach you all this time. I won't charge you for my services; in fact I'd rather pay you, because all these years as a herbalist I have never had a more interesting case, nor a better conversation.'

1988

Endnotes

- Note 1: Someone who taps palm trees for the sap inside to be fermented into an alcoholic beverage.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: West African spice.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Fruit of the kola tree, native to west Africa.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Discharge from a wound.Return to reference 4

- Note 5: A narrow hole in the ground, like those made to find oil.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A type of gourd.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: A flower native to southern Africa with medicinal properties.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Supernatural creatures drawn from Yoruba mythology; the word was coined by Wole Soyinka in his 1968 translation of the Yoruba-language novel The Forest of a Thousand Daemons —A Hunter's Saga by D. O. Fagunwa.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Beings that bridge the human and spirit world. Masked dancers embody these spirits. Masquerades are thought to appear at traditional celebrations, festivals, and funerals, and are evidence of Indigenous religious practices, which colonial officials tried to suppress.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: A type of healer treating illnesses caused by witchcraft, and not witches themselves. "Famous blacksmith": possibly Ogun, the Yoruba god of blacksmithing and metalwork. "Notorious tortoise": possibly Mbeku or Ijapa, both trickster figures in Yoruba folktales.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: A container for burning incense.Return to reference 2

ARUNDHATI ROY

Arundhati Roy was born in northern India in 1961. Her father was a tea plantation manager, and her mother, a native of the southern state of Kerala, worked on behalf of women's rights. While Roy was still a child, her parents divorced and she moved with her mother to Kerala, where she lived until the age of sixteen and would set her Booker Prize-winning novel The God of Small Things (1997). Kerala is renowned for its biodiverse backwaters, a network of rivers, lakes, and wetlands that brings fresh water into contact with salt water from the Arabian Sea. In the 1980s, the state identified tourism as a growth industry and launched a successful campaign to brand the backwaters region "God's Own Country."

In the excerpt from The God of Small Things included here, the novel's protagonist, Rahel, returns to her hometown of Ayemenem in the wake of the tourism boom to witness its transformation from a small fishing village to an environmental attraction dominated by the luxurious "Heritage" hotel. While the new Ayemenem may draw numerous visitors, the narrative calls attention to the costly effects of industrialized tourism and agriculture upon the environment and upon the livelihoods of local artists. The juxtaposition of Rahel's childhood memories with the present day also invites readers to consider the relationship between Kerala's colonial past under British rule and its present state of economic dependence on international visitors and global hotel conglomerates. Roy's storytelling relies on the beauty and power of physical description, which she uses to connect the most vulnerable members of the human and nonhuman world to the larger social and economic forces threatening their existence. This hallmark of her style is on vivid display in The God of Small Things, The Ministry of Utmost Happiness (2017), and her prolific nonfiction on behalf of environmental justice causes.

From The God of Small Things

God's Own Country¹

Years later, when Rahel returned to the river, it greeted her with a ghastly skull's smile, with holes where teeth had been, and a limp hand raised from a hospital bed.

Both things had happened.

It had shrunk. And she had grown.

Downriver, a saltwater barrage had been built, in exchange for votes from the influential paddy-farmer² lobby. The barrage regulated the inflow of salt water from the backwaters that opened into the Arabian Sea. So now they had two harvests a year instead of one. More rice, for the price of a river.

Despite the fact that it was June, and raining, the river was no more than a swollen drain now. A thin ribbon of thick water that lapped wearily at the mud banks on either side, sequined with the occasional silver slant of a dead fish. It was choked with a succulent weed,³ whose furred brown roots waved like thin tentacles underwater. Bronze-winged lily-trotters walked across it. Splay-footed, cautious.

Once it had had the power to evoke fear. To change lives. But now its teeth were drawn, its spirit spent. It was just a slow, sludging green ribbon lawn that ferried fetid garbage to the sea. Bright plastic bags blew across its viscous, weedy surface like subtropical flying-flowers.

The stone steps that had once led bathers right down to the water, and Fisher People to the fish, were entirely exposed and led from nowhere to nowhere, like an absurd corbelled⁴ monument that commemorated nothing. Ferns pushed through the cracks.

On the other side of the river, the steep mud banks changed abruptly into low mud walls of shanty hutments.⁵ Children hung their bottoms over the edge and defecated directly onto the squelchy, sucking mud of the exposed riverbed. The smaller ones left their dribbling mustard streaks to find their own way down. Eventually, by evening, the river would rouse itself to accept the day's offerings and sludge off to the sea, leaving wavy lines of thick white scum in its wake. Upstream, clean mothers washed clothes and pots in unadulterated factory effluents. People bathed. Severed torsos soaping themselves, arranged like dark busts on a thin, rocking, ribbon lawn.

On warm days the smell of shit lifted off the river and hovered over Ayemenem like a hat.

Further inland, and still across, a five-star hotel chain had bought the Heart of Darkness.⁶

The History House (where map-breath'd ancestors with tough toe-nails once whispered) could no longer be approached from the river. It had turned its back on Ayemenem.⁷ The hotel guests were ferried across the backwaters, straight from Cochin.⁸ They arrived by speedboat, opening up a V of foam on the water, leaving behind a rainbow film of gasoline.

The view from the hotel was beautiful, but here too the water was thick and toxic. No Swimming signs had been put up in stylish calligraphy. They had built a tall wall to screen off the slum and prevent it from encroaching on Kari Saipu's estate. There wasn't much they could do about the smell.

But they had a swimming pool for swimming. And fresh tandoori pomfret and crêpe suzette⁹ on their menu.

The trees were still green, the sky still blue, which counted for something. So they went ahead and plugged their smelly paradise—God's Own Country they called it in their brochures—because they knew, those clever Hotel People, that smelliness, like other peoples' poverty, was merely a matter of getting used to. A question of discipline. Of Rigor and Air-conditioning. Nothing more.

Kari Saipu's house had been renovated and painted. It had become the centerpiece of an elaborate complex, crisscrossed with artificial canals and connecting bridges. Small boats bobbed in the water. The old colonial bungalow with its deep verandah and Doric columns,¹ was surrounded by smaller, older, wooden houses—ancestral homes—that the hotel chain had bought from old families and transplanted in the Heart of Darkness. Toy Histories for rich tourists to play in. Like the sheaves of rice in Joseph's dream, like a press of eager natives petitioning an English magistrate, the old houses had been arranged around the History House in attitudes of deference. "Heritage," the hotel was called.

The Hotel People liked to tell their guests that the oldest of the wooden houses, with its airtight, paneled storeroom which could hold enough rice to feed an army for a year, had been the ancestral home of Comrade E. M. S. Namboodiripad, "Kerala's Mao Tse-tung,"² they explained to the uninitiated. The furniture and knick-knacks that came with the house were on display. A reed umbrella, a wicker couch. A wooden dowry box. They were labeled with edifying placards that said Traditional Kerala Umbrella and Traditional Bridal Dowry-box.

So there it was then, History and Literature enlisted by commerce. Kurtz and Karl Marx³ joining palms to greet rich guests as they stepped off the boat.

Comrade Namboodiripad's house functioned as the hotel's dining room, where semi-suntanned tourists in bathing suits sipped tender coconut water (served in the shell), and old Communists, who now worked as fawning bearers in colorful ethnic clothes, stooped slightly behind their trays of drinks.

In the evenings (for that Regional Flavor) the tourists were treated to truncated kathakali⁴ performances ("Small attention spans," the Hotel People explained to the dancers). So ancient stories were collapsed and amputated. Six-hour classics were slashed to twenty-minute cameos.

The performances were staged by the swimming pool. While the drummers drummed and the dancers danced, hotel guests frolicked with their children in the water. While Kunti revealed her secret to Karna on the riverbank,⁵ courting couples rubbed suntan oil on each other. While fathers played sublimated sexual games with their nubile teenaged daughters, Poothana suckled young Krishna at her poisoned breast.⁶ Bhima disemboweled Dushasana and bathed Draupadi's hair in his blood.⁷

The back verandah of the History House (where a posse of Touchable policemen converged, where an inflatable goose was burst) had been enclosed and converted into the airy hotel kitchen. Nothing worse than kebabs and caramel custard happened there now. The Terror was past. Overcome by the smell of food. Silenced by the humming of cooks. The cheerful chop-chop-chopping of ginger and garlic. The disemboweling of lesser mammals—pigs, goats. The dicing of meat. The scaling of fish.

Something lay buried in the ground. Under grass. Under twenty-three years of June rain.

A small forgotten thing.

Nothing that the world would miss.

A child's plastic wristwatch with the time painted on it.

Ten to two, it said.

A band of children followed Rahel on her walk.

"Hello hippie," they said, twenty-five years too late.

"What is your name?"

Then someone threw a small stone at her, and her childhood fled, flailing its thin arms.

* * *

1997

Endnotes

- Note 1: Tourism slogan for Kerala, a state in southern India famous for its backwaters and beaches. Return to reference 1

- Note 2: Rice farmers. "Barrage": a type of dam that can be opened and closed to control water flow.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Type of fleshy plant.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: An architectural technique to carry weight made by jutting material, like a bracket.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: A collection of huts.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A reference to the 1899 novella by Joseph Conrad (see p. 67 in this volume).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Village in Kerala, India.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: City in Kerala, India.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: A French dessert crêpe served with an orange zest and liqueur sauce. "Tandoori pomfret": a fish dish.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Grecian style of plain, unadorned columns.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Chinese revolutionary leader (1893–1976) and founder of the People's Republic of China (a Communist state).
"Comrade E. M. S. Namboodiripad": Indian politician who belonged to the Communist Party.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: German philosopher and author of The Communist Manifesto. "Kurtz": reference to a major character in Joseph Conrad's Heart of Darkness. He descends into corruption and madness while living in Congo and is a symbol of the moral failure of the imperial project.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Type of classical Indian dance.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: In the Hindu epic Mahabharata, Kunti gives birth to Karna out of wedlock and abandons him in a basket on the Ganges. Karna later finds that he is fighting against his half-siblings when he meets his mother later in life.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: In Hindu legend, Poothana, sent to kill the god Krishna, attempts to do so by breastfeeding him poisoned milk.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Also a tale of the Mahabharata. Dushasana is a villain who attempts to humiliate the noblewoman Draupadi by removing her sari, and Bhima avenges her by slaying

Dushasana.Return to reference 7

AMITAV GHOSH

Amitav Ghosh was born in 1956 in Calcutta in the state of West Bengal in India. He studied at the Doon School and Delhi University and went on to receive a doctorate in social anthropology from Oxford. Ghosh is equally renowned for his novels and nonfiction, both of which blend meticulous historical research and ethnographic accounts with complex plotlines and fully realized characters. Ghosh's early novels, including The Shadow Lines (1988), The Calcutta Chromosome (1995), and The Hungry Tide (2004), establish his preoccupation with memory, cross-cultural encounters, and the effects of humanmade borders on the conception of more than human homelands. Scientists feature prominently in the latter two novels as Ghosh derives literary conflict from the intermingling of their professional expertise with diverse forms of cultural knowledge and belief. Ghosh's interests in cosmopolitanism and environmentalism are on full display in the Ibis trilogy, which contains Sea of Poppies (2008), River of Smoke (2011), and Flood of Fire (2015). Set in the 1830s in the Indian Ocean region and centered on a trading ship called the Ibis, these novels feature a diverse multilingual ensemble of migrant characters whose fates intersect in the lead-up to the Opium Wars between Britain and China.

The Ibis trilogy reveals in fictional form the impact of industrial development, free trade, and resource wars on the nineteenth-century world order. The Great Derangement (2016), an excerpt from which is included here, offers in nonfictional form an account of the representational challenges that climate change poses to twenty-first-century writers of literature. Ghosh provocatively argues that the dominant conventions shaping literary fiction over the past two centuries have rendered climate change invisible or outlandish. Spectacular and apocalyptic natural disasters have been the province of science fiction, a genre historically regarded as less respectable or “serious” than literary realism and modernism. In turn, the cumulatively destructive effects of carbon emissions have been missing from canonical literary representations of everyday life. Ghosh calls upon writers to treat climate change as not only a problem of physical changes to Earth systems, but also a problem of perception that demands new strategies of literary representation.

From The Great Derangement

1

Who can forget those moments when something that seems inanimate turns out to be vitally, even dangerously alive? As, for example, when an arabesque¹ in the pattern of a carpet is revealed to be a dog's tail, which, if stepped upon, could lead to a nipped ankle? Or when we reach for an innocent looking vine and find it to be a worm or a snake? When a harmlessly drifting log turns out to be a crocodile?

It was a shock of this kind, I imagine, that the makers of *The Empire Strikes Back*² had in mind when they conceived of the scene in which Han Solo lands the Millennium Falcon on what he takes to be an asteroid—but only to discover that he has entered the gullet of a sleeping space monster.

To recall that memorable scene now, more than thirty-five years after the making of the film, is to recognize its impossibility. For if ever there were a Han Solo, in the near or distant future, his assumptions about interplanetary objects are certain to be very different from those that prevailed in California at the time when the film was made. The humans of the future will surely understand, knowing what they presumably will know about the history of their forebears on Earth, that only in one, very brief era, lasting less than three centuries, did a significant number of their kind believe that planets and asteroids are inert.

2

My ancestors were ecological refugees³ long before the term was invented.

They were from what is now Bangladesh,⁴ and their village was on the shore of the Padma River, one of the mightiest waterways in the land. The story, as my father told it, was this: one day in the mid-1850s the great river suddenly changed course, drowning the village; only a few of the inhabitants had managed to escape to higher ground. It was this catastrophe that had unmoored our forebears; in its wake they began to move westward and did not stop until the year 1856, when they settled once again on the banks of a river, the Ganges, in Bihar.⁵

I first heard this story on a nostalgic family trip, as we were journeying down the Padma River in a steamboat. I was a child then, and as I looked into those swirling waters I imagined a great storm, with coconut palms bending over backward until their fronds lashed the ground; I envisioned women and children racing through howling winds as the waters rose behind them. I thought of my ancestors sitting huddled on an outcrop, looking on as their dwellings were washed away.

To this day, when I think of the circumstances that have shaped my life, I remember the elemental force that untethered my ancestors from their homeland and launched them on the series of journeys that preceded, and made possible, my own travels. When I look into my past the river seems to meet my eyes, staring back, as if to ask, Do you recognize me, wherever you are?

Recognition is famously a passage from ignorance to knowledge. To recognize, then, is not the same as an initial introduction. Nor does recognition require an exchange of words: more often than not we recognize mutely. And to recognize is by no means to understand that which meets the eye; comprehension need play no part in a moment of recognition.

The most important element of the word recognition thus lies in its first syllable, which harks back to something prior, an already existing awareness that makes possible the passage from ignorance to knowledge: a moment of recognition occurs when a prior awareness flashes before us, effecting an instant change in our understanding of that which is beheld. Yet this flash cannot appear spontaneously; it cannot disclose itself except in the presence of its lost other. The knowledge that results from recognition, then, is not of the same kind as the discovery of something new: it arises rather from a renewed reckoning with a potentiality that lies within oneself.

This, I imagine, was what my forebears experienced on that day when the river rose up to claim their village: they awoke to the recognition of a presence that had molded their lives to the point where they had come to take it as much for granted as the air they breathed. But, of course, the air too can come to life with sudden and deadly violence—as it did in the Congo in 1988, when a great cloud of carbon dioxide burst forth from Lake Nyos⁶ and rolled into the surrounding villages, killing 1,700 people and an untold number of animals. But more often it does so with a quiet insistence—as the inhabitants of New Delhi and Beijing⁷ know all too well—when inflamed lungs and sinuses prove once again that there is no difference between the without and the within; between using and being used. These too are moments of recognition, in which it dawns on us that the energy that surrounds us, flowing under our feet and through wires in our walls, animating our vehicles and illuminating our rooms, is an all-encompassing presence that may have its own purposes about which we know nothing.

It was in this way that I too became aware of the urgent proximity of nonhuman presences, through instances of recognition that were forced upon me by my surroundings. I happened then to be writing about the Sundarbans, the great mangrove forest of the Bengal Delta,⁸ where the flow of water and silt is such that geological processes that usually unfold in deep time appear to occur at a speed where they can be followed from week to week and month to month. Overnight a stretch of riverbank will disappear, sometimes taking houses and people with it; but elsewhere a shallow mud bank will arise and within weeks the shore will have broadened by several feet. For the most part, these processes are of course cyclical. But even back then, in the first years of the twenty-first century, portents of accumulative and irreversible change could also be seen, in receding shorelines and a steady intrusion of salt water on lands that had previously been cultivated.

This is a landscape so dynamic that its very changeability leads to innumerable moments of recognition. I captured some of these in my notes from that time, as, for example, in these lines, written in May 2002: "I do believe it to be true that the land here is demonstrably alive; that it does not exist solely, or even incidentally, as a stage for the enactment of human history; that it is [itself] a protagonist." Elsewhere, in another note, I wrote, "Here even a child will begin a story about his grandmother with the words: 'in those days the river wasn't here and the village was not where it is . . .'"

Yet, I would not be able to speak of these encounters as instances of recognition if some prior awareness of what I was witnessing had not already been implanted in me, perhaps by childhood experiences, like that of going to look for my family's ancestral village; or by memories like that of a cyclone, in Dhaka,⁹ when a small fishpond, behind our walls, suddenly turned into a lake and came rushing into our house; or by my grandmother's stories of growing up beside a mighty river; or simply by the insistence with which the landscape of Bengal forces itself on the artists, writers, and filmmakers of the region.

But when it came to translating these perceptions into the medium of my imaginative life—into fiction, that is—I found myself confronting challenges of a wholly different order from those that I had dealt with in my earlier work. Back then, those challenges seemed to be particular to the book I was then writing, The Hungry Tide,¹ but now, many years later, at a moment when the accelerating impacts of global warming have begun to threaten the very existence of low-lying areas like the Sundarbans, it seems to me that those problems have far wider implications. I have come to recognize that the challenges that climate change poses for the contemporary writer, although specific in some respects, are also products of something broader and older; that they derive ultimately from the grid of literary forms and conventions that came to shape the narrative imagination in precisely that period when the accumulation of carbon in the atmosphere was rewriting the destiny of the Earth.

3

That climate change casts a much smaller shadow within the landscape of literary fiction than it does even in the public arena is not hard to establish. To see that this is so, we need only glance through the pages of a few highly regarded literary journals and book reviews, for example, the London Review of Books, the New York Review of Books, the Los Angeles Review of Books, the Literary Journal, and the New York Times Review of Books. When the subject of climate change occurs in these publications, it is almost always in relation to nonfiction; novels and short stories are very rarely to be glimpsed within this horizon. Indeed, it could even be said that fiction that deals with climate change is almost by definition not of the kind that is taken seriously by serious literary journals: the mere mention of the subject is often enough to relegate a novel or a short story to the genre of science fiction. It is as though in the literary imagination climate change were somehow akin to extraterrestrials or interplanetary travel.

There is something confounding about this peculiar feedback loop. It is very difficult, surely, to imagine a conception of seriousness that is blind to potentially life-changing threats. And if the urgency of a subject were indeed a criterion of its seriousness, then, considering what climate change actually portends for the future of the Earth, it should surely follow that this would be the principal preoccupation of writers the world over—and this, I think, is very far from being the case.

But why? Are the currents of global warming too wild to be navigated in the accustomed barques of narration? But the truth, as is now widely acknowledged, is that we have entered a time when the wild has become the norm: if certain literary forms are unable to negotiate these torrents, then they will have failed—and their failures will have to be counted as an aspect of the broader imaginative and cultural failure that lies at the heart of the climate crisis.

Clearly the problem does not arise out of a lack of information: there are surely very few writers today who are oblivious to the current disturbances in climate systems the world over. Yet, it is a striking fact that when novelists do choose to write about climate change it is almost always outside of fiction. A case in point is the work of Arundhati Roy:² not only is she one of the finest prose stylists of our time, she is passionate and deeply informed about climate change. Yet all her writings on these subjects are in various forms of nonfiction.

Or consider the even more striking case of Paul Kingsnorth,³ author of The Wake, a much-admired historical novel set in eleventh-century England. Kingsnorth dedicated several years of his life to climate change activism before founding the influential Dark Mountain Project, “a network of writers, artists and thinkers who have stopped believing the stories our civilization tells itself.” Although Kingsnorth has written a powerful nonfiction account of global resistance movements, as of the time of writing he has yet to publish a novel in which climate change plays a major part.

I too have been preoccupied with climate change for a long time, but it is true of my own work as well, that this subject figures only obliquely in my fiction. In thinking about the mismatch between my personal concerns and the content of my published work, I have come to be convinced that the discrepancy is not the result of personal predilections: it arises out of the peculiar forms of resistance that climate change presents to what is now regarded as serious fiction.

4

In his seminal essay “The Climate of History,” Dipesh Chakrabarty⁴ observes that historians will have to revise many of their fundamental assumptions and procedures in this era of the Anthropocene, in which “humans have become geological agents, changing the most basic physical processes of the earth.” I would go further and add that the Anthropocene presents a challenge not only to the arts and humanities, but also to our commonsense understandings and beyond that to contemporary culture in general.

There can be no doubt, of course, that this challenge arises in part from the complexities of the technical language that serves as our primary window on climate change. But neither can there be any doubt that the challenge derives also from the practices and assumptions that guide the arts and humanities. To identify how this happens is, I think, a task of the utmost urgency: it may well be the key to understanding why contemporary culture finds it so hard to deal with climate change. Indeed, this is perhaps the most important question ever to confront culture in the broadest sense—for let us make no mistake: the climate crisis is also a crisis of culture, and thus of the imagination.

Culture generates desires—for vehicles and appliances, for certain kinds of gardens and dwellings—that are among the principal drivers of the carbon economy. A speedy convertible excites us neither because of any love for metal and chrome, nor because of an abstract understanding of its engineering. It excites us because it evokes an image of a road arrowing through a pristine landscape; we think of freedom and the wind in our hair; we envision James Dean and Peter Fonda⁵ racing toward the horizon; we think also of Jack Kerouac and Vladimir Nabokov.⁶ When we see an advertisement that links a picture of a tropical island to the word paradise, the longings that are kindled in us have a chain of transmission that stretches back to Daniel Defoe and Jean-Jacques Rousseau:⁷ the flight that will transport us to the island is merely an ember in that fire. When we see a green lawn that has been watered with desalinated water, in Abu Dhabi⁸ or Southern California or some other environment where people had once been content to spend their water thriftily in nurturing a single vine or shrub, we are looking at an expression of a yearning that may have been midwived by the novels of Jane Austen.⁹ The artifacts and commodities that are conjured up by these desires are, in a sense, at once expressions and concealments of the cultural matrix that brought them into being.

This culture is, of course, intimately linked with the wider histories of imperialism and capitalism that have shaped the world.

But to know this is still to know very little about the specific ways in which the matrix interacts with different modes of cultural activity: poetry, art, architecture, theater, prose fiction, and so on.

Throughout history these branches of culture have responded to war, ecological calamity, and crises of many sorts: why, then, should climate change prove so peculiarly resistant to their practices?

From this perspective, the questions that confront writers and artists today are not just those of the politics of the carbon economy; many of them have to do also with our own practices and the ways in which they make us complicit in the concealments of the broader culture. For instance: if contemporary trends in architecture, even in this period of accelerating carbon emissions, favor shiny, glass-and-metal-plated towers, do we not have to ask, What are the patterns of desire that are fed by these gestures? If I, as a novelist, choose to use brand names as elements in the depiction of character, do I not need to ask myself about the degree to which this makes me complicit in the manipulations of the marketplace?

In the same spirit, I think it also needs to be asked, What is it about climate change that the mention of it should lead to banishment from the preserves of serious fiction? And what does this tell us about culture writ large and its patterns of evasion?

In a substantially altered world, when sea-level rise has swallowed the Sundarbans and made cities like Kolkata, New York, and Bangkok¹ uninhabitable, when readers and museumgoers turn to the art and literature of our time, will they not look, first and most urgently, for traces and portents of the altered world of their inheritance? And when they fail to find them, what should they—what can they—do other than to conclude that ours was a time when most forms of art and literature were drawn into the modes of concealment that prevented people from recognizing the realities of their plight? Quite possibly, then, this era, which so congratulates itself on its self-awareness, will come to be known as the time of the Great Derangement.

Endnotes

- Note 1: Type of decoration or ornamental pattern characterized by intricate lines and patterns.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The fifth episode of the Star Wars film franchise (1980).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: People who must leave their homes due to the effects of climate change.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Country in South Asia.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: State in eastern India.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Lake in the African country Cameroon. "Congo": country in Central Africa.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Capital of China. "New Delhi": capital of India.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: World's largest river delta, where the Brahmaputra and Ganges Rivers, among others, drain into the Bay of Bengal.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Capital of Bangladesh.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Published 2004.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Indian author also in this section (b. 1961).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: English author (b. 1972).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Indian historian (b. 1948).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: American actors. Fonda (1940–2019) starred in Easy Rider (1969), considered a quintessential American road film. Dean (1931–1955) starred in films including Rebel Without a Cause (1955) and also raced cars.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Russian American novelist (1899–1977), author of Lolita (1955), in part a foreigner's story of traveling across the United States. "Jack Kerouac": American novelist (1922–1969), author of On the Road (1957).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: French philosopher and writer (1712–1778). "Daniel Defoe": English writer (1660–1731).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Capital of the United Arab Emirates.Return to reference 8

- Note 9: English novelist (1775–1817).Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Capital of Thailand. “Kolkata”: city in India.Return to reference 1

ROBERT MACFARLANE

Born in 1976 in the village of Halam, Nottinghamshire, in England, Robert Macfarlane studied at the University of Cambridge, where he now teaches. Macfarlane is a distinguished nature writer whose nonfiction blends literary allusion, essayistic meditations, and novelistic plotlines in which individuals, like characters, experience revelations through their encounters with places. His early books, Mountains of the Mind (2003) and The Wild Places (2007), engage and challenge traditions of nature writing that align mountains with majesty and wilderness with empty spaces devoid of human intervention. Macfarlane approaches wildness as a “state of mind” rather than a feature of the land. His commitment to restoring human history and psychology to sites of geological and ecological wonder characterizes the skepticism of contemporary nature writing toward pristine notions of “Nature” with a capital N.

In his award-winning Underland (2019), Macfarlane uses the mythic motif of the underworld to connect the depths beneath the Earth’s surface to the limits of human imagination and fortitude in the face of irreversible changes to the climate. Traversing caves beneath the Mendip Hills in England, underground nuclear waste facilities in New Mexico, and tunnels beneath the melting ice caps of Greenland, Macfarlane contemplates the paradox of human agency in the face of geological time. On the one hand, human beings have irrevocably changed the Earth’s atmosphere and will leave the signature of our species in the strata of the Earth. On the other hand, humans are merely a blip in the deep time of our planet whose rock formations inscribe billions of years. In the excerpt included here, Macfarlane goes beneath Epping Forest in the northeast of London to explore the symbiotic networks between trees and fungus. Turning from megaflora to mushrooms draws human attention to the aesthetically unremarkable forms of life that enable our existence. Macfarlane takes the urban forest as a site of contradictions that leads its visitors to reappraise their own notions of preservation and extinction.

From UNDERLAND

The Understorey

(Epping Forest, London)¹

Occasionally—once or twice in a lifetime if you are lucky—you encounter an idea so powerful in its implications that it unsettles the ground you walk on.

The first time I heard anyone speak of the ‘wood wide web,’ more than a decade ago now, I was trying not to cry. A beloved friend was dying too young and too quickly. I had gone to see him for what I took to be the last time. He was tired by pain and drugs. We sat together, talked. My friend was a woodsman. Trees grew through his life and thought. His grandfather’s surname was Wood, he lived in a timber-framed house that he had built himself, and he had planted thousands of trees by hand over the years. ‘I have sap in my veins,’ he wrote once.

That day I read aloud a poem that was important to us both, ‘Birches’ by Robert Frost,² in which climbing the snow-white trunks of birches becomes both a readying for death and a declaration of life. Then he told me about new research he had recently read concerning the interrelations of trees: how, when one of their number was sickening or under stress, they could share nutrients by means of an underground system that conjoined their roots beneath the soil, thereby sometimes nursing the sick tree back to health. It was a measure of my friend’s generosity of spirit that—so close to death himself—he could speak unjealously of this phenomenon of healing.

He did not have the strength then to tell me the details of how this below-ground sharing operated—how tree might invisibly reach out to tree within the soil. But I could not forget the image of that mysterious buried network, joining single trees into forest communities. It was planted in my mind, and there took root. Over the years I would encounter other mentions of the same extraordinary idea, and gradually these isolated fragments began to connect together into something like understanding.

* * *

Merlin Sheldrake, as the oldest joke in mycology goes, is a fun guy to be around. During the days in which he conjures open the underland of Epping Forest for me, I ask more questions than I have of anyone for what feels like years. What he tells and shows me in that modest peri-urban forest reshapes my sense of the world in ways I am still processing.

* * *

'My childhood superheroes weren't Marvel characters,'³ Merlin once said to me, 'they were lichens and fungi. Fungi and lichen annihilate our categories of gender. They reshape our ideas of community and cooperation. They screw up our hereditary model of evolutionary descent. They utterly liquidate our notions of time. Lichens can crumble rocks into dust with terrifying acids. Fungi can exude massively powerful enzymes outside their bodies that dissolve soil. They're the biggest organisms in the world and among the oldest. They're world-makers and world-breakers. What's more superhero than that?'

Merlin and I set off on foot into Epping Forest one morning from a high clearing, heading roughly north, keeping the sun to the right of our line.

Epping extends to the north-east of London, and it is very far from a wildwood. It was first designated as a royal hunting forest in the twelfth century by Henry II,⁴ with penalties for poaching that included imprisonment and mutilation. Presently it is managed by the City of London Corporation, and has more than fifty bye-laws governing behaviour within its bounds—though the punishments are now fiscal rather than corporal. It is fully contained within the M25, the orbital motorway that encircles outer London. Minor roads traverse it, and it is never more than two and a half miles wide. Despite its small extent, Epping is easy to get lost in—a forest of forking paths to which, for a thousand years, the people of London and its surrounds have gone for shelter, sex, escape and a relic greenwood magic.

Growl of roads. Whirr of a low-flying bumblebee, stirring the leaf litter with its downdraught. Buzzard overhead, turning, mewing. Old coppice trees left uncut, hydra-headed pollards. A fallen log, thick with moss; small orange fungi sprouting from wet breaks in its grain. Where trees thin out and light falls, hundreds of green beech seedlings are pushing up through the litter, none more than an inch high. Five fallow deer appear between hollies ahead of us, the dapple of leaf-light flicking off the dapple of their flanks as they move through the understorey.

In the language of forestry and forest ecology, the 'understorey' is the name given to the life that exists between the forest floor and the tree canopy: the fungi, mosses, lichens, bushes and saplings that thrive and compete in this mid-zone. Metaphorically, though, the 'understorey' is also the sum of the entangled, ever-growing narratives, histories, ideas and words that interweave to give a wood or forest its diverse life in culture.

'What interests me most,' says Merlin, 'is the understorey's understory.' He points around at the beech, the hornbeam, the chestnut. 'All of these trees and bushes,' he says, 'are connected with one another below ground in ways we not only cannot see, but ways we have scarcely begun to understand.'

* * *

Merlin was taught as an undergraduate by Oliver Rackham,⁵ the legendary botanist whose research transformed our understanding of both the cultural and botanical history of the English landscape.

Working with Rackham, Merlin found himself most intellectually attracted to places where orthodox evolutionary theory felt thinnest—and for him the thinnest places were where mutualisms were at work. Mutualism is a subset of symbiosis in which there exists between organisms a prolonged relationship that is interdependent and reciprocally beneficial.

‘What fascinates me about mutualisms,’ says Merlin, ‘is that one would predict from basic evolutionary theory that they would be massively unstable, and collapse quickly into parasitism. But it turns out that there are very ancient mutualisms, which have remained stable for puzzlingly long times: between the yucca plant and yucca moths, for example, or of course between the bacteria that illuminate the bioluminescent headlamp of the bobtail squid, and the squid itself.’

‘Of course,’ I reply. ‘The ancient glowing-bobtail-squid-and-bacteria mutualism.’

‘The ultimate mutualism, though,’ says Merlin, ‘is between plants and mycorrhizal fungi.’

* * *

Merlin and I have been walking the forest for two hours or so when we reach one of Epping’s great pollard beech groves. Pollarding—the pruning of the upper branches of a tree to promote dense growth—keeps trees alive for longer, indeed can enter them into an almost indefinite fairy-tale time of longevity. Here in the grove, long waving trunks yearn up to the sun. Through their leaves falls a green sub-sea light. It feels as if we are swimming through a kelp forest.

We stop and lie down for a while on the woodland floor, on our backs, not speaking, watching the trees’ gentle movements in the breeze, and the light lacing and lancing from fifty feet or more above us. Where the pollards spread out to form the canopies, I realize I can trace patterns of space running along the edges of each tree’s canopy: the beautiful phenomenon known as ‘crown shyness’, whereby individual forest trees respect each other’s space, leaving slender running gaps between the end of one tree's outermost leaves and the start of another's.

Lying there among the trees, despite a learned wariness towards anthropomorphism, I find it hard not to imagine these arboreal relations in terms of tenderness, generosity and even love: the respectful distance of their shy crowns, the kissing branches that have pleached with one another, the unseen connections forged by root and hyphae between seemingly distant trees. I remember something Louis de Bernières⁶ has written about a relationship that endured into old age: 'we had roots that grew towards each other underground, and when all the pretty blossom had fallen from our branches we found that we were one tree and not two.' As someone lucky to live in a long love, I recognize that gradual growing-towards and subterranean intertwining; the things that do not need to be said between us, the unspoken communication which can sometimes tilt troublingly towards silence, and the sharing of both happiness and pain. I think of good love as something that roots, not rots, over time, and of the hyphae that are weaving through the ground below me, reaching out through the soil in search of mergings. Theirs, too, seems to me then a version of love's work.

Merlin gets up, walks towards the centre of the grove as if looking for something, then bends down and brushes away leaf litter and beech mast,⁷ to clear a patch of soil the size of a saucer. I get up and follow him. He pinches some of the earth and rubs it between his fingers. It smears rather than crumbling: a rich, dark humus,⁸ made of composted leaves.

'This is our problem when it comes to studying the fungal network,' he says. 'Soil is fantastically impenetrable to experiments, and the fungal hyphae are on the whole too thin to see with the naked eye. That's the main reason it's taken us so long to work out the wood wide web's existence, and to discern what it's doing.'

Rivers of sap flow in the trees around us. If we were right now to lay a stethoscope to the bark of a birch or beech, we would hear the sap bubbling and crackling as it moves through the trunk.

'You can put rhizotrons⁹ into the ground to look at root growth,' Merlin says, 'but those don't really give you the fungi because they're too fine. You can do below-ground laser scanning but, again, that's too crude for the fungal networks.'

I am reminded once more of how resistant the underland remains to our usual forms of seeing; how it still hides so much from us, even in our age of hyper-visibility and ultra-scrutiny. Just a few inches of soil is enough to keep startling secrets, hold astonishing cargo: an eighth of the world's total biomass comprises bacteria that live below ground, and a further quarter is of fungal origin.

'We know the network is there,' Merlin says, 'but it's so effortful to track it. So we have to look for clues to the labyrinth—find clever means of following its paths.'

I kneel beside him. I can see dozens of insects just in this small area, the names of most of which I do not know: gleaming spiders and red-bronze beetles battling over the leaves, a woodlouse curled up into a sphere, a green threadworm writhing through the humus.

'It's roiling with life,' I say to Merlin.

'That's just the visible life. Hyphae will be growing into the decomposing matter of this half-rotting leaf,' says Merlin, 'into those rotting logs and those rotting twigs, and then you'll have the mycorrhizal fungi whose hyphae grow into hot spots—all of them frothing and tangling and fusing, making a network that's connecting holly to holly but also to this beech, and to a seedling of something else over there, layering and layering and layering—until, well, it blows your computational brain!'

As Merlin speaks I feel a quick, eerie sense of the world shifting irreversibly around me. Ground shivering beneath feet, knees, skin. If only your mind were a slightly greener thing, we'd drown you in meaning . . . I glance down, try to trance the soil into transparency such that I can see its hidden infrastructure: millions of fungal skeins suspended between tapering tree roots, their prolific liaisons creating a gossamer web at least as intricate as the cables and fibres that hang beneath our cities. What's the haunting phrase I've heard used to describe the realm of fungi? The kingdom of the grey. It speaks of fungi's utter otherness—the challenges they issue to our usual models of time, space and species.

'You look at the network,' says Merlin, 'and then it starts to look back at you.'

* * *

Potawatomi, a Native American language of the Great Plains region, includes the word puhpowee, which might be translated as 'the force which causes mushrooms to push up from the earth overnight'. In 'all its technical vocabulary', Robin Wall Kimmerer notes, 'Western science has no such term, no words to hold this mystery.'

Kimmerer herself is a member of the Citizen Potawatomi Nation. A speaker of what she calls 'fluent botany', she is careful to distinguish this from what she refers to as 'the language of plants'—that is to say, the language that plants speak, as opposed to the language that is used to speak of plants. Kimmerer does not disdain the precisions of botanical lexis,¹ which 'polishes the gift of seeing', but she finds it also to be of necessity a lexis of objectification and distancing, with something missing beneath its finely faceted surface. That missing something is predominantly the acknowledgement of life in the more-than-human world, an indifference which is grained into language not just at the level of individual words, but at the deeper-down levels of grammar and syntax.

In Potawatomi, by contrast, almost all words declare the animacy or inanimacy of that to which they refer. The language is predisposed to recognize life in otherness, and also to extend the reach of that category of 'life' far beyond its familiar limits in Western thought. In Potawatomi, not only humans, animals and trees are alive, but so too are mountains, boulders, winds and fire. Stories, songs and rhythms are all also animate, they are, they be. Potawatomi is a language abundant with verbs: 70 per cent of its words are verbs, compared to 30 per cent in English. Wiikwegamaa, for instance, means 'to be a bay'. 'A bay is a noun only if water is dead,' writes Kimmerer:

trapped between its shores and contained by the word. But the verb . . . releases the water from bondage and lets it live. 'To be a bay' holds the wonder that, for this moment, the living water has decided to shelter itself between these shores, conversing with cedar roots and a flock of baby mergansers.²

Like Kimmerer, I wish for a language that recognizes and advances the animacy of the world, 'the life that pulses through pines and nuthatches and mushrooms . . . well[ing] up all around us'. Like Kimmerer, I relish those aspects of discourse that extend being and sentience respectfully and flexibly beyond the usual bearers of such qualities. Like Kimmerer I believe that we need, now, a 'grammar of animacy'. A modern predisposition to regard animacy as anomaly runs through what the poet Jeremy Prynne³ once called 'mammal language', by which he means the language that is used by humans, encoding intent, agency and muscular power deep in its grammar.

The real underland of language is not the roots of single words, but rather the soil of grammar and syntax, where habits of speech and therefore also habits of thought settle and interact over long periods of time. Grammar and syntax exert powerful influence on the proceedings of language and its users. They shape the ways we relate to each other and to the living world. Words are world-makers—and language is one of the great geological forces of the Anthropocene.

Projects have recently been started around the world to gain even the most basic of vocabularies for the experiences of life and death in the Anthropocene. These stuttering attempts to speak what it is we are doing have generated ugly new terms for an ugly epoch: 'geotraumatics', 'planetary dysphoria', 'apex-guilt'. Such words feel like futile forms of nominalism, a hopelessly hyperactive pointing and naming. They stick in the throat in two ways: they are difficult to utter and hard to swallow.

Only one of these recent coinages resonates with me: 'species loneliness', for the intense solitude that we are fashioning for ourselves as we strip the Earth of the other life with which we share it. If there is human meaning to be made of the wood wide web, it is surely that what might save us as we move forwards into the precarious, unsettled centuries ahead is collaboration: mutualism, symbiosis, the inclusive human work of collective decision-making extended to more-than-human communities.

You look at the network, and then it starts to look back at you ...

Writing of mycorrhizal fungi, Albrecht proposes that we rechristen the Anthropocene, naming it instead the Symbiocene—an epoch characterized in terms of social organization 'by human intelligence that replicates the symbiotic and mutually reinforcing life-reproducing forms and processes found in living systems . . . such as the wood wide web.'

The word for world is forest.

2019

Endnotes

- Note 1: Ancient woodland between London and Essex.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: American poet (1874–1963).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Brand of comics, with superhero characters including Spider-Man, Iron Man, and Captain America.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: King of England (r. 1154–89).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Cambridge historian and ecologist (1939–2015).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: English novelist (b. 1954).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Beech nuts fallen from a beech tree.Return to reference 7

- Note 8: Organic component of soil.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Underground labs made to study soil.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: The vocabulary of a language.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: From Robin Wall Kimmerer, Braiding Sweetgrass: Indigenous Wisdom, Scientific Knowledge, and the Teachings of Plants (Minneapolis: Milkweed, 2013).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: English poet (b. 1936).Return to reference 3

POETRY OF CLIMATE CHANGE

In the twenty-first century, oceans are heating up, ice sheets are shrinking, glaciers are melting, sea levels are rising, biodiversity is falling, and extreme weather is battering the planet. Although environmental awareness can be traced through the Romantics to earlier poets like Spenser and Chaucer, it was not until the twenty-first century that poets began grappling with the consequences of anthropogenic (human-caused) climate change. Their poems take a variety of approaches, but all have forged innovative ways of seeing, responding to, and thinking about the fate of the planet.

Some, such as Simon Armitage's "Ark," are openly elegiac, mourning the loss of diverse species, the degradation of reefs, ice sheets, and snow caps. Others, such as Peter Reading's "Clockwise (from the bottom)," assume a prophetic stance, satirically foretelling devastation. Still others, such as Vahni Capildeo's "Book of Dreams / Livre de Cauchemars," VI, present a dream vision of the future—or nightmare, as the French subtitle has it. In some climate poems, such as Reading's, the perspective is global. In others, such as Capildeo's poem set in the Caribbean, the focus is on the local effects of worldwide warming. Similarly, Seamus Heaney scrutinizes a glacier melting in Iceland, Patience Agbabi overhears rivers flooding in climate-sensitive Nepal, and in "Rainforest in the Sleep Room," Pascale Petit recounts the deforestation and bio-depletion of the Amazon, a human intrusion she figuratively compares to a lobotomy.

Climate change poses difficulties for representing time and space. How can a brief poem convey the long, layered timescale of climatic shift? In the compressed language of "Höfn," Heaney evokes the ages-long processes of glacier formation, followed by rapid, fearful warming. In "ECO₂nomics" Agbabi reflects another temporal complexity of climate change, how seasons become confused, as winter merges with spring. Or as Craig Santos Perez wryly puts it, "It was summer all winter long." Like time, space becomes confused. Recalling a long-haul flight from London to Delhi, Agbabi conflates up with down, air with earth, the plane's movement—the "airbus cuts a tunnel through the air"—with the dangerous flooding caused by emissions from it and other sources. In Armitage's "Ark," widely separated locations seem to merge—Latin America and Antarctica, the hippos of Africa and the public housing estates of Britain.

The human and the natural had long been enmeshed in the pastoral tradition of a sympathetic nature; but an endangered, humanity-degraded nature can provide far less solace or refuge. Rewriting the modern American poet Wallace Stevens in "Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Glacier," Craig Santos Perez affirms, "Humans and animals / are kin. / Humans and animals and glaciers / are kin." But as he and other poets indicate, the refusal to honor this kinship is jeopardizing not only animals and glaciers but also the humans who hold the planet's future in their hands.

SEAMUS HEANEY

A poet of the natural world and of humanity's complex entanglement with it, Seamus Heaney (1939–2013; see the headnote to him earlier in this volume) commented that "environmental issues have to a large extent changed the mind of poetry": "at this stage," he explained, with a reference to the late nineteenth-century poet Gerard Manley Hopkins, "nobody can have an uncomplicated Hopkinsian trust in the self-refreshing powers of nature." If nature once functioned as an uncorrupted alternative space with redemptive powers, it can no longer do so to the extent that it is seen as profoundly shaped by human activities.

In "Höfn" Heaney meditates on an endangered glacier. He wrote the poem after flying in a small propeller plane over Vatnajökull, also known as the Vatna Glacier, the largest ice cap in Iceland and one of the world's largest glaciers, en route from Reykjavik to the fishing town of Höfn. The poem compares the melting glacier to an enormous beast with multiple tongues, a term for glacial extensions into the sea. Human populations now ponder their precarious fate in the face of the melting they have caused. The poem's compounds suggest Old English and Old Norse kennings, words bolted together in an ancient, frozen world that now threatens to come undone as the "Undead" glacier melts. The poem implicitly acknowledges that the airflight that made it possible is complicit in the destruction it witnesses.

Höfn¹

The three-tongued glacier² has begun to melt.
What will we do, they ask, when boulder-milt³
Comes wallowing across the delta flats

5 And the miles-deep shag ice makes its move?
I saw it, ridged and rock-set, from above,
Undead grey-gristed earth-pelt, aeon⁴-scruff,

And feared its coldness that still seemed enough
To iceblock the plane window dimmed with breath,
Deepfreeze the seep of adamantine tilth⁵

10 And every warm, mouthwatering word of mouth.

2006

Endnotes

- Note 1: Town visited by Heaney after flying over Vatnajökull, or the Vatna Glacier, the largest ice cap in Iceland and one of the world's largest glaciers.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: An ice tongue extends from a glacier into the sea.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: According to the Oxford English Dictionary, milt is an obsolete word for rot.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Aeon is a spelling for eon, a major division of geological time. Also, in a variety of religions and philosophies, a word for long lengths of time, life cycles, or eternity.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Soil that's been prepared for planting. "Adamantine": unbreakable.Return to reference 5

PATIENCE AGBABI

Nigerian British poet Agbabi (b. 1965; see the headnote to her later in this volume) has helped renew poetic traditions to grapple with contemporary challenges of race, sexuality, and the environment. In 2007, Lloyd's, a London-based insurance company, co-sponsored and published a series of her and two other writers' poems about climate change—an indication of the public's rising interest in the subject. The punning title of one of her six poems, "ECO₂nomics," signals the entanglement of economics, carbon dioxide, and ecology in climate change. Agbabi abruptly juxtaposes a long-haul flight from London to Delhi with the terrestrial destruction it is helping to cause below. Planes and other humanmade technologies are dramatically affecting the seemingly distant earth's crops, rivers, and seasons. She quotes two villagers cited in an article in The Guardian about the effect of CO₂ emissions on Nepal, a country described as particularly vulnerable to climate change, like many areas of the global South. It has suffered devastating floods that a villager links by simile to a horrifying sound, "like 10,000 lorries." The poem leaps across time and space, emphasizing lines of connections. Even though inhabitants of Nepal have contributed only a small fraction of carbon emissions, in this interlinked, threatened world, they are at far greater risk of suffering its consequences in the near term.

ECO₂nomics

*The average Briton produces 126 times more carbon dioxide than someone living in Nepal.*¹

I read about freak floods in Nepal
as my London-Delhi long-haul airbus cuts a tunnel through the air.

0°C. *It was like a wall of water.*²

5 CO₂, -3, up here it's Winter;
down there, December, Printemps³

is early on the banks of the Seine.
It means that crop yields are going down.

10 The plane—it sounded like 10,000 lorries— makes a constant burr, a snowdrop buries its name, beats its estimated time of arrival.
Then all the land started moving like a river.

10,000 metres above sea level
the plane heaves like a tidal wave.

2007

Endnotes

- Note 1: The info under the title about CO₂ emissions comes after a report in the Guardian, "Nepal's farmers on the front line of global climate change”—John Vidal, Kathmandu, Dec. 2, 2006 [Agbabi's note].Return to reference 1

- Note 2: The italicized quotes in this poem are mostly attributed to Sherbahadur Tamang, a Nepalese villager quoted in the Guardian article mentioned above. One quote, “It means that crop yields are going down,” is attributed to another villager, Tekmadur Majsi. These villagers describe two southern Nepalese villages flooded with increasing frequency and intensityReturn to reference 2
- Note 3: Spring (French).Return to reference 3

PETER READING

Born in Liverpool, Peter Reading (1946–2011) studied painting at the Liverpool College of Art. Working for many years as a weighbridge operator at an animal feedmill in Shropshire, he eventually turned full-time to poetry and over the years published twenty-six collections. His work tends to be mordant, imbued with a recognition of the quotidian's capacity to turn grotesque. "Time's malice castigates / not only me," he writes, but "also fair governments, concepts, zeniths," leading to a bleak conclusion: "all which we valued nears expiry."

In Reading's late volumes, "Time's malice" takes on the special urgency of climate change. "Clockwise (from the bottom)," a poem written after the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change had issued dire predictions in its fourth report, hurtles toward environmental doom, not bothering to stop between title and the first stanza. The prophetic satire envisions the consequences of unchecked fossil-fuel emissions. Each of its forty-one, three-beat lines marks a year in the march toward a projected temperature rise of 4° Celsius. With grim poetic economy, the tightly constructed poem devotes a clipped sentence to each region, starting from the bottom of the globe with "Antarctic / glacial meltdown," and then moving north in a clockwise motion. The poem's thirteen stanzas—one more than the hands of a clock—proceed relentlessly across the barren Americas to the "snow-free Alps" to "Polynesia: sunk." In its final lines, the poem opens a set of parentheses but does not close them, "(all hands, &c., &c . . .)" trailing off into a future better averted, but terrifyingly possible.

Clockwise (from the bottom),^{1}

- 5 4 degrees Celsius up,
40 years on: Antarctic
glacial meltdown, ergo, sea levels risen (albeit most marine life extinct).
- South America: deluge, deglaciation,^{2} desert,
uninhabitable
(by humankind, that is).
- 10 North America: drought, flood, hurricane, desert,
uninhabitable
(by humankind, that is).
- 15 Canada: now warm, fertile (all hands battle to live there).
- Greenland's icesheet thawed.
- 20 Scandinavia/UK/
Russia/Siberia:
ideal growing conditions
(all hands war to get there).
- Southern Europe: desert,
snow-free Alps, dry rivers.
- Middle East: same old testament.
- Asia: Himalayan

25 deglaciation, floods;
Bangladesh abandoned,
ditto South India,
Pakistan &c.

30 Southern China: dried rivers and aquifers³ mean
the region is abandoned,
monsoons erode the earth,
dustbowls only obtain.

35 Polynesia: sunk.

Australia: in the north,
and in Tas.,⁴ 'compact cities'— all hands at war to get there—
the mass is wilderness.

40 New Zealand: densely populous, intensive farming and all that (all hands, &c., &c . . .

2010

Endnotes

- Note 1: This poem proceeds clockwise across the globe, from Antarctica to South America to New Zealand, in forty-one lines, one for each year before the predicted rise of 4 degrees Celsius if emissions were unchecked, in thirteen stanzas, one more than the numbers on a clockface.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: In geology, the retreat or melting of glaciers and ice.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Underground rock that contains groundwater, commonly extracted by a well.Return to reference 3

- Note 4: Shortening of Tasmania, an island state of Australia. Return to reference 4

VAHNI CAPILDEO

Born in Port of Spain, Trinidad, in 1973 and living in the UK since 1991, the Trinidadian Scottish poet Vahni Capildeo attended Oxford University on a Rhodes Scholarship, where they earned a D.Phil. in English on translation theory and Old Norse. They have researched for the Oxford English Dictionary and taught at multiple universities in the UK.

"The Book of Dreams / Livre de Cauchemars," VI, is a poem of shifting, spectatorial perception. Like a dream, the Caribbean world it portrays is nightmarishly changeable, as it undergoes the dire effects of sea level rise. In the poem, the speaker watches as boys from a Trinidadian school play football (soccer) in rising waters near a new hotel, its grounds periodically saturated with sea water. In Capildeo's dry, impersonal description, the match swells into the surreal: "How were they managing it? Their knees were lifting above the / waves." Crisp, vivid similes accumulate, deepening the poem's un/reality and anticipating the coming merger of water, vegetation, animal, and human. Waves follow "one another like one ridged iguana moving from branch to branch," and the players are "thin and whippy like coconut trees." "We were not enjoying watching the boys playing football in the sea," the speaker observes, as the joy of following a game dissolves into the horror of bearing witness to catastrophic inundation: "The Atlantic was going to join the match, and come in to / the hotel afterwards." Can we wake from such a cauchemar, the poem seems to ask, or is this now reality?

From The Book of Dreams / Livre de Cauchemars

VI

Someone had developed the bay since our last visit.

The drive north
was the same as for the more famous bathing-place; only a little further. We parked and began the uncertain walk (what should the feet expect? blown sand over paved path, or deep sand? mud or

5 quicksand? broken bottle or quartz?), to arrive at the tight little curve.

The lines in the sea threw up walls of light, drawing an imaginary
stadium around the bay—an under-resourced stadium whose building contractor had run off with the cash: the walls of light, lined like sea, were like corrugated metal, grey and splashed with rust or the 10 red of rained-on national slogans.

It wasn't a question of us arriving late: the grey and rust, scrub and dust, in a place indubitably holiday destination-ish for the people who lived on the island even more than for the thin-on-the-ground tourists. Up till the previous bend in the road, the day had retained

its colour.

15 The match had not started.
We walked down the steep slope to what was not defined enough to be a beach—more the area belonging to the sea.
The ground was damp-packed, indicating that sometimes but not always it was 20 below water. We turned left, or south-west, and up a smaller slope.
The pleasant, ramshackle new hotel, two and a half storeys high,
overlooking the bay, had an old-fashioned gallery running the length of each floor. Perhaps not belonging to the hotel, there was a not-imaginary slice of stadium, or rather seats in tiered stands and 25 something like a barbecue area, covering the western part of the angle of the small bay. That was new. It looked worn.
The match was starting. We sat on metal folding chairs in the first floor gallery, to watch the boys play football¹ in the sea.
'Eh-eh! But what are you doing here!' It was the drum majorette
30 from the Form II March Past parade—how many years ago? Grown up now, pretty in red, with a frosty can of something in her hand.
Retired headmistresses. Half-remembered prefects.² Everybody's aunt in a flowered hat and coral lipstick, the weight of a picnic

cooler testing the strength of her talcum-thick³ wrist. Somebody's
35 father (but hadn't he died?) trying harder to be friendly since he had betrayed his wife. The boys from the College of the Immaculate Conception,⁴ out of uniform and in red or white cotton T-shirts that burned and cowed over the forbidden meagreness that, shyly and
muskily, was—not their bodies—was also-them.
Other boys from 40 their college were in the sea, all at sea, playing football in the sea.
We were gathered there together to watch the match.
How were they managing it? Their knees were lifting above the waves. Despite the absence of goalposts, and the shifting depth of water, the boys seemed to know where to go. They were playing side-45 on to the waves; side-on to us. The waves came in faster, following one another like one ridged iguana moving from branch to branch.
The boys were thin and whippy like coconut trees, heads ferocious clusters of concentration.
'The match going well!'
50 But a dark cloud was blowing up, between the open sea and the edge of mountain. And the boys would not stop playing. And the wind was blowing up too, chill and bitter and salt, what the Atlantic brings to the tropics and is not 'tropical'. The drops of rain then,

heavy like one cent coins, hitting us like spiteful
alms. And the boys
55 seemed unable to stop playing. And they were kicking the ball up somehow from under greater and greater depth of water, and we remarked their sportsmanship from their elbows, the tops of their torsos, the struggling coconut-heads above the waves, in between the waves. They were in deeper. The sea was nearer. Nearer to us.
60 We were not enjoying watching the boys playing football in the sea.
They were playing the match of their lives.
Under the rimlet of every wave gasping further up on to the damp-
packed ground, the sea brought more darkness.
Then the approximate stadium of the bay began,
most impressively,
65 to acquire a fourth wall.
The Atlantic was going to join the match, and come in to the hotel afterwards.

2014, 2016

Endnotes

- Note 1: Soccer.Return to reference 1

- Note 2: Students charged with authority over younger schoolmates; more generally, chief officers or magistrates.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Talcum is one of the softest minerals.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Secondary school in Trinidad and Tobago.Return to reference 4

CRAIG SANTOS PEREZ

Born in 1980 on the Pacific Island of Guåhan (Guam), Craig Santos Perez has published eco-poetry, essays, criticism, reviews, and academic scholarship. He has also released spoken word albums and has performed his work at poetry festivals and conferences. His poetry is centered on Native Chamorro experience and language, criticizing the ecological ramifications of colonialism, imperialism, and capitalism, as well as gesturing toward what one poem calls a "horizon of care." He teaches literature and creative writing at the University of Hawai'i at Mānoa.

In "Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Glacier," Perez "recycles" American modernist poet Wallace Stevens's influential poem "Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Blackbird." Perez adapts Stevens's cubistic array of perspectives to defamiliarize an image of climate change so ubiquitous and clichéd as to be hard to see. Reversing Stevens's sequence, Perez starts with XIII and wends backward to a beginning that is an end. Perez reflects on the catastrophic threat to glaciers posed by climate change—their dwindling, breaking, rumbling, retreating, calving, and, as the final stanza brings home, melting. Whereas warmth often figures as a life-giving force, here human-derived heat has melted the last of what was "once 200,000 glaciers." Perez's many ways of "looking" also remind us that poetry offers a way of knowing: "I know, too," the speaker in the sixth stanza avers, "that the glacier is involved / in what I know." The glacier is involved in our knowing, and, as Perez's poem poignantly reminds us, our survival is inseparable from its fate: "We are of one ecology," "Humans and animals and glaciers / are kin."

Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Glacier

*recycling Wallace Stevens*¹

XIII

Among starving polar bears,
the only moving thing
was the edge of a glacier.

XII

5 We are of one ecology
like a planet
in which there were once 200,000 glaciers.

XI

The glacier absorbs greenhouse gas.
We are a large part of the biosphere.

X

10 Humans and animals
are kin.
Humans and animals and glaciers
are kin.

IX

We do not know which to fear more,
the terror of change

15 or the terror of uncertainty, the glacier calving
or just after.

VIII

Icebergs fill the vast ocean
with titanic wrecks.
20 The mass of the glacier disappears, to and fro.
The threat
hidden in the crevasse²
an irreversible clause.

VII

25 O vulnerable humans,
why do you engineer sea walls?
Do you not see how the glacier already floods the streets of the cities around you?

VI

30 I know king tides,
and lurid, unprecedented storms;
but I know, too,
that the glacier is involved in what I know.

V

35 When the glacial terminus broke, it marked the beginning of one of many waves.

IV

At the rumble of a glacier
losing its equilibrium,
40 every tourist in the new Arctic chased ice quickly.

III

Shell³ explored the poles
for offshore drilling.
Once, we blocked them,
45 in that we understood the risk of an oil spill to a glacier.

II

The sea is rising.
The glacier must be retreating.

I

50 It was summer all winter.
It was melting
and it was going to melt.
The last glacier fits
in our warm hands.

2016

Endnotes

- Note 1: American poet (1879–1955). Return to reference 1
- Note 2: A deep crack in a glacier or ice sheet. Return to reference 2

- Note 3: Founded in 1907 and one of the largest oil companies in the world.Return to reference 3

PASCALE PETIT

Born in France in 1953, Pascale Petit, a British poet of Indian, Welsh, and French heritage, studied sculpting at the Royal College of Art. In her collections of poetry, she explores questions of gender, embodiment, and the environment. Her collection Mama Amazonica was the inaugural winner of the Laurel Prize for Poetry in 2020, a prize for environmental poetry founded by British poet laureate Simon Armitage to raise awareness of the climate crisis.

A poem in this collection, "Rainforest in the Sleep Room," personifies the Amazon rainforest as a human patient receiving medical care. Like road construction through the rainforest, some medical interventions, though well intended, can be horribly destructive. The poem opens with a shocking image, comparing human intrusion into the Amazon to a lobotomy: "The highway goes through / the Amazon's brain / like an icepick through an eye-socket." More violence accrues through other similes: bulldozers cut through the Amazon's "cortex / like a scalpel." Petit's personifications vividly convey how destruction of the Amazon, a rainforest often anthropomorphized as the lungs of the world, wipes out a sustainable ecology for human and nonhuman animals. As a result of this persistent violence, in the end, "The only animals left / are grainy films / on camera traps." The poem concludes with a "still small voice," one of extinction: "a recording of the last / musician-wren." This voice, the poem concludes, "is like the beginning of the world." We might ask what such a beginning portends, and if it's enough to resist the cruelties to the planet enumerated in Petit's poem.

Rainforest in the Sleep Room

1

The highway goes through the Amazon's¹ brain
like an ice pick through an eye-socket.

5 First we clear her synapses²
then she forgets her animals.

2

Our bulldozers drive through the rainbow boa of her cortex like a scalpel—

10 those sleeping coils still dreaming up new species,

3 hallucinations we've blitzed with ECT.³

The bilateral current purrs
through her frontal lobes
15 like a forest of songbirds electrocuted by rain.

4

20 Afterwards, her thoughts are nestless, except for a few chicks
 up in the last ironwoods,
 patrolled by armed guards.

 Scientists climb ropes
 to monitor her stats,
 bring motherless macaws

25 down to incubators,
 measuring their wings,
 weighing naked souls,

5

 as if she's a patient in the Sleep Room
 who won't wake—

30 her dreams treelines traced by the EEG pen.⁴

6

 The only animals left are grainy films on camera traps

7

35 and a recording of the last musician-wren

 whose still small voice⁵ is like the beginning of the world.

Endnotes

- Note 1: South American river; largest in the world by water volume.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Medical preparation for a frontal lobotomy.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Electroconvulsive therapy, commonly known as “shock therapy.”Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Electroencephalogram (EEG) given by a wireless portable “pen” device to measure brain waves.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: After biblical destruction by earthquake, whirlwind, and fire, Ezekiel hears the “still small voice” of God (1 Kings 19:12).Return to reference 5

SIMON ARMITAGE

The publication in the magazine Scientific American of "Ark" by British poet laureate Simon Armitage (b. 1963; see headnote to him later in this volume), a poem written to commemorate the naming of a new polar research ship, exemplifies how science and literature can come together to address the unprecedented challenge of climate change. To convey the gravity of the situation, Armitage reimagines the biblical story of Noah's Ark for the Anthropocene. Now the flood results not from a divine judgment on human wickedness but from the sea level rise of anthropogenic climate change. Now the dove can bring back not an olive leaf, evidencing the promise of receding waters and dry land, but "a sprig of tinsel snagged in its beak, / a yard of fishing-line binding its feet." Now instead of evincing the hope of renewed life, it has "wings slicked in a rainbow of oil," a catastrophic degradation of the exalted biblical symbol of the Covenant.

Availing himself of the compression of poetry, Armitage shows that global warming has collapsed the distances between spaces on the globe—between Latin America and Antarctica, the African hippo and the British housing estate. To lament the losses of climate change, he echoes a Scottish folk song in lines such as "Bring back, bring back the leaf. / Bring back the reed and the reef." And to mourn species extinction, he deploys alliteration, rhythm, and rhyme: "Bring back the fern, the fish, the frond and the fowl, / the golden toad and the pygmy owl." Intermixing elegiac grief with satire, he mocks the careless littering of the oceans with metallic and plastic junk—"wrappers and bottles and nurdles and cans." Is there still time to reverse the slide toward ruination of the planet? Or will future generations look back on poems like Armitage's and on scientific reports and see warnings that went unheeded?

Ark¹

They sent out a dove:² it wobbled home, wings slicked in a rainbow³ of oil,
a sprig of tinsel snagged in its beak,
a yard of fishing-line binding its feet.

5 *Bring back, bring back the leaf.*⁴

They sent out an arctic fox:
it plodded the bays
of the northern fringe
in muddy socks
and a nylon cape.

10 Bring back, bring back the leaf.
 Bring back the reed and the reef,
 *set the ice sheet back on its frozen plinth,*⁵ tuck the restless watercourse⁶ into its bed, sit the glacier down on its highland throne,
15 put the snow cap back on the mountain peak.

Let the northern lights be the northern lights
*not the alien glow over Glasgow or Leeds.*⁷

A camel capsized in a tropical flood.
Caimans⁸ dozed in Antarctic lakes.
20 Polymers rolled in the sturgeon's⁹ blood.
 Hippos wandered the housing estates.

Bring back, bring back the leaf.
Bring back the tusk and the horn
unshorn.

25 Bring back the fern, the fish, the frond and the fowl,
 the golden toad and the pygmy owl, revisit the scene
 where swallowtails fly
30 through acres of unexhausted sky.

 They sent out a boat.
 Go little breaker,
 splinter the pack-ice and floes, nose
 through the rafts and pads
35 of wrappers and bottles and nurdles¹ and cans, the bergs and atolls and islands and states of plastic bags and micro-beads and the forests of smoke.

Bring back, bring back the leaf,
40 bring back the river and sea.

2020

Endnotes

- Note 1: In the biblical story of Noah's Ark, God directs Noah to build an ark and bring his family as well as one male and female animal of each species to safety. The humans and animals on the ark would repopulate the world in the wake of the great flood.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Noah releases a dove after the flood to find land. When the dove returns with an olive branch in its mouth, it becomes a symbol of hope.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Symbol of the covenant God makes with all living creatures to never flood the Earth again.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Variation on the refrain of the Scottish folk tune "My Bonnie Lies over the Ocean." The refrain is "Bring back, bring back, O bring back my Bonnie to me."Return to reference 4

- Note 5: A solid base, usually for a statue or column.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A channel where water flows.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: City in England. "Glasgow": city in Scotland.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: A reptile closely related to the alligator.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: A type of fish. "Polymers": natural or synthetic materials characterized by large, repeating molecular structures. Many plastics are polymers.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: A small pellet of plastic, or a microplastic.Return to reference 1

MARGARET ATWOOD

b. 1939

Margaret Atwood was born in Ottawa, Canada, into a family with roots in Nova Scotia, but when she was seven her family moved to Toronto. She did not receive formal schooling until she was eleven, because her family spent a large part of every year in the northern wildernesses of Quebec and Ontario. There, her father, a forest entomologist, pursued his research on insects, while she immersed herself in both the woods and books. The Canadian wilderness is the setting of a number of her poems, novels, and stories, although her work has ranged among a variety of real and fictional locales, including the Caribbean island of Bodily Harm (1981) and the dystopian Boston of The Handmaid's Tale (1985). Atwood received her B.A. in English from Victoria College, University of Toronto, in 1961. The next year she earned an M.A. at Harvard, later returning for doctoral research she did not complete, though several volumes of her poetry were published during that time. Before 1972, when she became a full-time writer, Atwood taught at Canadian universities in Vancouver, Montreal, Alberta, and Toronto.

Atwood is the author of more than a dozen collections of poetry, and more than twenty volumes of imaginative prose—both novels and short fiction—as well as a large number of essays and critical works. Her earliest books include the poems collected in the self-published Double Persephone (1961), and then the conventionally published The Circle Game (1964), a collection that won the Governor General's Literary Award for Poetry. Precisely carved language, doubleness of vision, ironic inversions of expectations—these are among the qualities that have garnered attention for her poetry. A poem such as “Miss July Grows Older” suggests the complexity of Atwood's surprising and witty examinations of gender relations. It opens with an arresting question in the voice of a smart, wryly self-critical beauty queen who, hardly a passive object, has skillfully manipulated men: “How much longer can I get away / with being so fucking cute?” Atwood has said that poetry is “the heart of the language, the activity through which language is renewed and kept alive.”

She has also said that, for her, “fiction is the guardian of the moral and ethical sense of the community.” Although she continued to publish collections of poetry over several decades, it is Atwood's fiction that has made her perhaps Canada's best-known writer. Her first novel, The Edible Woman (1969), explores a woman's eating disorders long before the sexual politics of anorexia and bulimia were widely discussed. Several of her subsequent novels were short-listed for the Booker Prize, including her most famous work, The Handmaid's Tale (1985), about a woman's struggle against imprisonment within sharply hierarchical gender roles in a religious fundamentalist dystopia; Cat's Eye (1989), about power and cruelty in girlhood friendships; and Alias Grace (1996), a fictionalized narrative of a historical nineteenth-century female servant accused of murder. The Blind Assassin (2000), which nests various stories within one another, finally won Atwood the Booker Prize. She won her second Booker for The Testaments (2019), a prize she shared with Bernardine Evaristo, who won for Girl, Woman, Other. Atwood joins Peter Carey, J. M. Coetzee, and Hilary Mantel as the only authors to have won a Booker twice.

Since the publication of her early book of essays, Survival (1972), Atwood has helped bring attention and shape to Canadian literature. Early in that book, she hazards sweeping comparisons between Canadian literature and both “the sense of adventure or danger” in the literature of the United States (its key symbol being “The Frontier”) and the “smugness and/or sense of security” in the literature of England (“The Island”). In her view, Canadian literature reflects a distinct experience. “Our stories are likely to be tales not of those who made it but of those who made it back, from the awful experience—the North, the snowstorm, the sinking ship—that killed everyone else. The survivor has no triumph or victory but the fact of his survival.” Some of Atwood’s fictional characters are survivors of the Canadian wilderness, including the young female protagonist of Surfacing, a novel published in the same year as Survival, who journeys deep into the wilderness in search of her lost father. The main character in Cat’s Eye reviews and relives the psychological damage inflicted on her by female friendships and bullying during her childhood and teenage years in the forest.

In the short story “Death by Landscape,” the central character, Lois, is also a survivor of loss and painful memories, of vexed female friendship and power relations lived out in the Canadian wilderness. Reflecting on coming of age at camp, Lois remembers the singing, the stratification, the role-playing as American Indians, but her main focus is her friendship with an American girl, Lucy, who imports into Canada her troubled home life. After a defining incident on a canoe trip, “Death by Landscape,” like other of Atwood’s novels and short fiction, becomes a narrative in part about the power of stories to give meaning, as well as their potential duplicity—about the power of narrative both to condemn and to explore, of language both to cripple and to liberate.

Death by Landscape

Now that the boys are grown up and Rob is dead, Lois has moved to a condominium apartment in one of the newer waterfront developments. She is relieved not to have to worry about the lawn, or about the ivy pushing its muscular little suckers into the brickwork, or the squirrels gnawing their way into the attic and eating the insulation off the wiring, or about strange noises. This building has a security system, and the only plant life is in pots in the solarium.

Lois is glad she's been able to find an apartment big enough for her pictures. They are more crowded together than they were in the house, but this arrangement gives the walls a European look: blocks of pictures, above and beside one another, rather than one over the chesterfield,¹ one over the fireplace, one in the front hall, in the old acceptable manner of sprinkling art around so it does not get too intrusive. This way has more of an impact. You know it's not supposed to be furniture.

None of the pictures is very large, which doesn't mean they aren't valuable. They are paintings, or sketches and drawings, by artists who were not nearly as well known when Lois began to buy them as they are now. Their work later turned up on stamps, or as silk-screen reproductions hung in the principals' offices of high schools, or as jigsaw puzzles, or on beautifully printed calendars sent out by corporations as Christmas gifts, to their less important clients. These artists painted mostly in the twenties and thirties and forties; they painted landscapes. Lois has two Tom Thomsons, three A. Y. Jacksons, a Lawren Harris. She has an Arthur Lismer, she has a J. E. H. MacDonald. She has a David Milne.² They are pictures of convoluted tree trunks on an island or pink wave-smoothed stone, with more islands behind; of a lake with rough, bright, sparsely wooded cliffs; of a vivid river shore with a tangle of bush and two beached canoes, one red, one grey; of a yellow autumn woods with the ice-blue gleam of a pond half-seen through the interlaced branches.

It was Lois who'd chosen them. Rob had no interest in art, although he could see the necessity of having something on the walls. He left all the decorating decisions to her, while providing the money, of course. Because of this collection of hers, Lois's friends—especially the men—have given her the reputation of having a good nose for art investments.

But this is not why she bought the pictures, way back then. She bought them because she wanted them. She wanted something that was in them, although she could not have said at the time what it was. It was not peace: she does not find them peaceful in the least. Looking at them fills her with a wordless unease. Despite the fact that there are no people in them or even animals, it's as if there is something, or someone, looking back out.

When she was thirteen, Lois went on a canoe trip. She'd only been on overnights before. This was to be a long one, into the trackless wilderness, as Cappie put it. It was Lois's first canoe trip, and her last.

Cappie was the head of the summer camp to which Lois had been sent ever since she was nine. Camp Manitou, it was called; it was one of the better ones, for girls, though not the best. Girls of her age whose parents could afford it were routinely packed off to such camps, which bore a generic resemblance to one another. They favoured Indian names and had hearty, energetic leaders, who were called Cappie or Skip or Scottie. At these camps you learned to swim well and sail, and paddle a canoe, and perhaps ride a horse or play tennis. When you weren't doing these things you could do Arts and Crafts and turn out dingy, lumpish clay ashtrays for your mother—mothers smoked more, then—or bracelets made of coloured braided string.

Cheerfulness was required at all times, even at breakfast. Loud shouting and the banging of spoons on the tables were allowed, and even encouraged, at ritual intervals. Chocolate bars were rationed, to control tooth decay and pimples. At night, after supper, in the dining hall or outside around a mosquito-infested campfire ring for special treats, there were singsongs. Lois can still remember all the words to "My Darling Clementine," and to "My Bonnie Lies Over the Ocean," with acting-out gestures: a rippling of the hands for "the ocean," two hands together under the cheek for "lies." She will never be able to forget them, which is a sad thought.

Lois thinks she can recognize women who went to these camps, and were good at it. They have a hardness to their handshakes, even now; a way of standing, legs planted firmly and farther apart than usual; a way of sizing you up, to see if you'd be any good in a canoe—the front, not the back. They themselves would be in the back. They would call it the stern.

She knows that such camps still exist, although Camp Manitou does not. They are one of the few things that haven't changed much. They now offer copper enamelling, and functionless pieces of stained glass baked in electric ovens, though judging from the productions of her friends' grandchildren the artistic standards have not improved.

To Lois, encountering it in the first year after the war, Camp Manitou seemed ancient. Its log-sided buildings with the white cement in between the half-logs, its flagpole ringed with whitewashed stones, its weathered grey dock jutting out into Lake Prospect, with its woven rope bumpers and its rusty rings for tying up, its prim round flowerbed of petunias near the office door, must surely have been there always. In truth it dated only from the first decade of the century; it had been founded by Cappie's parents, who'd thought of camping as bracing to the character, like cold showers, and had been passed along to her as an inheritance, and an obligation.

Lois realized, later, that it must have been a struggle for Cappie to keep Camp Manitou going, during the Depression and then the war, when money did not flow freely. If it had been a camp for the very rich, instead of the merely well off, there would have been fewer problems. But there must have been enough Old Girls, ones with daughters, to keep the thing in operation, though not entirely shipshape: furniture was battered, painted trim was peeling, roofs leaked. There were dim photographs of these Old Girls dotted around the dining hall, wearing ample woollen bathing suits and showing their fat, dimpled legs, or standing, arms twined, in odd tennis outfits with baggy skirts.

In the dining hall, over the stone fireplace that was never used, there was a huge moulting stuffed moose head, which looked somehow carnivorous. It was a sort of mascot; its name was Monty Manitou. The older campers spread the story that it was haunted, and came to life in the dark, when the feeble and undependable lights had been turned off or, due to yet another generator failure, had gone out. Lois was afraid of it at first, but not after she got used to it.

Cappie was the same: you had to get used to her. Possibly she was forty, or thirty-five, or fifty. She had fawn-coloured hair that looked as if it was cut with a bowl. Her head jutted forward, jiggling like a chicken's as she strode around the camp, clutching notebooks and checking things off in them. She was like their minister in church: both of them smiled a lot and were anxious because they wanted things to go well; they both had the same overwashed skins and stringy necks. But all this disappeared when Cappie was leading a singsong, or otherwise leading. Then she was happy, sure of herself, her plain face almost luminous. She wanted to cause joy. At these times she was loved, at others merely trusted.

There were many things Lois didn't like about Camp Manitou, at first. She hated the noisy chaos and spoon-banging of the dining hall, the rowdy singsongs at which you were expected to yell in order to show that you were enjoying yourself. Hers was not a household that encouraged yelling. She hated the necessity of having to write dutiful letters to her parents claiming she was having fun. She could not complain, because camp cost so much money.

She didn't much like having to undress in a roomful of other girls, even in the dim light, although nobody paid any attention, or sleeping in a cabin with seven other girls, some of whom snored because they had adenoids³ or colds, some of whom had nightmares, or wet their beds and cried about it. Bottom bunks made her feel closed in, and she was afraid of falling out of top ones; she was afraid of heights. She got homesick, and suspected her parents of having a better time when she wasn't there than when she was, although her mother wrote to her every week saying how much they missed her. All this was when she was nine. By the time she was thirteen she liked it. She was an old hand by then.

Lucy was her best friend at camp. Lois had other friends in winter, when there was school and itchy woollen clothing and darkness in the afternoons, but Lucy was her summer friend.

She turned up the second year, when Lois was ten, and a Bluejay. (Chickadees, Bluejays, Ravens, and Kingfishers—these were the names Camp Manitou assigned to the different age groups, a sort of totemic clan system. In those days, thinks Lois, it was birds for girls, animals for boys: wolves, and so forth. Though some animals and birds were suitable and some were not. Never vultures, for instance; never skunks, or rats.)

Lois helped Lucy to unpack her tin trunk and place the folded clothes on the wooden shelves, and to make up her bed. She put her in the top bunk right above her, where she could keep an eye on her. Already she knew that Lucy was an exception, to a good many rules; already she felt proprietorial.

Lucy was from the United States, where the comic books came from, and the movies. She wasn't from New York or Hollywood or Buffalo, the only American cities Lois knew the names of, but from Chicago. Her house was on the lake shore and had gates to it, and grounds. They had a maid, all of the time. Lois's family only had a cleaning lady twice a week.

The only reason Lucy was being sent to this camp (she cast a look of minor scorn around the cabin, diminishing it and also offending Lois, while at the same time daunting her) was that her mother had been a camper here. Her mother had been a Canadian once, but had married her father, who had a patch over one eye, like a pirate. She showed Lois the picture of him in her wallet. He got the patch in the war. "Shrapnel," said Lucy. Lois, who was unsure about shrapnel, was so impressed she could only grunt. Her own two-eyed, unwounded father was tame by comparison.

"My father plays golf," she ventured at last.

"Everyone plays golf," said Lucy. "My mother plays golf."

Lois's mother did not. Lois took Lucy to see the outhouses and the swimming dock and the dining hall with Monty Manitou's baleful head, knowing in advance they would not measure up.

This was a bad beginning; but Lucy was good-natured, and accepted Camp Manitou with the same casual shrug with which she seemed to accept everything. She would make the best of it, without letting Lois forget that this was what she was doing.

However, there were things Lois knew that Lucy did not. Lucy scratched the tops off all her mosquito bites and had to be taken to the infirmary to be daubed with Ozonol.⁴ She took her T-shirt off while sailing, and although the counsellor spotted her after a while and made her put it back on, she burnt spectacularly, bright red, with the X of her bathing-suit straps standing out in alarming white; she let Lois peel the sheets of whispery-thin burned skin off her shoulders. When they sang "Alouette" around the campfire, she did not know any of the French words. The difference was that Lucy did not care about the things she didn't know, whereas Lois did.

During the next winter, and subsequent winters, Lucy and Lois wrote to each other. They were both only children, at a time when this was thought to be a disadvantage, so in their letters they pretended to be sisters, or even twins. Lois had to strain a little over this, because Lucy was so blonde, with translucent skin and large blue eyes like a doll's, and Lois was nothing out of the ordinary—just a tallish, thinnish, brownish person with freckles. They signed their letters LL, with the L's entwined together like the monograms on a towel. (Lois and Lucy, thinks Lois. How our names date us. Lois Lane, Superman's girlfriend, enterprising female reporter; "I Love Lucy." Now we are obsolete, and it's little Jennifers, little Emilys, little Alexandras and Carolines and Tiffanys.)

They were more effusive in their letters than they ever were in person. They bordered their pages with X's and O's, but when they met again in the summers it was always a shock. They had changed so much, or Lucy had. It was like watching someone grow up in jolts. At first it would be hard to think up things to say.

But Lucy always had a surprise or two, something to show, some marvel to reveal. The first year she had a picture of herself in a tutu, her hair in a ballerina's knot on the top of her head; she pirouetted around the swimming dock, to show Lois how it was done, and almost fell off. The next year she had given that up and was taking horseback riding. (Camp Manitou did not have horses.) The next year her mother and father had been divorced, and she had a new stepfather, one with both eyes, and a new house, although the maid was the same. The next year, when they had graduated from Bluejays and entered Ravens, she got her period, right in the first week of camp. The two of them snatched some matches from their counsellor, who smoked illegally, and made a small fire out behind the farthest outhouse, at dusk, using their flashlights. They could set all kinds of fires by now; they had learned how in Campcraft. On this fire they burned one of Lucy's used sanitary napkins. Lois is not sure why they did this, or whose idea it was. But she can remember the feeling of deep satisfaction it gave her as the white fluff singed and the blood sizzled, as if some wordless ritual had been fulfilled.

They did not get caught, but then they rarely got caught at any of their camp transgressions. Lucy had such large eyes, and was such an accomplished liar.

This year Lucy is different again: slower, more languorous. She is no longer interested in sneaking around after dark, purloining cigarettes from the counsellor, dealing in black-market candy bars. She is pensive, and hard to wake in the mornings. She doesn't like her stepfather, but she doesn't want to live with her real father either, who has a new wife. She thinks her mother may be having a love affair with a doctor; she doesn't know for sure, but she's seen them smooching in his car, out on the driveway, when her stepfather wasn't there. It serves him right. She hates her private school. She has a boyfriend, who is sixteen and works as a gardener's assistant. This is how she met him: in the garden. She describes to Lois what it is like when he kisses her—rubbery at first, but then your knees go limp. She has been forbidden to see him, and threatened with boarding school. She wants to run away from home.

Lois has little to offer in return. Her own life is placid and satisfactory, but there is nothing much that can be said about happiness. "You're so lucky," Lucy tells her, a little smugly. She might as well say boring because this is how it makes Lois feel.

Lucy is apathetic about the canoe trip, so Lois has to disguise her own excitement. The evening before they are to leave, she slouches into the campfire ring as if coerced, and sits down with a sigh of endurance, just as Lucy does.

Every canoe trip that went out of camp was given a special send-off by Cappie and the section leader and counsellors, with the whole section in attendance. Cappie painted three streaks of red across each of her cheeks with a lipstick. They looked like three-fingered claw marks. She put a blue circle on her forehead with fountain-pen ink, and tied a twisted bandanna around her head and stuck a row of frazzle-ended feathers around it, and wrapped herself in a red-and-black Hudson's Bay blanket. The counsellors, also in blankets but with only two streaks of red, beat on tom-toms made of round wooden cheese boxes with leather stretched over the top and nailed in place. Cappie was Chief Cappeosota. They all had to say "How!" when she walked into the circle and stood there with one hand raised.

Looking back on this, Lois finds it disquieting. She knows too much about Indians: this is why. She knows, for instance, that they should not even be called Indians, and that they have enough worries without other people taking their names and dressing up as them. It has all been a form of stealing.

But she remembers, too, that she was once ignorant of this. Once she loved the campfire, the flickering of light on the ring of faces, the sound of the fake tom-toms, heavy and fast like a scared heartbeat; she loved Cappie in a red blanket and feathers, solemn, as a chief should be, raising her hand and saying, "Greetings, my Ravens." It was not funny, it was not making fun. She wanted to be an Indian. She wanted to be adventurous and pure, and aboriginal.

"You go on big water," says Cappie. This is her idea—all their ideas—of how Indians talk. "You go where no man has ever trod. You go many moons." This is not true. They are only going for a week, not many moons. The canoe route is clearly marked, they have gone over it on a map, and there are prepared campsites with names which are used year after year. But when Cappie says this—and despite the way Lucy rolls up her eyes—Lois can feel the water stretching out, with the shores twisting away on either side, immense and a little frightening.

"You bring back much wampum,"⁵ says Cappie. "Do good in war, my braves, and capture many scalps." This is another of her pretences: that they are boys, and bloodthirsty. But such a game cannot be played by substituting the word "squaw." It would not work at all.

Each of them has to stand up and step forward and have a red line drawn across her cheeks by Cappie. She tells them they must follow in the paths of their ancestors (who most certainly, thinks Lois, looking out the window of her apartment and remembering the family stash of daguerreotypes⁶ and sepia-coloured portraits on her mother's dressing table, the stiff-shirted, black-coated, grim-faced men and the beflounced women with their severe hair and their corseted respectability, would never have considered heading off onto an open lake, in a canoe, just for fun).

At the end of the ceremony they all stood and held hands around the circle, and sang taps. This did not sound very Indian, thinks Lois. It sounded like a bugle call at a military post, in a movie. But Cappie was never one to be much concerned with consistency, or with archaeology.

After breakfast the next morning they set out from the main dock, in four canoes, three in each. The lipstick stripes have not come off completely, and still show faintly pink, like healing burns. They wear their white denim sailing hats, because of the sun, and thin-striped T-shirts, and pale baggy shorts with the cuffs rolled up. The middle one kneels, propping her rear end against the rolled sleeping bags. The counsellors going with them are Pat and Kip. Kip is no-nonsense; Pat is easier to wheedle, or fool.

There are white puffy clouds and a small breeze. Glints come from the little waves. Lois is in the bow of Kip's canoe. She still can't do a J-stroke very well, and she will have to be in the bow or the middle for the whole trip. Lucy is behind her; her own J-stroke is even worse. She splashes Lois with her paddle, quite a big splash.

"I'll get you back," says Lois.

"There was a stable fly on your shoulder," Lucy says.

Lois turns to look at her, to see if she's grinning. They're in the habit of splashing each other. Back there, the camp has vanished behind the first long point of rock and rough trees. Lois feels as if an invisible rope has broken. They're floating free, on their own, cut loose. Beneath the canoe the lake goes down, deeper and colder than it was a minute before.

"No horsing around in the canoe," says Kip. She's rolled her T-shirt sleeves up to the shoulder; her arms are brown and sinewy, her jaw determined, her stroke perfect. She looks as if she knows exactly what she is doing.

The four canoes keep close together. They sing, raucously and with defiance; they sing "The Quartermaster's Store," and "Clementine," and "Alouette." It is more like bellowing than singing.

After that the wind grows stronger, blowing slantwise against the bows, and they have to put all their energy into shoving themselves through the water.

Was there anything important, anything that would provide some sort of reason or clue to what happened next? Lois can remember everything, every detail; but it does her no good.

They stopped at noon for a swim and lunch, and went on in the afternoon. At last they reached Little Birch, which was the first campsite for overnight. Lois and Lucy made the fire, while the others pitched the heavy canvas tents. The fireplace was already there, flat stones piled into a U. A burned tin can and a beer bottle had been left in it. Their fire went out, and they had to restart it. "Hustle your bustle," said Kip. "We're starving."

The sun went down, and in the pink sunset light they brushed their teeth and spat the toothpaste froth into the lake. Kip and Pat put all the food that wasn't in cans into a packsack and slung it into a tree, in case of bears.

Lois and Lucy weren't sleeping in a tent. They'd begged to be allowed to sleep out; that way they could talk without the others hearing. If it rained, they told Kip, they promised not to crawl dripping into the tent over everyone's legs: they would get under the canoes. So they were out on the point.

Lois tried to get comfortable inside her sleeping bag, which smelled of musty storage and of earlier campers, a stale salty sweetness. She curled herself up, with her sweater rolled up under her head for a pillow and her flashlight inside her sleeping bag so it wouldn't roll away. The muscles of her sore arms were making small pings, like rubber bands breaking.

Beside her Lucy was rustling around. Lois could see the glimmering oval of her white face.

"I've got a rock poking into my back," said Lucy.

"So do I," said Lois. "You want to go into the tent?" She herself didn't, but it was right to ask.

"No," said Lucy. She subsided into her sleeping bag. After a moment she said, "It would be nice not to go back."

"To camp?" said Lois.

"To Chicago," said Lucy. "I hate it there."

"What about your boyfriend?" said Lois. Lucy didn't answer. She was either asleep or pretending to be.

There was a moon, and a movement of the trees. In the sky there were stars, layers of stars that went down and down. Kip said that when the stars were bright like that instead of hazy it meant bad weather later on. Out on the lake there were two loons, calling to each other in their insane, mournful voices. At the time it did not sound like grief. It was just background.

The lake in the morning was flat calm. They skimmed along over the glassy surface, leaving V-shaped trails behind them; it felt like flying. As the sun rose higher it got hot, almost too hot. There were stable flies in the canoes, landing on a bare arm or leg for a quick sting. Lois hoped for wind.

They stopped for lunch at the next of the named campsites, Lookout Point. It was called this because, although the site itself was down near the water on a flat shelf of rock, there was a sheer cliff nearby and a trail that led up to the top. The top was the lookout, although what you were supposed to see from there was not clear. Kip said it was just a view.

Lois and Lucy decided to make the climb anyway. They didn't want to hang around waiting for lunch. It wasn't their turn to cook, though they hadn't avoided much by not doing it, because cooking lunch was no big deal, it was just unwrapping the cheese and getting out the bread and peanut butter, but Pat and Kip always had to do their woodsy act and boil up a billy tin^z for their own tea.

They told Kip where they were going. You had to tell Kip where you were going, even if it was only a little way into the woods to get dry twigs for kindling. You could never go anywhere without a buddy.

"Sure," said Kip, who was crouching over the fire, feeding driftwood into it. "Fifteen minutes to lunch."

"Where are they off to?" said Pat. She was bringing their billy tin of water from the lake.

"Lookout," said Kip.

"Be careful," said Pat. She said it as an afterthought, because it was what she always said.

"They're old hands," Kip said.

Lois looks at her watch: it's ten to twelve. She is the watch-minder; Lucy is careless of time. They walk up the path, which is dry earth and rocks, big rounded pinky-grey boulders or split-open ones with jagged edges. Spindly balsam and spruce trees grow to either side, the lake is blue fragments to the left. The sun is right overhead; there are no shadows anywhere. The heat comes up at them as well as down. The forest is dry and crackly.

It isn't far, but it's a steep climb and they're sweating when they reach the top. They wipe their faces with their bare arms, sit gingerly down on a scorching-hot rock, five feet from the edge but too close for Lois. It's a lookout all right, a sheer drop to the lake and a long view over the water, back the way they've come. It's amazing to Lois that they've travelled so far, over all that water, with nothing to propel them but their own arms. It makes her feel strong. There are all kinds of things she is capable of doing.

"It would be quite a dive off here," says Lucy.

"You'd have to be nuts," says Lois.

"Why?" says Lucy. "It's really deep. It goes straight down." She stands up and takes a step nearer the edge. Lois gets a stab in her midriff, the kind she gets when a car goes too fast over a bump.

"Don't," she says.

"Don't what?" says Lucy, glancing around at her mischievously. She knows how Lois feels about heights. But she turns back. "I really have to pee," she says.

"You have toilet paper?" says Lois, who is never without it. She digs in her shorts pocket.

"Thanks," says Lucy.

They are both adept at peeing in the woods: doing it fast so the mosquitoes don't get you, the underwear pulled up between the knees, the squat with the feet apart so you don't wet your legs, facing downhill. The exposed feeling of your bum, as if someone is looking at you from behind. The etiquette when you're with someone else is not to look. Lois stands up and starts to walk back down the path, to be out of sight.

"Wait for me?" says Lucy.

Lois climbed down, over and around the boulders, until she could not see Lucy; she waited. She could hear the voices of the others, talking and laughing, down near the shore. One voice was yelling, "Ants! Ants!" Someone must have sat on an ant hill. Off to the side, in the woods, a raven was croaking, a hoarse single note.

She looked at her watch: it was noon. This is when she heard the shout.

She has gone over and over it in her mind since, so many times that the first, real shout has been obliterated, like a footprint trampled by other footprints. But she is sure (she is almost positive, she is nearly certain) that it was not a shout of fear. Not a scream. More like a cry of surprise, cut off too soon. Short, like a dog's bark.

"Lucy?" Lois said. Then she called "Lucy!" By now she was clambering back up, over the stones of the path. Lucy was not up there. Or she was not in sight.

"Stop fooling around," Lois said. "It's lunch-time." But Lucy did not rise from behind a rock or step out, smiling, from behind a tree. The sunlight was all around; the rocks looked white. "This isn't funny!" Lois said, and it wasn't, panic was rising in her, the panic of a small child who does not know where the bigger ones are hidden. She could hear her own heart. She looked quickly around; she lay down on the ground and looked over the edge of the cliff. It made her feel cold. There was nothing.

She went back down the path, stumbling; she was breathing too quickly; she was too frightened to cry. She felt terrible—guilty and dismayed, as if she had done something very bad, by mistake. Something that could never be repaired. "Lucy's gone," she told Kip.

Kip looked up from her fire, annoyed. The water in the billy can was boiling. "What do you mean, gone?" she said. "Where did she go?"

"I don't know," said Lois. "She's just gone."

No one had heard the shout, but then no one had heard Lois calling, either. They had been talking among themselves, by the water.

Kip and Pat went up to the lookout and searched and called, and blew their whistles. Nothing answered.

Then they came back down, and Lois had to tell exactly what had happened. The other girls all sat in a circle and listened to her. Nobody said anything. They all looked frightened, especially Pat and Kip. They were the leaders. You did not just lose a camper like this, for no reason at all.

"Why did you leave her alone?" said Kip.

"I was just down the path," said Lois. "I told you. She had to go to the bathroom." She did not say pee in front of people older than herself.

Kip looked disgusted.

"Maybe she just walked off into the woods and got turned around," said one of the girls.

"Maybe she's doing it on purpose," said another.

Nobody believed either of these theories.

They took the canoes and searched around the base of the cliff, and peered down into the water. But there had been no sound of falling rock; there had been no splash. There was no clue, nothing at all. Lucy had simply vanished.

That was the end of the canoe trip. It took them the same two days to go back that it had taken coming in, even though they were short a paddler. They did not sing.

After that, the police went in a motorboat, with dogs; they were the Mounties⁸ and the dogs were German shepherds, trained to follow trails in the woods. But it had rained since, and they could find nothing.

Lois is sitting in Cappie's office. Her face is bloated with crying, she's seen that in the mirror. By now she feels numbed; she feels as if she has drowned. She can't stay here. It has been too much of a shock.

Tomorrow her parents are coming to take her away. Several of the other girls who were on the canoe trip are also being collected. The others will have to stay, because their parents are in Europe, or cannot be reached.

Cappie is grim. They've tried to hush it up, but of course everyone in camp knows. Soon the papers will know too. You can't keep it quiet, but what can be said? What can be said that makes any sense? "Girl vanishes in broad daylight, without a trace." It can't be believed. Other things, worse things, will be suspected. Negligence, at the very least. But they have always taken such care. Bad luck will gather around Camp Manitou like a fog; parents will avoid it, in favour of other, luckier places. Lois can see Cappie thinking all this, even through her numbness. It's what anyone would think.

Lois sits on the hard wooden chair in Cappie's office, beside the old wooden desk, over which hangs the thumb-tacked bulletin board of normal camp routine, and gazes at Cappie through her puffy eyelids. Cappie is now smiling what is supposed to be a reassuring smile. Her manner is too casual: she's after something. Lois has seen this look on Cappie's face when she's been sniffing out contraband chocolate bars, hunting down those rumoured to have snuck out of their cabins at night.

"Tell me again," says Cappie, "from the beginning."

Lois has told her story so many times by now, to Pat and Kip, to Cappie, to the police, that she knows it word for word. She knows it, but she no longer believes it. It has become a story. "I told you," she said. "She wanted to go to the bathroom. I gave her my toilet paper. I went down the path, I waited for her. I heard this kind of shout . . ."

"Yes," says Cappie, smiling confidently, "but before that. What did you say to one another?"

Lois thinks. Nobody has asked her this before. "She said you could dive off there. She said it went straight down."

"And what did you say?"

"I said you'd have to be nuts."

"Were you mad at Lucy?" says Cappie, in an encouraging voice.

"No," says Lois. "Why would I be mad at Lucy? I wasn't ever mad at Lucy." She feels like crying again. The times when she has in fact been mad at Lucy have been erased already. Lucy was always perfect.

"Sometimes we're angry when we don't know we're angry," says Cappie, as if to herself. "Sometimes we get really mad and we don't even know it. Sometimes we might do a thing without meaning to, or without knowing what will happen. We lose our tempers."

Lois is only thirteen, but it doesn't take her long to figure out that Cappie is not including herself in any of this. By we she means Lois. She is accusing Lois of pushing Lucy off the cliff. The unfairness of this hits her like a slap. "I didn't!" she says.

"Didn't what?" says Cappie softly. "Didn't what, Lois?"

Lois does the worst thing, she begins to cry. Cappie gives her a look like a pounce. She's got what she wanted.

Later, when she was grown up, Lois was able to understand what this interview had been about. She could see Cappie's desperation, her need for a story, a real story with a reason in it; anything but the senseless vacancy Lucy had left for her to deal with. Cappie wanted Lois to supply the reason, to be the reason. It wasn't even for the newspapers or the parents, because she could never make such an accusation without proof. It was for herself: something to explain the loss of Camp Manitou and of all she had worked for, the years of entertaining spoiled children and buttering up parents and making a fool of herself with feathers stuck in her hair. Camp Manitou was in fact lost. It did not survive.

Lois worked all this out, twenty years later. But it was far too late. It was too late even ten minutes afterwards, when she'd left Cappie's office and was walking slowly back to her cabin to pack. Lucy's clothes were still there, folded on the shelves, as if waiting. She felt the other girls in the cabin watching her with speculation in their eyes. Could she have done it? She must have done it. For the rest of her life, she has caught people watching her in this way.

Maybe they weren't thinking this. Maybe they were merely sorry for her. But she felt she had been tried and sentenced, and this is what has stayed with her: the knowledge that she had been singled out, condemned for something that was not her fault.

Lois sits in the living room of her apartment, drinking a cup of tea. Through the knee-to-ceiling window she has a wide view of Lake Ontario, with its skin of wrinkled blue-grey light, and of the willows of Centre Island shaken by a wind, which is silent at this distance, and on this side of the glass. When there isn't too much pollution she can see the far shore, the foreign shore; though today it is obscured.

Possibly she could go out, go downstairs, do some shopping; there isn't much in the refrigerator. The boys say she doesn't get out enough. But she isn't hungry, and moving, stirring from this space, is increasingly an effort.

She can hardly remember, now, having her two boys in the hospital, nursing them as babies; she can hardly remember getting married, or what Rob looked like. Even at the time she never felt she was paying full attention. She was tired a lot, as if she was living not one life but two: her own, and another, shadowy life that hovered around her and would not let itself be realized—the life of what would have happened if Lucy had not stepped sideways, and disappeared from time.

She would never go up north, to Rob's family cottage or to any place with wild lakes and wild trees and the calls of loons. She would never go anywhere near. Still, it was as if she was always listening for another voice, the voice of a person who should have been there but was not. An echo.

While Rob was alive, while the boys were growing up, she could pretend she didn't hear it, this empty space in sound. But now there is nothing much left to distract her.

She turns away from the window and looks at her pictures. There is the pinkish island, in the lake, with the intertwined trees. It's the same landscape they paddled through, that distant summer. She's seen travelogues of this country, aerial photographs; it looks different from above, bigger, more hopeless: lake after lake, random blue puddles in dark green bush, the trees like bristles.

How could you ever find anything there, once it was lost? Maybe if they cut it all down, drained it all away, they might find Lucy's bones, some time, wherever they are hidden. A few bones, some buttons, the buckle from her shorts.

But a dead person is a body; a body occupies space, it exists somewhere. You can see it; you put it in a box and bury it in the ground, and then it's in a box in the ground. But Lucy is not in a box, or in the ground. Because she is nowhere definite, she could be anywhere.

And these paintings are not landscape paintings. Because there aren't any landscapes up there, not in the old, tidy European sense, with a gentle hill, a curving river, a cottage, a mountain in the background, a golden evening sky. Instead there's a tangle, a receding maze, in which you can become lost almost as soon as you step off the path. There are no backgrounds in any of these paintings, no vistas; only a great deal of foreground that goes back and back, endlessly, involving you in its twists and turns of tree and branch and rock. No matter how far back in you go, there will be more. And the trees themselves are hardly trees; they are currents of energy, charged with violent colour.

Who knows how many trees there were on the cliff just before Lucy disappeared? Who counted? Maybe there was one more, afterwards.

Lois sits in her chair and does not move. Her hand with the cup is raised halfway to her mouth. She hears something, almost hears it: a shout of recognition, or of joy.

She looks at the paintings, she looks into them. Every one of them is a picture of Lucy. You can't see her exactly, but she's there, in behind the pink stone island or the one behind that. In the picture of the cliff she is hidden by the clutch of fallen rocks towards the bottom, in the one of the river shore she is crouching beneath the overturned canoe. In the yellow autumn woods she's behind the tree that cannot be seen because of the other trees, over beside the blue sliver of pond; but if you walked into the picture and found the tree, it would be the wrong one, because the right one would be further on.

Everyone has to be somewhere, and this is where Lucy is. She is in Lois's apartment, in the holes that open inwards on the wall, not like windows but like doors. She is here. She is entirely alive.

1991

Endnotes

- Note 1: Sofa.Return to reference 1
- Note 2:
All Canadian landscape painters: Tom Thomson (1877–1917), A. Y. Jackson (1882–1974), Lawren Harris (1885–1970), Arthur Lismer (1885–1969), J. E. H. MacDonald (1873–1932), and David Milne (1882–1953). Jackson, Harris, Lismer, and MacDonald were members of the Group of Seven, the first major national movement in Canadian art, and Thomson was associated with the group. Its work was usually expressionist in style.
Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Enlarged masses of lymphoid tissue at the top of the throat, blocking the nasal passages.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: First-aid ointment.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Beads made from polished shells and used as money by Indigenous peoples of North America.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Early photographs.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Metal pail with a close-fitting lid and a wire handle, used for cooking over open fires.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Royal Canadian Mounted Police.Return to reference 8

Miss July Grows Older

How much longer can I get away
with being so fucking cute?
Not much longer.
The shoes with bows, the cunning underwear with slogans on the crotch—Knock Here, 5 and so forth—
will have to go, along with the cat suit.¹
After a while you forget
what you really look like.
You think your mouth is the size it was.
10 You pretend not to care.

When I was young I went with my hair hiding one eye, thinking myself daring;
off to the movies in my jaunty pencil
skirt and elastic cinch-belt, 15 chewed gum, left lipstick imprints the shape of grateful, rubbery sighs on the cigarettes of men
I hardly knew and didn't want to.
Men were a skill, you had to have 20 good hands, breathe into their nostrils, as for horses. It was something I did well,
like playing the flute, although I don't.

In the forests of grey stems there are standing pools,
25 tarn-coloured,² choked with brown leaves.
Through them you can see an arm, a shoulder,
when the light is right, with the sky clouded.

The train goes past silos, through meadows,
the winter wheat on the fields like scanty fur.

30 I still get letters, although not many.
A man writes me, requesting true-life stories about bad sex. He's doing an anthology.
He got my name off an old calendar,
the photo that's mostly bum and daisies, 35 back when my skin had the golden slick of fresh-spread margarine.
Not rape, he says, but disappointment,
more like a defeat of expectations.
Dear Sir, I reply, I never had any.
Bad sex, that is.
40 It was never the sex, it was the other things,
the absence of flowers, the death threats,
the eating habits at breakfast.
I notice I'm using the past tense.

45 Though the vaporous cloud of chemicals that enveloped you
like a glowing eggshell, an incense, doesn't disappear: it just gets larger and takes in more. You grow out of sex like a shrunk dress into your common senses, those you share 50 with whatever's listening. The way the sun moves through the hours becomes important, the smeared raindrops
on the window, buds
on the roadside weeds, the sheen 55 of spilled oil on a raw ditch filling with muddy water.

Don't get me wrong: with the lights out
I'd still take on anyone,

60 if I had the energy to spare.
But after a while these flesh arpeggios get boring,
like Bach³ over and over;
too much of one kind of glory.

65 When I was all body I was lazy.
I had an easy life, and was not grateful.
Now there are more of me.
Don't confuse me with my hen-leg elbows:
what you get is no longer
what you see.

1995

Endnotes

- Note 1: Close-fitting jumpsuit, typically covering the body from the neck to the feet.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: That is, the color of a small mountain lake.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Johann Sebastian Bach (1685–1750), German composer. “Arpeggios”: the notes of a musical chord played in rapid succession.Return to reference 3

J. M. COETZEE

b. 1940

John Maxwell Coetzee was born in Cape Town, South Africa. His mother was a schoolteacher; his father, a lawyer who became a sheepherder after losing his job. When Coetzee was eight his family left the provinces, and he chronicles this and other parts of his childhood in third-person memoirs, Boyhood: Scenes from a Provincial Life (1997) and Youth: Scenes from a Provincial Life II (2002), followed up by a novelistic pseudo-biography of his adulthood, Summertime (2009). Coetzee was educated in Cape Town and then lived in London for a few years, working as a computer programmer, before earning his Ph.D. from the University of Texas at Austin, where he wrote a dissertation on the fiction of Samuel Beckett—a major influence, along with Kafka and Dostoyevsky, on Coetzee's fiction. He was appointed, first, assistant professor and, subsequently, Butler Professor of English at the State University of New York at Buffalo. In 1984 he returned to South Africa as professor of general literature at the University of Cape Town, and since 2002 he has lived in Australia. Coetzee is the first novelist to win the prestigious Booker Prize twice, and in 2003 he was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature.

The central concern of Coetzee's fiction—the oppressive nature of colonialism—made its appearance with his first book, Dusklands (1974). This consists of two novellas, one set in the U.S. State Department during the Vietnam War, the other in southern Africa two hundred years earlier. The protagonists of these seemingly different stories—Eugene Dawn, an expert in psychological warfare, and Jacobus Coetzee, an explorer and pioneer—are engaged in similar projects, each leading to oppression and murder. Coetzee's subsequent novels include In the Heart of the Country (1977), a feminist anticolonial fable in the voice of a mad South African farmwoman; Life & Times of Michael K (1983), about a homeless man trying to survive in war-torn Africa; Foe (1986), a retelling of Daniel Defoe's Robinson Crusoe from the perspective of a female castaway; The Master of Petersburg (1994), a fictionalized account of Dostoyevsky's life; and Disgrace (1999), about sexual harassment, rape, and race relations in post-apartheid South Africa. Coetzee published his first major works of the twenty-first century, including Elizabeth Costello (2003), Diary of a Bad Year (2007), and Summertime (2009), under the category of "fiction." Each was highly experimental in structure and deviated from the usual narratives and typographical modes of the novel. Elizabeth Costello unfolded as a series of lectures embedded within a fictional world, while Diary featured three narrative threads arranged in distinct sections across each page. The Childhood of Jesus (2013), The Schooldays of Jesus (2016), and The Death of Jesus (2020) return to the allegorical mode of Coetzee's earlier novels, but with stronger core interests in religion and philosophy. His novel The Pole (2023) is his second to be published in Spanish translation (the first being The Death of Jesus) before appearing in an English-language edition. His many essays and works of criticism have concerned censorship, the rights of animals, translation, and South African history, among other themes.

Coetzee is at once a passionate political novelist and an intensely literary one, both qualities emerging in his most compelling indictment of colonialism, Waiting for the Barbarians (1980). This novel takes its title and theme from a well-known poem by the Greek poet Constantine Cavafy (1863–1933), which ends (in Rae Dalven's translation):

. . . night is here but the barbarians have not come.

Some people arrived from the frontiers,
And they said that there are no longer any barbarians.
And now what shall become of us without any barbarians?
Those people were a kind of solution.

In Coetzee's novel the rulers of the unnamed empire claim it is threatened by barbarians, but the barbarian threat is, at least in part, a fantasy concocted by the empire to hold itself together. The narrator is a magistrate in charge of a frontier post, poised uneasily between the harmless inhabitants of the region and the empire's ruthless officials, and unable to protect either the natives or himself from his brutal colleague, Colonel Joll. Imprisoned and stripped of his duties, the magistrate becomes increasingly skeptical of the empire's motives. When the imperial army arrives to subdue supposed insurgents, its vicious treatment of prisoners calls into question the relation of "civilization" to "barbarism" and demonstrates, in harrowing scenes of abuse and torture, the ethical dangers of one people's dominance over another. In this medley of realist particularism and allegorical parable, Coetzee leaves the landscape and time of the novel hauntingly unspecified, suggesting that colonialism's degradation and coercion, violence, and moral corruption can occur anywhere, at any time.

From Waiting for the Barbarians

First there is the sound of muskets far away, as diminutive as popguns.¹ Then from nearer by, from the ramparts themselves, come volleys of answering shots. There is a stampede of footsteps across the barracks yard. "The barbarians!" someone shouts; but I think he is wrong. Above all the clamour the great bell begins to peal.

Kneeling with an ear to the crack of the door I try to make out what is going on.

The noise from the square mounts from a hubbub to a steady roar in which no single voice can be distinguished. The whole town must be pouring out in welcome, thousands of ecstatic souls. Volleys of musket-shots keep cracking. Then the tenor of the roar changes, rises in pitch and excitement. Faintly above it come the brassy tones of bugles.

The temptation is too great. What have I to lose? I unlock the door. In glare so blinding that I must squint and shade my eyes, I cross the yard, pass through the gate, and join the rear of the crowd. The volleys and the roar of applause continue. The old woman in black beside me takes my arm to steady herself and stands on her toes. "Can you see?" she says. "Yes, I can see men on horseback," I reply; but she is not listening.

I can see a long file of horsemen who, amid flying banners, pass through the gateway and make their way to the centre of the square where they dismount. There is a cloud of dust over the whole square, but I see that they are smiling and laughing: one of them rides with his hands raised high in triumph, another waves a garland of flowers. They progress slowly, for the crowd presses around them, trying to touch them, throwing flowers, clapping their hands above their heads in joy, spinning round and round in private ecstasies. Children dive past me, scrambling through the legs of the grownups to be nearer to their heroes. Fusillade after fusillade comes from the ramparts, which are lined with cheering people.

One part of the cavalcade does not dismount. Headed by a stern-faced young corporal bearing the green and gold banner of the battalion, it passes through the press of bodies to the far end of the square and then begins a circuit of the perimeter, the crowd surging slowly in its wake. The word runs like fire from neighbour to neighbour: "Barbarians!"

The standard-bearer's horse is led by a man who brandishes a heavy stick to clear his way. Behind him comes another trooper trailing a rope; and at the end of the rope, tied neck to neck, comes a file of men, barbarians, stark naked, holding their hands up to their faces in an odd way as though one and all are suffering from toothache. For a moment I am puzzled by the posture, by the tiptoeing eagerness with which they follow their leader, till I catch a glint of metal and at once comprehend. A simple loop of wire runs through the flesh of each man's hands and through holes pierced in his cheeks. "It makes them meek as lambs," I remember being told by a soldier who had once seen the trick: "they think of nothing but how to keep very still." My heart grows sick. I know now that I should not have left my cell.

I have to turn my back smartly to avoid being seen by the two who, with their mounted escort, bring up the rear of the procession: the bareheaded young captain whose first triumph this is, and at his shoulder, leaner and darker after his months of campaigning, Colonel of Police Joll.

The circuit is made, everyone has a chance to see the twelve miserable captives, to prove to his children that the barbarians are real. Now the crowd, myself reluctantly in its wake, flows towards the great gate, where a half-moon of soldiers blocks its way until, compressed at front and rear, it cannot budge.

"What is going on?" I ask my neighbour.

"I don't know," he says, "but help me to lift him." I help him to lift the child he carries on his arm on to his shoulders. "Can you see?" he asks the child.

"Yes."

"What are they doing?"

"They are making those barbarians kneel. What are they going to do to them?"

"I don't know. Let's wait and see."

Slowly, titanically, with all my might, I turn and begin to squeeze my body out, "Excuse me . . . excuse me . . ." I say: "the heat—I'm going to be sick." For the first time I see heads turn, fingers point.

I ought to go back to my cell. As a gesture it will have no effect, it will not even be noticed. Nevertheless, for my own sake, as a gesture to myself alone, I ought to return to the cool dark and lock the door and bend the key and stop my ears to the noise of patriotic bloodlust and close my lips and never speak again. Who knows, perhaps I do my fellow-townsmen an injustice, perhaps at this very minute the shoemaker is at home tapping on his last, humming to himself to drown the shouting, perhaps there are housewives shelling peas in their kitchens, telling stories to occupy their restless children, perhaps there are farmers still going calmly about the repair of the ditches. If comrades like these exist, what a pity I do not know them! For me, at this moment, striding away from the crowd, what has become important above all is that I should neither be contaminated by the atrocity that is about to be committed nor poison myself with impotent hatred of its perpetrators. I cannot save the prisoners, therefore let me save myself. Let it at the very least be said, if it ever comes to be said, if there is ever anyone in some remote future interested to know the way we lived, that in this farthest outpost of the Empire of light there existed one man who in his heart was not a barbarian.

I pass through the barracks gate into my prison yard. At the trough in the middle of the yard I pick up an empty bucket and fill it. With the bucket held up before me, slopping water over its sides, I approach the rear of the crowd again. "Excuse me," I say, and push. People curse me, give way, the bucket tilts and splashes, I forge forward till in a minute I am suddenly clear in the frontmost rank of the crowd behind the backs of the soldiers who, holding staves between them, keep an arena clear for the exemplary spectacle.

Four of the prisoners kneel on the ground. The other eight, still roped together, squat in the shade of the wall watching, their hands to their cheeks.

The kneeling prisoners bend side by side over a long heavy pole. A cord runs from the loop of wire through the first man's mouth, under the pole, up to the second man's loop, back under the pole, up to the third loop, under the pole, through the fourth loop. As I watch a soldier slowly pulls the cord tighter and the prisoners bend further till finally they are kneeling with their faces touching the pole. One of them writhes his shoulders in pain and moans. The others are silent, their thoughts wholly concentrated on moving smoothly with the cord, not giving the wire a chance to tear their flesh.

Directing the soldier with little gestures of the hand is Colonel Joll. Though I am only one in a crowd of thousands, though his eyes are shaded as ever, I stare at him so hard with a face so luminous with query that I know at once he sees me.

Behind me I distinctly hear the word magistrate. Do I imagine it or are my neighbours inching away from me?

The Colonel steps forward. Stooping over each prisoner in turn he rubs a handful of dust into his naked back and writes a word with a stick of charcoal. I read the words upside down: ENEMY . . . ENEMY . . . ENEMY . . . ENEMY. He steps back and folds his hands. At a distance of no more than twenty paces he and I contemplate each other.

Then the beating begins. The soldiers use the stout green cane staves, bringing them down with the heavy slapping sounds of washing-paddles, raising red welts on the prisoners' backs and buttocks. With slow care the prisoners extend their legs until they lie flat on their bellies, all except the one who had been moaning and who now gasps with each blow.

The black charcoal and ochre dust begin to run with sweat and blood. The game, I see, is to beat them till their backs are washed clean.

I watch the face of a little girl who stands in the front rank of the crowd gripping her mother's clothes. Her eyes are round, her thumb is in her mouth: silent, terrified, curious, she drinks in the sight of these big naked men being beaten. On every face around me, even those that are smiling, I see the same expression: not hatred, not bloodlust, but a curiosity so intense that their bodies are drained by it and only their eyes live, organs of a new and ravening appetite.

The soldiers doing the beating grow tired. One stands with his hands on his hips panting, smiling, gesturing to the crowd. There is a word from the Colonel: all four of them cease their labour and come forward offering their canes to the spectators.

A girl, giggling and hiding her face, is pushed forward by her friends. "Go on, don't be afraid!" they urge her. A soldier puts a cane in her hand and leads her to the place. She stands confused, embarrassed, one hand still over her face. Shouts, jokes, obscene advice are hurled at her. She lifts the cane, brings it down smartly on the prisoner's buttocks, drops it, and scuttles to safety to a roar of applause.

There is a scramble for the canes, the soldiers can barely keep order, I lose sight of the prisoners on the ground as people press forward to take a turn or simply watch the beating from nearer. I stand forgotten with my bucket between my feet.

Then the flogging is over, the soldiers reassert themselves, the crowd scrambles back, the arena is reconstituted, though narrower than before.

Over his head, exhibiting it to the crowd, Colonel Joll holds a hammer, an ordinary four-pound hammer used for knocking in tent-pegs. Again his gaze meets mine. The babble subsides.

"No!" I hear the first word from my throat, rusty, not loud enough. Then again: "No!" This time the word rings like a bell from my chest. The soldier who blocks my way stumbles aside. I am in the arena holding up my hands to still the crowd: "No! No! No!"

When I turn to Colonel Joll he is standing not five paces from me, his arms folded. I point a finger at him. "You!" I shout. Let it all be said. Let him be the one on whom the anger breaks. "You are depraving these people!"

He does not flinch, he does not reply.

"You!" My arm points at him like a gun. My voice fills the square. There is utter silence; or perhaps I am too intoxicated to hear.

Something crashes into me from behind. I sprawl in the dust, gasp, feel the sear of old pain in my back. A stick thuds down on me. Reaching out to ward it off, I take a withering blow on my hand.

It becomes important to stand up, however difficult the pain makes it. I come to my feet and see who it is that is hitting me. It is the stocky man with the sergeant's stripes who helped with the beatings. Crouched at the knees, his nostrils flaring, he stands with his stick raised for the next blow. "Wait!" I gasp, holding out my limp hand. "I think you have broken it!" He strikes, and I take the blow on the forearm. I hide my arm, lower my head, and try to grope towards him and grapple. Blows fall on my head and shoulders. Never mind: all I want is a few moments to finish what I am saying now that I have begun. I grip his tunic and hug him to me. Though he wrestles, he cannot use his stick; over his shoulder I shout again.

"Not with that!" I shout. The hammer lies cradled in the Colonel's folded arms. "You would not use a hammer on a beast, not on a beast!" In a terrible surge of rage I turn on the sergeant and hurl him from me. Godlike strength is mine. In a minute it will pass: let me use it well while it lasts! "Look!" I shout. I point to the four prisoners who lie docilely on the earth, their lips to the pole, their hands clasped to their faces like monkeys' paws, oblivious of the hammer, ignorant of what is going on behind them, relieved that the offending mark has been beaten from their backs, hoping that the punishment is at an end. I raise my broken hand to the sky. "Look!" I shout. "We are the great miracle of creation! But from some blows this miraculous body cannot repair itself! How—!" Words fail me. "Look at these men!" I recommence. "Men!" Those in the crowd who can crane to look at the prisoners, even at the flies that begin to settle on their bleeding welts.

I hear the blow coming and turn to meet it. It catches me full across the face. "I am blind!" I think, staggering back into the blackness that instantly falls. I swallow blood; something blooms across my face, starting as a rosy warmth, turning to fiery agony. I hide my face in my hands and stamp around in a circle trying not to shout, trying not to fall.

What I wanted to say next I cannot remember. A miracle of creation—I pursue the thought but it eludes me like a wisp of smoke. It occurs to me that we crush insects beneath our feet, miracles of creation too, beetles, worms, cockroaches, ants, in their various ways.

I take my fingers from my eyes and a grey world re-emerges swimming in tears. I am so profoundly grateful that I cease to feel pain. As I am hustled, a man at each elbow, back through the murmuring crowd to my cell, I even find myself smiling.

That smile, that flush of joy, leave behind a disturbing residue. I know that they commit an error in treating me so summarily. For I am no orator. What would I have said if they had let me go on? That it is worse to beat a man's feet to pulp than to kill him in combat? That it brings shame on everyone when a girl is permitted to flog a man? That spectacles of cruelty corrupt the hearts of the innocent? The words they stopped me from uttering may have been very paltry indeed, hardly words to rouse the rabble. What, after all, do I stand for besides an archaic code of gentlemanly behaviour towards captured foes, and what do I stand against except the new science of degradation that kills people on their knees, confused and disgraced in their own eyes? Would I have dared to face the crowd to demand justice for these ridiculous barbarian prisoners with their backsides in the air? Justice: once that word is uttered, where will it all end? Easier to shout No! Easier to be beaten and made a martyr. Easier to lay my head on a block than to defend the cause of justice for the barbarians: for where can that argument lead but to laying down our arms and opening the gates of the town to the people whose land we have raped? The old magistrate, defender of the rule of law, enemy in his own way of the State, assaulted and imprisoned, impregnably virtuous, is not without his own twinges of doubt.

My nose is broken, I know, and perhaps also the cheekbone where the flesh was laid open by the blow of the stick. My left eye is swelling shut.

As the numbness wears off the pain begins to come in spasms a minute or two apart so intense that I can no longer lie still. At the height of the spasm I trot around the room holding my face, whining like a dog; in the blessed valleys between the peaks I breathe deeply, trying to keep control of myself, trying not to make too disgraceful an outcry. I seem to hear surges and lulls in the noise from the mob on the square but cannot be sure that the roar is not simply in my eardrums.

They bring me my evening meal as usual but I cannot eat. I cannot keep still, I have to walk back and forth or rock on my haunches to keep myself from screaming, tearing my clothes, clawing my flesh, doing whatever people do when the limit of their endurance is reached. I weep, and feel the tears stinging the open flesh. I hum the old song about the rider and the juniper bush over and over again, clinging to the remembered words even after they have ceased to make any sense. One, two, three, four . . . I count. It will be a famous victory, I tell myself, if you can last the night.

In the early hours of the morning, when I am so giddy with exhaustion that I reel on my feet, I finally give way and sob from the heart like a child: I sit in a corner against the wall and weep, the tears running from my eyes without stop. I weep and weep while the throbbing comes and goes according to its own cycles. In this position sleep bursts upon me like a thunderbolt. I am amazed to come to myself in the thin grey light of day, slumped in a corner, with not the faintest sense that time has passed. Though the throbbing is still there I find I can endure it if I remain still. Indeed, it has lost its strangeness. Soon, perhaps, it will be as much part of me as breathing.

So I lie quietly against the wall, folding my sore hand under my armpit for comfort, and fall into a second sleep, into a confusion of images among which I search out one in particular, brushing aside the others that fly at me like leaves. It is of the girl. She is kneeling with her back to me before the snow-castle or sandcastle she has built. She wears a dark blue robe. As I approach I see that she is digging away in the bowels of the castle.

She becomes aware of me and turns. I am mistaken, it is not a castle she has built but a clay oven. Smoke curls up from the vent at the back. She holds out her hands to me offering me something, a shapeless lump which I peer at unwillingly through a mist. Though I shake my head my vision will not clear.

She is wearing a round cap embroidered in gold. Her hair is braided in a heavy plait which lies over her shoulder: there is gold thread worked into the braid. "Why are you dressed in your best?" I want to say: "I have never seen you looking so lovely." She smiles at me: what beautiful teeth she has, what clear jet-black eyes! Also now I can see that what she is holding out to me is a loaf of bread, still hot, with a coarse steaming broken crust. A surge of gratitude sweeps through me. "Where did a child like you learn to bake so well in the desert?" I want to say. I open my arms to embrace her, and come to myself with tears stinging the wound on my cheek. Though I scrabble back at once into the burrow of sleep I cannot re-enter the dream or taste the bread that has made my saliva run.

• •

Colonel Joll sits behind the desk in my office. There are no books or files; the room is starkly empty save for a vase of fresh flowers.

The handsome warrant officer whose name I do not know lifts the cedar-wood chest on to the desk and steps back.

Looking down to refer to his papers, the Colonel speaks. "Among the items found in your apartment was this wooden chest. I would like you to consider it. Its contents are unusual. It contains approximately three hundred slips of white poplar-wood, each about eight inches by two inches, many of them wound about with lengths of string.² The wood is dry and brittle. Some of the string is new, some so old that it has perished.

"If one loosens the string one finds that the slip splits open revealing two flat inner surfaces. These surfaces are written on in an unfamiliar script.

"I think you will concur with this description."

I stare into the black lenses. He goes on.

"A reasonable inference is that the wooden slips contain messages passed between yourself and other parties, we do not know when. It remains for you to explain what the messages say and who the other parties were."

He takes a slip from the chest and flicks it across the polished surface of the desk towards me.

I look at the lines of characters written by a stranger long since dead. I do not even know whether to read from right to left or from left to right. In the long evenings I spent poring over my collection I isolated over four hundred different characters in the script, perhaps as many as four hundred and fifty. I have no idea what they stand for. Does each stand for a single thing, a circle for the sun, a triangle for a woman, a wave for a lake; or does a circle merely stand for "circle", a triangle for "triangle", a wave for "wave"? Does each sign represent a different state of the tongue, the lips, the throat, the lungs, as they combine in the uttering of some multifarious unimaginable extinct barbarian language? Or are my four hundred characters nothing but scribal embellishments of an underlying repertory of twenty or thirty whose primitive forms I am too stupid to see?

"He sends greetings to his daughter," I say. I hear with surprise the thick nasal voice that is now mine. My finger runs along the line of characters from right to left. "Whom he says he has not seen for a long time. He hopes she is happy and thriving. He hopes the lambing season has been good. He has a gift for her, he says, which he will keep till he sees her again. He sends his love. It is not easy to read his signature. It could be simply 'Your father' or it could be something else, a name."

I reach over into the chest and pick out a second slip. The warrant officer, who sits behind Joll with a little notebook open on his knee, stares hard at me, his pencil poised above the paper.

"This one reads as follows," I say: " 'I am sorry I must send bad news. The soldiers came and took your brother away. I have been to the fort every day to plead for his return. I sit in the dust with my head bare. Yesterday for the first time they sent a man to speak to me. He says your brother is no longer here. He says he has been sent away. "Where?" I asked, but he would not say. Do not tell your mother, but join me in praying for his safety.'

"And now let us see what this next one says." The pencil is still poised, he has not written anything, he has not stirred. " 'We went to fetch your brother yesterday. They showed us into a room where he lay on a table sewn up in a sheet.' " Slowly Joll leans back in his chair. The warrant officer closes his notebook and half-rises; but with a gesture Joll restrains him. " 'They wanted me to take him away like that, but I insisted on looking first. "What if it is the wrong body you are giving me?" I said—"You have so many bodies here, bodies of brave young men." So I opened the sheet and saw that it was indeed he. Through each eyelid, I saw that there was a stitch, "Why have you done that?" I said. "It is our custom," he said. I tore the sheet wide open and saw bruises all over his body, and saw that his feet were swollen and broken. "What happened to him?" I said. "I do not know," said the man, "it is not on the paper; if you have questions you must go to the sergeant, but he is very busy." We have had to bury your brother here, outside their fort, because he was beginning to stink. Please tell your mother and try to console her.'

"Now let us see what the next one says. See, there is only a single character. It is the barbarian character war, but it has other senses too. It can stand for vengeance, and, if you turn it upside down like this, it can be made to read justice. There is no knowing which sense is intended. That is part of barbarian cunning.

"It is the same with the rest of these slips." I plunge my good hand into the chest and stir. "They form an allegory. They can be read in many orders. Further, each single slip can be read in many ways. Together they can be read as a domestic journal, or they can be read as a plan of war, or they can be turned on their sides and read as a history of the last years of the Empire—the old Empire, I mean. There is no agreement among scholars about how to interpret these relics of the ancient barbarians. Allegorical sets like this one can be found buried all over the desert. I found this one not three miles from here in the ruins of a public building. Graveyards are another good place to look in, though it is not always easy to tell where barbarian burial sites lie. It is recommended that you simply dig at random: perhaps at the very spot where you stand you will come upon scraps, shards, reminders of the dead. Also the air: the air is full of sighs and cries. These are never lost: if you listen carefully, with a sympathetic ear, you can hear them echoing forever within the second sphere. The night is best: sometimes when you have difficulty in falling asleep it is because your ears have been reached by the cries of the dead which, like their writings, are open to many interpretations.

“Thank you. I have finished translating.”

I have not failed to keep an eye on Joll through all this. He has not stirred again, save to lay a hand on his subordinate’s sleeve at the moment when I referred to the Empire and he rose, ready to strike me.

If he comes near me I will hit him with all the strength in my body. I will not disappear into the earth without leaving my mark on them.

The Colonel speaks. “You have no idea how tiresome your behaviour is. You are the one and only official we have had to work with on the frontier who has not given us his fullest co-operation. Candidly, I must tell you I am not interested in these sticks.” He waves a hand at the slips scattered on the desk. “They are very likely gambling-sticks. I know that other tribes on the border gamble with sticks.

“I ask you to consider soberly: what kind of future do you have here? You cannot be allowed to remain in your post. You have utterly disgraced yourself. Even if you are not eventually prosecuted —”

“I am waiting for you to prosecute me!” I shout. “When are you going to do it? When are you going to bring me to trial? When am I going to have a chance to defend myself?” I am in a fury. None of the speechlessness I felt in front of the crowd afflicts me. If I were to confront these men now, in public, in a fair trial, I would find the words to shame them. It is a matter of health and strength: I feel my hot words swell in my breast. But they will never bring a man to trial while he is healthy and strong enough to confound them. They will shut me away in the dark till I am a muttering idiot, a ghost of myself; then they will haul me before a closed court and in five minutes dispose of the legalities they find so tiresome.

“For the duration of the emergency, as you know,” says the Colonel, “the administration of justice is out of the hands of civilians and in the hands of the Bureau.” He sighs. “Magistrate, you seem to believe that we do not dare to bring you to trial because we fear you are too popular a figure in this town. I do not think you are aware of how much you forfeited by neglecting your duties, shunning your friends, keeping company with low people. There is no one I have spoken to who has not at some time felt insulted by your behaviour.”

“My private life is none of their business!”

“Nevertheless, I may tell you that our decision to relieve you of your duties has been welcomed in most quarters. Personally I have nothing against you. When I arrived back a few days ago, I had decided that all I wanted from you was a clear answer to a simple question, after which you could have returned to your concubines a free man.”

It strikes me suddenly that the insult may not be gratuitous, that perhaps for different reasons these two men might welcome it if I lost my temper. Burning with outrage, tense in every muscle, I guard my silence.

“However, you seem to have a new ambition,” he goes on. “You seem to want to make a name for yourself as the One Just Man, the man who is prepared to sacrifice his freedom to his principles.

"But let me ask you: do you believe that that is how your fellow-citizens see you after the ridiculous spectacle you created on the square the other day? Believe me, to people in this town you are not the One Just Man, you are simply a clown, a madman. You are dirty, you stink, they can smell you a mile away. You look like an old beggar-man, a refuse-scavenger. They do not want you back in any capacity. You have no future here.

"You want to go down in history as a martyr, I suspect. But who is going to put you in the history books? These border troubles are of no significance. In a while they will pass and the frontier will go to sleep for another twenty years. People are not interested in the history of the back of beyond."

"There were no border troubles before you came," I say.

"That is nonsense," he says. "You are simply ignorant of the facts. You are living in a world of the past. You think we are dealing with small groups of peaceful nomads. In fact we are dealing with a well organized enemy. If you had travelled with the expeditionary force you would have seen that for yourself."

"Those pitiable prisoners you brought in—are they the enemy I must fear? Is that what you say? You are the enemy, Colonel!" I can restrain myself no longer. I pound the desk with my fist. "You are the enemy, you have made the war, and you have given them all the martyrs they need—starting not now but a year ago when you committed your first filthy barbarities here! History will bear me out!"

"Nonsense. There will be no history, the affair is too trivial." He seems impassive, but I am sure I have shaken him.

"You are an obscene torturer! You deserve to hang!"

"Thus speaks the judge, the One Just Man," he murmurs.

We stare into each other's eyes.

"Now," he says, squaring the papers before him: "I would like a statement on everything that passed between you and the barbarians on your recent and unauthorized visit to them."

"I refuse."

"Very well. Our interview is over." He turns to his subordinate. "He is your responsibility." He stands up, walks out. I face the warrant officer.

• •

The wound on my cheek, never washed or dressed, is swollen and inflamed. A crust like a fat caterpillar has formed on it. My left eye is a mere slit, my nose a shapeless throbbing lump. I must breathe through my mouth.

I lie in the reek of old vomit obsessed with the thought of water. I have had nothing to drink for two days.

In my suffering there is nothing ennobling. Little of what I call suffering is even pain. What I am made to undergo is subjection to the most rudimentary needs of my body: to drink, to relieve itself, to find the posture in which it is least sore. When Warrant Officer Mandel and his man first brought me back here and lit the lamp and closed the door, I wondered how much pain a plump comfortable old man would be able to endure in the name of his eccentric notions of how the Empire should conduct itself. But my torturers were not interested in degrees of pain. They were interested only in demonstrating to me what it meant to live in a body, as a body, a body which can entertain notions of justice only as long as it is whole and well, which very soon forgets them when its head is gripped and a pipe is pushed down its gullet and pints of salt water are poured into it till it coughs and retches and flails and voids itself. They did not come to force the story out of me of what I had said to the barbarians and what the barbarians had said to me. So I had no chance to throw the high-sounding words I had ready in their faces. They came to my cell to show me the meaning of humanity, and in the space of an hour they showed me a great deal.

• •

Nor is it a question of who endures longest. I used to think to myself, "They are sitting in another room discussing me. They are saying to each other, 'How much longer before he grovels? In an hour we will go back and see.' "

But it is not like that. They have no elaborated system of pain and deprivation to which they subject me. For two days I go without food and water. On the third day I am fed. "I am sorry," says the man who brings my food, "we forgot." It is not malice that makes them forget. My torturers have their own lives to lead. I am not the centre of their universe. Mandel's underling probably spends his days counting bags in the commissary or patrolling the earthworks, grumbling to himself about the heat. Mandel himself, I am sure, spends more time polishing his straps and buckles than he spends on me. When the mood takes him he comes and gives me a lesson in humanity. How long can I withstand the randomness of their attacks? And what will happen if I succumb, weep, grovel, while yet the attacks go on?

• •

They call me into the yard. I stand before them hiding my nakedness, nursing my sore hand, a tired old bear made tame by too much baiting. "Run," Mandel says. I run around the yard under the blazing sun. When I slacken he slaps me on the buttocks with his cane and I trot faster. The soldiers leave their siesta and watch from the shade, the scullery maids hang over the kitchen door, children stare through the bars of the gate. "I cannot!" I gasp. "My heart!" I stop, hang my head, clutch my chest. Everyone waits patiently while I recover myself. Then the cane prods me and I shamble on, moving no faster than a man walks.

Or else I do tricks for them. They stretch a rope at knee-height and I jump back and forth over it. They call the cook's little grandson over and give him one end to hold. "Keep it steady," they say, "we don't want him to trip." The child grips his end of the rope with both hands, concentrating on this important task, waiting for me to jump. I baulk. The point of the cane finds its way between my buttocks and prods. "Jump," Mandel murmurs. I run, make a little skip, blunder into the rope, and stand there. I smell of shit. I am not permitted to wash. The flies follow me everywhere, circling around the appetizing sore on my cheek, alighting if I stand still for a moment. The looping movement of my hand before my face to chase them away has become as automatic as the flick of a cow's tail. "Tell him he must do better next time," Mandel says to the boy. The boy smiles and looks away. I sit down in the dust to wait for the next trick. "Do you know how to skip?" he says to the boy. "Give the rope to the man and ask him to show you how to skip." I skip.

It cost me agonies of shame the first time I had to come out of my den and stand naked before these idlers or jerk my body about for their amusement. Now I am past shame. My mind is turned wholly to the menace of the moment when my knees turn to water or my heart grips me like a crab and I have to stand still; and each time I discover with surprise that after a little rest, after the application of a little pain, I can be made to move, to jump or skip or crawl or run a little further. Is there a point at which I will lie down and say, "Kill me—I would rather die than go on"? Sometimes I think I am approaching that point, but I am always mistaken.

There is no consoling grandeur in any of this. When I wake up groaning in the night it is because I am reliving in dreams the pettiest degradations. There is no way of dying allowed me, it seems, except like a dog in a corner.

• •

Then one day they throw open the door and I step out to face not two men but a squad standing to attention. "Here," says Mandel, and hands me a woman's calico smock. "Put it on."

"Why?"

"Very well, if you want to go naked, go naked."

I slip the smock over my head. It reaches halfway down my thighs. I catch a glimpse of the two youngest maids ducking back into the kitchen, dissolving in giggles.

My wrists are caught behind my back and tied. "The time has come, Magistrate," Mandel whispers in my ear. "Do your best to behave like a man." I am sure I can smell liquor on his breath.

They march me out of the yard. Under the mulberry trees, where the earth is purple with the juice of fallen berries, there is a knot of people waiting. Children are scrambling about on the branches. As I approach everyone falls silent.

A soldier tosses up the end of a new white hemp rope; one of the children in the tree catches it, loops it over a branch, and drops it back.

I know this is only a trick, a new way of passing the afternoon for men bored with the old torments. Nevertheless my bowels turn to water. "Where is the Colonel?" I whisper. No one pays any heed.

"Do you want to say something?" says Mandel. "Say whatever you wish. We give you this opportunity."

I look into his clear blue eyes, as clear as if there were crystal lenses slipped over his eyeballs. He looks back at me. I have no idea what he sees. Thinking of him, I have said the words torture ... torturer to myself, but they are strange words, and the more I repeat them the more strange they grow, till they lie like stones on my tongue. Perhaps this man, and the man he brings along to help him with his work, and their Colonel, are torturers, perhaps that is their designation on three cards in a pay-office somewhere in the capital, though it is more likely that the cards call them security officers. But when I look at him I see simply the clear blue eyes, the rather rigid good looks, the teeth slightly too long where the gums are receding. He deals with my soul: every day he folds the flesh aside and exposes my soul to the light; he has probably seen many souls in the course of his working life; but the care of souls seems to have left no more mark on him than the care of hearts leaves on the surgeon.

"I am trying very hard to understand your feelings towards me," I say. I cannot help mumbling, my voice is unsteady, I am afraid and the sweat is dripping from me. "Much more than an opportunity to address these people, to whom I have nothing to say, would I appreciate a few words from you. So that I can come to understand why you devote yourself to this work. And can hear what you feel towards me, whom you have hurt a great deal and now seem to be proposing to kill."

Amazed I stare at this elaborate utterance as it winds its way out of me. Am I mad enough to intend a provocation?

"Do you see this hand?" he says. He holds his hand an inch from my face. "When I was younger"—he flexes the fingers—"I used to be able to poke this finger"—he holds up the index finger—"through a pumpkin-shell." He puts the tip of his finger against my forehead and presses. I take a step backwards.

They even have a cap ready for me, a salt-bag which they slip over my head and tie around my throat with a string. Through the mesh I watch them bring up the ladder and prop it against the branch. I am guided to it, my foot is set on the lowest rung, the noose is settled under my ear. "Now climb," says Mandel.

I turn my head and see two dim figures holding the end of the rope. "I can't climb with my hands tied," I say. My heart is hammering. "Climb," he says, steadying me by the arm. The rope tightens. "Keep it tight," he orders.

I climb, he climbs behind me, guiding me. I count ten rungs. Leaves brush against me. I stop. He grips my arm tighter. "Do you think we are playing?" he says. He talks through clenched teeth in a fury I do not understand. "Do you think I don't mean what I say?"

My eyes sting with sweat inside the bag. "No," I say, "I do not think you are playing." As long as the rope remains taut I know they are playing. If the rope goes slack, and I slip, I will die.

"Then what do you want to say to me?"

"I want to say that nothing passed between myself and the barbarians concerning military matters. It was a private affair. I went to return the girl to her family. For no other purpose."

"Is that all you want to say to me?"

"I want to say that no one deserves to die." In my absurd frock and bag, with the nausea of cowardice in my mouth, I say: "I want to live. As every man wants to live. To live and live and live. No matter what."

"That isn't enough." He lets my arm go. I teeter on my tenth rung, the rope saving my balance. "Do you see?" he says. He retreats down the ladder, leaving me alone.

Not sweat but tears.

There is a rustling in the leaves near me. A child's voice: "Can you see, uncle?"

"No."

"Hey, monkeys, come down!" calls someone from below. Through the taut rope I can feel the vibration of their movements in the branches.

So I stand for a long while, balancing carefully on the rung, feeling the comfort of the wood in the curve of my sole, trying not to waver, keeping the tension of the rope as constant as possible.

How long will a crowd of idlers be content to watch a man stand on a ladder? I would stand here till the flesh dropped from my bones, through storm and hail and flood, to live.

But now the rope tightens, I can even hear it rasp as it passes over the bark, till I must stretch to keep it from throttling me.

This is not a contest of patience, then: if the crowd is not satisfied the rules are changed. But of what use is it to blame the crowd? A scapegoat is named, a festival is declared, the laws are suspended: who would not flock to see the entertainment? What is it I object to in these spectacles of abasement and suffering and death that our new regime puts on but their lack of decorum? What will my own administration be remembered for besides moving the shambles from the marketplace to the outskirts of the town twenty years ago in the interests of decency? I try to call out something, a word of blind fear, a shriek, but the rope is now so tight that I am strangled, speechless. The blood hammers in my ears. I feel my toes lose their hold. I am swinging gently in the air, bumping against the ladder, flailing with my feet. The drumbeat in my ears becomes slower and louder till it is all I can hear.

I am standing in front of the old man, screwing up my eyes against the wind, waiting for him to speak. The ancient gun still rests between his horse's ears, but it is not aimed at me. I am aware of the vastness of the sky all around us, and of the desert.

I watch his lips. At any moment now he will speak: I must listen carefully to capture every syllable, so that later, repeating them to myself, poring over them, I can discover the answer to a question which for the moment has flown like a bird from my recollection.

I can see every hair of the horse's mane, every wrinkle of the old man's face, every rock and furrow of the hillside.

The girl, with her black hair braided and hanging over her shoulder in barbarian fashion, sits her horse behind him. Her head is bowed, she too is waiting for him to speak.

I sigh. "What a pity," I think. "It is too late now."

I am swinging loose. The breeze lifts my smock and plays with my naked body. I am relaxed, floating. In a woman's clothes.

What must be my feet touch the ground, though they are numb to all feeling. I stretch myself out carefully, at full length, light as a leaf. Whatever it is that has held my head so tightly slackens its grip. From inside me comes a ponderous grating. I breathe. All is well.

Then the hood comes off, the sun dazzles my eyes, I am hauled to my feet, everything swims before me, I go blank.

The word flying whispers itself somewhere at the edge of my consciousness. Yes, it is true, I have been flying.

I am looking into the blue eyes of Mandel. His lips move but I hear no words. I shake my head, and having once started find that I cannot stop.

"I was saying," he says, "now we will show you another form of flying."

"He can't hear you," someone says. "He can hear," says Mandel. He slips the noose from my neck and knots it around the cord that binds my wrists. "Pull him up."

If I can hold my arms stiff, if I am acrobat enough to swing a foot up and hook it around the rope, I will be able to hang upside down and not be hurt: that is my last thought before they begin to hoist me. But I am as weak as a baby, my arms come up behind my back, and as my feet leave the ground I feel a terrible tearing in my shoulders as though whole sheets of muscle are giving way. From my throat comes the first mournful dry bellow, like the pouring of gravel. Two little boys drop out of the tree and, hand in hand, not looking back, trot off. I bellow again and again, there is nothing I can do to stop it, the noise comes out of a body that knows itself damaged perhaps beyond repair and roars its fright. Even if all the children of the town should hear me I cannot stop myself: let us only pray that they do not imitate their elders' games, or tomorrow there will be a plague of little bodies dangling from the trees. Someone gives me a push and I begin to float back and forth in an arc a foot above the ground like a great old moth with its wings pinched together, roaring, shouting. "He is calling his barbarian friends," someone observes. "That is barbarian language you hear." There is laughter.

1980

Endnotes

- Note 1: The magistrate, narrator of the novel, listens from the prison in which the empire has incarcerated him.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Over the years the magistrate has conducted archaeological digs outside the city, unearthing these poplar slips and other artifacts.Return to reference 2

EAVAN BOLAND

1944–2020

Eavan Boland was born in Dublin, the youngest daughter of an Irish diplomat and a painter, but as recalled in “Fond Memory” and other poems, she was displaced as a six-year-old from Ireland to London, where her father was Irish ambassador, and then to New York, where he was his country’s representative at the United Nations, before finally returning to Ireland in adolescence. She attended convent schools in these various locations. In Ireland she studied—and then taught—English at Trinity College, Dublin, and following that she taught at University College, the University of Iowa, and Stanford University.

Boland said in a 1994 lecture, “I am an Irish poet. A woman poet. In the first category I enter the tradition of the English language at an angle. In the second, I enter my own tradition at an even more steep angle.” The great puzzle of Boland’s career was how to embrace Irish identity while rejecting certain male-centered assumptions that have long dominated Irish literary culture. For Boland as a young woman writer, the frozen, mythical images of the Irish nation as an idealized woman—Mother Ireland, Dark Rosaleen, Cathleen Ni Houlihan—were inhibiting and insufficient. To bring into Irish verse a national narrative, a “herstory” that interweaves private life and public life, Boland seized on an alternative tradition to that of Irish male poets—namely, the example of American women poets such as Sylvia Plath and Adrienne Rich. Her eye for symbolic detail, her ear for musical structure, her use of form to mirror content served her well in her effort to recover and vivify Irish women's historical experiences, including domestic labor, motherhood, famine, prostitution, and emigration.

Fond Memory

It was a school where all the children wore darned worsted;⁰
where they cried—or almost all—when the Reverend Mother
announced at lunch-time that the King¹ had died peacefully in his sleep. I dressed in wool as well, ate rationed food, played English games and learned 5 how wise the Magna Carta was, how hard the Hanoverians²
had tried, the measure and complexity of verse,
the hum and score of the whole orchestra.
At three-o'clock I caught two buses home
10 where sometimes in the late afternoon at a piano pushed into a corner of the playroom my father would sit down and play the slow lilts of Tom Moore³ while I stood there trying not to weep at the cigarette smoke stinging up from between his fingers and—as much as I could 15 think—
I thought this is my country, was, will be again, this upward-straining song made to be our safe inventory of pain. And I was wrong.

1987

Endnotes

- Note 1: King George VI of the United Kingdom died in 1952. Boland's father was a diplomat, and she spent much of her childhood in London.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Family of English monarchs who reigned from 1714 to 1901. "Magna Carta": charter of English liberties granted by King John in 1215.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Irish poet and singer (1779–1852).Return to reference 3

Notes

- °: woolen fabricReturn to reference °

The Dolls Museum in Dublin

The wounds are terrible. The paint is old.
The cracks along the lips and on the cheeks cannot be fixed. The cotton lawn¹ is soiled.
The arms are ivory dissolved to wax.

5 Recall the Quadrille.² Hum the waltz.
Promenade on the yacht-club terraces.
Put back the lamps in their copper holders,
the carriage wheels on the cobbled quays.

And recreate Easter in Dublin.³
10 Booted officers. Their mistresses.
Sunlight criss-crossing College Green.
Steam hissing from the flanks of horses.

Here they are. Cradled and cleaned, held close in the arms of their owners.
15 Their cold hands clasped by warm hands,
their faces memorized like perfect manners.

The altars are mannerly with linen.
The lilies are whiter than surplices.⁴
The candles are burning and warning:
20 Rejoice, they whisper. After sacrifice.

Horse-chestnuts hold up their candles.
The Green is vivid with parasols.
Sunlight is pastel and windless.
The bar of the Shelbourne⁵ is full.

Laughter and gossip on the terraces.

25 Rumour and alarm at the barracks.
The Empire is summoning its officers.
The carriages are turning: they are turning back.

30 Past children walking with governesses,
Looking down, cossetting their dolls,
then looking up as the carriage passes,
the shadow chilling them. Twilight falls.

35 It is twilight in the dolls' museum. Shadows remain on the parchment-coloured waists, are bruises on the stitched cotton clothes,
are hidden in the dimples on the wrists.

40 The eyes are wide. They cannot address the helplessness which has lingered in the airless peace of each glass case:
to have survived. To have been stronger than a moment. To be the hostages ignorance takes from time and ornament from destiny. Both.
To be the present of the past. To infer the difference with a terrible stare. But not feel it. And not know it.

1994

Endnotes

- Note 1: Usually fine linen, but also, as here, fine cotton.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: A square dance and the music for it.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: What became known as the "Easter Rising" began on Easter Monday, 1916, when over sixteen hundred Irish nationalists seized key points in Dublin and an Irish Republic was proclaimed from the General Post Office. See W. B. Yeats's "Easter, 1916" (p. 227).Return to reference 3

- Note 4: White linen vestments worn over cassocks.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Large Dublin hotel.Return to reference 5

The Lost Land

I have two daughters.

They are all I ever wanted from the earth.

Or almost all.

I also wanted one piece of ground:

5 One city trapped by hills. One urban river.
An island in its element.

So I could say mine. My own.
And mean it.

Now they are grown up and far away

10 and memory itself has become an emigrant,
wandering in a place
where love disassembles itself as landscape:

Where the hills
15 are the colours of a child's eyes,
where my children are distances, horizons:

At night,
on the edge of sleep,
I can see the shore of Dublin Bay.
20 Its rocky sweep and its granite pier.

Is this, I say
how they must have seen it,

backing out on the mailboat at twilight,
shadows falling
on everything they had to leave?
25 And would love forever?
And then
I imagine myself
at the landward rail of that boat
30 searching for the last sight of a hand.
I see myself
on the underworld side of that water, the darkness coming in fast, saying all the names I know for a lost land:
35 Ireland. Absence. Daughter.

1998

SALMAN RUSHDIE

b. 1947

The most influential novelist to have come from South Asia in the last seventy years is Ahmed Salman Rushdie, whose dynamic narratives—stories of magic, suffering, and the vitality of human beings in the grip of history—helped generate a literary renaissance in India. “I come from Bombay,” Rushdie has said, “and from a Muslim family, too. ‘My’ India has always been based on ideas of multiplicity, pluralism, hybridity: ideas to which the ideologies of the communalists are diametrically opposed. To my mind, the defining image of India is the crowd, and a crowd is by its very nature superabundant, heterogeneous, many things at once.” Rushdie was educated at Cathedral School, Bombay (now Mumbai), and from the age of thirteen, at Rugby School, Warwickshire, and King’s College, Cambridge. After living briefly in Pakistan, where his prosperous family had moved, Rushdie settled in England, working as an actor and as a freelance advertising copywriter (1970–80).

His first novel, Grimus (1979), passed unnoticed, but his second, Midnight’s Children (1981), announced the arrival of a major writer. Taking its title from those who were born—two months later than its author—around midnight on August 15, 1947, when the independent state of India was born, Midnight’s Children is a work of prodigious prodigality, a cornucopia as richly fertile in character, incident, and language as the subcontinent that is its setting. The book’s triumphant progress across the world culminated in its being judged

“the Booker of Bookers,” the best novel to have won Britain’s premier fiction prize in its first twenty-five years. Rushdie has said that “we’re all radio-active with history,” and the books that have followed Midnight’s Children have again shown a form of “magical realism”—learned from Latin American writers such as Jorge Luis Borges and Gabriel García Márquez—deployed in the service of a powerful political-historical imagination. Rushdie’s most notable novels of the 1990s and 2000s return to themes of historical violence, pluralism, and transnational violence, such as in Shalimar the Clown (2005), while making use of the forms of fable, fantasy, and metafictional narration, such as in The Enchantress of Florence (2008), Quichotte (2019), and Victory City (2023).

In 1988 Rushdie found himself at the perilous center of a real, rather than a magical-realist, political-historical storm. His novel The Satanic Verses provoked riots in India, Pakistan, and South Africa, and was judged by senior religious figures in Iran to have blasphemed the Prophet Muhammad (called by the offensive name “Mahound” in the novel), founder of the Muslim faith. A fatwa, or legal decree, calling for his death was pronounced. He was obliged to go into hiding, and for almost a decade lived under round-the-clock protection from British Secret Service agents, while governments argued for and against the lifting of the fatwa, and the author himself became symbolic of the vulnerability of the intellectual in the face of fundamentalism. The lifting of the fatwa in 1998 allowed Rushdie to reappear in public, but it is seen as irrevocable by some religious groups, and so his life has remained under constant threat. On August 12, 2022, just as he was about to give a lecture at the Chatauqua Institution in New York State, Rushdie was attacked by a man and stabbed multiple times, afterward spending six weeks in the hospital and losing vision in one eye.

Rushdie has defended The Satanic Verses in the essay “In Good Faith” (1990), while defining the irreverently pluralistic vision behind his “mongrel” aesthetic—a vision that has repeatedly resulted in the burning or banning of his books by political nationalists and religious purists in South Asia and other parts of the world:

If The Satanic Verses is anything, it is a migrant's-eye view of the world. It is written from the very experience of uprooting, disjuncture and metamorphosis (slow or rapid, painful or pleasurable) that is the migrant condition, and from which, I believe, can be derived a metaphor for all humanity.

Standing at the centre of the novel is a group of characters most of whom are British Muslims, or not particularly religious persons of Muslim background, struggling with just the sort of great problems of hybridization and ghettoization, of reconciling the old and the new. Those who oppose the novel most vociferously today are of the opinion that intermingling with a different culture will inevitably weaken and ruin their own. I am of the opposite opinion. The Satanic Verses celebrates hybridity, impurity, intermingling, the transformation that comes of new and unexpected combinations of human beings, cultures, ideas, politics, movies, songs. It rejoices in mongrelization and fears the absolutism of the Pure. Mélange, hotchpotch, a bit of this and a bit of that is how newness enters the world. It is the great possibility that mass migration gives the world, and I have tried to embrace it. The Satanic Verses is for change-by-fusion, change-by-conjoining. It is a love-song to our mongrel selves.

An earlier story, published the same year as his groundbreaking Midnight's Children, had invoked the Prophet uncontroversially. Like Midnight's Children, the story "The Prophet's Hair" buoyantly fuses Standard English with an exuberantly Indianized English, peppered with words of Hindi, Persian, Sanskrit, and Arabic origin—among the many languages that have been used in the extraordinarily polyglot Indian subcontinent. Like The Satanic Verses, "The Prophet's Hair" risks playfulness, satire, caricature, and whimsy in its treatment of the religion of his youth (though Rushdie has indicated he was brought up not as a believer but within a relaxed Muslim climate, almost secularized by the variety of other religions surrounding it).

The story is at once a moral fable in the tradition of The Thousand and One Nights and a magical-realist extravaganza, packed with incident, poetic detail ("water to which the cold of the night had given the cloudy consistency of wild honey"), and humor, all brilliantly interwoven at breakneck speed.

The Prophet's¹ Hair

Early in the year 19—, when Srinagar² was under the spell of a winter so fierce it could crack men's bones as if they were glass, a young man upon whose cold-pinked skin there lay, like a frost, the unmistakable sheen of wealth was to be seen entering the most wretched and disreputable part of the city, where the houses of wood and corrugated iron seemed perpetually on the verge of losing their balance, and asking in low, grave tones where he might go to engage the services of a dependably professional burglar. The young man's name was Atta, and the rogues in that part of town directed him gleefully into ever darker and less public alleys, until in a yard wet with the blood of a slaughtered chicken he was set upon by two men whose faces he never saw, robbed of the substantial bank-roll which he had insanely brought on his solitary excursion, and beaten within an inch of his life.

Night fell. His body was carried by anonymous hands to the edge of the lake, whence it was transported by shikara³ across the water and deposited, torn and bleeding, on the deserted embankment of the canal which led to the gardens of Shalimar. At dawn the next morning a flower-vendor was rowing his boat through water to which the cold of the night had given the cloudy consistency of wild honey when he saw the prone form of young Atta, who was just beginning to stir and moan, and on whose now deathly pale skin the sheen of wealth could still be made out dimly beneath an actual layer of frost.

The flower-vendor moored his craft and by stooping over the mouth of the injured man was able to learn the poor fellow's address, which was mumbled through lips that could scarcely move; whereupon, hoping for a large tip, the hawker rowed Atta home to a large house on the shores of the lake, where a beautiful but inexplicably bruised young woman and her distraught, but equally handsome mother, neither of whom, it was clear from their eyes, had slept a wink from worrying, screamed at the sight of their Atta—who was the elder brother of the beautiful young woman—lying motionless amidst the funereally stunted winter blooms of the hopeful florist.

The flower-vendor was indeed paid off handsomely, not least to ensure his silence, and plays no further part in our story. Atta himself, suffering terribly from exposure as well as a broken skull, entered a coma which caused the city's finest doctors to shrug helplessly. It was therefore all the more remarkable that on the very next evening the most wretched and disreputable part of the city received a second unexpected visitor. This was Huma, the sister of the unfortunate young man, and her question was the same as her brother's, and asked in the same low, grave tones:

'Where may I hire a thief?'

The story of the rich idiot who had come looking for a burglar was already common knowledge in those insalubrious⁴ gullies, but this time the young woman added: 'I should say that I am carrying no money, nor am I wearing any jewellery items. My father has disowned me and will pay no ransom if I am kidnapped; and a letter has been lodged with the Deputy Commissioner of Police, my uncle, to be opened in the event of my not being safe at home by morning. In that letter he will find full details of my journey here, and he will move Heaven and Earth to punish my assailants.'

Her exceptional beauty, which was visible even through the enormous welts and bruises disfiguring her arms and forehead, coupled with the oddity of her inquiries, had attracted a sizable group of curious onlookers, and because her little speech seemed to them to cover just about everything, no one attempted to injure her in any way, although there were some raucous comments to the effect that it was pretty peculiar for someone who was trying to hire a crook to invoke the protection of a high-up policeman uncle.

She was directed into ever darker and less public alleys until finally in a gully as dark as ink an old woman with eyes which stared so piercingly that Huma instantly understood she was blind motioned her through a doorway from which darkness seemed to be pouring like smoke. Clenching her fists, angrily ordering her heart to behave normally, Huma followed the old woman into the gloom-wrapped house.

The faintest conceivable rivulet of candlelight trickled through the darkness; following this unreliable yellow thread (because she could no longer see the old lady), Huma received a sudden sharp blow to the shins and cried out involuntarily, after which she at once bit her lip, angry at having revealed her mounting terror to whoever or whatever waited before her, shrouded in blackness.

She had, in fact, collided with a low table on which a single candle burned and beyond which a mountainous figure could be made out, sitting cross-legged on the floor. 'Sit, sit,' said a man's calm, deep voice, and her legs, needing no more flowery invitation, buckled beneath her at the terse command. Clutching her left hand in her right, she forced her voice to respond evenly:

'And you, sir, will be the thief I have been requesting?'

Shifting its weight very slightly, the shadow-mountain informed Huma that all criminal activity originating in this zone was well organised and also centrally controlled, so that all requests for what might be termed freelance work had to be channelled through this room.

He demanded comprehensive details of the crime to be committed, including a precise inventory of items to be acquired, also a clear statement of all financial inducements being offered with no gratuities excluded, plus, for filing purposes only, a summary of the motives for the application.

At this, Huma, as though remembering something, stiffened both in body and resolve and replied loudly that her motives were entirely a matter for herself; that she would discuss details with no one but the thief himself; but that the rewards she proposed could only be described as 'lavish'.

'All I am willing to disclose to you, sir, since it appears that I am on the premises of some sort of employment agency, is that in return for such lavish rewards I must have the most desperate criminal at your disposal, a man for whom life holds no terrors, not even the fear of God.

'The worst of fellows, I tell you—nothing less will do!'

At this a paraffin storm-lantern was lighted, and Huma saw facing her a grey-haired giant down whose left cheek ran the most sinister of scars, a cicatrice in the shape of the letter sín in the Nastaliq⁵ script. She was gripped by the insupportably nostalgic notion that the bogeyman of her childhood nursery had risen up to confront her, because her ayah⁶ had always forestalled any incipient acts of disobedience by threatening Huma and Atta: 'You don't watch out and I'll send that one to steal you away—that Sheikh⁷ Sín, the Thief of Thieves!'

Here, grey-haired but unquestionably scarred, was the notorious criminal himself—and was she out of her mind, were her ears playing tricks, or had he truly just announced that, given the stated circumstances, he himself was the only man for the job?

Struggling hard against the newborn goblins of nostalgia, Huma warned the fearsome volunteer that only a matter of extreme urgency and peril would have brought her unescorted into these ferocious streets.

'Because we can afford no last-minute backings-out,' she continued, 'I am determined to tell you everything, keeping back no secrets whatsoever. If, after hearing me out, you are still prepared to proceed, then we shall do everything in our power to assist you, and to make you rich.'

The old thief shrugged, nodded, spat. Huma began her story.

Six days ago, everything in the household of her father, the wealthy moneylender Hashim, had been as it always was. At breakfast her mother had spooned khichri⁸ lovingly on to the moneylender's plate; the conversation had been filled with those expressions of courtesy and solicitude on which the family prided itself.

Hashim was fond of pointing out that while he was not a godly man he set great store by 'living honourably in the world'. In that spacious lakeside residence, all outsiders were greeted with the same formality and respect, even those unfortunates who came to negotiate for small fragments of Hashim's large fortune, and of whom he naturally asked an interest rate of over 70 per cent, partly, as he told his khichri-spooning wife, 'to teach these people the value of money; let them only learn that, and they will be cured of this fever of borrowing borrowing all the time—so you see that if my plans succeed, I shall put myself out of business!'

In their children, Atta and Huma, the moneylender and his wife had successfully sought to inculcate the virtues of thrift, plain dealing and a healthy independence of spirit. On this, too, Hashim was fond of congratulating himself.

Breakfast ended; the family members wished one another a fulfilling day. Within a few hours, however, the glassy contentment of that household, of that life of porcelain delicacy and alabaster sensibilities, was to be shattered beyond all hope of repair.

The moneylender summoned his personal shikara and was on the point of stepping into it when, attracted, by a glint of silver, he noticed a small vial floating between the boat and his private quay. On an impulse, he scooped it out of the glutinous water.

It was a cylinder of tinted glass cased in exquisitely wrought silver, and Hashim saw within its walls a silver pendant bearing a single strand of human hair.

Closing his fist around this unique discovery, he muttered to the boatman that he'd changed his plans, and hurried to his sanctum,⁹ where, behind closed doors, he feasted his eyes on his find.

There can be no doubt that Hashim the moneylender knew from the first that he was in possession of the famous relic of the Prophet Muhammad, that revered hair whose theft from its shrine at Hazratbal mosque the previous morning had created an unprecedented hue and cry in the valley.

The thieves—no doubt alarmed by the pandemonium, by the procession through the streets of endless ululating¹ crocodiles of lamentation, by the riots, the political ramifications and by the massive police search which was commanded and carried out by men whose entire careers now hung upon the finding of this lost hair—had evidently panicked and hurled the vial into the gelatine bosom of the lake.

Having found it by a stroke of great good fortune, Hashim's duty as a citizen was clear: the hair must be restored to its shrine, and the state to equanimity and peace.

But the moneylender had a different notion.

All around him in his study was the evidence of his collector's mania. There were enormous glass cases full of impaled butterflies from Gulmarg, three dozen scale models in various metals of the legendary cannon Zamzama, innumerable swords, a Naga spear, ninety-four terracotta camels of the sort sold on railway station platforms, many samovars,² and a whole zoology of tiny sandalwood animals, which had originally been carved to serve as children's bathtime toys.

'And after all,' Hashim told himself, 'the Prophet would have disapproved mightily of this relic-worship. He abhorred the idea of being deified! So, by keeping this hair from its distracted devotees, I perform—do I not?—a finer service than I would by returning it! Naturally, I don't want it for its religious value . . . I'm a man of the world, of this world. I see it purely as a secular object of great rarity and blinding beauty. In short, it's the silver vial I desire, more than the hair.

'They say there are American millionaires who purchase stolen art masterpieces and hide them away—they would know how I feel. I must, must have it!'

Every collector must share his treasures with one other human being, and Hashim summoned—and told—his only son Atta, who was deeply perturbed but, having been sworn to secrecy, only spilled the beans when the troubles became too terrible to bear.

The youth excused himself and left his father alone in the crowded solitude of his collections. Hashim was sitting erect in a hard, straight-backed chair, gazing intently at the beautiful vial.

It was well known that the moneylender never ate lunch, so it was not until evening that a servant entered the sanctum to summon his master to the dining-table. He found Hashim as Atta had left him. The same, and not the same—for now the moneylender looked swollen, distended. His eyes bulged even more than they always had, they were red-rimmed, and his knuckles were white.

He seemed to be on the point of bursting! As though, under the influence of the misappropriated relic, he had filled up with some spectral fluid which might at any moment ooze uncontrollably from his every bodily opening.

He had to be helped to the table, and then the explosion did indeed take place.

Seemingly careless of the effect of his words on the carefully constructed and fragile constitution of the family's life, Hashim began to gush, to spume long streams of awful truths. In horrified silence, his children heard their father turn upon his wife, and reveal to her that for many years their marriage had been the worst of his afflictions. 'An end to politeness!' he thundered. 'An end to hypocrisy!'

Next, and in the same spirit, he revealed to his family the existence of a mistress; he informed them also of his regular visits to paid women. He told his wife that, far from being the principal beneficiary of his will, she would receive no more than the eighth portion which was her due under Islamic law. Then he turned upon his children, screaming at Atta for his lack of academic ability—'A dope! I have been cursed with a dope!'—and accusing his daughter of lasciviousness, because she went around the city barefaced, which was unseemly for any good Muslim girl to do. She should, he commanded, enter purdah³ forthwith.

Hashim left the table without having eaten and fell into the deep sleep of a man who has got many things off his chest, leaving his children stunned, in tears, and the dinner going cold on the sideboard under the gaze of an anticipatory bearer.⁴

At five o'clock the next morning the moneylender forced his family to rise, wash and say their prayers. From then on, he began to pray five times daily for the first time in his life, and his wife and children were obliged to do likewise.

Before breakfast, Huma saw the servants, under her father's direction, constructing a great heap of books in the garden and setting fire to it. The only volume left untouched was the Qur'an,⁵ which Hashim wrapped in a silken cloth and placed on a table in the hall. He ordered each member of his family to read passages from this book for at least two hours per day. Visits to the cinema were forbidden. And if Atta invited male friends to the house, Huma was to retire to her room.

By now, the family had entered a state of shock and dismay; but there was worse to come.

That afternoon, a trembling debtor arrived at the house to confess his inability to pay the latest instalment of interest owed, and made the mistake of reminding Hashim, in somewhat blustering fashion, of the Qur'an's strictures against usury. The moneylender flew into a rage and attacked the fellow with one of his large collection of bullwhips.

By mischance, later the same day a second defaulter came to plead for time, and was seen fleeing Hashim's study with a great gash in his arm, because Huma's father had called him a thief of other men's money and had tried to cut off the wretch's right hand with one of the thirty-eight kukri knives⁶ hanging on the study walls.

These breaches of the family's unwritten laws of decorum alarmed Atta and Huma, and when, that evening, their mother attempted to calm Hashim down, he struck her on the face with an open hand. Atta leapt to his mother's defence and he, too, was sent flying.

'From now on,' Hashim bellowed, 'there's going to be some discipline around here!'

The moneylender's wife began a fit of hysterics which continued throughout that night and the following day, and which so provoked her husband that he threatened her with divorce, at which she fled to her room, locked the door and subsided into a raga⁷ of sniffing. Huma now lost her composure, challenged her father openly, and announced (with that same independence of spirit which he had encouraged in her) that she would wear no cloth over her face; apart from anything else, it was bad for the eyes.

On hearing this, her father disowned her on the spot and gave her one week in which to pack her bags and go.

By the fourth day, the fear in the air of the house had become so thick that it was difficult to walk around. Atta told his shock-numbered sister: 'We are descending to gutter-level—but I know what must be done.'

That afternoon, Hashim left home accompanied by two hired thugs to extract the unpaid dues from his two insolvent clients. Atta went immediately to his father's study. Being the son and heir, he possessed his own key to the moneylender's safe. This he now used, and removing the little vial from its hiding-place, he slipped it into his trouser pocket and re-locked the safe door.

Now he told Huma the secret of what his father had fished out of Lake Dal, and exclaimed: 'Maybe I'm crazy—maybe the awful things that are happening have made me cracked—but I am convinced there will be no peace in our house until this hair is out of it.'

His sister at once agreed that the hair must be returned, and Atta set off in a hired shikara to Hazratbal mosque. Only when the boat had delivered him into the throng of the distraught faithful which was swirling around the desecrated shrine did Atta discover that the relic was no longer in his pocket. There was only a hole, which his mother, usually so attentive to household matters, must have overlooked under the stress of recent events.

Atta's initial surge of chagrin was quickly replaced by a feeling of profound relief.

'Suppose', he imagined, 'that I had already announced to the mullahs⁸ that the hair was on my person! They would never have believed me now—and this mob would have lynched me! At any rate, it has gone, and that's a load off my mind.' Feeling more contented than he had for days, the young man returned home.

Here he found his sister bruised and weeping in the hall; upstairs, in her bedroom, his mother wailed like a brand-new widow. He begged Huma to tell him what had happened, and when she replied that their father, returning from his brutal business trip, had once again noticed a glint of silver between boat and quay, had once again scooped up the errant relic, and was consequently in a rage to end all rages, having beaten the truth out of her—then Atta buried his face in his hands and sobbed out his opinion, which was that the hair was persecuting them, and had come back to finish the job.

It was Huma's turn to think of a way out of their troubles.

While her arms turned black and blue and great stains spread across her forehead, she hugged her brother and whispered to him that she was determined to get rid of the hair at all costs—she repeated this last phrase several times.

'The hair', she then declared, 'was stolen from the mosque; so it can be stolen from this house. But it must be a genuine robbery, carried out by a bona-fide thief, not by one of us who are under the hair's thrall—by a thief so desperate that he fears neither capture nor curses.'

Unfortunately, she added, the theft would be ten times harder to pull off now that their father, knowing that there had already been one attempt on the relic, was certainly on his guard.

'Can you do it?'

Huma, in a room lit by candle and storm-lantern, ended her account with one further question: 'What assurances can you give that the job holds no terrors for you still?'

The criminal, spitting, stated that he was not in the habit of providing references, as a cook might, or a gardener, but he was not alarmed so easily, certainly not by any children's djinni⁹ of a curse. Huma had to be content with this boast, and proceeded to describe the details of the proposed burglary.

'Since my brother's failure to return the hair to the mosque, my father has taken to sleeping with his precious treasure under his pillow. However, he sleeps alone, and very energetically; only enter his room without waking him, and he will certainly have tossed and turned quite enough to make the theft a simple matter. When you have the vial, come to my room,' and here she handed Sheikh Sín a plan of her home, 'and I will hand over all the jewellery owned by my mother and myself. You will find . . . it is worth . . . that is, you will be able to get a fortune for it . . . '

It was evident that her self-control was weakening and that she was on the point of physical collapse.

'Tonight,' she burst out finally. 'You must come tonight!'

No sooner had she left the room than the old criminal's body was convulsed by a fit of coughing: he spat blood into an old vanaspati¹ can. The great Sheikh, the 'Thief of Thieves', had become a sick man, and every day the time drew nearer when some young pretender to his power would stick a dagger in his stomach. A lifelong addiction to gambling had left him almost as poor as he had been when, decades ago, he had started out in this line of work as a mere pickpocket's apprentice; so in the extraordinary commission he had accepted from the moneylender's daughter he saw his opportunity of amassing enough wealth at a stroke to leave the valley for ever, and acquire the luxury of a respectable death which would leave his stomach intact.

As for the Prophet's hair, well, neither he nor his blind wife had ever had much to say for prophets—that was one thing they had in common with the moneylender's thunderstruck clan.

It would not do, however, to reveal the nature of this, his last crime, to his four sons. To his consternation, they had all grown up to be hopelessly devout men, who even spoke of making the pilgrimage to Mecca some day. 'Absurd!' their father would laugh at them. 'Just tell me how you will go?' For, with a parent's absolutist love, he had made sure they were all provided with a lifelong source of high income by crippling them at birth, so that, as they dragged themselves around the city, they earned excellent money in the begging business.

The children, then, could look after themselves.

He and his wife would be off soon with the jewel-boxes of the moneylender's women. It was a timely chance indeed that had brought the beautiful bruised girl into his corner of the town.

That night, the large house on the shore of the lake lay blindly waiting, with silence lapping at its walls. A burglar's night: clouds in the sky and mists on the winter water. Hashim the moneylender was asleep, the only member of his family to whom sleep had come that night. In another room, his son Atta lay deep in the coils of his coma with a blood-clot forming on his brain, watched over by a mother who had let down her long greying hair to show her grief, a mother who placed warm compresses on his head with gestures redolent of impotence. In a third bedroom Huma waited, fully dressed, amidst the jewel-heavy caskets of her desperation.

At last a bulbul² sang softly from the garden below her window and, creeping downstairs, she opened a door to the bird, on whose face there was a scar in the shape of the Nastaliq letter sín.

Noiselessly, the bird flew up the stairs behind her. At the head of the staircase they parted, moving in opposite directions along the corridor of their conspiracy without a glance at one another.

Entering the moneylender's room with professional ease, the burglar, Sín, discovered that Huma's predictions had been wholly accurate. Hashim lay sprawled diagonally across his bed, the pillow untenanted by his head, the prize easily accessible. Step by padded step, Sín moved towards the goal.

It was at this point that, in the bedroom next door, young Atta sat bolt upright in his bed, giving his mother a great fright, and without any warning—prompted by goodness knows what pressure of the blood-clot upon his brain—began screaming at the top of his voice:

'Thief! Thief! Thief!'

It seems probable that his poor mind had been dwelling, in these last moments, upon his own father; but it is impossible to be certain, because having uttered these three emphatic words the young man fell back upon his pillow and died.

At once his mother set up a screeching and a wailing and a keening and a howling so earsplittingly intense that they completed the work which Atta's cry had begun—that is, her laments penetrated the walls of her husband's bedroom and brought Hashim wide awake.

Sheikh Sín was just deciding whether to dive beneath the bed or brain the moneylender good and proper when Hashim grabbed the tiger-striped swordstick which always stood propped up in a corner beside his bed, and rushed from the room without so much as noticing the burglar who stood on the opposite side of the bed in the darkness. Sín stooped quickly and removed the vial containing the Prophet's hair from its hiding-place.

Meanwhile Hashim had erupted into the corridor, having unsheathed the sword inside his cane. In his right hand he held the weapon and was waving it about dementedly. His left hand was shaking the stick. A shadow came rushing towards him through the midnight darkness of the passageway and, in his somnolent anger, the moneylender thrust his sword fatally through its heart. Turning up the light, he found that he had murdered his daughter, and under the dire influence of this accident he was so overwhelmed by remorse that he turned the sword upon himself, fell upon it and so extinguished his life. His wife, the sole surviving member of the family, was driven mad by the general carnage and had to be committed to an asylum for the insane by her brother, the city's Deputy Commissioner of Police.

Sheikh Sín had quickly understood that the plan had gone awry.

Abandoning the dream of the jewel-boxes when he was but a few yards from its fulfilment, he climbed out of Hashim's window and made his escape during the appalling events described above. Reaching home before dawn, he woke his wife and confessed his failure. It would be necessary, he whispered, for him to vanish for a while. Her blind eyes never opened until he had gone.

The noise in the Hashim household had roused their servants and even managed to awaken the night-watchman, who had been fast asleep as usual on his charpoy³ by the street-gate. They alerted the police, and the Deputy Commissioner himself was informed. When he heard of Huma's death, the mournful officer opened and read the sealed letter which his niece had given him, and instantly led a large detachment of armed men into the light-repellent gullies of the most wretched and disreputable part of the city.

The tongue of a malicious cat-burglar named Huma's fellow-conspirator; the finger of an ambitious bank-robber pointed at the house in which he lay concealed; and although Sín managed to crawl through a hatch in the attic and attempt a roof-top escape, a bullet from the Deputy Commissioner's own rifle penetrated his stomach and brought him crashing messily to the ground at the feet of Huma's enraged uncle.

From the dead thief's pocket rolled a vial of tinted glass, cased in filigree silver.

The recovery of the Prophet's hair was announced at once on All-India Radio. One month later, the valley's holiest men assembled at the Hazratbal mosque and formally authenticated the relic. It sits to this day in a closely guarded vault by the shores of the loveliest of lakes in the heart of the valley which was once closer than any other place on earth to Paradise.

But before our story can properly be concluded, it is necessary to record that when the four sons of the dead Sheikh awoke on the morning of his death, having unwittingly spent a few minutes under the same roof as the famous hair, they found that a miracle had occurred, that they were all sound of limb and strong of wind, as whole as they might have been if their father had not thought to smash their legs in the first hours of their lives. They were, all four of them, very properly furious, because the miracle had reduced their earning powers by 75 per cent, at the most conservative estimate; so they were ruined men.

Only the Sheikh's widow had some reason for feeling grateful, because although her husband was dead she had regained her sight, so that it was possible for her to spend her last days gazing once more upon the beauties of the valley of Kashmir.

1981

Endnotes

- Note 1: The Prophet Muhammad, founder of the Muslim religion, was born in Mecca in about 570 and died in 632. Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Capital of the state of Kashmir. Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Long, swift Kashmiri boat. Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Unhealthy. Return to reference 4
- Note 5: A Persian cursive script, characterized by rounded forms and elongated horizontal strokes. "Cicatrice": scar of a healed wound.Return to reference 5

- Note 6: Child's nurse (Anglo-Indian, from Portuguese).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Chief (Arabic).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Rice and lentils cooked together (Hindi).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Private room.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Howling.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Apparatuses for making tea (Russian for "self-boilers").Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Area of certain traditional Indian houses in which Hindu or Muslim women live secluded from the sight of men outside their family circle.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Servant.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Or Koran, Muslims' sacred book: a collection of the Prophet Muhammad's oral revelations.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Curved knives broadening toward the point (Hindi).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Musical improvisation (Sanskrit).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Muslims learned in Islamic theology and sacred law.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: In Muslim demonology, a spirit (genie) with supernatural powers.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Vegetable fat used as butter in India.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Asian song thrush.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Light Indian bedstead.Return to reference 3

ANNE CARSON

b. 1950

Anne Carson was born in Toronto, Canada, and grew up in Ontario; she received both her B.A. and her Ph.D. in classics from the University of Toronto. The recipient of a MacArthur Fellowship, she has taught classics at the universities of Calgary, Princeton, Emory, McGill, and Michigan. Along with poetry, she has published books of criticism on classical literature, translations and adaptations from Greek, novels-in-verse, Autobiography of Red (1998) and Red Doc (2013), and the play Norma Jeane Baker of Troy (2019).

In her poetry, Carson braids together the ruminative texture of the essay, the narrative propulsion of the novel, the self-analysis of autobiography, and the lapidary compression of lyric. In “The Glass Essay,” a long poem that reflects on the dislocations of identity through time, love, and madness, she vividly narrates the end of a love affair, a visit with a difficult mother, and the degeneration of a father with Alzheimer’s in a nursing home. Into this semiautobiographical tale she weaves commentary on the writings of the Brontë sisters, whose works function—like the classical texts she often incorporates into her poetry—as oblique and remote points of comparison for the poet’s experience. Both personal and impersonal, Carson’s poetry bridges the gap between private narrative and philosophical speculation, between self-excavation and literary-critical analysis. Tightly wound with crisp diction, studded with striking metaphors, etched with epigrams and ironies, her poems are both lucid in feeling and intense in thought. They are at one and the same time intellectually crystalline and emotionally volcanic.

From The Glass Essay

* * *

160 Well there are many ways of being held prisoner,
I am thinking as I stride over the moor.
As a rule after lunch mother has a nap

and I go out to walk.
The bare blue trees and bleached wooden sky of April
carve into me with knives of light.

165 Something inside it reminds me of childhood—it is the light of the stalled time after lunch when clocks tick

and hearts shut
and fathers leave to go back to work and mothers stand at the kitchen sink pondering 170 something they never tell.
You remember too much,
my mother said to me recently.

Why hold onto all that? And I said,
Where can I put it down?
175 She shifted to a question about airports.

Crops of ice are changing to mud all around me as I push on across the moor warmed by drifts from the pale blue sun.

On the edge of the moor our pines dip and coast in breezes from somewhere else.

180

Perhaps the hardest thing about losing a lover is to watch the year repeat its days.
It is as if I could dip my hand down

185 into time and scoop up blue and green lozenges^o of April heat

a year ago in another country.

I can feel that other day running underneath this
one like an old videotape—here we go fast around the last corner

190 up the hill to his house, shadows of limes and roses blowing in the car window and music spraying from the radio and him singing and touching my left hand to his lips.

Law¹ lived in a high blue room from which he could see the sea.

195

Time in its transparent loops as it passes beneath me now
still carries the sound of the telephone in that room and traffic far off and doves under the window chuckling coolly and his voice saying,
You beauty. I can feel that beauty's

200 heart beating inside mine as she presses into his arms in the high blue room—

No, I say aloud. I force my arms down through air which is suddenly cold and heavy as water

and the videotape jerks to a halt like a glass slide under a drop of blood.
205 I stop and turn and stand into the wind, which now plunges towards me over the moor.

When Law left I felt so bad I thought I would die.
This is not uncommon.

I took up the practice of meditation.
210 Each morning I sat on the floor in front of my sofa and chanted bits of old Latin prayers.

*De profundis clamavi ad te Domine.*²
Each morning a vision came to me.
Gradually I understood that these were naked
215 glimpses of my soul.

I called them Nudes.
Nude #1. Woman alone on a hill.
She stands into the wind.

It is a hard wind slanting from the north.
Long flaps and shreds of flesh rip off the woman's 220 body and lift
and blow away on the wind, leaving an exposed column of nerve and blood and muscle calling mutely through lipless mouth.

It pains me to record this,

I am not a melodramatic person.
225 But soul is "hewn in a wild workshop"
as Charlotte Brontë says of Wuthering Heights.³

Charlotte's preface to Wuthering Heights is a publicist's masterpiece.
Like someone carefully not looking at a scorpion

230 crouched on the arm of the sofa Charlotte talks firmly and calmly about the other furniture of Emily's workshop—about the inexorable spirit ("stronger than a man, simpler than a child"),
the cruel illness ("pain no words can render"), 235 the autonomous end ("she sank rapidly, she made haste to leave us")
and about Emily's total subjection to a creative project she could neither understand nor control,
and for which she deserves no more praise nor blame
than if she had opened her mouth
240 "to breathe lightning." The scorpion is inching down the arm of the sofa while Charlotte continues to speak helpfully about lightning and other weather we may expect to experience
when we enter Emily's electrical atmosphere.
It is "a horror of great darkness" that awaits us there 245 but Emily is not responsible. Emily was in the grip.
"Having formed these beings she did not know what she had done," says Charlotte (of Heathcliff and Earnshaw and Catherine).⁴
Well there are many ways of being held prisoner.
250 The scorpion takes a light spring and lands on our left knee
as Charlotte concludes, "On herself she had no pity."

Pitiless too are the Heights, which Emily called Wuthering
because of their “bracing ventilation”
and “a north wind over the edge.”

255 Whaching⁵ a north wind grind the moor that surrounded her father’s house on every side, formed of a kind of rock called millstone grit, taught Emily all she knew about love and its necessities—

an angry education that shapes the way her characters
260 use one another. “My love for Heathcliff,” says
Catherine,

“resembles the eternal rocks beneath—a source of little visible delight, but necessary.”
Necessary? I notice the sun has dimmed and the afternoon air sharpening.

265 I turn and start to recross the moor towards home.
What are the imperatives that hold people like Catherine and Heathcliff together and apart, like pores blown into hot rock and then stranded out of reach

270 of one another when it hardens? What kind of necessity is that?
The last time I saw Law was a black night in September.
Autumn had begun,

my knees were cold inside my clothes.
A chill fragment of moon rose.
He stood in my living room and spoke 275 without looking at me. Not enough spin on it, he said of our five years of love.

Inside my chest I felt my heart snap into two pieces which floated apart. By now I was so cold 280 it was like burning. I put out my hand to touch his. He moved back.

I don't want to be sexual with you, he said.
Everything gets crazy.
But now he was looking at me.
Yes, I said as I began to remove my clothes.

285 Everything gets crazy. When nude
I turned my back because he likes the back.
He moved onto me.

Everything I know about love and its necessities
I learned in that one moment
290 when I found myself

thrusting my little burning red backside like a baboon at a man who no longer cherished me.
There was no area of my mind

not appalled by this action, no part of my body 295 that could have done otherwise.
But to talk of mind and body begs the question.

Soul is the place,
stretched like a surface of millstone grit between body and mind,
where such necessity grinds itself out.

300 Soul is what I kept watch on all that night.
Law stayed with me.

We lay on top of the covers as if it weren't really a night of sleep and time,
caressing and singing to one another in our made-up
language
like the children we used to be.
That was a night that centred Heaven and Hell, 305 as Emily would say. We tried to fuck but he remained limp, although happy. I came again and again, each time accumulating lucidity, until at last I was floating high up near the ceiling looking down
310 on the two souls clasped there on the bed with their mortal boundaries visible around them like lines on a map.
I saw the lines harden.
He left in the morning.
315 It is very cold
walking into the long scraped April wind.
At this time of year there is no sunset just some movements inside the light and then a sinking away.

1995

Endnotes

- Note 1: The speaker's lover. Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Psalm 130: "Out of the depths have I cried unto thee, O Lord" (Latin). Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Novel by English author Emily Brontë (1818–1848). Her sister Charlotte (1815–1855) wrote an introduction to the 1850 edition, explaining how such a mild and modest woman could have created a work of such passionate imagination and apparent “coarseness.” The speaker of “The Glass Essay” compares herself to Emily Brontë throughout the poem.Return to reference 3

- Note 4: Three characters from Wuthering Heights.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Emily Brontë’s idiosyncratic spelling of watcher, as the poem explains earlier. This excerpt is from its fourth section, also titled “Whacher.”Return to reference 5

Notes

- °: diamond-shaped figuresReturn to reference °

PAUL MULDOON

b. 1951

Paul Muldoon was born in Portadown, County Armagh, Northern Ireland. His mother was a schoolteacher; his father, a farm laborer and mushroom grower. Paul grew up in, as he put it, "a little enclave of Roman Catholics living within the predominantly Protestant parish of Loughgall, the village where the Orange Order was founded in 1795" (a unionist, anti-Catholic fraternal organization). Despite inheriting strong Republican sympathies, he depicts the Catholic Church unsympathetically, even going so far as to state that there is "a very fine line between organized religion and organized crime." His skepticism toward the nationalist extremism of the Irish Republican Army is evident in the wryly psychoanalytic poem "Anseo," which traces an IRA fighter's violent ways back to the violence inflicted on him by a cruel primary school teacher.

Muldoon was educated at the primary school in Collegelands (where his mother taught); St. Patrick's College, Armagh; and Queen's University, Belfast, where he was tutored by Seamus Heaney and came to know other poets of the "Belfast Group," such as Derek Mahon and Michael Longley. He worked as a radio and television producer for the British Broadcasting Corporation in Belfast until, in the mid-1980s, he became a freelance writer and moved to the United States, where he teaches at Princeton University. He was elected the Oxford Professor of Poetry, a post he held from 1999 to 2004, and he was the poetry editor of The New Yorker from 2007 to 2017. His collections of poems Howdie-Skelp, titled after the slap a midwife gives a newborn, was published in 2021.

Muldoon's first published poems were written in Irish, and although he soon switched to English, Irish words and phrases, such as "Anseo," continued to appear in his work. Like other Irish poets, he has had to contend with the long shadow cast by W. B. Yeats. In "7, Middagh Street," Muldoon quotes Yeats's agonizing worry, in his late poem "Man and the Echo," that his art may have helped inspire the executed leaders of the Easter Rising of 1916: "Did that play of mine send out / Certain men the English shot?" In Muldoon's poem, the characteristically irreverent answer, spoken by W. H. Auden, is "'Certainly not'. / / If Yeats had saved his pencil-lead / would certain men have stayed in bed?" Muldoon is more circumspect than Yeats about the power of art to alter the course of history. Informed by his postmodern skepticism about language, his approach to the Irish Troubles is also more oblique and ironic than that of his tutor, Seamus Heaney. In "Anseo" and "Turtles," among his many poems that eerily skew the form of the sonnet, he deploys multiple screens of irony to tell sly parables about the relation of language to history, of art to violence, especially of the Irish Troubles.

As with many other Irish poets, the United States soon loomed large in Muldoon's imagination. Excited by American films, he adapted cinematic techniques in long, hectic, hallucinatory poems. Other poems, such as "Meeting the British," parallel the plight of Native Americans with that of Northern Irish Catholics. Still others, such as "The Loaf," vigorously play on refrain, rhyme, and other repetitive formal structures to recall the sad history of Irish laborers in the United States. His earliest literary influence was, he said, Robert Frost's "strong, classic, lyric line. But the most important thing . . . was his mischievous, sly, multi-layered quality under the surface." It would be hard to improve on that last sentence as a description of Muldoon's own style, the expression of an omnivorous imagination that—in "Milkweed and Monarch," for example—mixes sensations at his parents' Collegelands grave with geographically scattered memories into a kaleidoscopic pattern that is at once moving, musically satisfying, and a brilliant postmodern variation on the poetic form of the villanelle (with the repetition of its first and third lines).

Anseo

When the Master was calling the roll
At the primary school in Collegelands,¹
You were meant to call back Anseo
And raise your hand
As your name occurred.
5 Anseo, meaning here, here and now,
All present and correct,
Was the first word of Irish I spoke.
The last name on the ledger
10 Belonged to Joseph Mary Plunkett Ward²
And was followed, as often as not,
By silence, knowing looks,
A nod and a wink, the Master's droll
'And where's our little Ward-of-court?'³

15 I remember the first time he came back
The Master had sent him out
Along the hedges
To weigh up for himself and cut
A stick with which he would be beaten.
After a while, nothing was spoken;
20 He would arrive as a matter of course
With an ash-plant, a salley-rod.⁴
Or, finally, the hazel-wand
He had whittled down to a whip-lash,
Its twist of red and yellow lacquers
25 Sanded and polished,
And altogether so delicately wrought
That he had engraved his initials on it.

I last met Joseph Mary Plunkett Ward

30 In a pub just over the Irish border.
He was living in the open,
In a secret camp
On the other side of the mountain.
He was fighting for Ireland,
Making things happen.
35 And he told me, Joe Ward,
Of how he had risen through the ranks
To Quartermaster, Commandant:
How every morning at parade
His volunteers would call back Anseo
42 And raise their hands
As their names occurred.

1980

Endnotes

- Note 1: Village in Northern Ireland where Muldoon went to school and his mother taught. Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Named after Joseph Mary Plunkett (1887–1916), one of the rebel leaders of the Easter Rising of 1916, executed for his role in planning the rebellion against British rule. Return to reference 2
- Note 3: A minor under the care of a court-appointed guardian. Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Stick made from a willow tree. "Ash-plant": stick or whip made from a sapling of the ash tree. Return to reference 4

Meeting the British

We met the British in the dead of winter.
The sky was lavender

and the snow lavender-blue.
I could hear, far below,

5 the sound of two streams coming together
(both were frozen over) and, no less strange, myself calling out in French

10 across that forest-clearing. Neither General Jeffery Amherst¹

nor Colonel Henry Bouquet could stomach our willow-tobacco.

15 As for the unusual scent when the Colonel shook out his handkerchief: C'est la lavande,
*une fleur mauve comme le ciel.*²

They gave us six fishhooks
and two blankets embroidered with smallpox.

1987

Endnotes

- Note 1:

Jeffery Amherst, commander-in-chief of British forces in the French and Indian War (1754–63), fought against France and its Native American allies. During Pontiac's Rebellion (1763–64), led by Ottawa chief Pontiac in the Great Lakes region, Amherst wrote to the British officer Colonel Bouquet, "Could it not be contrived to Send the Small Pox among those Disaffected Tribes of Indians?" Bouquet replied, "I will try to inoculate [that is, infect] the Indians by means of Blankets that may fall in their hands, taking care however not to get the disease myself," to which Amherst responded, "You will Do well to try to Inoculate the Indians by means of Blanketts, as well as to try Every other method that can serve to Extirpate this Execreble Race." Apparently as a result of this and similar plans of other British officers, many Native Americans in the area, never having been exposed to smallpox, were killed by the disease in 1763–64. Pontiac concluded a peace treaty with the British in July 1766.

Return to reference 1

- Note 2: It is lavender, a flower purple as the sky (French).Return to reference 2

From 7, Middagh Street

From *Wystan*¹

* * *

65 And were Yeats living at this hour
it should be in some ruined tower

not malachited Ballylee²
where he paid out to those below

one gilt-edged scroll from his pencil
as though he were part-Rapunzel

70 and partly Delphic oracle.³
As for his crass, rhetorical posturing, 'Did that play of mine send out certain men (certain men?)

the English shot . . . ?⁴
75 the answer is 'Certainly not'.

If Yeats had saved his pencil-lead would certain men have stayed in bed?

For history's a twisted root with art its small, translucent fruit

80 and never the other way round.
The roots by which we were once bound are severed here, in any case,

and we are all now dispossessed;

prince, poet, construction worker,
85 salesman, soda fountain jerker—

all equally isolated.
Each loads flour, sugar and salted

beef into a covered wagon and strikes out for his Oregon,

90 each straining for the ghostly axe of a huge, blond-haired lumberjack.

* * *

1987

Endnotes

- Note 1: This long poem is spoken in various voices, including this selection from "Wystan," first name of the Anglo-American poet W. H. Auden (1907–1973), whose periodic Brooklyn Heights address is the title of the poem.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The ancient Norman tower that the Irish poet W. B. Yeats (1865–1939) purchased and lived in. "Malachited": of a deep green color.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: In ancient Greece, a cave and shrine where a priestess supposedly under a god's influence gave riddling answers to questions brought by worshipers. "Rapunzel": fairy-tale character imprisoned in a tower who let down her long hair for her rescuer to climb.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: From Yeats's poem "Man and the Echo" (see p. 244), in which he worries that his nationalist play Cathleen ni Houlihan

(1902) helped inspire the violent Easter 1916 uprising against British rule. Return to reference 4

Milkweed and Monarch

As he knelt by the grave of his mother and father
the taste of dill, or tarragon—
he could barely tell one from the other—filled his mouth. It seemed as if he might smother.

Why should he be stricken
5 with grief, not for his mother and father, but a woman slinking from the fur of a sea-otter

in Portland, Maine, or, yes, Portland, Oregon—
he could barely tell one from the other—

and why should he now savour 10 the tang of her, her little pickled gherkin,
as he knelt by the grave of his mother and father?

•

He looked about. He remembered her palaver^o on how both earth and sky would darken—15 “You could barely tell one from the other”— while the Monarch butterflies passed over in their milkweed-hunger:¹ “A wing-beat, some reckon,

may trigger off the mother and father of all storms, striking your Irish Cliffs of Moher with the force of a hurricane.”

20 Then: “Milkweed and Monarch ‘invented’ each other.”

•

He looked about. Cow's-parsley in a samovar.²
He'd mistaken his mother's name, "Regan", for "Anger":
as he knelt by the grave of his mother and father
he could barely tell one from the other.

25

1994

Endnotes

- Note 1: The monarch butterfly's larvae appear to eat only milkweed.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Russian tea urn.Return to reference 2

Notes

- °: beguiling talkReturn to reference °

The Loaf

When I put my finger to the hole they've cut for a dimmer switch
in a wall of plaster stiffened with horsehair
it seems I've scratched a two-hundred-year-old itch with a pink and a pink and a pinkie-pick.

5 When I put my ear to the hole I'm suddenly aware of spades and shovels turning up the gain^o
all the way from Raritan to the Delaware¹ with a clink and a clink and a clinky-click.

When I put my nose to the hole I smell the floodplain
10 of the canal after a hurricane and the spots of green grass where thousands of Irish have lain
with a stink and a stink and a stinky-stick.

When I put my eye to the hole I see one holding horse dung to the rain
in the hope, indeed, indeed, 15 of washing out a few whole ears of grain with a wink and a wink and a winkie-wick.

And when I do at last succeed in putting my mouth to the horsehair-fringed niche
I can taste the small loaf of bread he baked from that whole seed

with a link and a link and a linky-lick.

20

2002

Endnotes

- Note 1: The Delaware and Raritan Canal was hand-built by Irish immigrants between 1830 and 1834, providing a route from Philadelphia to New York City. During its construction, many Irish laborers died of Asiatic cholera. Muldoon's house in New Jersey was built around 1750.Return to reference 1

Notes

- °: volumeReturn to reference °

Turtles

A cubit-wide turtle acting the bin¹ lid
by the side of the canal conjures those Belfast² nights I lay awake, putting in a bid for the police channel
as lid bangers gave the whereabouts
5 of armored cars and petrol^o bombers lit one flare after another. So many of those former sentries and scouts have now taken up the lyre³
I can't be sure of what is and what is not.
The water, for example, has the look of tin.
10 Nor am I certain, given their ability to smell the rot once the rot sets in,
that turtles have not been enlisted by some police forces
to help them recover corpses.

2006

Endnotes

- Note 1: Garbage can. "Cubit": ancient measure of length approximately equal to the forearm, or between 18 and 22 inches.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Capital of Northern Ireland and a site, from the 1970s, of violent sectarian conflict (known as "the Troubles") between Protestants and Catholics.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Stringed instrument similar to a harp; a symbol of lyric poetry.Return to reference 3

Notes

- °: gasoline Return to reference °

HILARY MANTEL

1952–2022

Hilary Mantel was born and grew up in villages in Derbyshire and Cheshire, in the north of England, near greater Manchester. Her parents were struggling Irish Catholic immigrants, a textile worker and a clerk. She was a deeply religious student at convent schools, though by the age of twelve, she had lost her faith. After she studied law at the London School of Economics and the University of Sheffield, she was first employed as a social work assistant at a geriatric hospital and, after a year, as a sales assistant selling dresses in a department store where she began to write. With her husband, a geologist, she lived in Botswana for five years (1977–82) and Saudi Arabia for four (1983–86). Her ongoing and severe endometriosis was first misdiagnosed as psychosomatic. She described her struggle with the painful disease in a memoir, Giving up the Ghost (2003), and illness and alienation from the body were frequent concerns in her fiction.

Mantel was the first English novelist and the first woman to become a two-time winner of Britain's most prestigious award for fiction, the Man Booker Prize. The awards were for her historical novels written from the perspective of Thomas Cromwell, Henry VIII's key counselor: Wolf Hall (2009) and Bring up the Bodies (2012), the first two books of the trilogy, which ended with The Mirror and the Light (2020). By the time she received these prizes and the National Book Critics Circle Award, she had already published novels in various genres in a wide range of settings and time periods, from revolutionary France and eighteenth-century England to contemporary southern Africa and Saudi Arabia. Despite their variety, all these novels draw, perhaps not surprisingly, on facets of Mantel's life. Written in Saudi Arabia, her first two published novels, Every Day Is Mother's Day (1985) and Vacant Possession (1986), are black comedies that made use of her experience in social work. In the thriller Eight Months on Ghazzah Street (1988), cross-cultural tensions erupt after an Englishwoman moves to Saudi Arabia. The theological mystery Fludd (1989) casts a critical eye on Roman Catholicism in 1950s England. Although it wasn't published until 1992, A Place of Greater Safety was the first novel Mantel wrote—a historical novel centered on three figures in the French Revolution who, she suggested, reflected her youthful idealism. A Change of Climate (1994) tells the tragic story of an English missionary couple in southern Africa. An Experiment in Love (1995) concerns strained friendships among classmates who end up together at the University of London. The Giant, O'Brien (1998) describes an unusually large Irishman (and endometriosis had greatly enlarged Mantel's body) who only briefly fascinates eighteenth-century England. Beyond Black (2005) concerns a medium with a powerful memory and perhaps novelistic imagination who travels with her manager through the English suburbs.

Despite the autobiographical traces in her work, Mantel was uncannily able to inhabit minds and social worlds vastly distant from her own, perhaps nowhere more so than in her Thomas Cromwell novels. As a result, she could bring to life a sixteenth-century counselor as a multidimensional character, though Cromwell had been represented by other writers as a cardboard villain. Even with his execution of Henry VIII's perceived enemies, including Thomas More and Anne Boleyn, the shrewd and wily strategist becomes sympathetic in Mantel's retelling. Having grown up in poverty with an abusive father, he makes himself—by virtue of cunning, intelligence, and exacting observation—one of the most powerful and consequential figures of the English Renaissance. The complexity of Mantel's characters, her brilliant use of dialogue, her deft construction of dramatic scenes, and her fascination with historical detail suggest the abiding impression that Shakespeare made on her in childhood. She said that, having only been exposed to snippets of his work, "I almost exploded with joy when I found there was a whole fat book of plays."

The immense historical and cultural differences between the Tudor court in Mantel's historical novels and the world of her semiautobiographical short story "Sorry to Disturb"—Jeddah, Saudi Arabia, as experienced by a budding English novelist in the 1980s—is a measure of Mantel's range. Yet from Mantel's perspective, these worlds were not entirely unlike. She compared the limits on free expression and the consequent reliance on rumor in both Tudor England and 1980s Saudi Arabia, and in Mantel's telling, women in both worlds find themselves confined and trapped, even under conditions of relative affluence. "Sorry to Disturb" revolves around the misunderstandings between an English narrator and a South Asian businessman who regularly visits her coffinlike apartment. At first it seems as if he might provide a welcome diversion, but their encounters become increasingly vexed as he projects on her certain ideas about the British and other Westerners. She finds herself wanting, as she puts it, to "bear out the national character he had given me," yet also to deflect his gender assumptions. The layering of English with Saudi and South Asian cultural worlds, of fictional narration with dialogue and diary entries, of realist social observation with surreal hints and evocative figurative language (insecticide falling "like bright mists, veils"), all contribute to the making of a rich story. Mantel's tale demonstrates her lifelong ability to write her way into the vulnerability of the outsider, to illuminate the constraints endured by women in various centuries and cultures, and to vivify the lived experience of religious and cultural friction, whether in sixteenth-century England or in the contemporary Persian Gulf.

Sorry to Disturb

In those days, the doorbell didn't ring often, and if it did I would draw back into the body of the house. Only at a persistent ring would I creep over the carpets, and make my way to the front door with its spy hole. We were big on bolts and shutters, deadlocks and mortises, safety chains and windows that were high and barred. Through the spy hole I saw a distraught man in a crumpled, silver-gray suit: thirties, Asian. He had dropped back from the door, and was looking about him, at the closed and locked door opposite, and up the dusty marble stairs. He patted his pockets, took out a balled-up handkerchief, and rubbed it across his face. He looked so fraught that his sweat could have been tears. I opened the door.

At once he raised his hands as if to show he was unarmed, his handkerchief dropping like a white flag. "Madam!" Ghastly pale I must have looked, under the light that dappled the tiled walls with swinging shadows. But then he took a breath, tugged at his creased jacket, ran a hand through his hair and conjured up his business card. "Muhammad Ijaz. Import-Export. I am so sorry to disturb your afternoon. I am totally lost. Would you permit use of your telephone?"

I stood aside to let him in. No doubt I smiled. Given what would ensue, I must suppose I did. "Of course. If it's working today."

I walked ahead and he followed, talking; an important deal, he had almost closed it, visit to client in person necessary, time—he worked up his sleeve and consulted a fake Rolex—time running out; he had the address—again he patted his pockets—but the office is not where it should be. He spoke into the telephone in rapid Arabic, fluent, aggressive, his eyebrows shooting up, finally shaking his head; he put down the receiver, looked at it in regret; then up at me, with a sour smile. Weak mouth, I thought. Almost a handsome man, but not: slim, sallow, easily thrown. "I am in your debt, madam," he said. "Now I must dash."

I wanted to offer him a what—bathroom break? Comfort stop? I had no idea how to phrase it. The absurd phrase wash and brushup came into my mind. But he was already heading for the door—though from the way the call had concluded I thought they might not be so keen to see him, at his destination, as he was to see them. “This crazy city,” he said. “They are always digging up the streets and moving them. I am so sorry to break in on your privacy.” In the hall, he darted another glance around and up the stairs. “Only the British will ever help you.” He skidded across the hall and prized open the outer door with its heavy ironwork screen; admitting, for a moment, the dull roar of traffic from Medina Road. The door swung back, he was gone. I closed the hall door discreetly, and melted into the oppressive hush. The air conditioner rattled away, like an old relative with a loose cough. The air was heavy with insecticide; sometimes I sprayed it as I walked, and it fell about me like bright mists, veils. I resumed my phrasebook and tape, Fifth Lesson: *I’m living in Jeddah.*¹ I’m busy today. God give you strength!

When my husband came home in the afternoon I told him: “A lost man was here. Pakistani. Businessman. I let him in to phone.”

My husband was silent. The air conditioner hacked away. He walked into the shower, having evicted the cockroaches. Walked out again, dripping, naked, lay on the bed, stared at the ceiling. Next day I swept the business card into a bin.

In the afternoon the doorbell rang again. Ijaz had come back, to apologize, to explain, to thank me for rescuing him. I made him some instant coffee and he sat down and told me about himself.

It was then June 1983. I had been in Saudi Arabia for six months. My husband worked for a Toronto-based company of consulting geologists, and had been seconded² by them to the Ministry of Mineral Resources. Most of his colleagues were housed in family “compounds” of various sizes, but the single men and a childless couple like ourselves had to take what they could get. This was our second flat. The American bachelor who had occupied it before had been moved out in haste. Upstairs, in this block of four flats, lived a Saudi civil servant with his wife and baby; the fourth flat was empty; on the ground floor across the hall from us lived a Pakistani accountant who worked for a government minister, handling his personal finances. Meeting the womenfolk in the hall or on the stairs—one blacked-out head to toe, one partly veiled—the bachelor had livened up their lives by calling “Hello!” Or possibly “Hi there!”

There was no suggestion of further impertinence. But a complaint had been made, and he vanished, and we went to live there instead. The flat was small by Saudi standards. It had beige carpet and off-white wallpaper on which there was a faint crinkled pattern, almost indiscernible. The windows were guarded by heavy wooden shutters that you cranked down by turning a handle on the inside. Even with the shutters up it was dim and I needed the strip lights on all day. The rooms were closed off from each other by double doors of dark wood, heavy like coffin lids. It was like living in a funeral home, with samples stacked around you, and insect opportunists frying themselves on the lights.

He was a graduate of a Miami business school, Ijaz said, and his business, his main business just now, was bottled water. Had the deal gone through, yesterday? He was evasive—obviously, there was nothing simple about it. He waved a hand—give it time, give it time.

I had no friends in this city as yet. Social life, such as it was, centered on private houses; there were no cinemas, theaters or lecture halls. There were sports grounds, but women could not attend them. No “mixed gatherings” were allowed. The Saudis did not mix with foreign workers. They looked down on them as necessary evils, though white-skinned, English-speaking expatriates were at the top of the pecking order. Others—Ijaz, for example—were “Third Country Nationals,” a label that exposed them to every kind of truculence, insult and daily complication. Indians and Pakistanis staffed the shops and small businesses. Filipinos worked on building sites. Men from Thailand cleaned the streets. Bearded Yemenis sat on the pavement outside lock-up shops, their skirts rucked up, their hairy legs thrust out, their flip-flops inches from the whizzing cars.

I am married, Ijaz said, and to an American; you must meet her. Maybe, he said, maybe you could do something for her, you know? What I foresaw at best was the usual Jeddah arrangement, of couples shackled together. Women had no motive power in this city; they had no driving licenses, and only the rich had drivers. So couples who wanted to visit must do it together. I didn't think Ijaz and my husband would be friends. Ijaz was too restless and nervy. He laughed at nothing. He was always twitching his collar and twisting his feet in their scuffed Oxfords,³ always tapping the fake Rolex, always apologizing. Our apartment is down by the port, he said, with my sister-in-law and my brother, but he's back in Miami just now, and my mother's here just now for a visit, and my wife from America, and my son and my daughter, aged six, aged eight. He reached for his wallet and showed me a strange-looking, steeple-headed little boy. "Saleem."

When he left, he thanked me again for trusting him to come into my house. Why, he said, he might have been anybody. But it is not the British way to think badly of needy strangers. At the door he shook my hand. That's that, I thought. Part of me thought, it had better be.

For one was always observed: overlooked, without precisely being seen, recognized. My Pakistani neighbor Yasmin, to get between my flat and hers, would fling a scarf over her rippling hair, then peep around the door; with nervous, pecking movements she hopped across the marble, head swiveling from side to side, in case someone should choose that very moment to shoulder through the heavy street door. Sometimes, irritated by the dust that blew under the door and banked up on the marble, I would go out into the hall with a long broom. My male Saudi neighbor would come down from the first floor on his way out to his car and step over my brushstrokes without looking at me, his head averted. He was according me invisibility, as a mark of respect to another man's wife.

I was not sure that Ijaz accorded me this respect. Our situation was anomalous and ripe for misunderstanding: I had an afternoon caller. He probably thought that only the kind of woman who took a lot of risks with herself would let a stranger into her house. Yet I could not guess what he probably thought. Surely a Miami business school, surely his time in the West, had made my attitude seem more normal than not? His talk was relaxed now he knew me, full of feeble jokes that he laughed at himself; but then there was the jiggling of his foot, the pulling of his collar, the tapping of his fingers. I had noticed, listening to my tape, that his situation was anticipated in the Nineteenth Lesson: I gave the address to my driver, but when we arrived, there wasn't any house at this address. I hoped to show by my brisk friendliness what was only the truth, that our situation could be simple, because I felt no attraction to him at all; so little that I felt apologetic about it. That is where it began to go wrong—my feeling that I must bear out the national character he had given me, and that I must not slight him or refuse a friendship, in case he thought it was because he was a Third Country National.

For his second visit, and his third, were an interruption, almost an irritation. Having no choice in that city, I had decided to cherish my isolation, coddle it. I was ill in those days, and subject to a fierce drug regime that gave me blinding headaches, made me slightly deaf and made me, though I was hungry, unable to eat. The drugs were expensive and had to be imported from England; my husband's company brought them in by courier. Word of this leaked out, and the company wives decided I was taking fertility drugs; but I did not know this, and my ignorance made our conversations peculiar and, to me, slightly menacing. Why were they always talking, on the occasions of forced company sociability, about women who'd had miscarriages but now had a bouncing babe in the buggy? An older woman confided that her two were adopted; I looked at them and thought Jesus, where from, the zoo? My Pakistani neighbour also joined in the cooing over the offspring that I would have shortly—she was in on the rumors, but I put her hints down to the fact that she was carrying her first child and wanted company. I saw her most mornings for an interval of coffee and chat, and I would rather steer her to talking about Islam, which was easy enough; she was an educated woman and keen to instruct. June 6th: "Spent two hours with my neighbor," says my diary, "widening the cultural gap."

Next day, my husband brought home air tickets and my exit visa for our first home leave, which was seven weeks away. Thursday, June 9th: "Found a white hair in my head." At home there was a general election, and we sat up through the night to listen to the results on the BBC World Service. When we turned out the light, the grocer's daughter jiggled through my dreams to the strains of "Lillibulero."⁴ Friday was a holiday, and we slept undisturbed till the noon prayer call. Ramadan⁵ began. Wednesday, June 15th: "Read *The Twyborn Affair*⁶ and vomited sporadically."

On the sixteenth our neighbors across the hall left for pilgrimage, robed in white. They rang our doorbell before they left: "Is there anything we can bring you from Mecca?"⁷ June 19th saw me desperate for change, moving the furniture around the sitting room and recording "not much improvement." I write that I am prey to "unpleasant and intrusive thoughts," but I do not say what they are. I describe myself as "hot, sick and morose." By July 4th I must have been happier, because I listened to the *Eroica*⁸ while doing the ironing. But on the morning of July 10th, I got up first, put the coffee on, and went into the sitting room to find that the furniture had been trying to move itself back. An armchair was leaning to the left, as if executing some tipsy dance; at one side its base rested on the carpet, but the other side was a foot in the air, and balanced finely on the rim of a flimsy wastepaper basket. Open-mouthed, I shot back into the bedroom; it was the Eid holiday,⁹ and my husband was still half awake. I gibbered at him. Silent, he rose, put on his glasses, and followed me. He stood in the doorway of the sitting room. He looked around and told me without hesitation it had nothing to do with him. He walked into the bathroom. I heard him close the door, curse the cockroaches, switch on the shower. I said later, I must be walking in my sleep. Do you think that's it? Do you think I did it? July 12th: "Execution dream again."

The trouble was, Ijaz knew I was at home; how would I be going anywhere? One afternoon I left him standing in the hall, while he pressed and pressed the doorbell, and next time, when I let him in, he asked me where I had been; when I said, "Ah, sorry, I must have been with my neighbor," I could see he did not believe me, and he looked at me so sorrowfully that my heart went out to him. Jeddah fretted him, it galled him, and he missed, he said, America, he missed his visits to London, he must go soon, take a break; when was our leave, perhaps we might meet up? I explained I did not live in London, which surprised him; he seemed to suspect it was an evasion, like my failure to answer the door. "Because I could get an exit visa," he said again. "Meet up there. Without all this . . ." he gestured at the coffin-lid doors, the heavy, willful furniture.

He made me laugh that day, telling me about his first girlfriend, his American girlfriend whose nickname was Patches. It was easy to picture her, sassy and suntanned, astonishing him one day by pulling off her top, bouncing her bare breasts at him and putting an end to his wan virginity. The fear he felt, the terror of touching her . . . his shameful performance . . . recalling it, he knuckled his forehead. I was charmed, I suppose. How often does a man tell you these things? I told my husband, hoping to make him laugh, but he didn't. Often, to be helpful, I hoovered up the cockroaches before his return from the Ministry. He shed his clothes and headed off. I heard the splash of the shower. Nineteenth Lesson: Are you married? Yes, my wife is with me, she's standing there in the corner of the room. I imagined the cockroaches, dark and flailing in the dust bag.

I went back to the dining table, on which I was writing a comic novel. It was a secret activity I never mentioned to the company wives, and barely mentioned to myself. I scribbled under the strip light, until it was time to drive out for food shopping. You had to shop between sunset prayers and night prayers; if you mistimed it, then at the first prayer call the shops slammed down their shutters, trapping you inside, or outside in the wet heat of the car park. The malls were patrolled by volunteers from the Committee for the Propagation of Virtue and the Elimination of Vice.

At the end of July Ijaz brought his family for tea. Mary-Beth was a small woman but seemed swollen beneath the skin; spiritless, freckled, limp, she was a faded redhead who seemed huddled into herself, unused to conversation. A silent daughter with eyes like dark stars had been trussed up for the visit in a frilly white dress. At six, steeple-headed Saleem had lost his baby fat, and his movements were tentative, as if his limbs were snappable. His eyes were watchful; Mary-Beth hardly met my gaze at all. What had Ijaz told her? That he was taking her to see a woman who was something like he'd like her to be? It was an unhappy afternoon. I can only have got through it because I was buoyed by an uprush of anticipation; my bags were packed for our flight home. A day earlier, when I had gone into the spare room where I kept my clothes, I had met another dismaying sight. The doors of the fitted wardrobe, which were large and solid like the other coffin lids, had been removed from their hinges; they had been replaced, but hung by the lower hinges only, so that their upper halves flapped like the wings of some ramshackle flying machine.

On August 1st we left King Abdulaziz International Airport in an electrical storm, and had a bumpy flight. I was curious about Mary-Beth's situation and hoped to see her again, though another part of me hoped that she and Ijaz would simply vanish.

I didn't return to Jeddah till the very end of November, having left my book with an agent. Just before our leave I had met my Saudi neighbor, a young mother taking a part-time literature course at the women's university. Education for women was regarded as a luxury, an ornament, a way for a husband to boast of his broadmindedness; Munira couldn't even begin to do her assignments, and I took to going up to her flat in the late mornings and doing them for her, while she sat on the floor in her négligée, watching Egyptian soaps on TV and eating sunflower seeds. We three women, Yasmin and Munira and I, had become midmorning friends; all the better for them to watch me, I thought, and discuss me when I'm gone. It was easier for Yasmin and me to go upstairs, because to come down Munira had to get kitted out in full veil and abaya;¹ again, that treacherous, hovering moment on the public territory of the staircase, where a man might burst through from the street and shout "Hi!" Yasmin was a delicate woman, like a princess in a Persian miniature; younger than myself, she was impeccably soignée,² finished with a flawless glaze of good manners and restraint. Munira was nineteen, with coarse, eager good looks, a pale skin, and a mane of hair that crackled with static and seemed to lead a vital, separate life; her laugh was a raucous cackle. She and Yasmin sat on cushions but gave me a chair; they insisted. They served Nescafé in my honor, though I would have preferred a sludgy local brew. I had learned the crude effectiveness of caffeine against migraine; some nights, sleepless, pacing, I careened off the walls, and only the dawn prayer call sent me to bed, still thinking furiously of books I might write.

Ijaz rang the doorbell on December 6th. He was so very pleased to see me after my long leave; beaming, he said, "Now you are more like Patches than ever." I felt a flare of alarm; nothing, nothing had been said about this before. I was slimmer, he said, and looked well—my prescription drugs had been cut down, and I had been exposed to some daylight, I supposed that was what was doing it. But, "No, there is something different about you," he said. One of the company wives had said the same. She thought, no doubt, that I had conceived my baby at last.

I led Ijaz into the sitting room, while he trailed me with compliments, and made the coffee. "Maybe it's my book," I said, sitting down. "You see, I've written a book . . ." My voice tailed off. This was not his world. No one read books in Jeddah. You could buy anything in the shops except alcohol or a bookcase. My neighbor Yasmin, though she was an English graduate, said she had never read a book since her marriage; she was too busy making supper parties every night. I have had a little success, I explained, or I hope for a little success, I have written a novel you see, and an agent has taken it on.

"It is a storybook? For children?"

"For adults."

"You did this during your vacation?"

"No, I was always writing it." I felt deceitful. I was writing it when I didn't answer the doorbell.

"Your husband will pay to have it published for you."

"No, with luck someone will pay me. A publisher. The agent hopes he can sell it."

"This agent, where did you meet him?"

I could hardly say, in the Writers' & Artists' Yearbook.³ "In London. At his office."

"But you do not live in London," Ijaz said, as if laying down an ace. He was out to find something wrong with my story. "Probably he is no good. He may steal your money."

I saw of course that in his world, the term agent would cover some broad, unsavory categories. But what about "Import-Export," as written on his business cards? That didn't sound to me like the essence of probity. I wanted to argue; I was still upset about Patches; without warning, Ijaz seemed to have changed the terms of engagement between us. "I don't think so. I haven't given him money. His firm, it's well known." Their office is where? Ijaz sniffed, and I pressed on, trying to make my case; though why did I think that an office in William IV Street was a guarantee of moral worth? Ijaz knew London well. "Charing Cross tube?" He still looked affronted. "Near Trafalgar Square?"

Ijaz grunted. "You went to this premises alone?"

I couldn't placate him. I gave him a biscuit. I didn't expect him to understand what I was up to, but he seemed aggrieved that another man had entered my life. "How is Mary-Beth?" I asked.

"She has some kidney disease."

I was shocked. "Is it serious?"

He raised his shoulders; not a shrug, more a rotation of the joints, as if easing some old ache. "She must go back to America for treatment. It's okay. I'm getting rid of her anyway."

I looked away. I hadn't imagined this. "I'm sorry you're unhappy."

"You see really I don't know what's the matter with her," he said testily. "She is always miserable and moping."

"You know, this is not the easiest place for a woman to live."

But did he know? Irritated, he said, "She wanted a big car. So I got a big car. What more does she want me to do?"

December 6th: "Ijaz stayed too long," the diary says. Next day he was back. After the way he had spoken of his wife—and the way he had compared me to dear old Patches from his Miami days—I didn't think I should see him again. But he had hatched a scheme and he wasn't going to let it go. I should come to a dinner party with my husband and meet his family and some of his business contacts. He had been talking about this project before my leave and I knew he set great store by it. I wanted, if I could, to do him some good; he would appear to his customers to be more a man of the world if he could arrange an international gathering, if—let's be blunt—he could produce some white friends. Now the time had come. His sister-in-law was already cooking, he said. I wanted to meet her; I admired these diaspora Asians, their polyglot enterprise, the way they withstood rebuffs, and I wanted to see if she was more Western or Eastern or what. "We have to arrange the transportation," Ijaz said. "I shall come Thursday, when your husband is here. Four o'clock. To give him directions." I nodded. No use drawing a map. They might move the streets again.

The meeting of December 8th was not a success. Ijaz was late, but didn't seem to know it. My husband dispensed the briefest host's courtesies, then sat down firmly in his armchair, which was the one that had tried to levitate. He seemed, by his watchful silence, ready to put an end to any nonsense, from furniture or guests or any other quarter. Sitting on the edge of the sofa, Ijaz flaked his baklava over his lap, he juggled with his fork and jiggled his coffee cup. After our dinner party, he said, almost the next day, he was flying to America on business. "I shall route via London. Just for some recreation. Just to relax, three-four days."

My husband must have stirred himself to ask if he had friends there. "Very old friend," Ijaz said, brushing crumbs to the carpet. "Living at Trafalgar Square. A good district. You know it?"

My heart sank; it was a physical feeling, of the months falling away from me, months in which I'd had little natural light. When Ijaz left—and he kept hovering on the threshold, giving further and better street directions—I didn't know what to say, so I went into the bathroom, kicked out the cockroaches and cowered under the stream of tepid water. Wrapped in a towel, I lay on the bed in the dark. I could hear my husband—I hoped it was he, and not the armchair—moving around in the sitting room. Sometimes in those days when I closed my eyes I felt that I was looking back into my own skull. I could see the hemispheres of my brain. They were convoluted and the color of putty.

The family apartment down by the port was filled with cooking smells and crammed with furniture. There were photographs on every surface, carpets laid on carpets. It was a hot night, and the air conditioners labored and hacked, spitting out water, coughing up lungfuls of mold spores, blights. The table linen was limp and heavily fringed, and I kept fingering these fringes, which felt like nylon fur, like the ears of a teddy bear; they comforted me, though I felt electric with tension. At the table a vast lumpen elder presided, a woman with a long chomping jaw; she was like Quentin Matsys's Ugly Duchess,⁴ except in a spangled sari. The sister-in-law was a bright, brittle woman, who gave a sarcastic lilt to all her phrases. I could see why; it was evident, from her knowing looks, that Ijaz had talked about me, and set me up in some way; if he was proposing me as his next wife, I offered little improvement on the original. Her scorn became complete when she saw I barely touched the food at my elbow; I kept smiling and nodding, demurring and deferring, nibbling a parsley leaf and sipping my Fanta. I wanted to eat, but she might as well have offered me stones on a doily. Did Ijaz think, as the Saudis did, that Western marriages meant nothing? That they were entered impulsively and on impulse broken? Did he assume my husband was as keen to offload me as he was to lose Mary-Beth? From his point of view the evening was not going well. He had expected two supermarket managers, he told us, important men with spending power; now night prayers were over, the traffic was on the move again, all down Palestine Road and along the Corniche⁵ the traffic lights were turning green, from Thumb Street to the Pepsi flyover⁶ the city was humming, but where were they? Sweat dripped from his face. Fingers jabbed the buttons of the telephone. "Okay, he is delayed? He has left? He is coming now?" He rapped down the receiver, then gazed at the phone as if willing it to chirp back at him, like some pet fowl. "Time means nothing here," he joked, pulling at his collar. The sister-in-law shrugged and turned down her mouth. She never rested, but passed airily through the room in peach chiffon, each time returning from the kitchen with another laden tray; out of sight, presumably, some oily skivvy⁷ was weeping into the dishes. The silent elder put away a large part of the food, pulling the plates toward her and working through them systematically till the pattern showed beneath her questing fingers; you looked away, and when you looked back the plate was clean. Sometimes, the phone rang: "Okay, they're nearly here," Ijaz called. Ten minutes, and his brow furrowed again. "Maybe they're lost."

"Sure they're lost," sister-in-law sang. She sniggered; she was enjoying herself. Nineteenth Lesson, translate these sentences: So long as he holds the map the wrong way up, he will never find the house. They started traveling this morning, but have still not arrived. It seemed a hopeless business, trying to get anywhere, and the textbook confessed it. I was not really learning Arabic, of course, I was too impatient; I was leafing through the lessons, looking for phrases that might be useful if I could say them. We stayed long, long into the evening, waiting for the men who had never intended to come; in the end, wounded and surly, Ijaz escorted us to the door. I heard my husband take in a breath of wet air. "We'll never have to do it again," I consoled him. In the car, "You have to feel for him," I said. No answer.

December 13th: My diary records that I am oppressed by "the darkness, the ironing and the smell of drains." I could no longer play my Eroica tape as it had twisted itself up in the innards of the machine. In my idle moments I had summarized forty chapters of *Oliver Twist*⁸ for the use of my upstairs neighbor. Three days later I was “horribly unstable and restless,” and reading the Lyttelton/Hart-Davis Letters.⁹ Later that week I was cooking with my neighbor Yasmin. I recorded “an afternoon of graying pain.” All the same, Ijaz was out of the country and I realized I breathed easier when I was not anticipating the ring of the doorbell. December 16th, I was reading *The Philosopher’s Pupil*¹ and visiting my own student upstairs. Munira took my forty chapter summaries, flicked through them, yawned, and switched on the TV. “What is a workhouse?” I tried to explain about the English poor law, but her expression glazed; she had never heard of poverty. She yelled out for her servant, an ear-splitting yell, and the girl—a beaten-down Indonesian—brought in Munira’s daughter for my diversion. A heavy, solemn child, she was beginning to walk, or stamp, under her own power, her hands flailing for a hold on the furniture. She would fall on her bottom with a grunt, haul herself up again by clutching the sofa; the cushions slid away from her, she tumbled backward, banged on the floor her large head with its corkscrew curls, and lay there wailing. Munira laughed at her: “White nigger, isn’t it?” She didn’t get her flat nose from my side, she explained. Or those fat lips either. It’s my husband’s people, but of course, they’re blaming me.

January 2nd 1984: We went to a dark little restaurant off Khalid bin Wahlid Street, where we were seated behind a lattice screen in the “family area.” In the main part of the room men were dining with each other. The business of eating out was more a gesture than a pleasure; you would gallop through the meal, because without wine and its rituals there was nothing to slow it, and the waiters, who had no concept that a man and woman might eat together for more than sustenance, prided themselves on picking up your plate as soon as you had finished and slapping down another, and rushing you back onto the dusty street. That dusty orange glare, perpetual, like the lighting of a bad sci-fi film; the constant snarl and rumble of traffic; I had become afraid of traffic accidents, which were frequent, and every time we drove out at night I saw the gaping spaces beneath bridges and flyovers; they seemed to me like amphitheatres in which the traffic’s casualties enacted, flickering, their final moments.

Sometimes, when I set foot outside the apartment, I started to shake. I blamed it on the drugs I was taking; the dose had been increased again. When I saw the other wives they didn't seem to be having these difficulties. They talked about paddling pools and former lives they had led in Hong Kong. They got up little souk² trips to buy jewelry, so that sliding on their scrawny tanned arms their bracelets clinked and chimed, like ice cubes knocking together. On Valentine's Day we went to a cheese party; you had to imagine the wine. I was bubbling with happiness; a letter had come from William IV Street, to tell me my novel had been sold. Spearing his Edam³ with a cocktail stick, my husband's boss loomed over me: "Hubby tells me you're having a book published. That must be costing him a pretty penny."

Ijaz, I assumed, was still in America. After all, he had his marital affairs to sort out, as well as business. He doesn't reappear in the diary till March 17th, St. Patrick's Day, when I recorded, "Phone call, highly unwelcome." For politeness, I asked how business was; as ever, he was evasive. He had something else to tell me: "I've got rid of Mary-Beth. She's gone."

"What about the children?"

"Saleem is staying with me. The girl, it doesn't matter. She can have her if she wants."

"Ijaz, look, I must say good-bye. I hear the doorbell." What a lie.

"Who is it?"

What, did he think I could see through the wall? For a second I was so angry I forgot there was only a phantom at the door.

"Perhaps my neighbor," I said meekly.

"See you soon," Ijaz said.

I decided that night I could no longer bear it. I did not feel I could bear even one more cup of coffee together. But I had no means of putting an end to it, and for this I excused myself, saying I had been made helpless by the society around me. I was not able to bring myself to speak to Ijaz directly. I still had no power in me to snub him. But the mere thought of him made me squirm inside with shame, at my own general cluelessness, and at the sad little lies he had told to misrepresent his life, and the situation into which we had blundered; I thought of the sister-in-law, her peach chiffon and her curled lip.

Next day when my husband came home I sat him down and instigated a conversation. I asked him to write to Ijaz and ask him not to call on me anymore, as I was afraid that the neighbors had noticed his visits and might draw the wrong conclusion: which, as he knew, could be dangerous to us all. My husband heard me out. You need not write much, I pleaded, he will get the point. I should be able to sort this out for myself, but I am not allowed to, it is beyond my power, or it seems to be. I heard my own voice, jangled, grating; I was doing what I had wriggled so hard to avoid, I was sheltering behind the mores of this society, off-loading the problem I had created for myself in a way that was feminine, weak and spiteful.

My husband saw all this. Not that he spoke. He got up, took his shower. He lay in the rattling darkness, in the bedroom where the wooden shutters blocked out the merest chink of afternoon glare. I lay beside him. The evening prayer call woke me from my doze. My husband had risen to write the letter. I remember the snap of the lock as he closed it in his briefcase.

I have never asked him what he put in the letter, but whatever it was it worked. There was nothing—not a chastened note pushed under the door, nor a regretful phone call. Just silence. The diary continues but Ijaz exits from it. I read Zuckerman Unbound, The Present & The Past, and The Bottle Factory Outing.⁴ The company's post office box went missing, with all the incoming mail in it. You would think a post box was a fixed thing and wouldn't go wandering of its own volition, but it was many days before it was found, at a distant post office, and I suppose a post box can move if furniture can. We drifted toward our next leave. May 10th, we attended a farewell party for an escapee whose contract was up. "Fell over while dancing and sprained my ankle." May 11th: With my ankle strapped up, "watched The Texas Chainsaw Massacre."⁵

I had much more time to serve in Jeddah. I didn't leave finally till the spring of 1986. By that time we had been rehoused twice more, shuttled around the city and finally outside it to a compound off the freeway. I never heard of my visitor again. The woman trapped in the flat on the corner of Al-Suror Street seems a relative stranger, and I ask myself what she should have done, how she could have managed it better. She should have thrown those drugs away, for one thing; they are nowadays a medication of last resort, because everybody knows they make you frightened, deaf and sick. But about Ijaz? She should never have opened the door in the first place. Discretion is the better part of valor; she's always said that. Even after all this time it's hard to grasp exactly what happened. I try to write it as it occurred but I find myself changing the names to protect the guilty. I wonder if Jeddah left me forever off-kilter in some way, tilted from the vertical and condemned to see life skewed. I can never be certain that doors will stay closed and on their hinges, and I do not know, when I turn out the lights at night, whether the house is quiet as I left it or the furniture is frolicking in the dark.

2009, 2014

Endnotes

- Note 1: Saudi Arabian port city on the Red Sea and modern commercial hub.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Temporarily assigned.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Dress shoes.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: March associated with the English Civil War (1642–51).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Islamic holy month of fasting, introspection, and prayer. "Noon prayer": Muslims typically pray at five designated times each day.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Novel (1979) by Australian writer Patrick White (1912–1990).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Birthplace of Muhammad and Islam's holiest city. All able Muslims are expected to make pilgrimage to Mecca at some point in their lives.Return to reference 7

- Note 8: Third Symphony by German composer Ludwig van Beethoven (1770–1827).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Feast day marking the end of Ramadan.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Full-body robe (Arabic).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Elegant (French).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: British directory for aspiring writers.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Satirical portrait by the Flemish artist Quentin Matsys (1466–1530), also referred to as A Grotesque Old Woman.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Coastal resort area of Jeddah.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Overpass.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Low-ranking female domestic servant.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Novel (1838) by English writer Charles Dickens (1812–1870).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Correspondence between English literature teacher George Lyttelton (1883–1962) and former student Rupert Hart-Davis (1907–1999), published in six volumes between 1978 and 1984.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Novel (1983) by Irish-born English writer Iris Murdoch (1919–1999).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Open-air marketplace.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Dutch cheese.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Novels by American writer Philip Roth (1933–2018) and English writers Ivy Compton-Burnett (1884–1969) and Beryl Bainbridge (1932–2010).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: 1974 American slasher film.Return to reference 5

BORN-DIGITAL LITERATURE

Born-digital literature refers to a subset of literary works that are written on a computer and generally meant to be read on a computer. Many such works are programmed in addition to being written; use sound, motion, and interactivity; and have historically been published on floppy disk, CD-ROM, and online (hence, born-digital). They cannot appear on the printed page without sacrificing some aspect of their essential form and meaning. Other born-digital works begin on a computer, but appear in print and thematize the process of crossing over from screen to page. Their composition and presentation reflect a deep awareness of the media formats in which they appear.

We might think of these works as metamedial rather than metafictional. Whereas a metafictional work self-consciously references its status as a work of fiction, a metamedial work references the media in which it was written or appears—whether it be a paper book, a computer screen, or a particular social media platform. Further, metamedial works do not take the material qualities of language for granted. They experiment with the look and sound of letters and the speed and arrangement of words across print, audio, and video. In various ways, they invite readers of literature to think about how the specificities of print and digital environments affect their experience of the work.

Many of the writers in this cluster invoke or rewrite canonical texts from earlier periods of literary history. This is no accident. Writers wishing to prove that digital media can indeed be literary media draw on their knowledge of the canon and reinvent old forms using new tools and techniques. Take the poetry of Kamau Brathwaite and Caroline Bergvall, for example. When Brathwaite began writing poetry on an Apple Macintosh computer in the late 1980s, he coined the phrase “Sycorax video style” (SVS) to describe his visual exploration of the different typefaces and symbols available through its word-processing program. Named for Caliban's mother, an unseen character who is also a witch and foil to Prospero in Shakespeare's The Tempest, SVS is characterized by pixelated letters, keyboard art (drawings made from symbols available on a keyboard), and variable typefaces, fonts, and font sizes to bring a screen aesthetic to paper. With SVS, Brathwaite reverses expectations of technological progress. He brings graphic design into his writing to excavate the deep past of colonial violence and to compare computer screens to medieval forms of media, such as the scroll and the illuminated manuscript. Poet and sound artist Caroline Bergvall follows Brathwaite in using computer-mediated poetry to evoke the history of the English language as well as the radically different sensory experiences of reading aloud and silent reading. "The Franker Tale" (2011), a contemporary reimagining of Chaucer's "The Franklin's Tale," blends the sounds and spellings of Middle English and modern English to show proximities in the regulation of women's bodies over time. Bergvall further remixes found documents with original writing in a literary version of the common web-based practice of copy and paste.

The earliest computer-generated poetry descends from avant-garde traditions of European modernism. German mathematician Theo Lutz created Stochastic Texts (1959) on a Zuse22 computer. He designed a Fortran program where the input was carefully selected words from Franz Kafka's The Castle and the output was a series of random combinations of those words. Lutz, like the mathematically inclined French poet Raymond Queneau, incorporated randomness, chance, and permutation into the making of poetry. Programmed and recombinant poetry influenced the development of kinetic poetry or poetry that moves across a screen and consequently cannot be read on paper.

The prolific Canadian poet bpNichol created First Screening (1984) on an Apple IIe computer in the BASIC programming language. These kinetic poems operate in the borderlands of text and image. Visuals puns, moving strings of words, and the use of letters as variables draw attention to how the changing physical inscription and pacing of a poem adds to its many possible meanings. The kinetic poetry of bpNichol recalls the visual and typographical play of French symbolist Stéphane Mallarmé and the Blast manifesto (see the cluster on Modernist Manifestos earlier in this volume) and looks forward to the work of Young-Hae Chang Heavy Industries (YHCHI). The group, based in Seoul, South Korea, consists of artist Young-Hae Chang and her partner, Marc Voge. YHCHI programmed the powerful “BUST DOWN THE DOOR!” (2000) and “TRAVELING TO UTOPIA” (2012) with Flash Animation, a software platform of historical importance to developing interactive media on the World Wide Web. YHCHI use the resources of Flash to question the reputation of the internet as a highly accessible or “democratic” medium that levels cultural hierarchies. Their kinetic poems purposely deny users interactivity and create jarring experiences that suggest digital tools may take away more freedom than they give. The high-speed sequencing of frames, shockingly large Monaco typeface, layered multilingual writing, and pulsating music disorient the reader and defamiliarize the visual organization of the computer screen.

The World Wide Web was developed and launched by British computer scientist Tim Berners-Lee in 1989, and in the 1990s, first-generation digital fiction was dominated by American writers of hypertext narratives. afternoon, a story (1990) by Michael Joyce, and Shelley Jackson’s Patchwork Girl (1995), a rewriting of Mary Shelley’s Frankenstein, brought the hyperlinked, networked structure native to the web into this new literary form of storytelling. Hypertext fiction offered multiple reading paths through a story, and its labyrinthine structure would in turn influence twenty-first-century experiments with typography and page design in book-based novels such as Mark Z. Danielewski’s House of Leaves (2000) and Adam Thirlwell’s Kapow! (2012). Ali Smith’s novel How to Be Both (2014), an excerpt of which is included here, was simultaneously published in two print editions, each presenting the narrative in a different order. Print readers received one of the two versions at random while ebook readers were given both versions.

Since 2010, born-digital fiction has spread to large social media platforms where authors engage with internet genres like the tweet and the meme, launch collaborative writing projects, and blend aspects of literary publishing with public performance. The fiction of David Mitchell and Teju Cole reflects the migration of writers without specialized programming skills into the sphere of digital literature. Mitchell published his short story "The Right Sort" on Twitter (rebranded in 2023 as X) serially over one week (July 14–20, 2014) and followed a strict timetable of two batches of tweets per day at one tweet per minute. He welcomed the novelty of writing prose under the constraint of 140 characters (the maximum length of a tweet at that time) and incorporated the rhythm of tweet release into a story that used timing and enjambment to convey the changing mental state of its protagonist.

Writing from Lagos, Nigeria, Cole took to Twitter to examine how modes of attention shaped the relationship between political centers of power and their peripheries. "Seven Short Stories about Drones" (2013) offers a new twist on postcolonial strategies of writing back to the canon. It unfolds through a series of seven tweets, each of which recontextualizes the first line of a classic novel in light of drone strikes and civilian deaths in Afghanistan and Pakistan. If literature is the medium through which readers refine their faculties of attention and empathy, then Cole suggests it might be weaponized against apathy in the face of atrocity. "Hafiz" (2014), which centers on eyewitness accounts of an emergency situation, cleverly harnesses Twitter's reputation as a platform for breaking news and citizen journalism. The short story was written by Cole alone, but its sentences were distributed across a group of his followers who tweeted them from their accounts. Cole then retweeted (copied) his followers' tweets so that the complete story appeared on his profile page. The orchestration of "Hafiz" made ingenious use of Twitter's retweet function to transform an individually authored story into a collaborative performance that blurred the boundaries between fiction and news.

Readers can experience the full effect of kinetic poetry through an ebook, which, unlike a print format, enables access to the audio and video features of born-digital literature. In the case of social media-based literature, access is more complicated. Twitter fiction, on its native platform, blended into the news feeds of different users so that each reader would encounter a story or a fragment of the story through the prism of their personalized feed. While the Norton Anthology ebook cannot replicate the experience of reading on Twitter, it does remind us how all literature that lasts is inevitably read outside of its original context. This fact does not diminish the value of the encounter, but raises fruitful questions about the relationship between text and context, between reading and viewing a poem, and between experiencing a fictional work in real time on a social media platform and reading it later in its archived form. To make some of the literature in this section more accessible, we invite you to move from page to screen.

With twentieth- and twenty-first-century advances in digital technology, desktop computers, laptops, game consoles, tablets, and smartphones have become indispensable tools for work and play. Even if preservation and display pose a challenge as file formats change and become obsolete, born-digital literature proves that computing devices have left a vital mark on the arts of the English language. Through their inspired use of word-processing software, programming languages, graphic design, and social media interfaces, these authors make reading and writing feel new again.

KAMAU BRATHWAITE

In the excerpt below from ConVERSations with poet Nathaniel Mackey, the Barbadian poet Kamau Brathwaite (1930–2020) (see headnote earlier in this volume) introduces Sycorax Video Style, a mode of writing that combines technological and typographical experimentation with the postcolonial desire to reimagine characters from the canon of English literature. Sycorax is the name of Caliban's mother in Shakespeare's The Tempest. Although she never appears on stage, characters refer to her as a witch. Brathwaite reclaims Sycorax as a mother who inspires his poetic creativity and provides an alternative figure of authority to Prospero. Sycorax Video Style uses pixelated letters, computer typefaces, and line drawings to approximate the appearance of a television or computer screen on the printed page. The result is an experimental form of writing that resists the standardization of literary language on the page.

After he began writing in Sycorax Video Style, Brathwaite encountered difficulties with publishers unable or unwilling to deviate from standard formats. The style of ConVERSations reproduced here exemplifies the style as Brathwaite wished it to appear. The visual appearance of the poem "Letter Sycorax" offers a more subdued version of Sycorax Video Style. In the poem Brathwaite imagines Sycorax's computer as an alternative to Prospero's book. The computer, despite being an emblem of Western technology, allows Brathwaite to write "in light" and to improvise upon his past poetics of decolonization.

[On Sycorax Video Style]

The publishers are struggling with it because what happen during this time was not only - for mwe - a 'revolution' into surrealism, if you like, or magical realism - I call it dream status or dreamstorie - [to Nate] you would know more about this than I do - but I suppose dreams are a healing process. .

But the very concept of writing has alter, and it's as if I'm gone back to the Middle Ages, in a way, and I'm tryin to create those things that they did - what-do-you-call-them? Scrolls? that kind of tone. And the computer gives me that opportunity. To release the pen from the fist of my broeken hand and begin what I call my 'video-style', in which I try to make the words themselves live off - away from - the 'page', so you can see - is this true? does this make sense - or does it simply try to mean what i mean? - like see their sound - technology taking us 'back', I suppose, to the Urals - which is why I continue to think of the MiddleAges - what was 'happening' in Europe, the Mediterranean, the Middle East, the Islamic world of the ILLUMINATED MANUSCRIPTS when the written word could still hear itself speak, as it were And beyond that, even to the possibility of

On Sycorax Video Style: This is a selection from ConVERsations with Nathaniel Mackey, a book based on a transcript of a public discussion between the two poets. Mackey (b. 1947) is referred to as "Nate." Throughout, Brathwaite plays with the sound and sight of words as he brings in the informal style and syntax of spoken Caribbean English.

Sycorax: In Shakespeare's Tempest, Sycorax is a character mentioned but not seen. She is the mother of Caliban, who has become important in postcolonial Caribbean literature as a symbol for the colonial subject who has absorbed the colonizer's culture and language but rejects its authority.

mwe: derived from Haitian Creole, “mwe” in Brathwaite’s lexicon signifies a combination of “me” and “we” and the retention of individuality within community.

surrealism: an artistic movement focusing on the unconscious and on creating dream-like scenes.

magical realism: a literary movement originating in Latin America; it blends fantastical elements into the realist novel. Major authors associated with the movement include Alejo Carpentier (1904–1980) and Gabriel García Márquez (1927–2014).

Middle Ages: period from the 5th to 15th centuries, between the fall of Rome and the Renaissance.

scrolls: Gutenberg invented the printing press sometime around 1440; this set in motion the printing of books as we know them today. Prior to this, scrolls, made of rolled pieces of parchment or other material, were used for writing and reading. Today, “scrolling” refers to the navigation of computer screens.

broeken: deliberately alternative spelling for “broken.”

Urals: a mountain range in Western Russia; commonly referred to as the boundary between Europe and Asia.

illuminated manuscripts: hand-written books with elaborate painted decorations, including borders, large chapter letters, and miniature and full-pages pictures. The majority of them were produced in the Middle Ages.

HIEROGLYPHICS

- Egypt, Maya, Aztec - and 'beyond' that even unto timehri before fire. It involves a process of video-thinking and a presentation - a representation - of illuminated scrolls which the present concept of the 4½" x 7½" margin book with a certain uniform face, won't interest and therefore can't/won't/won't entertain - hence my struggle with publishers and printers over the presentation - the representation - of all my new 'Sycorax video-style' stuff: DreamStories [ds], The Zea Mexican Diary [zmd], Trench Town Rock [ttr] and especially DreamStories which is the nearest of these texts to dream and why in the end I have to publish BarabajanPoem (s) and later MR [Magic(al) Realism] myself [Savacou North 1994 & 1998; tho the printer succeeded in well fuckin up - even tho is 'print ready' - its pagination + the signatures, so that it wasn't ready when i needin it etc etc etc - an dat's basically because e tink e know better dan mwe about MU-RAL]

* * *

HIEROGLYPHICS: writing that uses pictures as characters, rather than a letter-based alphabet. The Egyptian, Mayan, and Aztec empires all used different forms of hieroglyphics.

timehri: Guyanese Amerindian word that means "paintings and drawings on a rock," or "petroglyph." Brathwaite drew on concepts from Indigenous languages as a counterpoint to European thought.

face: typeface. Brathwaite suggests that the standard-size book with uniform typeface cannot adequately represent Sycorax Video Style.

Letter Sycorax

forest Nzinga

1

Dear mamma

*i writin yu dis letter/wha?
guess what! pun a computer o/kay?
like i jine de mercantilists!*

well not quite!

i mean de same way dem tief/in gun power from sheena & taken we blues &

gone

■■■

say wha? get on wid de same ole story?

okay okay okay

okay

if yu cyaan beat prospero whistle

No mamma!

is not one a dem pensive tings like ibm or bang & ovid
nor anyting glori. ous like dat!

but is one a de bess tings since cicero o kay?

it have key board &

evva

ting. like dat ole reminton yu have pun top de war. drobe up there ketchin duss

only wid dis one yu na ave to benn dung over to out out
de mistake dem wid white liquid paper. de papyrus

ribbid & soff

before it drei up flakey & crink. like yu was paintin yu house

um doan even nuse no paper yu does have to roll

pun dat blk rollin pin like yu rollin dough pun a flatten

& does go off ping pun de right hann wing a de paper
when de clatterin words start to fly & fling
like a ping. wing

■

wid dis  now
long before yu cud say jackie robb
inson or rt-d2 or shout

wre
dis ya obeah blo get a whole whole para graph write up &

blink pun a black bird

like dat indonesian fella in star trek
where dem is wear dem permanent wrinkle up grey

& white flannel cost ume like dem gettin ready to jogg

but dem sittin dung dere in such silence a rome

it not turn
in a hair pun dem wig/wam &

hack/in out hack/in hack/in all sorta back up & read out & fail out & think & it even have trash

can for garbage from all part/icles a de gal.

a ~~x~~ y

&
mamma

a doan really know how pascal & co. balt apple & cogito ergo sum come to h/invent all these tings since de rice & fall a de roman empire

& how capitalism & slaveley like it putt christianity
on ice

so dem cd always open dat cole smokin door a hell when dem ready for ash or
a psalm
sangridge or
choke

Why i cyaan nuse me hann & crawl

up de white like i use to?

since when i kin type?

dats what i tryin to tell ya!

*yu know me cyaan
neither flat foot pun de key*

boards like say charlie chap dance/in *far less touch

tapp/in like bo.*

jangles

walk/in doun chauncery lane

yu hear/in me mwa?

but i mwangles!

a mean
a nat forwardin wid star wars

nor sing
songin no bionicle
songs or like sputnik &

chips
goin bleep bleep bleep bleep bleep bleep bleep into de peloponnesian wars

but i mwangles

2

Why a callin it

x?

a doan write.
ly know
but yes.
taday when a was tell.

in a ceratin girl
frenn about

it/she kinda look at i funn.
y like if

she tink i has ~~x~~er~~x~~es or aids

so she soffly soffly silk.
in i off like if i is sick.

ly or sorrow or souse

but is like what i try.
in to sen/seh &

seh about muse.
in computer

& mouse & learn.

in prospero ling.
go

&
ting

not fe dem/not fe dem
de way caliban

done

but fe we fe a-we

for nat one a we shd response if prospero get curse

wid im own curser

though um not like when covetous ride miss praedial
mule

but is like we still start where we start/in out start/in out start/in out start/in

out since menelek was a bwoy
& why is dat &

what is de bess way to say so/so it doan sounn like brigg flatts or her. vokitz nor de n.

san cantos nor de souf sea bible nor like ink. le & yarico & de anglo sa  on chronicles

&
mamma!

a fine
a cyaan get nutten

write a cyaan get nutten really rite

while a stannin up hey in me years & like me
inside a me shadow

like de mahn still mekkin mwe walk up de slope dat e slide
in black down de whole long curve a de arch

i pell a go

some times smile.
in nice

some times like e really laughin after we & some times like e helpin we up while e push.

in we black dung
again

like when yu rumbellin dung into de under grounn

on one a dem move.
in stair.
crace &

*like yu fuh.
get like yu wallet or some ting like*

*dat
& yu cyaan nevva turn back*

nor walk back up nor

even run back up

outta there

■

*cause de stair.
crace crazy &*

*creak.
in & snake
skinn. in*

it

down down down

&

how. ever

yu

runnin up runnin up runnin up runnin up

it still goin down

goin down

goin down

goin down

like sa.

hell

like sy.

phyllis

like

the edges of the desert

&

guess who down dey at de top a de line wid dante & dodo & julie & nappo & nix & adolph kaisermann be. havin like one a de boys

but idi & splash & pol

pot

&

a whole rash a economists pullin we up by we boot

straps & smo. kin

pot

bellied ha/ha/ha/ha havana cigars

& grand master sergeant doe & brand new imperial corporals smilin of cordite & leather

strap & vd & vid. eo

&

the striped eyes of nigerian tigritude & like what yu say happ.

enin inna libraria

*all a dem brooks of the dead
&*

mamma

*a know yu can plant lettice & ice but yu
cyaan eat ikebana*

*Yet a sittin dung here in front a dis stone
face*

eeee lectrical mallet into me

fist

chipp/in dis poem onta dis tab. let

chiss. ellin dark. ness writin in light

like i is a some. is a some. is a some body.

a x
pert or some *thing like moses or aaron or one a dem dyaaam isra

light*

&
mamma!

1993

Glossary

Letter Sycorax

from the 1993 New Directions edition; an earlier version, titled "X/Self's Xth Letters from the Thirteen Provinces" (Oxford University Press, 1987), had standard typography and explanatory notes, both of which Brathwaite resisted and subsequently removed.

Nzinga legendary queen of the African kingdoms of Ndonga and Matamba (modern-day Angola), renowned for winning an anticolonial war against the Portuguese and for providing refuge for African resistance.

jine

join (West Indian English).

dem tief

them thief (West Indian English).

sheena

China (Brathwaite's note, Oxford edition).

taken we blues echoing lines protesting the White appropriation of Black culture for profit in "Note on Commercial Theater" by Langston Hughes: "You've done taken my blues and gone" and "Yep, you done taken my blues and gone."

yu cyaan

you cannot.

prospero

Shakespeare's plantation owner (Brathwaite's note); main character in The Tempest who uses his magical powers to enslave Caliban.

tings things.

ibm

IBM—American technology company; dominant in the personal computer market at the time this poem was written.

bang & ovid

Bang & Olufsen, a Danish company known for luxury electronics; punning on Ovid, Roman poet and fixture of the classical canon.

cicero

unit of measurement used in early European typography and a family of computer fonts, named for Marcus Tullius Cicero, Roman statesman and writer.

evva

every.

reminton

Remington; an early typewriter.

benn dung

"bend down," with play on "dung."

white liquid paper

also known as White-Out, an opaque liquid used to correct mistakes in typewritten texts.

papyrus ancient paperlike material.

ribbid & soff

ribbed and soft.

"rollin" "ping"

a typewriter uses rollers to hold and advance paper, rings a bell ("ping") when approaching the end of the page, and clatters when its keys are depressed.

ping. wing

pun on the computer font pingwing.

jackie robb-inson

Jackie Robinson, the first African American to play Major League Baseball; see also the expression "Before I could say Jack Robinson," meaning something happened very fast.

rt-d2

R2-D2, a robot in the Star Wars films.

obeah

a system of spiritual practices in the African diaspora of the Caribbean and South America.

star trek

American science fiction television show; it is unclear the actor or character to whom Brathwaite refers.

star trek

American science fiction television show; it is unclear the actor or character to whom Brathwaite refers.

wig/wam

play on wig and wigwam, a Native American dwelling with a domed roof, and on "hairpin turn."

hack, back up, readout, trash can

computer-related terms.

hack, back up, readout, trash can

computer-related terms.

hack, back up, readout, trash can

computer-related terms.

hack, back up, readout, trash can

computer-related terms.

hack, back up, readout, trash can

computer-related terms.

pascal programming language, named after French philosopher Blaise Pascal, who created an adding machine that was a precursor to the calculator.

co.balt

mineral used in some batteries for portable electronics.

apple computer company founded in 1976.

cogito ergo sum

"I think, therefore I am" (Latin), attributed to philosopher René Descartes.

h/invent approximates West Indian pronunciation.

ash or / a psalm / sangridge or / choke

play on Ash Wednesday or Palm Sunday, and on sandwich or coke (and choke also as "stifle").

ash or / a psalm / sangridge or / choke

play on Ash Wednesday or Palm Sunday, and on sandwich or coke (and choke also as "stifle").

ash or / a psalm / sangridge or / choke

play on Ash Wednesday or Palm Sunday, and on sandwich or coke (and choke also as "stifle").

ash or / a psalm / sangridge or / choke

play on Ash Wednesday or Palm Sunday, and on sandwich or coke (and choke also as "stifle").

charlie chap

Charlie Chaplin, English silent film actor.

bojangles

nickname of Bill Robinson, American tap dancer and entertainer, described by Brathwaite as an “underground/submerged teacher and choreographer of many (more famous) in the Fred Astaire/Shirley Temple era.”

chauncery lane

Not the London walkway, but downtown Kingston (Jamaica) reggae-making and recording center (Brathwaite’s note).

chauncery lane

Not the London walkway, but downtown Kingston (Jamaica) reggae-making and recording center (Brathwaite’s note).

farwardin

possibly a play on “Farvardin,” the Persian name for the first month of the Solar Hijri calendar.

bionicle bionics is the combination of biological bodies by technological engineering.

sputnik

the first satellite launched into space, in 1957 by the Soviet Union.

peloponnesian wars wars between Athens and Sparta (431–404 B.C.E.), which ended democracy in Athens.

xerxes

possibly the stylized x’s here stand for an “h” and “p,” making this herpes, another sexually transmitted disease. “Xerxes” is also a Persian king who invaded ancient Greece.

aids

AIDS, an immune system disorder caused by the HIV virus.

praedial

relating to or attached to the land; used to differentiate enslaved people who worked in the field from those who worked in the home (nonpraedial).

menelek

Menelik I, considered by Rastafarians the founder of the Solomonic dynasty in Ethiopia.

brigg flatts

Briggflatts, 1966 poem by British poet Basil Bunting.

brigg flatts

Briggflatts, 1966 poem by British poet Basil Bunting.

her. vokitz

M. J. Herskovits, American cultural anthropologist whose books trace African culture in African American culture.

π san cantos mathematical sign for the constant pi. With "san," this is The Pisan Cantos, part of poet Ezra Pound's The Cantos (1948).

souf sea bible

play on the South Sea Bubble, the 1720 speculation bubble of British investors in the South Sea Company that traded in enslaved people.

ink. le and yarico

Inkle and Yarico, a 1787 comic opera in which Inkle, a British trader, is shipwrecked in the West Indies and falls in love with a Caribbean woman, Yarico.

anglo saxon chronicles records of English history from the 9th century.

e slide / in black down

allusion to the myth of Sisyphus, condemned in Hades forever to roll a boulder up a hill only to have it roll back down.

e slide / in black down

allusion to the myth of Sisyphus, condemned in Hades forever to roll a boulder up a hill only to have it roll back down.

arch i pell a go

archipelago, a group of islands, like those in the Caribbean.

arch i pell a go

archipelago, a group of islands, like those in the Caribbean.

arch i pell a go

archipelago, a group of islands, like those in the Caribbean.

arch i pell a go

archipelago, a group of islands, like those in the Caribbean.

arch i pell a go

archipelago, a group of islands, like those in the Caribbean.

dante

Dante Alighieri, Italian poet who described an elaborate hell in the Divine Comedy.

dodo

an extinct species of flightless bird.

julie

Julius Caesar.

nappo

Napoleon Bonaparte.

nix

Richard Nixon.

adolph kaisermann

Adolph Hitler.

adolph kaisermann

Adolph Hitler.

idi

Idi Amin, brutal Ugandan dictator.

splash possibly Mao Zedong, who swam across the Yangtze River at the age of 72.

pol pot

Pol Pot, Cambodian dictator who perpetrated genocide.

pol pot

Pol Pot, Cambodian dictator who perpetrated genocide.

havana cigars

Havana is the capital of Cuba, known for its cigars. In 1959 revolutionaries overthrew the dictatorship of Fulgencio Batista and established communism in the country.

grand master sergeant doe

Samuel Doe, a master sergeant in the Armed Forces of Liberia who staged a military coup in 1980.

cordite

a propellant used as a replacement for gunpowder, particularly by the British Army.

vd and vid.

play on VD, venereal disease, and vid., the abbreviation of the Latin vide ("see").

nigerian tigritude

allusion to Nigerian writer Wole Soyinka's declaration that "A tiger does not proclaim his tigritude—he pounces," meant to rebut the concept of "négritude," which posited an essential Blackness.

ikebana

the Japanese art of flower arrangement.

moses

a prophet in the Old Testament who led the Israelites out of slavery in Egypt across the Red Sea to establish the Promised Land.

aaron

the brother of Moses; also a prophet.

isra light

Israelite. In the Old Testament, the Israelites were tribes that lived in Canaan.

isra light

Israelite. In the Old Testament, the Israelites were tribes that lived in Canaan.

co.balt

mineral used in some batteries for portable electronics.

bojangles

nickname of Bill Robinson, American tap dancer and entertainer, described by Brathwaite as an "underground/submerged teacher and choreographer of many (more famous) in the Fred Astaire/Shirley Temple era."

sahel\(I\).

transitional region between coastal West Africa and the Sahara Desert.

sahel\(I\).

transitional region between coastal West Africa and the Sahara Desert.

syphyllis

syphilis, a sexually transmitted disease.

syphyllis

syphilis, a sexually transmitted disease.

Sycorax

Caliban's mother in The Tempest, described as a witch. In postcolonial Caribbean literature, Caliban is a figure for the colonial subject who has absorbed the colonizer's culture and language but rejects its authority.

CAROLINE BERGVALL

Born in Germany in 1962 to a Norwegian father and French mother, Caroline Bergvall was raised in Switzerland, France, and Norway. She studied at the Université de la Sorbonne Nouvelle in Paris, received her M.Phil. from the University of Warwick in Britain and her Ph.D. from the Dartington College of Arts, where she directed the Performance Writing program from 1995 to 2000. She served as visiting professor at Kings College London from 2017 to 2020 and remains based in London. Bergvall's poetry crosses linguistic and media boundaries. Multilingualism and translation feature in many of her works, and she makes use of historical languages, such as Middle English, as well as modern languages in her collections Meddle English (2011), Drift (2014), and Alisoun Sings (2019). Her performance pieces feature audio recordings, sound distortion, and installations (often in galleries and museums) that draw attention to the relationship between speaking, hearing, and writing across cultural difference. Racial and especially gendered embodiment emerge as major themes of her work in its turn toward the particularities of the voice, dialect, and accent.

Bergvall's performance writing emphasizes the different media in which words may appear. Her allusive poetry puts literary language into conversation with other textual forms drawn from the history of recording technologies ranging from handwriting to hypertext. In "The Franker Tale," she remixes passages from "The Franklin's Tale" and "The Summoner's Tale" from The Canterbury Tales by Geoffrey Chaucer with quotations from the Letter of Pope John Paul II to Women (1995). In the letter, the Pope praised women for fulfilling the traditional roles of wife and mother while also entering the workforce. He also reaffirmed the Catholic Church's stance against abortion even when pregnancy is the result of rape. Bergvall uses these sources and their multilingual underpinnings to chronicle, in frank terms, the global history of sexual violence against women.

The Franker Tale¹ (Deus Hic,² 2)

Following tweye³ two breathing crises and with a tube placidly placed placed in his esophagus, the papal Pope in Rome⁴ global preacher most powerful suprem
o was not in good form
5 when the seeds of death's deeth⁵ one by one finally popped in hym him irreparably tearing the throat and the skin's hem.

Back at the Tavern in London
the dear vinolent⁶ drunken queer 10 painter portreytour⁷ knew all along once ones
the hol hole of the hooly blessed Sire Father's muth⁸ mouth turns from screm⁹ to scream to smear 15 rising seated darkly in a white frame of derk purple shoulders drenched in a shower of gold paint
it would be tyme, it's time to deepen the denn,¹ to coarsen the crust and seek out the companye!

20 A new ideology of yvele evell evyl evil manaces society
and it includes gay weddyngge jolly marriage abortion abomination and stem cell studie research wrote the papal he hey in his bestselling scriptures book,
*Memory and Identity.*²

25 The Pope's noisy mouth had a mutt and a deceptively brooding chin.
Ones once both saufly safely shut ad eternam³ papal knights guards were quickly positioned.
30 There will be no collective revelrye, gaiety merrymaking, drynke drinking,
daunce dancing on tabules tables or shaking one's booty aboute around or laying the shrewed cursed poisoned 35 yifte gift of one's maladye this sickness our need at the feet of the lifeless pontiff.⁴
A sea of pilgrims mourn move in sylent silent procession
past the hooly holy cors corpse careyne⁵ carcass arrayed laid-out
prepared solempnely in full ceremony.
But this deethly Death is short-lived.
40 Soon cries rise from Seint Peter's square:⁶
The Pope is dead! Long live the Pope's Rottweiler!⁷

*'Beloved Sisters in the Lord!'*⁸ (Letter to Women, 10 July 1995 on the occasion of the Fourth World Conference on 45 Women, Beijing)
To grope tendrely a conscience
In shrift; in prechyng is my diligence,
I walk and I walke, I fish and I fische his word is set al myn entente to spread intent.⁹
'I greet you all most cordially, women throughout the 50 world!
What great appreciation must be shown to those women who, with a heroic love for the child they have conceived, proceed with a *pregnancy resulting from the injustice of rape. Here we are thinking

of atrocities perpetrated not only in situations of war, still so common in the world, but also in societies which are 55 blessed by prosperity and peace and yet are often corrupted by a culture of hedonistic permissiveness. The choice to have an abortion always remains a grave sin.'*

The wholly painter staring blankly stands between two animal carcasses suspended on hooks has his photograph taken.
60 Women of Bosnia! Women of Rwanda! Women of Afghanistan!

Women of Bengal! Kurdish women! Women of Chechnya!¹
Whan thirty tyrants, ful of cursednesse,
Hadde slayn Phidoun in Atthenes, at feste,
They comanded his daughters for tareste,
65 And bryngen hem biforn hem in despit,
Al naked, to fulfille hir foul delit, their foul delight
And in hir fadres blood their father's blood they made them dance

Upon the pavement, God yeve hem meschaunce!²
Women and children of Sudan! Women of Colombia!
70 Kashmiri women! Punjabi women! Women of France!
Women of Britain! Women of Finland! Women of America!³

They of Mecene leete enquire and seke
Of Lacedomye fifty maidens eke,
On whiche they wolden doon hir lecherye;⁴
75 And foul delight.

Susters and nieces! Mothers aunts and doghters!
Deus Hic! God is drunk!

At these wordes words heven rose glood⁵
the deepest soun son sound 80 a song sangen entuned intoned
a dense clamour clamor cries out Love is leaving! the Earth quakes quaketh shakes under their feet!
some sort of deep tabour⁶ of drum or drone.
My tale is almost doon.⁷
85 Some sawe some saying goes some seyn some say they say they saw des foules⁸ de crowds en sang⁹ bleeding incensed, suster, the sky is dreaming drumming up
90 red clouds of red blod an occean of blood ocean.
Amongst them they say they saw the joly Painter departed
swymmes floating, and all the time farting¹ in the hote hot somer summer heat heete with the glee of an Ashbery John.²
95 Othere say that it was the old Papa's body finally flying free
quit of its distasteful containee.
Here endeth the Franker Tale.

2011

Endnotes

- Note 1:
In addition to remixing passages from The Canterbury Tales with material from the papal letter, Bergvall also mixes Latin, Middle English, English, and French. "The Franklin's Tale" centers on the marriage between Dorigen and the knight Averagus. Both pledge to a marriage of equals in which neither exerts absolute sovereignty over the other. When a mission takes Averagus away for two years, Dorigen receives advances from the handsome squire Aurelius. Thinking it will deter Aurelius, Dorigen offers her hand on the condition that Aurelius complete a seemingly impossible task: remove threatening rocks from the coastline. When he succeeds through the services of a learned clerk, Dorigen despairs and contemplates suicide. Upon his return, Averagus tells Dorigen to keep her promise to Aurelius, but upon witnessing the nobility of Averagus, Aurelius releases Dorigen from her promise. In turn, the clerk releases Aurelius from his debt as well.

Return to reference 1

- Note 2: God be here (Latin). The Friar speaks these words in "The Summoner's Tale," a satiric tale highly critical of friars (members of religious order that have taken a vow of poverty). In the tale the Friar offers false promises of prayer in return for gold.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Two (Middle English).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The pope is the head of the Catholic Church and is the bishop of Rome. The pope technically resides in Vatican City, a city entirely surrounded by the city of Rome.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Death (Middle English).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Drunken (Middle English).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Painter (Middle English).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Mouth (Middle English).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Possibly a variation on screme (scream in Middle English).Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Den, or lair (Middle English).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Book published by Pope John Paul II in 2005. Included in it are his controversial claims that abortion and gay marriage belong to "a new ideology of evil, perhaps more insidious and hidden, which attempts to pit human rights against the family and against man."Return to reference 2

- Note 3: To eternity (Latin).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The Pope.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Corpse (Middle English).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The plaza located in front of St. Peter's Basilica, in the Vatican City.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Breed of working dog known for its strength.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The italicized sections of the poem are direct quotes from Pope John Paul II's Letter to Women in which he addresses the rights and dignity of women around the world. The Pope thanks women for being mothers and wives as well as for working outside the home or joining religious orders. He addresses violence against women and inequality, and reaffirms the distinct roles of men and women in society.Return to reference 8
- Note 9:
Quotations from Chaucer's "The Summoner's Tale," in which the corrupt Friar speaks to Thomas of his calling to preach diligently, study the gospel of Peter and Paul, and spread the work of Christ. The lines from the original tale are as follows:

To grope tendrely a conscience / In shrift; in prechyng is my diligence, / And studie in Petres wordes and in Poules. / I walke, and fisse Cristen mennes soules, / To yelden Jhesu Crist his propre rente; / To sprede his word is set al myn entente.

Return to reference 9

- Note 1: A republic in Russia. "Bosnia": country in southeast Europe. "Rwanda": country in Central Africa. "Afghanistan": country in Central Asia. "Bengal": region in India and Bangladesh. "Kurdish": of the Iranian Kurd ethnic group.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Quotation from "The Franklin's Tale" regarding Phidon's daughters. Phidon, an Athenian, was killed during the reign of the Thirty Tyrants in the city. His daughters were forced to dance naked over their father's blood but drowned themselves in a well to preserve their virginity.Return to reference 2

- Note 3: Country in North America, or the American continents. "Sudan": country in northeast Africa. "Colombia": country in South America. "Kashmiri": of the Kashmir ethnic group in India. "Punjabi": from the Punjab region of Pakistan and India. "France": country in Europe. "Britain": country in Europe. "Finland": country in northern Europe.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Quotation from "The Franklin's Tale" about Greek maidens who killed themselves to preserve their virginity. This entire stanza recalls Dorigen's catalog of women who committed suicide rather than compromise their chastity.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Glide (Middle English).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Drum (Middle English).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Done (Middle English).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Crowds (French).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Blood (French).Return to reference 9
- Note 1: In "The Summoner's Tale," Thomas, the man whom the friar asks for gold, gives him a fart instead.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: John Ashbery (1927–2017), American poet.Return to reference 2

bpNICHOL

Barrie Phillip Nichol (1944–1988) was a Canadian poet, born in Vancouver, British Columbia. He first came to prominence for his concrete poetry—that is, the visual arrangement of words on a page to create pictures or abstract designs. Concrete poetry treats words like modeling clay to be sculpted and shaped, and Nichol’s playful poems of the 1960s and 1970s experimented with breaking words into their component parts (for example, letters and syllables) as well as sculpting images out of words. He won a prestigious Governor General’s Award for several poetry collections, including The Cosmic Chef: An Evening of Concrete (1970) and Still Water (1970).

Nichol described his own poetic practice as animated by the “borderblur” between image, text, and sound. When he moved from the paper page to the computer screen, he introduced the movement of words into his experiments with textual display. First Screening (1984) is an early example of kinetic poetry that Nichol created using an Apple IIE computer and the BASIC programming language. Over the course of a dozen poems, Nichol explores the movement of words and letters across the screen and, in the source code for the last poem, “Off Screen Romance,” even invites readers to code part of the poem themselves. Such a move reminds readers that born-digital poetry exists in at least two locations—on screen and off screen in the source code that generated it.

Nichol was a prolific writer in multiple media. Over the course of his life, he extended and revised his major work of long poetry, The Martyrology (1972–87; 1990–93). He also created sound poetry as part of a group called The Four Horsemen, and he wrote screenplays for the children’s television show Fraggle Rock. The following pages contain screenshots from First Screening. We invite you to read/view the full video of the poems in the Norton Anthology ebook in the Norton Ebook Reader platform or doing a web search for “bpNichol,

First Screening.”

First Screening

Cover of First Screening.

The cover of
FIRST SCREENING
was designed on an Apple IIe computer using the Gutenberg Word Processing programme.

The cover drawing is entitled
4 PLANE H'S
and is for Barbara Caruso

FIRST SCREENING
is published by Underwhich Editions
P.O.Box 262
Adelaide Street Station
Toronto, Ontario
Canada M5C 2J4

This is No. 1 in the Underwhich Software Series.
It is reproduced in an edition of 100 copies of which this is No. 20

Entire contents copyright 1984 by bpNichol.
This disk is not copy-protected. Accept no less.

bp

Production, publication, and copyright information for First Screening.

A FEW NOTES

The dozen poems to be found on this diskette (a baker's dozen if you include the cover piece) were composed over the period of a year & a half, from approximately Spring 83 to Fall 84. As a result, tho the on-screen activity never reveals it, the off-screen programming moves from brute stumbling to some much more elegant solutions, a record of how the process of programming, the process of composition, guided me to the final result. What most surprised me in this process was how concerns that had been present for me in the mid-60's, issues of composition and content i was confronting while working with my early concrete poems, suddenly found a new focus. In fact, i was finally in a position to create those filmic effects that i hadn't had the patience or skill to animate at that time.

As ever, new technology opens up new formal problems, and the problems of babel raise themselves all over again in the field of computer languages and operating systems. Thus the fact that this disk is only available in an Applesoft Basic version (the only language i know at the moment) precisely because translation is involved in moving it out further. But that inherent problem doesn't take away from the fact that computers & computer languages also open up new ways of expressing old contents, of revivifying them. One is in a position to make it new.

I'm particularly grateful therefore to Stan Bevington, who got me into computers in the first place, Frank Davey and Renwick Day, who more than fanned the first flickerings of my curiosity, and Lionel Kearns and Marco Fraticelli from whom i learned many of the programming skills used to make these poems. But the dedication, which appears on this disk, is an acknowledgement to two people who kept my writing hopes up in the mid-60's when there were far fewer people out there who seemed to share the excitements and concerns these poems grow out of. In a real sense, they kept me writing.

bpNichol

Toronto, September 28th, 1984.

Introductory notes for First Screening.

Screenshot from the kinetic poem "After the Storm."

```
104 GOSUB 1000: REM CONSTRUCTI
    ON 1
105 GOSUB 3556: REM ANY OF YOU
    R LIP
106 GOSUB 425: REM SELF-REFLEX
    IVE 2
107 GOSUB 820: REM POEM FOR MY FATHER
108 GOSUB 1900: REM AFTER THE STORM
110 REM FOR THE CURIOUS VIEWE
    R/READER THERE'S AN 'OFF-SCR
    EEN ROMANCE' AT 1748. YOU JU
    ST HAVE TO TUNE IN THE PROGR AMME.
112 GOSUB 495: REM TIDAL POOL
114 GOSUB 550: REM DEDICATION
116 REM FOR FURTHER RE-MARKS
    LIST 3900,4000
118 FOR PAUSE = 1 TO 4000: NEXT
```

Code for the poems in First Screening with an invitation to the reader at line 110. The command "Run 1748" reveals a hidden poem called "Off-Screen Romance."

YOUNG-HAE CHANG HEAVY INDUSTRIES

YOUNG-HAE CHANG HEAVY INDUSTRIES (YHCHI) is the name of a fake corporation formed in 1999 by Korean artist and translator Young-Hae Chang and Seoul-based poet Mark Voge. The pair use Flash animation, an interactive program for making videos, to create powerful and often dystopian works of kinetic poetry. Many of the works of YHCHI address themes of authoritarianism, as in "BUST DOWN THE DOOR!" and "TRAVELING TO UTOPIA," both of which depict invasive searches by police officers and representatives of the state. In "BUST DOWN THE DOOR!," the pacing of the video increases quickly and becomes almost assaulting as readers/viewers are forced to experience the video as beyond their control. In "TRAVELING TO UTOPIA," policing is explicitly tied to the historical use of surveillance technologies to monitor the movements of people across borders. This work also introduces multiple plotlines: one at the top of the screen in Korean, one in the center in English, and another at the bottom of the screen, also in English. The videos of YHCHI often appear in multiple versions and multiple languages with languages left untranslated. This style of production and distribution both mimics and critiques the business models of corporations that release many versions of a product tailored to distinct sectors of the global market.

Most YHCHI digital videos begin with a countdown from ten that reproduces the opening countdowns associated with analog film reels in early cinema. They also use the Monaco font, which gives the text in their videos a distinctive, even branded, appearance. Their use of jazz music is another signature aspect of their style, and often creates syncopation across music and text. YHCHI deliberately and creatively cross old and new forms of media as they move between the literary and art worlds. They have been called pioneers of internet art and have used their work to examine and reappraise the key promises of the internet as a technology for connecting and empowering people across the world. The following pages contain screenshots from "BUST DOWN THE DOOR!" and "TRAVELING TO UTOPIA." Please replace the search text with: We invite you to refer to the Norton Anthology ebook in the Norton Ebook Reader platform or search the web for the full videos.

BUST DOWN THE DOOR!

YOUNG-HAE
CHANG
HEAVY INDUSTRIES
PRESENTS

BUST DOWN
THE DOOR!

Screenshots of the poem's opening credits, which announce its author and title.

TRAVELING TO UTOPIA

Screenshot of the poem's animated title.

Screenshot of the kinetic poem's opening lines.

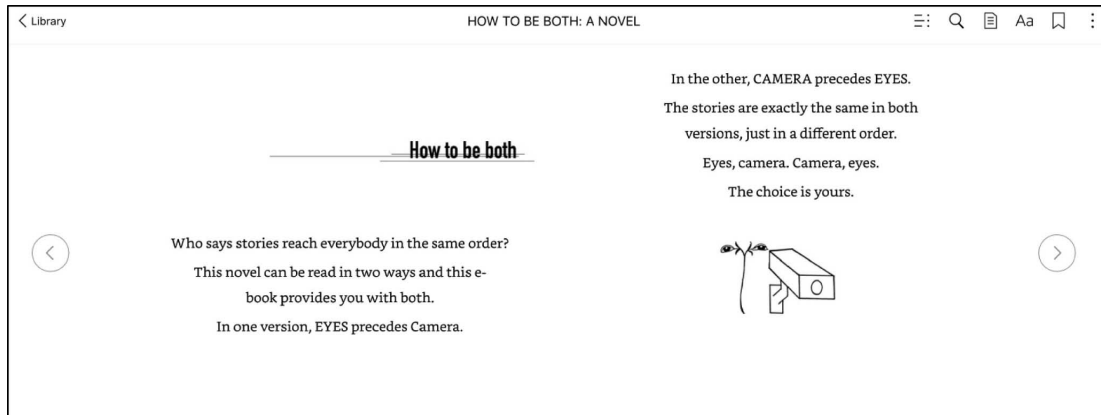

ALI SMITH

Ali Smith was born in 1962 in Inverness, the cultural capital of the Scottish Highlands. She was raised in a working-class family and grew up in a council home (public housing) near the Caledonian Canal. As a child Smith dreamed of becoming a sanitation worker and of finding all sorts of interesting thrown-away things. As a teenager she had a variety of jobs, including waitress, food preparer, and receptionist for the BBC Highlands office. Smith went on to study English language and literature at the University of Aberdeen and later pursued (but did not complete) a doctorate in Irish and American modernism at Cambridge.

While at Cambridge Smith found her passion in playwriting. Her first three plays, Stalemate, The Dance, and Trace of Arc, premiered at the Edinburgh Festival Fringe, a major performing arts festival. Her first short story collection, Free Love and Other Stories, appeared in 1995 and received the Saltire First Book of the Year Award. Since then Smith has published three more short story collections, twelve novels, including the Seasonal Quartet (pub. 2016–20), and a number of nonfiction and journalistic pieces. Smith's fiction is admired for its humorous wordplay, genderbending playfulness, and rich engagement with visual art. All of these characteristics are on display in the excerpt here from How to Be Both (2014), in which Smith creates a memorable female protagonist named George who is mourning the loss of her mother while also recalling their trip to Italy to view fifteenth-century frescoes. The novel was simultaneously published in two print editions, each presenting the narrative in a different order. Print readers received one of the two versions of the narrative at random, while ebook readers were given both versions from which to choose. Smith wears her erudition lightly via her characters' detailed descriptions of painted images and in their bickering over Latin phrases, etymology, and grammar rules. In her fiction, errors become portals of discovery and narrative pathways follow more than one direction.

From How to Be Both

A screenshot from the opening of the ebook.

Consider this moral conundrum for a moment, George's mother says to George who's sitting in the front passenger seat.

Not says. Said.

George's mother is dead.

What moral conundrum? George says.

The passenger seat in the hire care is strange, being on the side the driver's seat is on at home. This must be a bit like driving is, except without the actual, you know, driving.

Okay. You're an artist, his mother says.

Am I? George says. Since when? And is that a moral conundrum?

Ha ha, her mother says. Humour me. Imagine it. You're an artist.

This conversation is happening last May, when George's mother is still alive, obviously. She's been dead since September. Now it's January, to be more precise it's just past midnight on New Year's Eve, which means it has just become the year after the year in which George's mother died.

George's father is out. It is better than him being at home, standing maudlin in the kitchen or going round the house switching things off and on. Henry is asleep. She just went in and checked on him; he was dead to the world, though not as dead as the word dead literally means when it means, you know, dead.

This will be the first year her mother hasn't been alive since the year her mother was born. That is so obvious that it is stupid even to think it and yet so terrible that you can't not think it. Both at once.

Anyway George is spending the first minutes of the new year looking up the lyrics of an old song. Let's Twist again.¹ Lyrics by Kal Mann. The words are pretty bad. Let's twist again like we did last summer. Let's twist again like we did last year. Then there's a really bad rhyme, a rhyme that isn't, properly speaking, even a rhyme.

Do you remember when Things were really hummin'.

Hummin' doesn't rhyme with summer, the line doesn't end in a question mark, and is it meant to mean, literally, do you remember that time when things smelt really bad?

Then Let's twist again, twisting time is here. Or, as all the sites say, twistin' time.

At least they've used an apostrophe, the George from before her mother died says.

I do not give a fuck about whether some site on the internet attends to grammatical correctness, the George from after says.

That before and after thing is about mourning, is what people keep saying. They keep talking about how grief has stages. There's some dispute about how many stages of grief there are. There are three, or five, or some people say seven.

It's quite like the songwriter actually couldn't be bothered to think of words. Maybe he was in one of the three, five or seven stages of mourning too. Stage nine (or twenty three or a hundred and twenty three or ad infinitum, because nothing will ever not be like this again): in this stage you will no longer be bothered with whether songwords mean anything. In fact you will hate almost all songs.

But George has to find a song to which you can do this specific dance.

It being so apparently contradictory and meaningless is no doubt a bonus. It will be precisely why the song sold so many copies and was such a big deal at the time. People like things not to be too meaningful.

Okay, I'm imagining, George in the passenger seat last May in Italy says at exactly the same time as George at home in England the following January stares at the meaninglessness of the words of an old song. Outside the car window Italy unfurls round and over them so hot and yellow it looks like it's been sandblasted. In the back Henry snuffles lightly, his eyes closed, his mouth open. The band of the seatbelt is over his forehead because he is so small.

You're an artist, her mother says, and you're working on a project with a lot of other artists. And everybody on the project is getting the same amount, salary-wise. But you believe that what you're doing is worth more than everyone on the project, including you, is getting paid. So you write a letter to the man who's commissioned the work and you ask him to give you more money than everyone else is getting.

Am I worth more? George says. Am I better than the other artists?

Does that matter? her mother says. Is that what matters?

Is it me or is it the work that's worth more? George says.

Good. Keep going, her mother says.

Is this real? George says. Is it hypothetical?

Does that matter? her mother says.

Is this something that already has an answer in reality but you're testing me with the concept of it though you already know perfectly well what you yourself think about it? George says.

Maybe, her mother says. But I'm not interested in what I think. I'm interested in what you think.

You're not usually interested in anything I think, George says.

That's so adolescent of you, George, her mother says.

I am adolescent, George says.

Well, yes. That explains that, then, her mother says.

There's a tiny silence, still okay, but if she doesn't give in a bit and soon George knows that her mother, who has been prickly, unpredictable and misery-faced for weeks now about there being trouble in the paradise otherwise known as her friendship with that woman Lisa Goliard, will get first of all distant then distinctly moody and ratty.

Is it happening now or in the past? George says.

Is the artist a woman or a man?

Do either of those things matter? her mother says.

Does either, George says. Either being singular.

Mea maxima,² her mother says.

I just don't get why you won't commit, ever, George says. And that doesn't mean what you think it means. If you say it without the culpa it just means I'm the most, or I'm the greatest, or to me the greatest belongs, or my most.

It's true, her mother says. I'm the most greatest. But the most greatest what?

Past or present? George says. Male or female? It can't be both. It must be one or the other.

Who says? Why must it? her mother says.

AUGH, George says too loud.

Don't, her mother says jerking her head towards the back. Unless you want him awake, in which case you're in charge of entertainment.

I. Can't. Answer. Your. Moral. Question. Unless. I. Know. More. Details, George says sotto voce, which, in Italian, though George doesn't speak Italian, literally means below the voice.

Does morality need details? her mother whispers back.

God, George says.

Does morality need God? her mother says.

Talking to you, George says still below the voice, is like talking to a wall.

Oh, very good, you, very good, her mother says.

How exactly is that good? George says.

Because this particular art, artist and conundrum are all about walls, her mother says. And that's where I'm driving you to.

Yeah, George says. Up the wall.

Her mother laughs a real out-loud laugh, so loud that after it they both turn to see if Henry will waken, but he doesn't. This kind of laugh from her mother is so rare right now that it is almost like normal. George is so pleased she feels herself blush with it.

And what you just said is grammatically incorrect, she says.

It is not, her mother says.

It is, George says. Grammar is a finite set of rules and you just broke one.

I don't subscribe to that belief, her mother says.

I don't think you can call language a belief, George says.

I subscribe to the belief, her mother says, that language is a living growing changing organism.

I don't think that belief will get you into heaven, George says.

Her mother laughs for real again.

No, listen, an organism, her mother says—

(and through George's head flashes the cover of the old paperback called How To Achieve Good Orgasm that her mother keeps in one of her bedside cupboards, from way before George was born, from the time in her mother's life when she was, she says, young and easy under some appleboughs)

—which follows its own rules and alters them as it likes and the meaning of what I said is perfectly clear therefore its grammar is perfectly acceptable, her mother says.

(How To Achieve Good Organism.)

Well. Grammatically inelegant then, George says.

I bet you don't even remember what it was I said in the first place, her mother says.

Where I'm driving you to, George says.

Her mother takes both hands off the wheel in mock despair.

How did I, the most maxima unpedantic of all the maxima unpedantic women in the world, end up giving birth to such a pedant? And why the hell wasn't I smart enough to drown it at birth?

Is that the moral conundrum? George says.

Consider it, for a moment, yes, why don't you, her mother says.

No she doesn't.

Her mother doesn't say.

Her mother said.

Because if things really did happen simultaneously it'd be like reading a book but one in which all the lines of the text have been overprinted, like each page is actually two pages but with one superimposed on the other to make it unreadable. Because it's New Year not May, and it's England not Italy, and it's pouring with rain outside and regardless of the hum (the hummin') of the rain you can still hear people's stupid New Year fireworks going off and off and off like a small war, because people are standing out in the pouring rain, rain pelting into their champagne glasses, their upturned faces watching their own (sadly) inadequate fireworks light up then go black.

* * *

Is this the place you were talking about in the car? she says. The moral conundrum?

Her mother says nothing.

She is looking.

George looks too.

The room is warm and dark. No, not dark, it's light. Both. It's like a huge dark dance hall with a lit-up picture that goes round some of its walls. There is nothing else in the room, except some low benches on which to sit and look at the walls, and over in the far corner a middle-aged lady (attendant?) on a folding seat. Apart from that, there is just the picture. It is impossible to see it all at once. Half the room is covered in it. The other half has faded picture, or no picture. What there is, though, is so full of life happening that it's actually like life, at least those bits are at the far end. And the people in the broad blue stripe which goes all round the middle of the wall, all through the middle of the picture splitting it into an above and a below, look like they're floating, or walking on air, especially in that brighter part.

It resembles a giant comic strip. Except it's also like art.

There are ducks. There's a man with his fist round the neck of a duck. The duck looks really surprised, like it's saying what the f—. Above the duck's head there's another bird just sitting there completely free. It's sitting next to the man and it's watching him throttling the duck as if it's quite interested in what's happening.

This is only one detail. There are details like it everywhere. There's a paddling dog. George stares at its genitals. In fact, look at the largeness of the testicles on all the creatures who have them everywhere in the picture, except the one creature you'd expect it on, the bull. He doesn't seem to have any.

Then there's a monkey hugging the leg of a boy, who regards it with snobby disdain. Over there there's a very small child in a cap, in yellow, reading or eating something. An old woman holding a piece of paper is being attentive to the child. There are unicorns pulling a chariot here and lovers kissing there, and people with musical instruments here, people working up trees and in fields there. There are cherubs and garlands, crowds of people, women working at what looks like a loom up there, and down here there are eyes looking out of a black archway while people talk and do business and don't notice the looking. There are dogs and horses, soldiers and townspeople, birds and flowers, rivers and riverbanks, water bubbles in the rivers, swans that look like they're laughing. There's a crowd of babies. They look haughty. There are rabbits, or hares, no, both.

The buildings in the picture are sometimes beautiful and sometimes broken open, there are broken road slabs and bricks, broken arches up against fine architecture and plants growing through the whole and broken buildings everywhere.

It is impossible, though, not to keep looking then looking back again at the blue-coloured stripe which runs like a frieze round the room between the upper part and the lower parts of the picture and in which the people and animals seem to float free. The blue calls your eyes every time. It gives you a breather from the things happening above and below it. In the blue there's a woman in a beautiful red dress just sitting in the air above a cheeky-looking goat or sheep. There's the man in the white rags. That's the man who was in the picture her mother saw at home. He's why they're here. Along from him, on the other side of the woman floating above the goat, there's a young man or a young woman, could be either, dressed in beautiful rich clothes and holding an arrow or a stick and a gold hoop thing, like everything's nothing but a charming game.

Male or female? she says to her mother who's standing under these figures.

I don't know, her mother says.

Her mother, smiling, points to the man in rags then the woman sitting on air then the playful rather dilettante richly dressed figure in turn.

Male, female, both, she says. Beautiful, all of them, including the sheep. And look at that.

She points to the top level, the level it hurts more to look at for longer because it's so high, where there are three chariots, pulled by different creatures, and a lot of people standing about, and birds and rabbits and trees and flowers and far landscapes.

In come the gods, her mother says.

Are they the gods? George says.

And nobody even notices, her mother says. Look at all the people round them. Like the gods are no big deal. In they come and nobody even bats an eyelid.

George turns on her heel to look at the other wall. Down that long side of the room there's more of the picture. It's meant to be the same kind of thing as this wall. The overall design is the same.

But it's just not as good, not as eyecatching or interesting—or maybe it hasn't been as well restored.

George has a closer look at the other picture-wall.

Its figures are just not as beautiful. There are creatures, like that giant lobster there, but they're nothing compared, say, to that horse on that wall looking out almost directly, whose eyes tell you he's not at all sure about having that man on his back. There are people and flowers here too, even people covered in flowers, but they're less attractive, or more grotesque, than the people there on that end wall where the horses get fatter as the skies get bluer.

It is meant to be the seasons, is it?

She goes back to the good wall.

It is like everything is in layers. things happen right at the front of the pictures and at the same time they continue happening, both separately and connectedly, behind, and behind that, and again behind that, like you can see, in perspective, for miles. Then there are the separate details, like that man with the duck. They're all also happening on their own terms. The picture makes you look at both—the close-up happenings and the bigger picture. Looking at the man with the duck is like seeing how everyday and how almost comic cruelty is. The cruelty happens in among everything else happening. It is an amazing way to show how ordinary cruelty really is.

There doesn't seem to be hunting or cruelty in the top parts, just the lower parts.

The unicorns have horns that look like they're made of lit-up glass.

The clothes all the people are wearing look as if breeze is blowing through them.

George turns towards her mother and is surprised by how young and bright she looks standing under the blue.

What is this place? George says.

Her mother shakes her head.

Palazzo,³ she says.

Then she says a word that George can't catch.

I've never seen anything like it, her mother says. It's so warm it's almost friendly. A friendly work of art. I've never thought such a thing in my life, And look at it. It's never sentimental. It's generous, but it's sardonic too. And whenever it's sardonic, a moment later it's generous again.

She turns to George.

It's a bit like you, she says.

Then she doesn't say anything. She just looks.

The place is completely silent behind them except for the lady attendant who has been charmed by Henry into leading him from picture to picture and telling him the words for whatever he points at.

Cavallo, the woman says.

Horse, Henry says.

Si! the woman says. Bene. Unicorni. Cielo. Stelle. Terra. Dei e dee e lo zodiaco. Minerva. Venere. Apollo. Minerva Marzo Ariete. Venere Aprile Toro. Apollo Maggio Gemelli. Duca Borso di Ferrara. Dondo la giustizia. Dondo un regalo. Il palio. Un cagnolino.⁴

She sees George and her mother are both listening to her too. She points at the blank and faded walls.

Secco,⁵ she says.

She points at the still-picture-covered walls.

Fresco,⁶ she says.

She points at the really good bright end wall.

Mando o andato a Venezia per ottenere il meglio azzurro.⁷

I think she's saying that the blue colour is Venetian, her mother says.

George's mother goes over to speak to the attendant. She speaks in English. The attendant speaks back in Italian which her mother doesn't speak. They smile at each other and have a conversation.

What did she say? George asks her mother as they leave the room through the curtained door and go down the stairs.

I've no idea, her mother says. But it was nice to talk to her.

Afterwards they sit at an outside restaurant table in the garden of this place. Yellow sweet-smelling flowers drop off the trees on to their heads and on to the table. George notices a huge crack in the outside of the palace building up near the roof.

The earthquake maybe, her mother says. Quite recent. Last year. I think we're lucky to have got to see it at all. I think it's just reopened to the public.

Is that why some of the walls have pictures and some just blank plaster? George says. And two of the people in the chariots on the end wall have faces and one of them doesn't?

I don't know, her mother says. I don't know much about it. It was quite hard to find out anything. But I'm finding it quite enjoyable, not knowing.

But what about the moral conundrum? George says.

The what? her mother says.

The getting paid more for the better art, George says.

Oh, yes. That, her mother says. Well.

She tells George again about the artist who did part of the room five hundred and fifty years ago, who thought his work should be paid better than everybody else's in the room and wrote a letter asking the Duke for more money.

In fact, what happened is something even more compelling, she says. because that letter he wrote's the only reason we know anything about that artist even existing. And they only found that letter a hundred years ago. Which was more than four hundred years after he painted his bit of the walls. For four hundred years he didn't exist. No one even knew the room had frescoes in it till only about a hundred or so years ago, end of the eighteen hundreds. They'd been whitewashed over for hundreds of years. Then some whitewash fell off the walls and they found these pictures underneath. The room'd been lost till then.

So if you were in a room, I mean like if you were just sitting in a room. Could the room you were actually in get—lost? Henry says.

He looks stricken.

No, George says. Don't be an idiot.

Don't call your brother an idiot, George's mother says.

You're an idiot, Henry says.

Don't call your sister an idiot, their mother says.

I didn't call him an idiot, I said nidiot, George says. Nidiot is much worse than just idiot.

You're far and away more of a nidiot than me, Henry says.

Than I am, George says.

Her mother laughs.

You can't not do that, can you? she says. It's your nature, isn't it?

Do what? George says.

Henry runs off into the cow parsley at the rough end of the garden where there are some modern-looking sculptures and the meadow has been left to grow as high as it likes. Because the grass is so high he vanishes completely.

This is like a magic place, her mother says.

It's true that it is kind of spectacular here, George thinks—and that's the second time she's thought the word spectacular—because when they walked out here a moment ago and down the garden path to this restaurant, which looked like it might be a junk shop but turns out to serve pasta and wine, a jazz track with old-fashioned piano and trumpets suddenly started playing as if by itself in the air (in reality out of one of the restaurant's speakers) as if especially for them.

Now the garden fills with Italian schoolchildren younger than George and older than Henry. They sit round the tables and talk to each other.

Did he get the money in the end? George says.

Who? her mother says.

The painter, George says. Because he really was better. If he painted the part of the room at the far end.

I don't know, George, her mother says. I know almost nothing about it. I only really know what I've told you, which is what it said under the picture when I saw it at home. When we get back I'll read up about it. Though, you know, it might just be that our eyes are more used to finding some parts of the room more beautiful than the others, because of what we now expect beauty to be. It might be our standards rather than theirs. But I agree. I agree with you. Some of it is really outstandingly beautiful. Some of it is breathtaking. And I find it pretty interesting that the only reason we know that the painter who did that wall existed, even lived at all, is that he asked for more.

Like Oliver Twist,⁸ George says.

Her mother smiles.

In some ways, she says.

What was his name? George says.

Her mother screws up her eyes.

You know, I knew this, George, I did know. I read it when we were at home. But right now I can't remember it, her mother says.

We came all this way to see a picture you like that much but you can't remember the name of the man who did it? George says.

Her mother widens her eyes at her.

I know, she says. But it kind of doesn't matter, does it, that we don't know his name. We saw the pictures. What more do we need to know? It's enough just that someone painted them and then one day we came here and saw them. No?

I could look it up on your phone, George says.

Then she immediately feels a mixture of things ranging from unpleasant all the way to bad.

(Guilt and fury:

– Sing me a love song

– No, my singing voice went with pregnancy

– I wonder where it went. I bet its [sic] in a cathedral city up in some fancy cathedral ceiling hanging out with the carvings of the angels

Fury and guilt:

– Howre your eyes today and how you doin what you doin where are you & whenll we meet)

Her mother doesn't notice. Her mother has no idea. Her mother is looking down for where her phone is, checking it is safely in the pocket of her bag.

(George's own phone is not a smartphone though she will be given one of her own in less than a year's time, at Christmas, three and a half months after her mother dies.)

Let's not look anything up, her mother says. It's so nice. Not to have to know.

Her mother is going soft.

Not that there's anything wrong with soft. Her mother, soft, forgetful, vague and loving, like other people's mothers always seem to be, is a whole new prospect.

* * *

Is her mother really dead? Is it an elaborate hoax? (All hoaxes, on TV and the radio and in the papers and online, are described as elaborate whether they're elaborate or not.) Has someone elaborately, or not, spirited her mother away like on an episode of Spooks⁹ and now she's living a life elsewhere under a new name and just isn't allowed to contact people (even her own children) from her former life?

Because how can someone just vanish?

George had seen her contorted in the hospital bed. Her skin had changed colour and was covered in weals. She could hardly speak. What she did say, in the last part of whatever was happening to her and before they put George outside the door to wait in the corridor, was that she was a book, I'm an open book, she said. Though it was also equally possible that what she'd said was that she was an unopen book.

I a a u opn ook.

* * *

2014

Endnotes

- Note 1: 1961 song sung by Chubby Checker, following his hit single "The Twist." Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Nonsensical Latin phrase, "my maximum." The phrase "mea maxima culpa" means "my most grievous fault." Return to reference 2

- Note 3: An impressive building resembling a palace.Return to reference 3

- Note 4:

This passage seems to reflect the perspective of the listeners who do not speak Italian and are possibly mishearing it.

Translations for the Italian: "Sì": Yes! "Bene": Good. "Unicorni": Unicorns. "Cielo": Sky. "Stelle": Stars. "Terra": Earth. "Dei e dee e lo zodiaco": Gods and goddesses and the zodiac. "Minerva": Roman equivalent of Athena, goddess of wisdom and justice.

"Venere": Venus, Roman equivalent of Aphrodite, goddess of love and beauty. "Apollo": Roman and Greek god of prophecy and archery. "Minerva Marzo Ariete": Minerva, March (the month), and Aries, the first astrological sign of the Zodiac, where the Sun is located in the month of March. "Venere Aprile Toro": Venus, April, Taurus, second sign of the zodiac where the sun is located in the month of April. "Apollo Maggio Gemelli": Apollo, May, and Gemini, third sign of the zodiac, where the sun is located in May. "Duca Borso di Ferrara": Borso d'Este (1413–1471), Duke of Ferrara. "Dondo": Could be a misapprehension of "tondo," a Renaissance term for a circular painting. "La giustizia": justice. "Un regalo": a gift. "Il palio": The prize. "Un cagnolino": a puppy.

The location is the Palazzo Schifanoia in Ferrara, a city in Northern Italy. The "Hall of the Months" contains frescoes divided into twelve sections, one for each month, though only some still exist. The upper section of each shows the world of the gods. The middle section shows the zodiac signs. And a lower part shows the world of humans, including the court and townspeople.

Return to reference 4

- Note 5: Painting on dry plaster with water-based pigments.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Painting on wet plaster; when it dries it becomes part of the wall.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: I sent or went to Venice to get the best blue.Return to reference 7

- Note 8: Protagonist of Charles Dickens's Oliver Twist (1838), in which the hungry orphan Oliver says to the master, "Please, sir, I want some more."Return to reference 8
- Note 9: British TV spy series (2002–11).Return to reference 9

DAVID MITCHELL

David Mitchell was born in 1969 in Southport, England, and received an M.A. in comparative literature from the University of Kent. As a child, he struggled with a stammer, a speech impediment that he has said informs his identity as a writer. Today, Mitchell is a novelist renowned for his ability to write in different voices and across different genres. His first novel, Ghostwritten (1999), featured nine narrators in nine different locations telling interconnected stories. It was written while Mitchell was living in Hiroshima, Japan, where he taught English. He and his family returned to Europe in 2002 and settled in Ireland, where Mitchell now resides.

Mitchell's follow-ups to Ghostwritten, Number9Dream (2001) and Cloud Atlas (2004), were both shortlisted for the Booker Prize and continued his rich engagement with East Asia. They also cemented his reputation as a stylistic chameleon able to mix literary fiction with the genres of science fiction and fantasy. Mitchell has since tried his hand at the historical novel, The Thousand Autumns of Jacob de Zoet (2010), and the horror novel, Slade House (2015), which grew out of the Twitter story "The Right Sort." His latest novel, Utopia Avenue (2020), features numerous allusions to his previous novels and deepens a self-reflexive streak in Mitchell's oeuvre as he moves toward forging a literary universe populated by related characters and connected by artful cross-references. In this excerpt from "The Right Sort," which Mitchell published on Twitter in serial form over the course of one week (July 14–20, 2014), a young boy from a middle-class background enters the aristocratic home of a lord and lady. We learn he has taken his mother's Valium to relieve his anxiety, but as the story progresses, it becomes difficult to separate the effects of the drug from the supernatural happenings within the home. The story, like the house, begins to resemble a maze in which characters and readers are caught between the world of people and the world of ghosts.

From The Right Sort¹

David Mitchell ² @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

.@SceptreBooks are delighted to present a story written by David for Twitter, serialised twice a day this week. We give you #THERIGHTSORT . . .

 20 314 170 ³

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

We get off the Number 10 bus at a pub called 'The Fox and Hounds'. 'If anyone asks,' Mum tells me, 'say we came by taxi.'

 5 95 106

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

'I thought lying was wrong,' I say. Butter wouldn't melt in my mouth. Mum gives me a look. 'It's called "creating the right impression".'

 1 39 48

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

A lorry⁴ rumbles by. 'Besides,' adds Mum, 'If your "father" paid what the judge told him to pay, on time, we would travel more by taxi.'

 1 25 33

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

Westwood Road's not a run-down road, but it's hardly posh either. Joined-up red-brick houses, like ours. Small drives. Dustbins.

 21 31

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

Not like you'd expect a Lady to live in. 'Right,' says Mum, double-checking the directions she wrote on an envelope. 'This way.'

21

31

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

'So we're looking out for an alley called "Slade Alley",' says Mum. 'On the left. And mind the puddles.' Off we trudge.

1

18

30

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

It's a grey afternoon. Rain's forecast for later. Through a front window, I see wrestling on the telly.⁵ Mum walks ahead. I follow.

19

34

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

I hope to God nobody from school sees me in this tweed jacket and tie Mum bought me from Littlewoods. I look like a total ponce.⁶

1

22

44

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

If any of Gaz Townshend's lot catch me dressed like this, life won't be worth living come Monday. His gang shits on me enough as it is.

21

33

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

It's all very well for Mum to say, 'You shouldn't care what people think': kids have laws and if you break those laws, you're dead meat.

1

36

57

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

(No point telling Mum about getting picked on: she just sighs and says, 'You should have passed the scholarship for King's,⁷ Nathan.')

19

36

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

Leaves blow down from an overhanging branch. There's more leaves off than there are leaves left. October. The clocks go back tonight.⁸

22

50

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

Suddenly here it is: 'SLADE ALLEY' says the old-style sign, high up on the windowless side of one of two houses the alley cuts in between.

1

21

32

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

You can't see Slade Alley till you're smack bang in front of it. Dark. Dunno.⁹ It's like Slade Alley shouldn't even be here.

20

34

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

A real live Lady, married to a real live Lord, living down here? If you ask me, Mum's ballsed it up.¹ Wouldn't be the first time.

20

33

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

'Lord and Lady Briggs's main residence is in Oxfordshire,² Mum tells me for the umpteenth time. 'This is only Lady Briggs's town house.'

20

30

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

'I didn't say anything,' I say. 'Good,' says Mum. 'Come on then, don't dawdle.' Her voice and footsteps echo a bit.

1

18

34

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

It's colder in Slade Alley than on Westwood Road. After twenty paces, the alley turns left, then carries on between two high walls.

18

34

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

'We're to keep our eyes peeled for a door,' says Mum. 'A black iron door. Lady Briggs said it's easy to miss.' You can say that again . . .

5

29

60

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

. . . 'cause there's no door down here at all. No gate. No 'townhouse'. The alley turns right, then after twenty more paces, you're out . . .

13

23

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

. . . where a sign says 'CRANBURY ROAD'. Mum scowls at her A to Z, at her scribbled directions, at me. 'I don't understand,' she says.

9

23

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

I think I do. It's Mum's Valium.³ Makes her slapdash. She gets two prescriptions from two different doctors, and takes a double dose.

9

25

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

Valium calms Mum down enough to teach her students, but it makes her mix things up. She called me Frank yesterday – Dad's name.

11

23

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

Mum doesn't notice that I nick the odd pill. Valium's like my power pill, from Pac-Man.⁴ I get nervous too. I took a pill before we left.

16

27

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

The pill's just kicking in now. Valium breaks down the world into bite-sized sentences. Like this one. All lined up. Munch-munch.

1

37

69

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

Valium or no Valium, when the dog barks I nearly shit myself and my lungs fill with dark and my blood fills with a scream—

3

17

32

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

But it's okay, it's okay, it's only a yappy little thing through this fence. Not a bull mastiff. Not the mastiff. The dark drains away.

11

26

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

That was three years ago. They had the dog put down. 'Destroyed', it said in the papers. Maybe Mum's noticed I've gone pale and sweaty . . .

10

23

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

. . . but probably not. She's still too flustered about not finding Lady Briggs's house. Our visit's all she's talked about all week.

10

22

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

Ever since Lady Briggs invited us over to a soir  e after the rehearsal. Mum's a piano teacher. Lady Briggs plays the harp.

9

21

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

Mum made me shine my shoes, like, a gazillion times. 'Don't let me down, Nathan,' she keeps saying. 'These people are the right sort.'

12

23

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

A bald man in overalls with a broken nose walks by, turning off Cranbury Road into Slade Alley. He's carrying a ladder.

2

9

21

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

He's whistling 'I'd like to teach the world to sing'.⁵ Mum cuts in. 'Excuse me, do you know where I'll find Lady Norah Briggs's house?'

10

22

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

(She's used her posh voice. 'House' is 'Hice'. I want to die. Being posh at my school is worse than wearing flares⁶ or being gay.

Almost.)

 1 12 31

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

The ladder man says, 'Nah, but if you find her, tell her Ladyship I fancy a bit o' posh if she fancies a bit o' rough'. He winks at me . . .

 3 11 27

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

. . . then the ladder goes down the way we came, into Slade Alley. 'What a repulsive, greasy oik,' says Mum, quietly, thank God.

 9 21

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

What a waste of time. I could be at home, playing 'Germans versus British' on my desert battleground. Rommel's⁷ tanks are cornered.

 1 11 27

David Mitchell  @david_mitchell • Jul 14, 2014 . . .

(Me and Dad invented the game before he went back to Rhodesia.⁸ We built the landscape from papler-mâché. It's epic.)

 3 12 38

* * *

Endnotes

- Note 1: This excerpt presents tweets from the story's first day of serialized publication on Twitter. To read "The Right Sort" in its entirety, do a web search for “David Mitchell, The Right Sort, Twitter.”Return to reference 1

- Note 2: The checkmark icon (2009–23) referred to users, often public figures or celebrities, with “verified” status, which meant Twitter had confirmed their identities.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: On Twitter, a line of icons sits below each tweet. The word balloon icon indicates the number of user comments; the arrows icon indicates retweets, or the number of times users have re-circulated a tweet; the heart icon indicates the number of users who “liked” a tweet; and the up-arrow icon indicates the capacity to share the tweet via other websites or email.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Truck (British English).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Television (British English).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Effeminate or gay man (derogatory British slang). “Littlewoods”: English retail company.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: King’s College, a university.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Daylight saving time, when clocks are adjusted.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: “I don’t know” (slang).Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Made a mistake, botched it (British English).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: County in southeast England.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Prescription drug used to treat anxiety, panic attacks, or other conditions.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: 1980s arcade game where Pac-Man must avoid ghosts and eat all the pellets in the level. There are several larger pellets that allow Pac-Man to eat the ghosts.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Pop song (1971) that was the jingle for Coca-Cola before being recorded by both the The Hillside Singers and The New Seekers as a single.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Flared pants. “Posh”: elegant; upper-class (British English).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Erwin Rommel (1891–1944), German field marshal during World War II.Return to reference 7

- Note 8: Formerly a British colony; now the country of Zimbabwe. Return to reference 8

TEJU COLE

Teju Cole was born in 1975 to Nigerian parents in Kalamazoo, Michigan, and returned to Nigeria at five months old, where he grew up and lived a comfortable life in the capital city of Lagos. He briefly attended medical school at the University of Michigan before shifting his interests to art history and pursuing a doctorate in the field at Columbia University. Cole is now a writer and a photographer and serves as the Gore Vidal Professor of the Practice of Creative Writing at Harvard University. He first came to literary attention for his meditative novel Open City (2011), which follows a Nigerian immigrant and medical resident through New York and Belgium. He has also published the autofictional Tremor (2023) and several well-received essay collections and photography books, including Known and Strange Things (2016), Blind Spot (2017), and Black Paper: Writing in a Dark Time (2021).

Cole has made inventive use of multiple social media platforms, including Twitter, where he posted experimental literary works until 2014, such as "Seven Short Stories about Drones," printed in its entirety here, and "Hafiz," which is excerpted. On Instagram, he posts photography, and on Spotify, he curates playlists. He has also written reflectively about the role these large platforms have on the reception and distribution of the arts. When asked about his interest in internet-based writing and social media in particular, he said, "For sure, some of the smartest and most interesting literary minds of our generation and the generations to come will work in areas that are not 'books' as we currently think of them."

Seven Short Stories about Drones¹

Teju Cole @tejucole • Jan 14, 2013 . . .

Seven short stories about drones

 10 176 75

Teju Cole @tejucole • Jan 14, 2013 . . .

1. Mrs Dalloway said she would buy the flowers herself. Pity. A signature strike leveled the florist's.

 4 234 95

Teju Cole @tejucole • Jan 14, 2013 . . .

2. Call me Ishmael. I was a young man of military age. I was immolated at my wedding. My parents are inconsolable.

 2 213 83

Teju Cole @tejucole • Jan 14, 2013 . . .

3. Stately, plump Buck Mulligan came from the stairhead, bearing a bowl of lather. A bomb whistled in. Blood on the walls. Fire from heaven.

 2 206 72

Teju Cole @tejucole • Jan 14, 2013 . . .

4. I am an invisible man. My name is unknown. My loves are a mystery. But an unmanned aerial vehicle from a secret location has come for me.

 1 262 116

Teju Cole @tejucole • Jan 14, 2013 . . .

5. Someone must have slandered Josef K., for one morning, without having done anything truly wrong, he was killed by a Predator drone.

386

150

Teju Cole @tejucole • Jan 14, 2013 . . .

6. Okonkwo was well known throughout the nine villages and even beyond. His torso was found, not his head.

191

75

Teju Cole @tejucole • Jan 14, 2013 . . .

7. Mother died today. The program saves American lives.²

225

105

Endnotes

- Note 1:

Cole takes the first lines of seven classic novels and recontextualizes them. The next footnote specifies the title of each novel. When Cole tweeted these lines, he did not give away the allusions. His tweets entered into the personalized news feeds of different users and took on different contexts in each feed. To read the tweets as a sequence, a user needed to go to Cole's Twitter page. This story is not archived in a Twitter collection, but is reprinted in its entirety here.

Return to reference 1

- Note 2: 1: Mrs. Dalloway, Virginia Woolf. 2: Moby-Dick, Herman Melville. 3: Ulysses, James Joyce. 4: Invisible Man, Ralph Ellison. 5: The Trial, Franz Kafka. 6: Things Fall Apart, Chinua Achebe. 7: The Stranger, Albert Camus. The program refers to the global War on Terror.Return to reference 2

From Hafiz¹

George Szirtes @george_szirtes • Jan 8, 2014 . . .

Four others were there: a young man busy with a phone, a young woman, a baby in a pram, a girl who was with the woman.

28

25

²

Asa Nwa (Chi Baby) @AfricanCeleb • Jan 8, 2014 . . .

The seated man was closer to sixty than to fifty, dressed in an ordinary way, a button-down long-sleeved shirt, trousers.

26

27

Ayesha A. Siddiqi ³ @AyeshaASiddiqi • Jan 8, 2014 . . .

The young man with the phone said, "He's having chest pains. Earlier he said he was having chest pains."

26

37

Divya Sachar @culdivsac • Jan 8, 2014 . . .

"Is it a heart attack?"

"I don't know."

"Did you call 911?"

25

25

Mister Simian @MisterSimian • Jan 8, 2014 . . .

He hesitated. Then he said no, and that maybe I should. The man on the ground grimaced and did not look up.

1

23

27

Matt Pearce  @mattdpearce • Jan 8, 2014 . . .

He gave no indication of being aware of our presence. He was tranquil, wordless. The tears were falling from his eyes.

27

32

BRITTLE PAPER @brittlepaper • Jan 8, 2014 . . .

When I finished and had hung up the phone, I tried to talk to my man on the ground but his sound lacked all sound.

26

31

* * *

Endnotes

- Note 1:
Cole authored the short story “Hafiz” before sending it in tweet-length segments to twenty-one of his Twitter followers. His followers each tweeted their part of the story, which Cole then retweeted in sequence so that the complete story could appear in his Twitter feed as if being told by eyewitnesses on the street. At the same time, his tweets entered the personalized feeds of other Twitter users, which presented them in an even wider range of contexts. An excerpt from “Hafiz” is printed here; the complete story can be found by doing a web search for “Teju Cole, Hafiz.”
Return to reference 1
- Note 2: On Twitter, a line of icons sits below each tweet. The word balloon icon indicates the number of user comments; the arrows icon indicates retweets, or the number of times users have re-circulated a tweet; the heart icon indicates the number of users who “liked” a tweet; and the up-arrow icon indicates the capacity to share the tweet via other websites or email.
Return to reference 2

- Note 3: The checkmark icon refers to users, often public figures or celebrities, with “verified” status, meaning Twitter has confirmed their identities. Verified accounts began appearing in 2009, but Twitter paywalled the checkmark in 2023, causing some public figures to lose their icons.Return to reference 3

KAZUO ISHIGURO

b. 1954

"The big emotions loom powerfully in understatement," states Kazuo Ishiguro, and accordingly his novels are often restrained and indirect. Winner of the 2017 Nobel Prize for Literature, he is one of the most acclaimed contemporary novelists living in England, but he was born in Nagasaki, Japan, where his mother had survived the dropping of the atomic bomb. When he was five, his father's work as an oceanographer led the family to move to a small town in southern England. Ishiguro earned a B.A. in English and philosophy at the University of Kent and an M.A. in creative writing at the University of East Anglia.

Ishiguro's first two novels, A Pale View of Hills (1982) and An Artist of the Floating World (1986), were set largely in Japan in the aftermath of World War II, both of them cast in the monologue form that he would employ frequently in subsequent fiction. With every novel he has written since, Ishiguro has dramatically changed his work's setting, genre, or style. The location shifts to a grand English estate in his third novel, The Remains of the Day (1989), winner of the Booker Prize, subsequently made into a celebrated movie. It centers on the ruminations and regrets of an English butler named Stevens, so constrained by propriety, class, and duty that he has served a lord with fascist sympathies and has missed a chance for romantic fulfillment with a coworker. The Unconsoled (1995) marks a further departure from the crisp realism of the early novels, a dreamlike, elliptically narrated story about a pianist in an unnamed city. When We Were Orphans (2000) warps and fuses detective story with historical fiction in narrating a detective's quest to understand his parents' disappearance in 1930s Shanghai. Like The Remains of the Day, Ishiguro's Never Let Me Go (2005) is one of his best-known novels, also re-created as a film. But unlike his earlier work, it takes up and subtly remakes the genre of dystopian science fiction: English boarding school students gradually realize they are fated to play a part in a society that will use them up and brutally discard them. The Buried Giant (2015) is yet another leap for Ishiguro, this time into Arthurian fantasy set in medieval England. Klara and the Sun (2021) cultivates the innocent air of children's literature with a crucial twist: the child's perspective is narrated by a robot programmed to serve as an "Artificial Friend" to human children. Along with his novels, Ishiguro has also written short stories, film scripts, plays, and songs.

Although his novels dart in different directions, some preoccupations recur. In his early years, Ishiguro devoted himself to songwriting, and he has traced his fiction to this perhaps surprising source: "My style as a novelist comes substantially from what I learnt writing songs. The intimate, first-person quality of a singer performing to an audience, for instance, carried over for me into novels. As did the need to approach meaning subtly, sometimes by nudging it into the spaces between the lines."

Some of Ishiguro's characters grapple with regret over misdeeds and lives unlived. "On the one hand," he remarked, "there is a need for honesty, on the other hand a need to deceive themselves—to preserve a sense of dignity, some sort of self-respect. What I want to suggest is that some sort of dignity and self-respect does come from that sort of honesty." His characters sometimes are racked by conflicting demands for self-understanding and self-pacifying consolation.

Ishiguro wrote the short story "A Village after Dark" when he was preparing to write his dreamlike novel The Unconsoled. It frustrates our usual expectations for plot development. As in a play by Samuel Beckett, little happens. And recalling Franz Kafka's fiction, the setting seems somewhere between dream and reality. The narrative withholds all but a few details of time and place. The narrator, Fletcher, seems a washed-up leader of some kind, but we do not learn anything about the particular ideas or the movement he once advanced. This narrative restraint places less focus on the subject of the story than on how it is told. Like many of Ishiguro's first-person narrators, Fletcher tells his own story in a way that soon raises questions about his reliability. Almost like a dream, the story seems to enact his guilt over his past: a forgotten romantic partner berates him for having ruined her life, and a fellow schoolboy accuses him of having bullied him. His accusers also partly absolve Fletcher of his misdeeds, and he tries in various ways to justify and defend himself. His regrets, self-deceptions, and vanity suggest the limits to human self-understanding. One way to approach this strange story is to consider which of its aspects lend themselves to rational and realistic understanding, and which evoke what he called the "universal language" or "grammar" of dreams. Of "memory and dream" Ishiguro has said, "you manipulate both according to your emotional needs at the time." As in much of his work, Ishiguro challenges us to rethink what we thought we knew about the conventions of fiction and about the relation between dream and reality, between memory and truth.

A Village after Dark

There was a time when I could travel England for weeks on end and remain at my sharpest—when, if anything, the travelling gave me an edge. But now that I am older I become disoriented more easily. So it was that on arriving at the village just after dark I failed to find my bearings at all. I could hardly believe I was in the same village in which not so long ago I had lived and come to exercise such influence.

There was nothing I recognized, and I found myself walking forever around twisting, badly lit streets hemmed in on both sides by the little stone cottages characteristic of the area. The streets often became so narrow I could make no progress without my bag or my elbow scraping one rough wall or another. I persevered nevertheless, stumbling around in the darkness in the hope of coming upon the village square—where I could at least orient myself—or else of encountering one of the villagers. When after a while I had done neither, a weariness came over me, and I decided my best course was just to choose a cottage at random, knock on the door, and hope it would be opened by someone who remembered me.

I stopped by a particularly rickety-looking door, whose upper beam was so low that I could see I would have to crouch right down to enter. A dim light was leaking out around the door's edges, and I could hear voices and laughter. I knocked loudly to insure that the occupants would hear me over their talk. But just then someone behind me said, "Hello."

I turned to find a young woman of around twenty, dressed in raggedy jeans and a torn jumper, standing in the darkness a little way away.

"You walked straight past me earlier," she said, "even though I called to you."

"Did I really? Well, I'm sorry. I didn't mean to be rude."

"You're Fletcher, aren't you?"

"Yes," I said, somewhat flattered.

"Wendy thought it was you when you went by our cottage. We all got very excited. You were one of that lot, weren't you? With David Maggis and all of them."

"Yes," I said, "but Maggis was hardly the most important one. I'm surprised you pick him out like that. There were other, far more important figures." I reeled off a series of names and was interested to see the girl nodding at each one in recognition. "But this must have all been before your time," I said. "I'm surprised you know about such things."

"It was before our time, but we're all experts on your lot. We know more about all that than most of the older ones who were here then. Wendy recognized you instantly just from your photos."

"I had no idea you young people had taken such an interest in us. I'm sorry I walked past you earlier. But you see, now that I'm older, I get a little disoriented when I travel."

I could hear some boisterous talk coming from behind the door. I banged on it again, this time rather impatiently, though I was not so eager to bring the encounter with the girl to a close.

She looked at me for a moment, then said, "All of you from those days are like that. David Maggis came here a few years ago. In '93, or maybe it was '94. He was like that. A bit vague. It must get to you after a while, travelling all the time."

"So Maggis was here. How interesting. You know, he wasn't one of the really important figures. You mustn't get carried away with such an idea. Incidentally, perhaps you could tell me who lives in this cottage." I thumped the door again.

"The Petersons," the girl said. "They're an old house. They'll probably remember you."

"The Petersons," I repeated, but the name meant nothing to me.

"Why don't you come to our cottage? Wendy was really excited. So were the rest of us. It's a real chance for us, actually talking to someone from those days."

"I'd very much like to do that. But first of all I'd better get myself settled in. The Petersons, you say."

I thumped the door again, this time quite ferociously. At last it opened, throwing warmth and light out into the street. An old man was standing in the doorway. He looked at me carefully, then asked, "It's not Fletcher, is it?"

"Yes, and I've just got into the village. I've been travelling for several days."

He thought about this for a moment, then said, "Well, you'd better come in."

I found myself in a cramped, untidy room full of rough wood and broken furniture. A log burning in the fireplace was the only source of light, by which I could make out a number of hunched figures sitting around the room. The old man led me to a chair beside the fire with a grudgingness that suggested it was the very one he had just vacated. Once I sat down, I found I could not easily turn my head to see my surroundings or the others in the room. But the warmth of the fire was very welcome, and for a moment I just stared into its flames, a pleasant grogginess drifting over me. Voices came from behind me, inquiring if I was well, if I had come far, if I was hungry, and I replied as best I could, though I was aware that my answers were barely adequate. Eventually, the questions ceased, and it occurred to me that my presence was creating a heavy awkwardness, but I was so grateful for the warmth and the chance to rest that I hardly cared.

Nonetheless, when the silence behind me had gone unbroken for several minutes, I resolved to address my hosts with a little more civility, and I turned in my chair. It was then, as I did so, that I was suddenly seized by an intense sense of recognition. I had chosen the cottage quite at random, but now I could see that it was none other than the very one in which I had spent my years in this village. My gaze moved immediately to the far corner—at this moment shrouded in darkness—to the spot that had been my corner, where once my mattress had been and where I had spent many tranquil hours browsing through books or conversing with whoever happened to drift in. On summer days, the windows, and often the door, were left open to allow a refreshing breeze to blow right through. Those were the days when the cottage was surrounded by open fields and there would come from outside the voices of my friends, lazing in the long grass, arguing over poetry or philosophy. These precious fragments of the past came back to me so powerfully that it was all I could do not to make straight for my old corner then and there.

Someone was speaking to me again, perhaps asking another question, but I hardly listened. Rising, I peered through the shadows into my corner, and could now make out a narrow bed, covered by an old curtain, occupying more or less the exact space where my mattress had been. The bed looked extremely inviting, and I found myself cutting into something the old man was saying.

"Look," I said, "I know this is a bit blunt. But, you see, I've come such a long way today. I really need to lie down, close my eyes, even if it's just for a few minutes. After that, I'm happy to talk all you like."

I could see the figures around the room shifting uneasily. Then a new voice said, rather sullenly, "Go ahead then. Have a nap. Don't mind us."

But I was already picking my way through the clutter toward my corner. The bed felt damp, and the springs creaked under my weight, but no sooner had I curled up with my back to the room than my many hours of travelling began to catch up with me. As I was drifting off, I heard the old man saying, "It's Fletcher, all right. God, he's aged."

A woman's voice said, "Should we let him go to sleep like that? He might wake in a few hours and then we'll have to stay up with him."

"Let him sleep for an hour or so," someone else said. "If he's still asleep after an hour, we'll wake him."

At this point, sheer exhaustion overtook me.

It was not a continuous or comfortable sleep. I drifted between sleep and waking, always conscious of voices behind me in the room. At some point, I was aware of a woman saying, "I don't know how I was ever under his spell. He looks such a ragamuffin now."

In my state of near-sleep, I debated with myself whether these words applied to me or, perhaps, to David Maggis, but before long sleep engulfed me once more.

When I next awoke, the room appeared to have grown both darker and colder. Voices were continuing behind me in lowered tones, but I could make no sense of the conversation. I now felt embarrassed at having gone to sleep in the way I had, and for a few further moments remained motionless with my face to the wall. But something about me must have revealed that I was awake, for a woman's voice, breaking off from the general conversation, said, "Oh, look, look." Some whispers were exchanged, then I heard the sound of someone coming toward my corner. I felt a hand placed gently on my shoulder, and looked up to find a woman kneeling over me. I did not turn my body sufficiently to see the room, but I got the impression that it was lit by dying embers, and the woman's face was visible only in shadow.

"Now, Fletcher," she said. "It's time we had a talk. I've waited a long time for you to come back. I've thought about you often."

I strained to see her more clearly. She was somewhere in her forties, and even in the gloom I noticed a sleepy sadness in her eyes. But her face failed to stir in me even the faintest of memories.

"I'm sorry," I said. "I have no recollection of you. But please forgive me if we met some time ago. I do get very disoriented these days."

"Fletcher," she said, "when we used to know one another, I was young and beautiful. I idolized you, and everything you said seemed like an answer. Now here you are, back again. I've wanted to tell you for many years that you ruined my life."

"You're being unfair. All right, I was mistaken about a lot of things. But I never claimed to have any answers. All I said in those days was that it was our duty, all of us, to contribute to the debate. We knew so much more about the issues than the ordinary people here. If people like us procrastinated, claiming we didn't yet know enough, then who was there to act? But I never claimed I had the answers. No, you're being unfair."

"Fletcher," she said, and her voice was oddly gentle, "you used to make love to me, more or less every time I wandered in here to your room. In this corner, we did all kinds of beautifully dirty things. It's odd to think how I could have once been so physically excited by you. And here you're just a foul-smelling bundle of rags now. But look at me—I'm still attractive. My face has got a bit lined, but when I walk in the village streets I wear dresses I've made specially to show off my figure. A lot of men want me still. But you, no woman would look at you now. A bundle of stinking rags and flesh."

"I don't remember you," I said. "And I've no time for sex these days. I've other things to worry about. More serious things. Very well, I was mistaken about a lot in those days. But I've done more than most to try and make amends. You see, even now I'm travelling. I've never stopped. I've travelled and travelled trying to undo what damage I may once have caused. That's more than can be said of some others from those days. I bet Maggis, for instance, hasn't worked nearly as hard to try and put things right."

The woman was stroking my hair.

"Look at you. I used to do this, run my fingers through your hair. Look at this filthy mess. I'm sure you're contaminated with all sorts of parasites." But she continued slowly to run her fingers through the dirty knots. I failed to feel anything erotic from this, as perhaps she wished me to do. Rather, her caresses felt maternal. Indeed, for a moment it was as though I had finally reached some cocoon of protectiveness, and I began once more to feel sleepy. But suddenly she stopped and slapped me hard on the forehead.

"Why don't you join the rest of us now? You've had your sleep. You've got a lot of explaining to do." With that she got up and left.

For the first time, I turned my body sufficiently to survey the room. I saw the woman making her way past the clutter on the floor, then sitting down in a rocking chair by the fireplace. I could see three other figures hunched around the dying fire. One I recognized to be the old man who had opened the door. The two others—sitting together on what looked like a wooden trunk—seemed to be women of around the same age as the one who had spoken to me.

The old man noticed that I had turned, and he indicated to the others that I was watching. The four of them proceeded to sit stiffly, not speaking. From the way they did this, it was clear that they had been discussing me thoroughly while I was asleep. In fact, as I watched them I could more or less guess the whole shape their conversation had taken. I could see, for instance, that they had spent some time expressing concern for the young girl I had met outside, and about the effect I might have on her peers.

"They're all so impressionable," the old man would have said. "And I heard her inviting him to visit them."

To which, no doubt, one of the women on the trunk would have said, "But he can't do much harm now. In our time, we were all taken in because all his kind—they were young and glamorous. But these days the odd one passing through from time to time, looking all decrepit and burned out like that—if anything, it goes to demystify all that talk about the old days. In any case, people like him have changed their position so much these days. They don't know themselves what they believe."

The old man would have shaken his head. "I saw the way that young girl was looking at him. All right, he looks a pitiful mess over there just now. But once his ego's fed a little, once he has the flattery of the young people, sees how they want to hear his ideas, then there'll be no stopping him. It'll be just like before. He'll have them all working for his causes. Young girls like that, there's so little for them to believe in now. Even a stinking tramp like this could give them a purpose."

Their conversation, all the time I slept, would have gone something very much like that. But now, as I observed them from my corner, they continued to sit in guilty silence, staring at the last of their fire. After a while, I rose to my feet. Absurdly, the four of them kept their gazes averted from me. I waited a few moments to see if any of them would say anything. Finally, I said, "All right, I was asleep earlier, but I've guessed what you were saying. Well, you'll be interested to know I'm going to do the very thing you feared. I'm going this moment to the young people's cottage. I'm going to tell them what to do with all their energy, all their dreams, their urge to achieve something of lasting good in this world. Look at you, what a pathetic bunch. Crouching in your cottage, afraid to do anything, afraid of me, of Maggis, of anyone else from those times. Afraid to do anything in the world out there, just because once we made a few mistakes. Well, those young people haven't yet sunk so low, despite all the lethargy you've been preaching at them down the years. I'll talk to them. I'll undo in half an hour all of your sorry efforts."

"You see," the old man said to the others. "I knew it would be this way. We ought to stop him, but what can we do?"

I crashed my way across the room, picked up my bag, and went out into the night.

The girl was still standing outside when I emerged. She seemed to be expecting me and with a nod began to lead the way.

The night was drizzly and dark. We twisted and turned along the narrow paths that ran between the cottages. Some of the cottages we passed looked so decayed and crumbling that I felt I could destroy one of them simply by running at it with all my weight.

The girl kept a few paces ahead, occasionally glancing back at me over her shoulder. Once she said, "Wendy's going to be so pleased. She was sure it was you when you went past earlier. By now, she'll have guessed she was right, because I've been away this long, and she'll have brought the whole crowd together. They'll all be waiting."

"Did you give David Maggis this sort of reception, too?"

"Oh, yes. We were really excited when he came."

"I'm sure he found that very gratifying. He always had an exaggerated sense of his own importance."

"Wendy says Maggis was one of the interesting ones, but that you were, well, important. She thinks you were really important."

I thought about this for a moment.

"You know," I said, "I've changed my mind on very many things. If Wendy's expecting me to say all the things I used to all those years ago, well, she's going to be in for a disappointment."

The girl did not seem to hear this, but continued to lead me purposefully through the clusters of cottages.

After a little while, I became aware of footsteps following a dozen or so paces behind us. At first, I assumed this was just some villager out walking and refrained from turning round. But then the girl halted under a street lamp and looked behind us. I was thus obliged also to stop and turn. A middle-aged man in a dark overcoat was coming toward us. As he approached, he held out his hand and shook mine, though without smiling.

"So," he said, "you're here."

I then realized I knew the man. We had not seen each other since we were ten years old. His name was Roger Button, and he had been in my class at the school I had attended for two years in Canada before my family returned to England. Roger Button and I had not been especially close, but, because he had been a timid boy, and because he, too, was from England, he had for a while followed me about. I had neither seen nor heard from him since that time. Now, as I studied his appearance under the street lamp, I saw the years had not been kind to him. He was bald, his face was pocked and lined, and there was a weary sag to his whole posture. For all that, there was no mistaking my old classmate.

"Roger," I said, "I'm just on my way to visit this young lady's friends. They've gathered together to receive me. Otherwise I'd have come and looked you up straightaway. As it was, I had it in my mind as the next thing to do, even before getting any sleep tonight. I was just thinking to myself, However late things finish at the young people's cottage, I'll go and knock on Roger's door afterward."

"Don't worry," said Roger Button as we all started to walk again. "I know how busy you are. But we ought to talk. Chew over old times. When you last saw me—at school, I mean—I suppose I was a rather feeble specimen. But, you know, that all changed when I got to fourteen, fifteen. I really toughened up. Became quite a leader type. But you'd long since left Canada. I always wondered what would have happened if we'd come across each other at fifteen. Things would have been rather different between us, I assure you."

As he said this, memories came flooding back. In those days, Roger Button had idolized me, and in return I had bullied him incessantly. However, there had existed between us a curious understanding that my bullying him was all for his own good; that when, without warning, I suddenly punched him in the stomach on the playground, or when, passing him in the corridor, I impulsively wrenched his arm up his back until he started to cry, I was doing so in order to help him toughen up. Accordingly, the principal effect such attacks had on our relationship was to keep him in awe of me. This all came back to me as I listened to the weary-looking man walking beside me.

"Of course," Roger Button went on, perhaps guessing my train of thought, "it might well be that if you hadn't treated me the way you did I'd never have become what I did at fifteen. In any case, I've often wondered how it would have been if we'd met just a few years later. I really was something to be reckoned with by then."

We were once again walking along the narrow twisted passages between cottages. The girl was still leading the way, but she was now walking much faster. Often we would only just manage to catch a glimpse of her turning some corner ahead of us, and it struck me that we would have to keep alert if we were not to lose her.

"Today, of course," Roger Button was saying, "I've let myself go a bit. But I have to say, old fellow, you seem to be in much worse shape. Compared with you, I'm an athlete. Not to put too fine a point on it, you're just a filthy old tramp now, really, aren't you? But, you know, for a long time after you left I continued to idolize you. Would Fletcher do this? What would Fletcher think if he saw me doing that? Oh, yes. It was only when I got to fifteen or so that I looked back on it all and saw through you. Then I was very angry, of course. Even now, I still think about it sometimes. I look back and think, Well, he was just a thoroughly nasty so-and-so. He had a little more weight and muscle at that age than I did, a little more confidence, and he took full advantage. Yes, it's very clear, looking back, what a nasty little person you were. Of course, I'm not implying you still are today. We all change. That much I'm willing to accept."

"Have you been living here long?" I asked, wishing to change the subject.

"Oh, seven years or so. Of course, they talk about you a lot around here. I sometimes tell them about our early association. 'But he won't remember me,' I always tell them. 'Why would he remember a skinny little boy he used to bully and have at his beck and call?' Anyway, the young people here, they talk about you more and more these days. Certainly, the ones who've never seen you tend to idealize you the most. I suppose you've come back to capitalize on all that. Still, I shouldn't blame you. You're entitled to try and salvage a little self-respect."

We suddenly found ourselves facing an open field, and we both halted. Glancing back, I saw that we had walked our way out of the village; the last of the cottages were some distance behind us. Just as I had feared, we had lost the young woman; in fact, I realized we had not been following her for some time.

At that moment, the moon emerged, and I saw we were standing at the edge of a vast grassy field—extending, I supposed, far beyond what I could see by the moon.

Roger Button turned to me. His face in the moonlight seemed gentle, almost affectionate.

"Still," he said, "it's time to forgive. You shouldn't keep worrying so much. As you see, certain things from the past will come back to you in the end. But then we can't be held accountable for what we did when we were very young."

"No doubt you're right," I said. Then I turned and looked around in the darkness. "But now I'm not sure where to go. You see, there were some young people waiting for me in their cottage. By now they'd have a warm fire ready for me and some hot tea. And some home-baked cakes, perhaps even a good stew. And the moment I entered, ushered in by that young lady we were following just now, they'd all have burst into applause. There'd be smiling, adoring faces all around me. That's what's waiting for me somewhere. Except I'm not sure where I should go."

Roger Button shrugged. "Don't worry, you'll get there easily enough. Except, you know, that girl was being a little misleading if she implied you could walk to Wendy's cottage. It's much too far. You'd really need to catch a bus. Even then, it's quite a long journey. About two hours, I'd say. But don't worry, I'll show you where you can pick up your bus."

With that, he began to walk back toward the cottages. As I followed, I could sense that the hour had got very late and my companion was anxious to get some sleep. We spent several minutes walking around the cottages again, and then he brought us out into the village square. In fact, it was so small and shabby it hardly merited being called a square; it was little more than a patch of green beside a solitary street lamp. Just visible beyond the pool of light cast by the lamp were a few shops, all shut up for the night. There was complete silence and nothing was stirring. A light mist was hovering over the ground.

Roger Button stopped before we had reached the green and pointed.

"There," he said. "If you stand there, a bus will come along. As I say, it's not a short journey. About two hours. But don't worry, I'm sure your young people will wait. They've so little else to believe in these days, you see."

"It's very late," I said. "Are you sure a bus will come?"

"Oh, yes. Of course, you may have to wait. But eventually a bus will come." Then he touched me reassuringly on the shoulder. "I can see it might get a little lonely standing out here. But once the bus arrives your spirits will rise, believe me. Oh, yes. That bus is always a joy. It'll be brightly lit up, and it's always full of cheerful people, laughing and joking and pointing out the window. Once you board it, you'll feel warm and comfortable, and the other passengers will chat with you, perhaps offer you things to eat or drink. There may even be singing—that depends on the driver. Some drivers encourage it, others don't. Well, Fletcher, it was good to see you."

We shook hands, then he turned and walked away. I watched him disappear into the darkness between two cottages.

I walked up to the green and put my bag down at the foot of the lamppost. I listened for the sound of a vehicle in the distance, but the night was utterly still. Nevertheless, I had been cheered by Roger Button's description of the bus. Moreover, I thought of the reception awaiting me at my journey's end—of the adoring faces of the young people—and felt the stirrings of optimism somewhere deep within me.

2001

HANIF KUREISHI

b. 1954

Born in Bromley, a suburb of London, to a Pakistani immigrant father and an English mother, Hanif Kureishi has much in common with the semiautobiographical protagonist of his first novel, The Buddha of Suburbia (1990):

My name is Karim Amir, and I am an Englishman born and bred, almost. I am often considered to be a funny kind of Englishman, a new breed as it were, having emerged from two old histories. But I don't care—Englishman I am (though not proud of it), from the South London suburbs and going somewhere.

The biracial and bicultural Karim is troubled by his "odd mixture of continents and blood, of here and there, of belonging and not." Like Zadie Smith and other black and Asian British writers inspired by his work, Kureishi is the product of postwar migrations, from Britain's former colonies in the Caribbean, South Asia, Africa, and elsewhere, to the empire's heart. The problem of puzzling out issues of identity and race, belonging and estrangement in contemporary Britain is at the core of much of Kureishi's writing.

Kureishi studied philosophy at King's College London, receiving his B.A. in 1977. He worked at theaters in various capacities, rising from usher to writer in residence at the Royal Court Theatre in London. Trying his hand at different kinds of writing, he won international acclaim when his first screenplays were made into movies. In My Beautiful Laundrette (1985), a Pakistani Briton takes over a run-down commercial laundromat and, with the help of a white friend who becomes his lover and partner, fights off racist attacks and turns the venture into a success. Kureishi's next film venture, Sammy and Rosie Get Laid (1987), is also set against the backdrop of the racial tensions of Margaret Thatcher's 1980s, featuring an open marriage between a Pakistani Briton and an Englishwoman. Pathbreaking explorations of the new multiracial Britain, these films figured prominently in discussions of race, multiculturalism, and national identity in subsequent decades. Since their release, other of Kureishi's writings have been made into films, including London Kills Me (1992), The Mother (2004), Venus (2006), Weddings and Beheadings (2007) and Le Week-End (2013). He has also published many essays, short stories, and novels, including The Black Album (1995), which explores the disenfranchisement and radicalization of young British Muslims and the book burnings of Salman Rushdie's The Satanic Verses, followed by Intimacy (1999), Gabriel's Gift (2001), The Body (2004), and Something to Tell You (2008), in which the London transit-system bombings of July 7, 2005 (killing 52 and wounding 700) touch most of the characters' lives. The Last Word (2014) satirizes a postcolonial novelist who turns out to be depraved. On December 26, 2022, he collapsed on a sidewalk in Rome, and realized, when he came to, that he could not move his arms or legs. Several days later, from his hospital bed in Italy, he began dictating tweets to his partner, Isabella, and his son Carlo, publishing his dispatches as threads on Twitter and as "The Kureishi Chronicles" on Substack (a subscriber-driven digital publishing platform).

Among Kureishi's works adapted into films is the short story "My Son the Fanatic," one of his many reflections on Muslim Britain long before the subject received widespread attention. In this story Parvez, who has worked for twenty years as a taxi driver in an unnamed English city, tries to ensure his son Ali's financial success as a future accountant. When his son suddenly dumps his Western movies, books, videos, clothes, and friends, Parvez is baffled. In the ensuing conflict between a partly assimilated Punjabi father, who drinks alcohol (forbidden in Islam) and befriends a prostitute, and a son who has adopted a strictly observant form of Islam and identifies with oppressed Muslims around the world, Kureishi's story gives narrative form to the collision between different ways of belonging among Britain's people of non-Western descent.

Writing about the screenplay, Kureishi commented: "It perplexed me that young people, brought up in secular Britain, would turn to a form of belief that denied them the pleasures of the society in which they lived. Islam was a particularly firm way of saying no to all sorts of things." He surmised that decades of racial exclusion and economic disappointment help explain the appeal of fundamentalist forms of Islam to the children of South Asian immigrants in Britain:

It must not be forgotten, therefore, that the backgrounds to the lives of these young people includes colonialism—being made to feel inferior in your own country. And then, in Britain, racism; again, being made to feel inferior in your own country. . . . Yet all along it was taken for granted that 'belonging', which means, in a sense, not having to notice where you are, and more importantly, not being seen as different, would happen eventually. Where it hasn't, there is, in the children and grandchildren of the great postwar wave of immigrants, considerable anger and disillusionment. . . . The 'West' was a dream that didn't come true. But one cannot go home again. One is stuck. . . . If you feel excluded it might be tempting to exclude others.

My Son the Fanatic. A scene from the 1997 film adaptation, directed by Udayan Prasad.

Religious fundamentalists, in his view, wanted to exclude others (non-Muslims, gays, “unsubmissive women,” etc.), just as they had been excluded. Never idealizing or sentimentalizing multiracial Britain, Kureishi has been one of its most incisive observers, helping at the same time to reimagine its future.

My Son the Fanatic

Surreptitiously the father began going into his son's bedroom. He would sit there for hours, rousing himself only to seek clues. What bewildered him was that Ali was getting tidier. Instead of the usual tangle of clothes, books, cricket bats, video games, the room was becoming neat and ordered; spaces began appearing where before there had been only mess.

Initially Parvez had been pleased: his son was outgrowing his teenage attitudes. But one day, beside the dustbin, Parvez found a torn bag which contained not only old toys, but computer discs, video tapes, new books and fashionable clothes the boy had bought just a few months before. Also without explanation, Ali had parted from the English girlfriend who used to come often to the house. His old friends had stopped ringing.

For reasons he didn't himself understand, Parvez wasn't able to bring up the subject of Ali's unusual behaviour. He was aware that he had become slightly afraid of his son, who, alongside his silences, was developing a sharp tongue. One remark Parvez did make, 'You don't play your guitar any more,' elicited the mysterious but conclusive reply, 'There are more important things to be done.'

Yet Parvez felt his son's eccentricity as an injustice. He had always been aware of the pitfalls which other men's sons had fallen into in England. And so, for Ali, he had worked long hours and spent a lot of money paying for his education as an accountant. He had bought him good suits, all the books he required and a computer. And now the boy was throwing his possessions out!

The TV, video and sound system followed the guitar. Soon the room was practically bare. Even the unhappy walls bore marks where Ali's pictures had been removed.

Parvez couldn't sleep; he went more to the whisky bottle, even when he was at work. He realised it was imperative to discuss the matter with someone sympathetic.

Parvez had been a taxi driver for twenty years. Half that time he'd worked for the same firm. Like him, most of the other drivers were Punjabis.¹ They preferred to work at night, the roads were clearer and the money better. They slept during the day, avoiding their wives. Together they led almost a boy's life in the cabbies' office, playing cards and practical jokes, exchanging lewd stories, eating together and discussing politics and their problems.

But Parvez had been unable to bring this subject up with his friends. He was too ashamed. And he was afraid, too, that they would blame him for the wrong turning his boy had taken, just as he had blamed other fathers whose sons had taken to running around with bad girls, truanting from school and joining gangs.

For years Parvez had boasted to the other men about how Ali excelled at cricket, swimming and football, and how attentive a scholar he was, getting straight 'A's in most subjects. Was it asking too much for Ali to get a good job now, marry the right girl and start a family? Once this happened, Parvez would be happy. His dreams of doing well in England would have come true. Where had he gone wrong?

But one night, sitting in the taxi office on busted chairs with his two closest friends watching a Sylvester Stallone film, he broke his silence.

'I can't understand it!' he burst out. 'Everything is going from his room. And I can't talk to him any more. We were not father and son—we were brothers! Where has he gone? Why is he torturing me!'

And Parvez put his head in his hands.

Even as he poured out his account the men shook their heads and gave one another knowing glances. From their grave looks Parvez realised they understood the situation.

'Tell me what is happening!' he demanded.

The reply was almost triumphant. They had guessed something was going wrong. Now it was clear. Ali was taking drugs and selling his possessions to pay for them. That was why his bedroom was emptying.

'What must I do, then?'

Parvez's friends instructed him to watch Ali scrupulously and then be severe with him, before the boy went mad, overdosed or murdered someone.

Parvez staggered out into the early morning air, terrified they were right. His boy—the drug-addict killer!

To his relief he found Bettina sitting in his car.

Usually the last customers of the night were local 'brasses' or prostitutes. The taxi drivers knew them well, often driving them to liaisons. At the end of the girls' shifts, the men would ferry them home, though sometimes the women would join them for a drinking session in the office. Occasionally the drivers would go with the girls. 'A ride in exchange for a ride,' it was called.

Bettina had known Parvez for three years. She lived outside the town and on the long drive home, when she sat not in the passenger seat but beside him, Parvez had talked to her about his life and hopes, just as she talked about hers. They saw each other most nights.

He could talk to her about things he'd never be able to discuss with his own wife. Bettina, in turn, always reported on her night's activities. He liked to know where she was and with whom. Once he had rescued her from a violent client, and since then they had come to care for one another.

Though Bettina had never met the boy, she heard about Ali continually. That late night, when he told Bettina that he suspected Ali was on drugs, she judged neither the boy nor his father, but became businesslike and told him what to watch for.

'It's all in the eyes,' she said. They might be bloodshot; the pupils might be dilated; he might look tired. He could be liable to sweats, or sudden mood changes. 'Okay?'

Parvez began his vigil gratefully. Now he knew what the problem might be, he felt better. And surely, he figured, things couldn't have gone too far? With Bettina's help he would soon sort it out.

He watched each mouthful the boy took. He sat beside him at every opportunity and looked into his eyes. When he could he took the boy's hand, checking his temperature. If the boy wasn't at home Parvez was active, looking under the carpet, in his drawers, behind the empty wardrobe, sniffing, inspecting, probing. He knew what to look for: Bettina had drawn pictures of capsules, syringes, pills, powders, rocks.

Every night she waited to hear news of what he'd witnessed.

After a few days of constant observation, Parvez was able to report that although the boy had given up sports, he seemed healthy, with clear eyes. He didn't, as his father expected, flinch guiltily from his gaze. In fact the boy's mood was alert and steady in this sense: as well as being sullen, he was very watchful. He returned his father's long looks with more than a hint of criticism, of reproach even, so much so that Parvez began to feel that it was he who was in the wrong and not the boy!

'And there's nothing else physically different?' Bettina asked.

'No!' Parvez thought for a moment. 'But he is growing a beard.'

One night, after sitting with Bettina in an all-night coffee shop, Parvez came home particularly late. Reluctantly he and Bettina had abandoned their only explanation, the drug theory, for Parvez had found nothing resembling any drug in Ali's room. Besides, Ali wasn't selling his belongings. He threw them out, gave them away or donated them to charity shops.

Standing in the hall, Parvez heard his boy's alarm clock go off. Parvez hurried into his bedroom where his wife was still awake, sewing in bed. He ordered her to sit down and keep quiet, though she had neither stood up nor said a word. From this post, and with her watching him curiously, he observed his son through the crack in the door.

The boy went into the bathroom to wash. When he returned to his room Parvez sprang across the hall and set his ear at Ali's door. A muttering sound came from within. Parvez was puzzled but relieved.

Once this clue had been established, Parvez watched him at other times. The boy was praying. Without fail, when he was at home, he prayed five times a day.²

Parvez had grown up in Lahore,³ where all the boys had been taught the Koran. To stop him falling asleep when he studied, the Maulvis⁴ had attached a piece of string to the ceiling and tied it to Parvez's hair, so that if his head fell forward he would instantly awake. After this indignity Parvez had avoided all religions. Not that the other taxi drivers had more respect. In fact they made jokes about the local mullahs⁵ walking around with their caps and beards, thinking they could tell people how to live, while their eyes roved over the boys and girls in their care.

Parvez described to Bettina what he had discovered. He informed the men in the taxi office. The friends, who had been so curious before, now became oddly silent. They could hardly condemn the boy for his devotions.

Parvez decided to take a night off and go out with the boy. They could talk things over. He wanted to hear how things were going at college; he wanted to tell him stories about their family in Pakistan. More than anything he yearned to understand how Ali had discovered the 'spiritual dimension', as Bettina described it.

To Parvez's surprise, the boy refused to accompany him. He claimed he had an appointment. Parvez had to insist that no appointment could be more important than that of a son with his father.

The next day, Parvez went immediately to the street where Bettina stood in the rain wearing high heels, a short skirt and a long mac⁶ on top, which she would open hopefully at passing cars.

'Get in, get in!' he said.

They drove out across the moors and parked at the spot where on better days, with a view unimpeded for many miles by nothing but wild deer and horses, they'd lie back, with their eyes half closed, saying 'This is the life.' This time Parvez was trembling. Bettina put her arms around him.

'What's happened?'

'I've just had the worst experience of my life.'

As Bettina rubbed his head Parvez told her that the previous evening he and Ali had gone to a restaurant. As they studied the menu, the waiter, whom Parvez knew, brought him his usual whisky and water. Parvez had been so nervous he had even prepared a question. He was going to ask Ali if he was worried about his imminent exams. But first, wanting to relax, he loosened his tie, crunched a popadom⁷ and took a long drink.

Before Parvez could speak, Ali made a face.

'Don't you know it's wrong to drink alcohol?' he said.

'He spoke to me very harshly,' Parvez told Bettina. 'I was about to castigate the boy for being insolent, but managed to control myself.'

He had explained patiently to Ali that for years he had worked more than ten hours a day, that he had few enjoyments or hobbies and never went on holiday. Surely it wasn't a crime to have a drink when he wanted one?

'But it is forbidden,' the boy said.

Parvez shrugged. 'I know.'

'And so is gambling, isn't it?'

'Yes. But surely we are only human?'

Each time Parvez took a drink, the boy winced, or made a fastidious face as an accompaniment. This made Parvez drink more quickly. The waiter, wanting to please his friend, brought another glass of whisky. Parvez knew he was getting drunk, but he couldn't stop himself. Ali had a horrible look on his face, full of disgust and censure. It was as if he hated his father.

Halfway through the meal Parvez suddenly lost his temper and threw a plate on the floor. He had felt like ripping the cloth from the table, but the waiters and other customers were staring at him. Yet he wouldn't stand for his own son telling him the difference between right and wrong. He knew he wasn't a bad man. He had a conscience. There were a few things of which he was ashamed, but on the whole he had lived a decent life.

'When have I had time to be wicked?' he asked Ali.

In a low monotonous voice the boy explained that Parvez had not, in fact, lived a good life. He had broken countless rules of the Koran.

'For instance?' Parvez demanded.

Ali hadn't needed time to think. As if he had been waiting for this moment, he asked his father if he didn't relish pork pies.⁸

'Well . . .'

Parvez couldn't deny that he loved crispy bacon smothered with mushrooms and mustard and sandwiched between slices of fried bread. In fact he ate this for breakfast every morning.

Ali then reminded Parvez that he had ordered his own wife to cook pork sausages, saying to her, 'You're not in the village now, this is England. We have to fit in!'

Parvez was so annoyed and perplexed by this attack that he called for more drink.

'The problem is this,' the boy said. He leaned across the table. For the first time that night his eyes were alive. 'You are too implicated in Western civilisation.'

Parvez burped; he thought he was going to choke. 'Implicated!' he said. 'But we live here!'

'The Western materialists hate us,' Ali said. 'Papa, how can you love something which hates you?'

'What is the answer then?' Parvez said miserably. 'According to you?'

Ali addressed his father fluently, as if Parvez were a rowdy crowd that had to be quelled and convinced. The Law of Islam would rule the world; the skin of the infidel would burn off again and again; the Jews and Christians would be routed. The West was a sink of hypocrites, adulterers, homosexuals, drug-takers and prostitutes.

As Ali talked, Parvez looked out of the window as if to check that they were still in London.

'My people have taken enough. If the persecution doesn't stop there will be jihad.⁹ I, and millions of others, will gladly give our lives for the cause.'

'But why, why?' Parvez said.

'For us the reward will be in paradise.'

'Paradise!'

Finally, as Parvez's eyes filled with tears, the boy urged him to mend his ways.

'How is that possible?' Parvez asked.

'Pray,' Ali said. 'Pray beside me.'

Parvez called for the bill and ushered his boy out of the restaurant as soon as he was able. He couldn't take any more. Ali sounded as if he'd swallowed someone else's voice.

On the way home the boy sat in the back of the taxi, as if he were a customer.

'What has made you like this?' Parvez asked him, afraid that somehow he was to blame for all this. 'Is there a particular event which has influenced you?'

'Living in this country.'

'But I love England,' Parvez said, watching his boy in the mirror. 'They let you do almost anything here.'

'That is the problem,' he replied.

For the first time in years Parvez couldn't see straight. He knocked the side of the car against a lorry,¹ ripping off the wing mirror. They were lucky not to have been stopped by the police: Parvez would have lost his licence and therefore his job.

Getting out of the car back at the house, Parvez stumbled and fell in the mud, scraping his hands and ripping his trousers. He managed to haul himself up. The boy didn't even offer him his hand.

Parvez told Bettina he was now willing to pray, if that was what the boy wanted, if that would dislodge the pitiless look from his eyes.

'But what I object to,' he said, 'is being told by my own son that I am going to hell!'

What finished Parvez off was that the boy had said he was giving up accountancy. When Parvez had asked why, Ali had said sarcastically that it was obvious.

'Western education cultivates an anti-religious attitude.'

And, according to Ali, in the world of accountants it was usual to meet women, drink alcohol and practise usury.²

'But it's well-paid work,' Parvez argued. 'For years you've been preparing!'

Ali said he was going to begin to work in prisons, with poor Muslims who were struggling to maintain their purity in the face of corruption. Finally, at the end of the evening, as Ali was going to bed, he had asked his father why he didn't have a beard, or at least a moustache.³

'I feel as if I've lost my son,' Parvez told Bettina. 'I can't bear to be looked at as if I'm a criminal. I've decided what to do.'

'What is it?'

'I'm going to tell him to pick up his prayer mat and get out of my house. It will be the hardest thing I've ever done, but tonight I'm going to do it.'

'But you mustn't give up on him,' said Bettina. 'Many young people fall into cults and superstitious groups. It doesn't mean they'll always feel the same way.'

She said Parvez had to stick by his boy, giving him support, until he came through.

Parvez was persuaded that she was right, even though he didn't feel like giving his son more love when he had hardly been thanked for all he had already given.

Nevertheless, Parvez tried to endure his son's looks and reproaches. He attempted to make conversation about his beliefs. But if Parvez ventured any criticism, Ali always had a brusque reply. On one occasion Ali accused Parvez of 'grovelling' to the whites; in contrast, he explained, he was not 'inferior'; there was more to the world than the West, though the West always thought it was best.

'How is it you know that?' Parvez said. 'Seeing as you've never left England?'

Ali replied with a look of contempt.

One night, having ensured there was no alcohol on his breath, Parvez sat down at the kitchen table with Ali. He hoped Ali would compliment him on the beard he was growing but Ali didn't appear to notice.

The previous day Parvez had been telling Bettina that he thought people in the West sometimes felt inwardly empty and that people needed a philosophy to live by.

'Yes,' said Bettina. 'That's the answer. You must tell him what your philosophy of life is. Then he will understand that there are other beliefs.'

After some fatiguing consideration, Parvez was ready to begin. The boy watched him as if he expected nothing.

Haltingly Parvez said that people had to treat one another with respect, particularly children their parents. This did seem, for a moment, to affect the boy. Heartened, Parvez continued. In his view this life was all there was and when you died you rotted in the earth. 'Grass and flowers will grow out of me, but something of me will live on—'

'How?'

'In other people. I will continue—in you.' At this the boy appeared a little distressed. 'And your grandchildren,' Parvez added for good measure. 'But while I am here on earth I want to make the best of it. And I want you to, as well!'

'What d'you mean by "make the best of it"?' asked the boy.

'Well,' said Parvez. 'For a start . . . you should enjoy yourself. Yes. Enjoy yourself without hurting others.'

Ali said that enjoyment was a 'bottomless pit'.

'But I don't mean enjoyment like that!' said Parvez. 'I mean the beauty of living!'

'All over the world our people are oppressed,' was the boy's reply.

'I know,' Parvez replied, not entirely sure who 'our people' were, 'but still—life is for living!'

Ali said, 'Real morality has existed for hundreds of years. Around the world millions and millions of people share my beliefs. Are you saying you are right and they are all wrong?’

Ali looked at his father with such aggressive confidence that Parvez could say no more.

One evening Bettina was sitting in Parvez’s car, after visiting a client, when they passed a boy on the street.

‘That’s my son,’ Parvez said suddenly. They were on the other side of town, in a poor district, where there were two mosques.

Parvez set his face hard.

Bettina turned to watch him. ‘Slow down then, slow down!’ she said. ‘He’s good-looking. Reminds me of you. But with a more determined face. Please, can’t we stop?’

‘What for?’

‘I’d like to talk to him.’

Parvez turned the cab round and stopped beside the boy.

‘Coming home?’ Parvez asked. ‘It’s quite a way.’

The sullen boy shrugged and got into the back seat. Bettina sat in the front. Parvez became aware of Bettina’s short skirt, gaudy rings and ice-blue eye shadow. He became conscious that the smell of her perfume, which he loved, filled the cab. He opened the window.

While Parvez drove as fast as he could, Bettina said gently to Ali, ‘Where have you been?’

‘The mosque,’ he said.

‘And how are you getting on at college? Are you working hard?’

‘Who are you to ask me these questions?’ he said, looking out of the window. Then they hit bad traffic and the car came to a standstill.

By now Bettina had inadvertently laid her hand on Parvez’s shoulder. She said, ‘Your father, who is a good man, is very worried about you. You know he loves you more than his own life.’

‘You say he loves me,’ the boy said.

‘Yes!’ said Bettina.

‘Then why is he letting a woman like you touch him like that?’

If Bettina looked at the boy in anger, he looked back at her with twice as much cold fury.

She said, 'What kind of woman am I that deserves to be spoken to like that?'

'You know,' he said. 'Now let me out.'

'Never,' Parvez replied.

'Don't worry, I'm getting out,' Bettina said.

'No, don't!' said Parvez. But even as the car moved she opened the door, threw herself out and ran away across the road. Parvez shouted after her several times, but she had gone.

Parvez took Ali back to the house, saying nothing more to him. Ali went straight to his room. Parvez was unable to read the paper, watch television or even sit down. He kept pouring himself drinks.

At last he went upstairs and paced up and down outside Ali's room. When, finally, he opened the door, Ali was praying. The boy didn't even glance his way.

Parvez kicked him over. Then he dragged the boy up by his shirt and hit him. The boy fell back. Parvez hit him again. The boy's face was bloody. Parvez was panting. He knew that the boy was unreachable, but he struck him nonetheless. The boy neither covered himself nor retaliated; there was no fear in his eyes. He only said, through his split lip: 'So who's the fanatic now?'

1997

Endnotes

- Note 1: From the Punjab, a South Asian region including part of Pakistan and northwestern India.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Prayer five times a day is one of the pillars of Islam.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Pakistani city in the Punjab region.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Muslim doctors of the law, teachers, or imams.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Muslim clerics.Return to reference 5

- Note 6: Mackintosh, a rainproof coat.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: South Asian spiced wafer of bread.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Pork is forbidden in Islam.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Religious struggle or duty, sometimes interpreted to mean religious war (Arabic).Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Truck.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: To charge interest on a loan, a practice forbidden in Islam.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: In some strict interpretations of Islam, a beard is seen as compulsory for men.Return to reference 3

CAROL ANN DUFFY

b. 1955

Carol Ann Duffy was born in Glasgow, Scotland, to an Irish mother and a Scottish father in a working-class Catholic family. After moving as a child to Stafford, England, she was educated there at St. Joseph's Convent and at Stafford Girls' High School, before studying philosophy at the University of Liverpool. She worked in television, edited a poetry magazine, and taught creative writing in London's schools, and since 1996 she has lectured at Manchester Metropolitan University. In 2009 she was appointed Britain's poet laureate, the first woman and first Scot to hold the post; she stepped down in 2019.

A playwright as well as poet, Duffy is especially skillful in her use of dramatic monologue, fashioning and assuming the voices of mythological, historical, and fictive characters, such as Medusa or Lazarus's imaginary wife. Such poetic ventriloquism is well suited to her feminist revisions of myth and history: it enables her to dramatize a silenced or marginalized female perspective, wittily playing on the ironic contrast between the traditional version of a narrative and her own. The biblical story of Lazarus's resurrection, for example, looks different from the perspective of his wife, who upon his miraculous return from the dead scoffs: "I breathed / his stench."

The author of love poetry ("Valentine"), historical poetry ("The Christmas Truce"), and political satire as well as dramatic monologues, Duffy has a sharp eye for detail and uses it deftly in poems characterized by their sensuality, economy, and exuberance. Working in well-constructed stanzas, carefully pacing her rhythms, playing on half-rhymes, effectively conjuring the senses of touch, smell, and sight, she mobilizes the resources of traditional lyric and turns them to contemporary ends—the remaking of master narratives, the celebration of lesbian desire.

Warming Her Pearls

for Judith Radstone¹

Next to my own skin, her pearls. My mistress
bids me wear them, warm them, until evening when I'll brush her hair. At six, I place them round her cool, white throat. All day I think of her, 5 resting in the Yellow Room, contemplating silk or taffeta, which gown tonight? She fans herself whilst I work willingly, my slow heat entering each pearl. Slack on my neck, her rope.

10 She's beautiful. I dream about her in my attic bed; picture her dancing with tall men, puzzled by my faint, persistent scent beneath her French perfume, her milky stones.

15 I dust her shoulders with a rabbit's foot, watch the soft blush seep through her skin like an indolent sigh. In her looking-glass my red lips part as though I want to speak.

20 Full moon. Her carriage brings her home. I see her every movement in my head . . . Undressing, taking off her jewels, her slim hand reaching for the case, slipping naked into bed, the way she always does . . . And I lie here awake, knowing the pearls are cooling even now in the room where my mistress sleeps. All night
I feel their absence and I burn.

Endnotes

- Note 1: British political activist and bookseller (1925–2001). According to Radstone's obituary in The Guardian, the poem was inspired by a conversation with Radstone about the practice of ladies' maids increasing the luster of their mistresses' pearls by wearing them beneath their clothes. Return to reference 1

Valentine

Not a red rose or a satin heart.

I give you an onion.
It is a moon wrapped in brown paper.
It promises light
like the careful undressing of love.

5

Here.
It will blind you with tears
like a lover.
It will make your reflection
a wobbling photo of grief.

10

I am trying to be truthful.

Not a cute card or a kissogram.¹

I give you an onion.
Its fierce kiss will stay on your lips,
possessive and faithful
as we are,
for as long as we are.

15

Take it.
Its platinum loops shrink to a wedding ring,
if you like.
Lethal.
Its scent will cling to your fingers,
cling to your knife.

20

Endnotes

- Note 1: Telegram delivered by a young woman with a kiss.Return to reference 1

Medusa¹

A suspicion, a doubt, a jealousy
grew in my mind,
which turned the hairs on my head to filthy snakes,
as though my thoughts
hissed and spat on my scalp.

5

My bride's breath soured, stank
in the grey bags of my lungs.
I'm foul mouthed now, foul tongued,
yellow fanged.
There are bullet tears in my eyes.
Are you terrified?

10

Be terrified.
It's you I love,
perfect man, Greek God, my own;
but I know you'll go, betray me, stray from home.
So better by far for me if you were stone.

15

I glanced at a buzzing bee,
a dull grey pebble fell to the ground.
I glanced at a singing bird,
a handful of dusty gravel
spattered down.

20

I looked at a ginger cat, a housebrick
shattered a bowl of milk.
I looked at a snuffling pig,

25

a boulder rolled
in a heap of shit.

30 I stared in the mirror.
Love gone bad
showed me a Gorgon.
I stared at a dragon.
Fire spewed
35 from the mouth of a mountain.

And here you come with a shield for a heart and a sword for a tongue
and your girls, your girls.
Wasn't I beautiful?
40 Wasn't I fragrant and young?

Look at me now.

1999

Endnotes

- Note 1: In Greek mythology the mortal, snake-haired gorgon with the power to turn anyone who gazed upon her into stone. Looking at her reflection in a shield given him by Athena, Perseus cut off Medusa's head as she slept. Return to reference 1

Mrs Lazarus¹

5 I had grieved. I had wept for a night and a day over my loss, ripped the cloth I was married in from my breasts, howled, shrieked, clawed at the burial stones till my hands bled, retched his name over and over again, dead, dead.

10 Gone home. Guttled the place. Slept in a single cot, widow, one empty glove, white femur in the dust, half. Stuffed dark suits into black bags, shuffled in a dead man's shoes, noosed the double knot of a tie round my bare neck,

15 gaunt nun in the mirror, touching herself. I learnt the Stations of Bereavement,² the icon of my face in each bleak frame; but all those months he was going away from me, dwindling to the shrunk size of a snapshot, going,

20 going. Till his name was no longer a certain spell for his face. The last hair on his head floated out from a book. His scent went from the house.

The will was read. See, he was vanishing to the small zero held by the gold of my ring.

25 Then he was gone. Then he was legend, language;
my arm on the arm of the schoolteacher—the shock of a man's strength under the sleeve of his coat—along the hedgerows. But I was faithful for as long as it took. Until he was memory.

So I could stand that evening in the field in a shawl of fine air, healed, able to watch the edge of the moon occur to the sky and a hare thump from a hedge; then notice 30 the village men running towards me, shouting, behind them the women and children, barking dogs, and I knew. I knew by the sly light on the blacksmith's face, the shrill eyes of the barmaid, the sudden hands bearing me 35 into the hot tang of the crowd parting before me.
He lived. I saw the horror on his face.
I heard his mother's crazy song. I breathed his stench; my bridegroom in his rotting shroud, moist and dishevelled from the grave's slack chew, 40 croaking his cuckold name, disinherited, out of his time.

1999

Endnotes

- Note 1: Lazarus was the man raised from the dead by Jesus (John 11). Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Allusion to the Stations of the Cross, a series of fourteen icons (pictures or carvings) corresponding to the stages of Jesus's crucifixion and over each of which a prayer is said. Return to reference 2

The Christmas Truce¹

Christmas Eve in the trenches of France,
the guns were quiet.
The dead lay still in No Man's Land—
Freddie, Franz, Friedrich, Frank . . .
5 The moon, like a medal, hung in the clear, cold sky.

Silver frost on barbed wire, strange tinsel,
sparkled and winked.
A boy from Stroud² stared at a star
to meet his mother's eyesight there.
10 An owl swooped on a rat on the glove of a corpse.

In a copse of trees behind the lines,
a lone bird sang.
A soldier-poet noted it down—a robin
holding his winter ground—
15 then silence spread and touched each man like a hand.

Somebody kissed the gold of his ring;
a few lit pipes;
most, in their greatcoats, huddled,
waiting for sleep.
20 The liquid mud had hardened at last in the freeze.

But it was Christmas Eve; believe; belief thrilled the night air,
where glittering rime^o on unburied sons treasured their stiff hair.
25 The sharp, clean, midwinter smell held memory.

On watch, a rifleman scoured the terrain—
no sign of life,
no shadows, shots from snipers,
nowt^o to note or report.
The frozen, foreign fields were acres of pain.

30

Then flickering flames from the other side
danced in his eyes,
as Christmas Trees in their dozens shone,
candlelit on the parapets,
and they started to sing, all down the German lines.

35

Men who would drown in mud, be gassed, or shot, or vaporised
by falling shells, or live to tell, heard for the first time then—
Stille Nacht. Heilige Nacht. Alles schläft, einsam
40 wacht . . . ³

Cariad,^o the song was a sudden bridge
from man to man;
a gift to the heart from home,
or childhood, some place shared . . .
When it was done, the British soldiers cheered.

45

A Scotsman started to bawl The First Noel
and all joined in,
till the Germans stood, seeing across the divide,
the sprawled, mute shapes of those who had died.

50

All night, along the Western Front, they sang,
the enemies—
carols, hymns, folk songs, anthems,
in German, English, French;
each battalion choired in its grim trench.

55 So Christmas dawned, wrapped in mist, to open itself
and offer the day like a gift for Harry, Hugo, Hermann, Henry, Heinz . . .
60 with whistles, waves, cheers, shouts, laughs.

Frohe Weihnachten,⁴ Tommy! MerryChristmas, Fritz!
A young Berliner,
brandishing schnapps,
was the first from his ditch to climb.
65 A Shropshire⁵ lad ran at him like a rhyme.

Then it was up and over, every man,
to shake the hand
of a foe as a friend, or slap his back like a brother would;
70 exchanging gifts of biscuits, tea, Maconochie's stew,

Tickler's jam⁶ . . . for cognac, sausages, cigars,
beer, sauerkraut;
or chase six hares, who jumped from a cabbage-patch, or find a ball
75 and make of a battleground a football pitch.^o

I showed him a picture of my wife.
Ich zeigte ihm
ein Foto meiner Frau.
Sie sei schön, sagte er.⁷
80 He thought her beautiful, he said.

They buried the dead then, hacked spades into hard earth
again and again, till a score of men were at rest, identified, blessed.

85 Der Herr ist mein Hirt⁸ . . . my shepherd, I shall not want.

And all that marvellous, festive day and night,
they came and went,
the officers, the rank and file,
their fallen comrades side by side
beneath the makeshift crosses of midwinter graves .
90 . .

. . . beneath the shivering, shy stars and the pinned moon
and the yawn of History;
the high, bright bullets
which each man later only aimed at the sky.
95

2011

Endnotes

- Note 1: Series of unofficial but widespread ceasefires between British and German forces along the Western Front around Christmas 1914.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Town in southwest England.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Original German of "Stille Nacht," or "Silent Night," which in English is sung as "Silent night. Holy night. All is calm, all is bright . . ."Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Merry Christmas (German).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: County in the West of England. See also A Shropshire Lad (1896), collection of poems by English poet A. E. Housman (1859–1936).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: English jam often eaten by British troops in the trenches. "Maconochie's stew": wartime food ration from Scotland.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: I showed him a picture of my wife. He thought her beautiful, he said (German).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The Lord is my shepherd (German, Psalm 23).Return to reference 8

Notes

- °: frostReturn to reference °
- °: nothing (Northern English)Return to reference °
- °: darling (Welsh)Return to reference °
- °: soccer fieldReturn to reference °

CARYL PHILLIPS

b. 1958

"I am of, and not of, this place," repeats Caryl Phillips in a collection of essays, (2001). Born on the Caribbean island of Saint Kitts when it was still under British rule, he moved with his parents to England when he was only four months old and settled in the northern city of Leeds. Growing up Black in a predominantly White working-class community, he was the first student from his high school to attend Oxford University. After earning his B.A. in English Literature in 1979, he began making his living as a playwright, writing scripts for radio, television, and film. The success of his first novel, (1985), about a young woman who moves from the Caribbean to London with her baby and husband, enabled him to devote more energy to writing the prize-winning novels that have distinguished him as one of Britain's leading writers. The protagonist of his second novel, (1986), reverses the migration, returning to the Caribbean after twenty years in England. Since 1990, Phillips has taught predominantly in the United States, at Amherst, Barnard, and Yale.

Ever since his first novels, the voluntary and forced movement of people has remained at the empathic core of his fiction. As he remarked in an interview, his preoccupations have been "diaspora, dispossession, historical fracture, people being uprooted and displaced." Further emphasizing the mobility, displacement, and dispossession of his characters, he continued: "I am writing stories about people who find themselves on cattle trucks, I am writing stories about people who find themselves in ships sailing to countries that they don't want to go to, I find myself writing about people who wake up in the morning and their father is gone."

Phillips is best known for his historical novels about the transatlantic slave trade and its aftermath in Britain, the Caribbean, and the United States. It is central to a series of books, including the novels Higher Ground (1989), Cambridge (1991), and Crossing the River (1993), as well as his nonfictional The Atlantic Sound (2000). Reimagining the humanity of characters who are enslaved and enslaving, selling and sold, free and in bondage, Phillips deftly interweaves multiple narratives and perspectives in his novels. Sometimes he juxtaposes the radically discontinuous viewpoints of characters whose lives are entangled yet strangely parallel. The dominant narrative voices in Cambridge are those of Emily Cartwright, the White daughter of a British plantation owner, horrified by what she sees on the plantation but still racist in her views, and of Cambridge, the repeatedly enslaved and freed title character. Similarly, Crossing the River encompasses not only the story of a formerly enslaved man and his well-intentioned former enslaver but also the diary of an eighteenth-century owner of a "slave ship."

In addition to novels that probe human psychology in the historical past, some of Phillips's fictions come closer to the present and range widely in subject matter. The Nature of Blood (1997) is centered on the experience of a Jewish survivor of a Nazi death camp but reaches back to the fifteenth-century Venice of Othello. A Distant Shore (2003) features the unlikely friendship between a White English schoolteacher and an African refugee. Dancing in the Dark (2005) reimagines the lives of two famous minstrel singers, Bert Williams and his partner George Walker. Foreigners (2007), ironically subtitled Three English Lives, fuses real and historical material to tell the story of three Black migrants struggling and failing to make England their home. Like other of his fictions, In the Falling Snow (2009) explores the struggles of Caribbean migration in Britain, but The Lost Child (2015) was an unexpected departure, reimagining the orphan Heathcliff in Emily Brontë's novel Wuthering Heights (1847). Phillips continued his direct engagement with literary history in A View of the Empire at Sunset (2018), which weaves a novel around the itinerant life of Gwen Williams, the young woman who would grow up to become Jean Rhys.

Although he has also written books that combine first-person essay, travelogue, and social critique, such as The European Tribe (1987) and Colour Me English (2011), Phillips prefers in his novels to be invisible, to live through his characters. In the short autobiographical story "Growing Pains," Phillips writes about his early development as a Black child in England in a voice that is at once personal and distanced, intimate and in the third person. The story traces a writer's coming of age. It is wound around a series of encounters with stories by British, Russian, White American, African American, and other writers through which the boy-turned-young-man attempts to understand his identity and purpose. It is the story of one person's maturation, as he negotiates questions of race and class in a 1960s and '70s Britain still partly in denial about its emerging multiracialism. But in the youth's cross-cultural engagements with imaginary characters in far-flung places and times, it is also a story that showcases the expansiveness of the literary imagination.

Growing Pains

A LIFE IN TEN CHAPTERS

There are ten chapters to this story.

Chapter One

He lives in Leeds, in the North of England. His is a strange school for there is a broad white line in the middle of the playground. The boys and girls from the local housing estate have to play on one side of the line. His immigrant parents own their small house and so he is instructed to play on the other side of the line. He is the only black boy in the school. When the bell signals the end of playtime the two groups, one neatly dressed, the other group more discernibly scruffy, retreat into their separate buildings. The five-year-old boy is beginning to understand difference—in the form of class. The final lesson of the day is story time. The neatly dressed children sit cross-legged on the floor at the feet of their teacher, Miss Teale. She begins to read them a tale about 'Little Black Sambo'.¹ He can feel eyes upon him. He now wishes that he was on the other side of the line with the scruffy children. Either that, or would the teacher please read them a different story?

Chapter Two

He is a seven-year-old boy, and he has changed schools. At this new school there are no girls. His teacher asks him to stay behind after the lesson has finished. He is told that he must take his story and show it to the teacher in the next classroom. He isn't sure if he is being punished, but slowly he walks the short way up the corridor and shows the story to the other teacher, Miss Holmes. She sits on the edge of her desk and reads it. Then Miss Holmes looks down at him, but at first no words are exchanged. And then she speaks. 'Well done. I'll hold on to this.'

Chapter Three

The eight-year-old boy seems to spend his whole day with his head stuck in books. His mother encourages him to get into the habit of going to the local library every Saturday, but he can only take out four books at a time and by Monday he has read them all. Two brothers up the street sometimes let him borrow their Enid Blyton paperbacks. The Famous Five adventure stories.² Julian, Dick, Anne, George and Timmy the dog are the first literary lives that he intimately engages with. However, he tells his mother that he does not understand why the boys' mother warms the Enid Blyton paperbacks in the oven when he returns them. The two brothers have mentioned something to him about germs. His mother is furious. She forbids him to borrow any more books from these two boys. He begins to lose touch with Julian, Dick, Anne, George and Timmy the dog.

Chapter Four

His parents have recently divorced. He is nine and he is spending the weekend with his father, who seems to have little real interest in his son. He senses that his father is merely fulfilling a duty, but the son needs his father's attention and so he writes a story. The story includes the words 'glistening' and 'glittering' which have a glamour that the son finds alluring. When the son eventually hands the story to his father, the father seems somewhat baffled by this offering. His father is an immigrant, this much he already understands. But it is only later that he realises that imaginative writing played no part in his father's colonial education as a subject of the British Empire. His father's rudimentary schooling never embraced poetic conceits such as those his son seems determined to indulge in. As the father hands back the story to his son, a gap begins to open up between the two of them.

Chapter Five

He is only ten years old when his father decides that it is fine to leave him all alone in his spartan flat while he goes to work the night shift at the local factory. There is no television. No radio. Nothing to seize his attention beyond the few comic books and soccer magazines that the son has brought with him from his mother's house. Then, late at night, alone in the huge double bed, he leans over and discovers a paperback in the drawer of the bedside table and he begins to read the book. It is a true story about a white American man who has made himself black in order that he might experience what it is like to be a colored man. The ten-year-old boy reads John Howard Griffin's *Black Like Me*³ and, alone in his father's double bed, he tries hard not to be afraid. That night he leaves the lights on, and in the morning he is still awake as his exhausted father slides into bed next to him.

Chapter Six

At sixteen he has no girlfriend. The truth is, his brothers aside, he has few friends of any kind, and he seldom speaks with his father or stepmother. During the long summer holiday he locks himself away in his bedroom and he reads one large nineteenth-century novel after another. He learns how to lose himself in the world and lives of others, and in this way he does not have to think about the woeful state of his own life. At the moment he is reading Anna Karenina.⁴ Towards the end of one afternoon his heart leaps, and he has to catch his breath. He puts the book down and whispers to himself, 'My God.' His stepmother calls him downstairs for dinner. He sits at the table in silence but he cannot eat. He stares at his brothers, at his father, at his stepmother. Do they not understand? Anna has thrown herself in front of a train.

Chapter Seven

He is eighteen and he has completed his first term at university. He cannot go back to his father's house and so he travels 150 miles north to his mother's place. Mother and son have not, of late, spent much time in each other's company. His mother does not understand that her eighteen-year-old son is now, according to him, a man. They argue, and he gets in the car and drives off in a fit of frustration. He stops the car in the local park and opens his book. However, he cannot get past the sheer audacity of the first sentence of James Baldwin's Blues for Mister Charlie.⁵ 'And may every nigger like this nigger end like this nigger—face down in the weeds!' This eighteen-year-old 'man' is completely overwhelmed by Baldwin's brutal prose. He reads this one sentence over and over and over again. And then he closes the book and decides that he should go back and make up with his mother.

Chapter Eight

His tutor has asked to see him in his office. Dr Rabbitt informs the student that he has passed the first part of his degree in Psychology, Neurophysiology and Statistics, but he reassures the student that at nineteen there is still time for him to reconsider his choice of a degree. Does he really wish to pursue psychology? The student patiently explains that he wishes to understand people, and that before university he was assiduously reading Jung and Freud for pleasure. His unmoved tutor takes some snuff, and then he rubs his beard. So you want to know about people, do you? He patiently explains to the student that William James was the first professor of psychology at Harvard, but it was his brother, Henry,⁶ who really knew about people. The student looks at Dr Rabbitt, but he is unsure what to say. His tutor helps him to make the decision. 'Literature. If you want to know about people study English literature, not psychology.'

Chapter Nine

He is twenty, and for the first time since arriving in England as a four-month-old baby he has left the country. He has travelled to the United States, and crossed the huge exciting nation by Greyhound bus. After three weeks on the road, he knows that soon he will have to return to England and complete his final year of university. In California he goes into a bookstore. He buys a copy of a book that has on the cover a picture of a young man who looks somewhat like himself. He takes the book to the beach, and sits on a deckchair and begins to read. When he finishes Richard Wright's *Native Son*⁷ it is almost dark, and the beach is deserted. But he now knows what he wishes to do with his life. And then, some time later, he is grateful to discover that mere ambition is fading and is being replaced by something infinitely more powerful; purpose.

Chapter Ten

He sits with his great-grandmother in the small village at the far end of St Kitts,⁸ the island on which he was born twenty-eight years earlier. He has now published two novels, and on each publication day he has asked his editor to send a copy of the book to his great-grandmother. But she has never mentioned the books and so gingerly he now asks her if she ever received them? Does she have them? When she moves it is like watching a statue come to life. She reaches beneath the chair and slowly pulls out two brown cardboard bundles. The books are still in their packaging. She has opened the bundles, looked at the books, and then neatly replaced them. Again she opens the packaging. She fingers the books in the same way that he has seen her finger her bible. Then she looks at her great-grandson and smiles. 'I was the teacher's favourite,' she says. She was born in 1898 and so he realises that she is talking to him about life at the dawn of the twentieth century. 'And,' she continues, 'I missed a lot of school for I had to do all the errands.' Suddenly he understands what she means. She cannot read. He swallows deeply and lowers his eyes. How could he be clumsy enough to cause her this embarrassment? She carefully puts the books back in their cardboard packaging and tucks them back under the chair. She looks at her great-grandson. She doted on this boy for the first four months of his life. The great-grandson who disappeared to England. The great-grandson who all these years later now sends her stories from England.

2005

Endnotes

- Note 1: Illustrated children's book first published in 1899, featuring a highly racialized dark-skinned protagonist, by Scottish writer Helen Bannerman (1862–1946).Return to reference 1

- Note 2: Series of children's adventure novels by English writer Enid Blyton (1897–1968).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Nonfiction book (1961) describing a six-week period in 1959 in which Griffin (1920–1980), a White man from Dallas, Texas, darkened his skin and passed as a Black man while traveling through the American South.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Novel (1878) by Russian writer Leo Tolstoy (1828–1910).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Play (1964) by American writer James Baldwin (1924–1987).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Henry James (1843–1916), American fiction writer.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Novel (1940) by American writer Richard Wright (1908–1960).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Island in the West Indies.Return to reference 8

SIMON ARMITAGE

b. 1963

Born in the village of Marsden in West Yorkshire, Simon Armitage writes poetry marked by his working-class upbringing in the rural north of England. After earning a B.A. in geography at Portsmouth University and an M.A. in social work at Manchester University, he became, like his father, a probation officer, though after six years he turned his attention from drug-rehabilitation programs to poetry. His first book of poems, Zoom!, was published in 1989, followed by a number of poetry collections, including Paper Aeroplane: Selected Poems 1989–2014 (2014). His alliterative translations from Middle English of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight (2007) and The Death of King Arthur (2012) have been widely praised. He also published a dramatic retelling of Homer's Odyssey (2006), and he has written novels, plays, and memoirs, including one about a walking tour in northern England and another about his obsession with popular music. Scripts for television, film, and radio have also kept him in the public eye in Britain. He has taught at a number of universities—since 2017 at the University of Leeds—and in 2015 he was elected the Oxford Professor of Poetry, a post in which his predecessors include Geoffrey Hill, Paul Muldoon, and Seamus Heaney. He was appointed Poet Laureate of the United Kingdom in 2019, succeeding Carol Ann Duffy.

Like Philip Larkin, Armitage writes lyric poems that take inspiration from the everyday rather than the exotic or the extreme.

In a manifesto poem, he writes of not having parachuted from a plane or visited the Taj Mahal; instead, he has skipped stones and “felt each stone’s inertia / spend itself against the water; then sink”; he has “held the wobbly head of a boy / at the day centre, and stroked his fat hands” (“It Ain’t What You Do, It’s What It Does to You”). A poem may be about something as simple as rolling a tire down a hill, though visionary wonder may spring from such mundane sources (“The Tyre”). His diction is pitched in a colloquial register, including slang and Northern English vernacular (for example, ginnels and dunch in “Horses, M62”). But his poetry accumulates resonances through modulations of enjambment and syntax, deft deployments of internal and end rhyme, and astonishing figurative language (an old tire is compared to “gashed, rhinoceros, sea-lion skin / nursing a gallon of rain in its gut”). Revitalizing the traditional tools of the English-language lyric, Armitage can make a poem about the encounter between cars and horses on a motorway stop in its tracks (“Standstill. / Motor oil pulses. / Black blood.”) or burst with a scattering force (“a riderless charge, // a flack of horseshoe and hoof”). Even as he seeks to engage the common reader, he is poet of uncommon formal virtuosity and versatility.

The Tyre

Just how it came to rest where it rested, miles out, miles from the last farmhouse even,
was a fair question. Dropped by hurricane or aeroplane perhaps for some reason,
5 put down as a cairn¹ or marker, then lost.
Tractor-size, six or seven feet across,
it was sloughed, unconscious, warm to the touch,
its gashed, rhinoceros, sea-lion skin
nursing a gallon of rain in its gut.
10 Lashed to the planet with grasses and roots, it had to be cut. Stood up it was drunk or slugged, wanted nothing more than to slump, to spiral back to its circle of sleep,
dream another year in its nest of peat.
15 We bullied it over the moor, drove it, pushed from the back or turned it from the side, unspooling a thread in the shape and form of its tread, in its length and in its line, rolled its weight through broken walls, felt the shock 20 when it met with stones, guided its sleepwalk down to meadows, fields, onto level ground.
There and then we were one connected thing,
five of us, all hands steering a tall ship or one hand fingering a coin or ring.

25 Once on the road it picked up pace, freewheeled, then moved up through the gears, and wouldn't give to shoulder-charges, kicks; resisted force until to tangle with it would have been to test bone against engine or machine, to be dragged in, broken, thrown out again

30 minus a limb. So we let the thing go, leaning into the bends and corners,
balanced and centred, riding the camber,² carried away with its own momentum.
We pictured an incident up ahead:
35 life carved open, gardens in half, parted,
a man on a motorbike taken down,
a phone-box upended, children erased,
police and an ambulance in attendance,
scuff-marks and the smell of burning rubber, 40 the tyre itself embedded in a house or lying in the gutter, playing dead.
But down in the village the tyre was gone,
and not just gone but unseen and unheard of,
not curled like a cat in the graveyard, not 45 cornered in the playground like a reptile, or found and kept like a giant fossil.
Not there or anywhere. No trace. Thin air.

Being more in tune with the feel of things than science and facts, we knew that the tyre 50 had travelled too fast for its size and mass, and broken through some barrier of speed,
outrun the act of being driven, steered,
and at that moment gone beyond itself towards some other sphere, and disappeared.
55

1997

Endnotes

- Note 1: A mound of stones raised as a monument or marker.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Tilt built into a road at a curve, allowing vehicles to maintain speed.Return to reference 2

Horses, M62¹

Sprung from a field,
a team
of a dozen or so

5 is suddenly here and amongst, silhouettes
in the butterscotch dusk.

One ghosts
between vans,
traverses three lanes,
10 its chess-piece head
fording the river of fumes;
one jumps the barricades

between carriageways;
a third slows
to a halt 15 then bends, nosing

the road, tonguing the surface for salt.

Standstill.
Motor oil pulses.
20 Black blood.

Some trucker swings down from his cab to muster and drove;^o but 25 unbiddable, crossbred nags

 they scatter through ginnels^o

 of coachwork^o and chrome,
 and are distant, gone,
30 then a dunch^o

 and here alongside is a horse,
 the writhing mat of its hide

 pressed on the glass—
 a tank of worms—
35 a flank

 of actual horse . . .
 It bolts,
 all arse and tail

40 through a valley of fleet saloons.^o
 Regrouped they clatter away, then spooked by a horn

 double back,
45 a riderless charge,

 a flack^o of horseshoe and hoof
 into the idling cars,
 now eyeball, nostril, tooth

 under the sodium glow,
50 biblical, eastbound,
 against the flow.

Endnotes

- Note 1: Highway in northern England connecting Liverpool and Hull.Return to reference 1

Notes

- °: herdReturn to reference °
- °: narrow passagewaysReturn to reference °
- °: car-body workReturn to reference °
- °: slight collisionReturn to reference °
- °: station wagonsReturn to reference °
- °: burstReturn to reference °

The English Astronaut

He splashed down in rough seas off Spurn Point.¹
I watched through a coin-op telescope jammed with a lollipop stick as a trawler fished him out of the waves and ferried him back to Mission Control on a trading estate near the Humber Bridge.²
5 He spoke with a mild voice: yes, it was good to be home; he'd missed his wife, the kids, couldn't wait for a shave and a hot bath. 'Are there any more questions?' No, there were not.

10 I followed him in his Honda Accord to a Little Chef on the A1³, took the table opposite, watched him order the all-day breakfast and a pot of tea.
'You need to go outside to do that,' said the waitress when he lit a cigarette. He read the paper, 15 started the crossword, poked at the black pudding⁴ with his fork. Then he stared through the window for long unbroken minutes at a time, but only at the busy road, never the sky. And his face was not the moon. And his hands were not the hands of a man 20 who had held between finger and thumb the blue planet, and lifted it up to his watchmaker's eye.

2010

Endnotes

- Note 1: Narrow sandbar off the northeast coast of England, near Hull.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Suspension bridge southwest of Hull. "Trading estate": industrial park.Return to reference 2

- Note 3: Longest highway in Britain, London to Edinburgh. "Little Chef": chain of British diners.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Type of blood sausage.Return to reference 4

Beck¹

It is all one chase.
Trace it back: the source might be nothing more than a teardrop
5 squeezed from a curlew's eye, then follow it down
to the full-throated roar
at its mouth:
a dipper^o
10 strolls the river
dressed for dinner
in a white bib.

The unbroken thread
of the beck
15 with its nose for the sea,
all flux and flex,
soft-soaping a pebble
for thousands of years,
or here
20 after hard rain sawing the hillside in half with its chain.
Or here,
where water unbinds
and hangs
25 at the waterfall's face, and just for that one stretched white moment becomes lace.

Endnotes

- Note 1: A mountain stream; an attention-getting gesture, such as a nod or wave. Return to reference 1

Notes

- °: small diving bird Return to reference °

PATIENCE AGBABI

b. 1965

Born in London to Nigerian parents, Patience Agbabi became a foster child at a young age. Later describing herself as “bi-cultural,” she grew up in a White English family in Sussex and Wales while maintaining a close relationship with her birth parents, with whom she also lived from time to time. She attributes her interest in moving across borders and boundaries to her dual family upbringing. She is drawn to moments of metamorphosis, and brings elements of linguistic transformation and translation into her poetry. Agbabi earned a B.A. in English with honors at Oxford and an M.A. in creative writing from the University of Sussex. She is the author of five collections of poetry, from her early autobiographical R.A.W. (1995) to The Infinite (2020).

Hailed as a “performance” or “spoken word” poet, Agbabi composes for both the stage and the page. In “Prologue” (also performed as “Word”), from her second collection, Transformatrix (2000), as in her other work, Agbabi’s language and the forms she uses amalgamate high literary art with oral and musical traditions. The poem adapts the insistent rhyme, syncopated rhythms, and self-reflexive wordplay of hip-hop. Dotted with literary terms and techniques, it also draws on the ancient ars poetica tradition—poems as instruction manuals for writing poetry. Partly rap boast and partly literary manifesto, Agbabi’s exuberantly hybrid art remakes and renews the disparate sources it welds together.

Agbabi's distinctive style improvises upon the history of English-language poetry. In high school she was thrilled by the General Prologue to Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, which she later reimagined for a contemporary, multiracial Britain as Telling Tales (2014). Three poems from that collection are included here, starting with "Prologue" (Grime Mix), a rewriting of the host Harry Bailey's greeting to the pilgrims. Agbabi's version plays with readers' expectations from the first line by transforming "April showers" from a weather event into a female muse for a modern day emcee. The original Canterbury Tales proposed a contest between pilgrims. Whoever told the best story would be rewarded with a free dinner. Agbabi embraces the spirit of performance and competition in Chaucer's poems and brings the infectious excitement of slam poetry and rap battles to her cycle of poems. "The Kiss" (The Miller's Tale) and "What Do Women Like Bes'?" (The Wife of Bath's Tale) give voice to two self-identified femme fatales: Robyn Miller and the Nigerian immigrant Alice Ebi Bafa. Robyn's dramatic monologue makes use of single-rhymed quatrains while the Wife of Bafa speaks in free verse (a rarity in Agbabi's poetry) to convey the character's no-nonsense attitude and the cadences of Nigerian English. These formal choices translate the gleeful vulgarity and tragicomedy of the original tales into modern poetic idioms.

Telling Tales returns the Canterbury Tales to its roots in oral storytelling and everyday language. Agbabi's long poem "The Doll's House" unfolds in rhyme royal, the rhyme scheme first developed by Chaucer for his long poems such as Troilus and Criseyde. Agbabi takes as her target the Harewood House in Yorkshire, a country estate built in 1738 whose wealth and grandeur mark it as one of the "Treasure Houses" of England. "The Doll's House" revisits the stately home through the prism of the transatlantic slave trade and the sugar plantations from which its owners, the Lascelles family, profited. The stanza structure of the poem turns out to be a refined façade, and the verses renovate our perspective of the opulent country home built on enslaved people's labor. "The Doll's House" offers "a beauty whittled from harsh truth." It was shortlisted for the Forward Prize for Best Single Poem of 2014 and participates in a larger global movement toward decolonizing sites of cultural heritage.

Prologue (Word)

Give me a word
any word
let it roll across your tongue like a dolly mixture. o
5 Open your lips say it loud
let each syllable vibrate
like a transistor.
Say it again again again again again
10 till it's a tongue twister till its meaning is in tatters till its meaning equals sound
now write it down,
letter by letter
15 loop the loops
till you form a structure.
Do it again again again again again
till it's a word picture.
Does this inspire?
Is your consciousness on fire?
20 Then let me take you higher. 1

Give me a noun
give me a verb
and I'm in motion
25 cos I'm on a mission
to deliver information
so let me take you to the fifth dimension.
No fee, it's free,
you only gotta pay attention.
So sit back, relax,

30 let me take you back to when you learnt to walk, talk, learnt coordination
and communication,
35 mama
dada.
If you rub two words together you get friction cut them in half, you get a fraction.
If you join two words you get multiplication.
My school of mathematics
40 equals verbal acrobatics
so let's make conversation.

Give me a preposition
give me an interjection
give me inspiration.
45 In the beginning was creation
I'm not scared of revelations cos I've done my calculations.
I've got high hopes
on the tightrope,
50 I just keep talking.
I got more skills than I got melanin
I'm fired by adrenaline
if you wanna know what rhyme it is it's feminine.
55 Cos I'm Eve on an Apple Mac this is a rap attack
so rich in onomatopoeia
I'll take you higher than the ozone layer.
So give me Word for Windows
60 give me 'W' times three cos I'm on a mission
to deliver information
that is gravity defying and I'll keep on trying

65 till you lose your fear of flying.
Give me a pronoun
give me a verb
and I'm living in syntax.
You only need two words to form a sentence.
70 I am I am I am I am I am bicultural and sometimes clinical,
my mother fed me rhymes through the umbilical,
I was born waxing lyrical.
I was raised on Watch with Mother²
75 The Rime of the Ancient Mariner³ and Fight the Power.⁴
Now I have the perfect tutor
in my postmodern suitor,
I'm in love with my computer.
80 But let me shut down before I touch down.

Give me a word
give me a big word
let me manifest
85 express in excess
the M I X
of my voice box.
Now I've eaten the apple
I'm more subtle than a snake is.
90 I wanna do poetic things in poetic places.
Give me poetry unplugged
so I can counter silence.
Give me my poetic licence

95 and I'll give you metaphors that top eclipses
I'll give megabytes and megamixes.

Give me a stage and I'll cut form on it give me a page and I'll perform on it.

Give me a word
any word.

100

2000

Endnotes

- Note 1: "I Want to Take You Higher" is the title of a song (1969) by Sly and the Family Stone.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: British children's TV series (1953–73).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Long poem (1798) by the English Romantic poet Samuel Taylor Coleridge (1772–1834).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Song (1989) by the American hip-hop group Public Enemy.Return to reference 4

Notes

- °: British candyReturn to reference °

Prologue (Grime Mix)

Harry 'Bells' Bailey¹

When my April showers me with kisses
I could make her my missus or my mistress but I'm happily hitched—sorry home girls—said my vows to the sound of the Bow Bells 5 yet her breath is as fresh as the west wind, when I breathe her, I know we're predestined to make music; my muse, she inspires me, though my mind's overtaxed, April fires me,
how she pierces my heart to the fond root 10 till I bleed sweet cherry blossom en route to our bliss trip; there's days she goes off me, April loves me not; April loves me with a passion, dear doctor, I'm wordsick and I got the itch like I'm allergic 15 but it could be my shirt's on the cheap side;
serenade overnight with my peeps wide,
nothing like her, liqueur, an elixir,
overproof that she serves as my sick cure,
she's as strong as a ram, she is Aries,² 20 see my jaw-dropping jeans, she could wear these;
see my jaw dropping neat Anglo-Saxon,³
I got ink in my veins more than Caxton⁴ and it flows hand to mouth, here's a mouthfeast, verbal feats from the streets of the South-East 25 but my April, she blooms every shire's end, fit or vint, rich or skint,⁵ she inspires them from the grime to the clean-cut iambic,⁶ rime royale,⁷ rant or rap, get your slam kick.

On this Routemaster bus,⁸ get cerebral,
30 Tabard Inn to Canterbury Cathedral,⁹ poet pilgrims competing for free picks,
Chaucer Tales, track by track, here's the remix from below-the-belt base to the topnotch;
I won't stop all the clocks with a stopwatch 35 when the tales overrun, run offensive, or run clean out of steam, they're authentic cos we're keeping it real, reminisce this:
Chaucer Tales were an unfinished business.
May the best poet lose, as the saying goes.
40 May the best poet muse be mainstaying those on the stage, on the page, on their subject:
me and April, we're The Rhyming Couplet.
I'm The Host for tonight, Harry Bailey,
if I'm tongue-tied, April will bail me,
45 I'm MC but the M is for mistress when my April shows me what a kiss is . . .

2014

Endnotes

- Note 1: Innkeeper in The Canterbury Tales who suggests the storytelling competition that is the frame for the tales.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: The first astrological sign in the zodiac, symbolized by a ram.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Germanic people who migrated to England in the 5th century. Anglo-Saxon is sometimes used interchangeably with Old English.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: William Caxton, an important printer, publisher, and translator. He printed Chaucer's Canterbury Tales.Return to reference 4

- Note 5: Having no money (British slang). “Vint”: to make wine.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Metrical feet in poetry, consisting of an unstressed syllable followed by a stressed syllable.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Introduced by Chaucer, a rhyming stanza of seven lines of iambic pentameter.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: A double-decker bus used in London.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Cathedral in Canterbury, Kent, England, where the pilgrims of The Canterbury Tales travel to visit the shrine of Saint Thomas Becket. “Tabard Inn”: where the pilgrims gather before their journey.Return to reference 9

The Kiss

Robyn Miller¹

Get me a pint of Southwark piss!²
It all took place in a pub like this.
My tongue is black as licorice,
my tale is blue an it goes like this:

5 I'm just eighteen an newly wed.
My husband's old an crap in bed,
my lover's fit, well hung, well read,
his rival's mad, a musclehead.

10 Three loves I have an two are thick:
My husband John's a jealous prick,
the rival, Abs, thinks with his dick.
My lover's French, il s'appelle Nick,³

15 in his final year at Greenwich,
Engineering Astrophysics,
he's proposed but I'm a bitch,
I'd leave my husband, but he's rich.

20 A carpenter, an 'ancient oak'
with a heart tattoo, a real bloke's bloke,
crashed out on what he thought was coke⁴
an fifteen pints of ale. Nick's joke.

John owns the pub. We live upstairs an every night he says his prayers,
while Nick, our lodger, flirts downstairs,
where Abs, our bouncer, sells his wares.

25 This Abs comes on to guys and girls.
He pushes weights an class A pills.⁵
Grey eyes, blond hair with baby curls an a bod⁶ as hard as the drugs he sells.

30 He buys me wine, real ales an Pimms.⁷
He likes his women weasel slim with eyebrows plucked till they're pencil thin.
His gear is class: I put up with him.

35 But Nick's more subtle, tweets an texts, no kiss-me-quick with a pint of Becks.⁸
Belle femme, je t'aime,⁹ he says, an necks
those pills Abs recommends for sex.

40 Three men walk into a pub like this but only one can kiss the kiss.
What is it makes my bottle fizz?
Je ne sais quoi my arse,¹ hear this:

45 What's in a kiss? I'll kiss an tell.
My husband's kiss is Southwark ale,
my lover's 'baiser'² 'fuck' in braille
an I'm his fucked-up femme fatale.³

50 So John's upstairs an proper pissed.
I'm in the bar with Nick. We've kissed in English, French an every lisped linguistic twist, you get the gist.

 High on the pills that kick like tabs,⁴
we crawl around the floor like crabs,
Adam, Eve,⁵ on hormone jabs,
we got The Knowledge like black cabs.

55 Nous faisons l'amour⁶ all night, an by six o'clock it's still not light
 when Abs knocks on the window, tight,
 Kiss me, babes. I say, Alright.

60 Window's open, total geared he's tongueing me but something's weird:
 too right, cos I ain't got no beard,
 stead of my lips, he got my rear!

Fuck you! Storms off down the alleyway.
 Then tap, tap, tap on the central bay,
 Mr Am-I-straight-or-gay?
 back for his petit déjeuner!⁷

65 *À moi!*⁸ Nick winks, bares his behind for Abs's probing lips to find:
 then farts a fart, the deadly kind,
 a blast that almost makes Abs blind!

70 We laugh, but Abs laughs last, the sod,⁹ Abs has a hard-on, like his bod,
 he grabs Nick's arse, I swear to God,
 in goes his red-hot iron rod!

75 *Bordel de merde!*¹ Well sick, that kiss cos Abs is built like an obelisk.
 John wakes, falls headlong, slips a disc,
 slurs, What in great God's name is this?

80 My husband's so in shock to see the men, he sobers instantly an doesn't even notice me until I'm dressed. So I'm Scot-free but Abs an Nick, he throws them out.

It's made him even more devout.
Now, when I see them, Kiss? I shout, raise my eyebrows high, an pout.

85 So, I got fucked; John's a fuckwit;
an Nick my lover, fucked to shit;
an Abs scored hard, he's fucking fit;
both men were fucked by the fucked-off git.²

90 If you drink your beer in a tulip glass³ an kiss the air cos you think you're class
but draw the line at this French farce, bon appétit⁴—French-kiss my arse!

2014

Endnotes

- Note 1: In The Canterbury Tales, the Miller is named Robyn and is the narrator of a bawdy tale meant to respond to the gentility of "The Knight's Tale."Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Alcoholic beverage (slang). "Southwark": area of London on the southern bank of the river Thames.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: His name is (French).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Cocaine (slang).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Class of drugs including amphetamines and cocaine.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Body (slang).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: English brand of gin-based liqueur.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: German brand of beer.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Beautiful woman, I love you (French).Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Something that can't be described; literally "I don't know what" (French).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Kiss (French).Return to reference 2

- Note 3: Trope of a seductive woman leading her lover into a trap; literally “fatal woman” (French).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: A portion of a drug, like ecstasy or LSD (slang).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: In the Bible, the first man and woman created by God.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: We make love (French).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Breakfast (French).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: My turn (French).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: An unpleasant man (British slang), formerly slang for a homosexual male.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: For fuck’s sake (French).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: A foolish person (slang).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Kind of beer glass.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Enjoy your meal (French).Return to reference 4

What Do Women Like Bes'? (The Wife of Bath's Tale)¹

Mrs Alice Ebi Bafa

My name is Mrs Alice Ebi Bafa,
I come from Nigeria.
I'm very fine, isn't it?
My nex' birthday I'll be . . . twenty-nine.
I'm business woman.
5 Would you like to buy some cloth?
I've all de latest styles from Lagos,²
Italian shoe an' handbag to match, lace, linen an' Dutch wax.³
I only buy de bes'
10 an' I travel first class.
Some say I have blood on my han's
'cause I like to paint my nails red but others call me femme fatale.⁴
My father had four wives
15 so I've had five husband.
I cast a spell with my gap-tooth smile
an' my bottom power!
Three were good and two were bad.
The first three were old and rich
20 an' I was young and fit.
They died of exhaustion!
The first from Ghana, second Sierra Leone,⁵
the third was white Englishman.
Short or tall, black or white,
25 I had race relations with dem.
They were quiet simple men
so I told lie to pepper de marriage.
Why you drink Guinness⁶ in my neighbour's house-o?
Is she so fine in her Jimmy Shoe?⁷

30 You go vex if I meet Justice Bafa in Lagos bar and off my phone! Ah-ah!
*Am I Delilah to cut off your head?*⁸
I accused them of fornication
when they could barely stand on their two legs.
35 To enter my good book, they go beg!
 The fourth one was ladies' man,
I could not count his women on one han'
but he'd rage if I looked at another man.
40 He puff his ches' like King Solomon⁹ with wife and concubine
but woman must be faithful and sober.
Such talk is not worth one kobo!¹
I am not a feminax,²
I do not believe women are equal to men,
45 women are better!
Our chamber of Venus³
is for both birth and pleasure.
I was very wild when I was young.
They called me Miss Highlife,
50 I was not considered a good wife
but I always respected my husban'.
He died when I returned from dis London.
 The fifth one I married for love.
Chief Justice 'Aboniki' Bafa.
55 He was studying law at University of Ibadon.⁴
He was not yet twenty-one,
wicked in bed and so handsome but he liked pornographic magazine.
His favourite was Playboy.⁵
60 One day I threw it on fire to teach him a lesson.
He turned into wife batterer.
He was to regret his action.
I beat him till he begged for his ancestors!

Now we get on like house on fire.
65 Some say I'm a witchcraft
 'cause I did not bear dem children.
 They do not understand the Western medicine.
 Since my first husban', from Ghana,
70 I had freedom of procreation.
 He wanted ten children to pass my hip
 but I learnt how to wield de whip.
 Ghana is very advanced,
 the female owns the children not de male.
75 This is their folktale
 I tell in my own tongue:
 'What Do Women Most Desire?'
 A big man soldier
 resided in king's household.
80 But outside de compound
 he saw small girl, fourteen years of age and took her by force!
 He was disgraced and sentenced to death!
 They must cut off his . . . head.
85 In Ghana, woman was goddess.
 But the queen pitied his sorrow,
 she would spare his life
 if he could answer question
 What thing is it that women most desire?
90 in a year and tomorrow.
 The soldier went on his two legs.
 What do women like bes'?
 Some said gold coin, or fine cloth,
 some said man be chilli-pepper hot,
95 some said freedom, some said marriage, some said we want husband think we can keep secret to chest.
 None were correct
 and he failed the brain to guess.
 The year end he mus' return.

100 Off road he heard beating of drum an' saw plenty women, fit and young, dancing in kente cloth,⁶ traditional dress of Ghana.

105 They must give him answer.
But they disappeared into hot air.
Only an old old madame suffering from eyes, leg rough like yam.
Greetings, Nana! I beg you your wisdom.
110 What is the greatest desire of women?
She smiled, I reveal secret!
But sozaboy,⁷ promise
to grant my bes' wish.
He gives her his word.

105 The old madame is elated.
Nex' day old and young congregated to hear soldier response.
Even mosquito quiet for his reply:
110 Women desire to have sovereignty
over their husbands, or lovers.
They want to have mastery over him.
If I lie, I forfeit my head for sin.
The palace sings jubilation.
No woman can contradict him,
115 wife, widow or virgin.
But the old madame with eyes
must have her wish:
That he must take her hand in marriage!
He think say it worse than death
120 but soldier mus' honour his debt.
That night old madame be smiling in bed.
It pain him to look his newlywed.
Husban', pay your dues to wife!
Am I too poor for love?
125 I can amen' myself, Sir,

but you must amen' yourself also.
Your family not give virtue, dat from God.
Your pride not worth one cedi!
You say I old. Respect your elder!
130 And if I ugly, I not take lover.
Ugliness an' age keep me chaste.
Still he refuse to look her face.
I make amen', my husban'. Choose!
I remain ugly an' old
135 an' faithful to your body,
What a dilemma!
He frown till he resemble old papa.
My wife, he says, Choose for your husband.
140 I place myself in your capable hands.
This so pleases the old old madame.
Kiss me, my husban', so handsome!
You have given me power you should.
I shall be both beautiful an' good.
145 Look my face when cock crow,
I am very pleasing to you.
Her prophecy came to pass and the marriage consummated in bliss . . .
So she married a rapist
150 but he learnt his lesson.
May God give us young submissive husband!
You like my headtie?
It's de latest fashion.
They sell like hot cake on Victoria Island.⁸
155 Fifty pounds.
I give you discount 'cause I like your smile.
The quality is very good.
If I take off more I will not make profit an' I travel to Lagos nex' week.
160 Make it my lucky day.
Please, I beg you!

Endnotes

- Note 1: Female narrator who has been married five times in Chaucer's The Canterbury Tales; she gives rare insight into how women should navigate the institution of marriage.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Largest city in Nigeria.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: A type of cotton fabric common in African textiles.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Trope of a seductive woman leading her lover into a trap; literally "fatal woman" (French).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Countries in West Africa.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Irish brand of beer.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Reference to Jimmy Choo, a luxury brand of shoes.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: In the Hebrew Bible, the lover of Samson who is bribed to find the source of his strength. When she learns it is his hair, she orders a servant to cut Samson's hair. Delilah is associated with treacherous women.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: In the Old Testament and Hebrew Bible, a king of Israel.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Denomination of Nigerian currency.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Possible pun on "feminist" and Feminax, a pill to relieve menstrual pain.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: In Roman mythology, the goddess of love, beauty, and sexuality.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Oldest university in Nigeria.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Magazine known for nude and semi-nude photos of women.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Ghanaian fabric hand woven from lengths of colorful cotton and silk.Return to reference 6

- Note 7: Pronunciation spelling of soldier boy.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Affluent area of Lagos, Nigeria.Return to reference 8

The Doll's House

The source of the wealth that built Harewood¹ is historical fact. There is nothing anyone can do to change the past, however appalling or regrettable that past might be. What we can do, however, what we must do, is engage with that legacy and in so doing stand a chance of having a positive effect on the future.—David Lascelles²

Art is a lie that makes us realise truth.—Pablo Picasso³

5 Welcome to my house, this stately home
 where, below stairs, my father rules as chef:
 confecting, out of sugar-flesh and -bone,
 decor so fine, your tongue will treble clef singing its name. Near-sighted and tone-deaf,
 I smell-taste-touch; create each replica in my mind's tongue. My name? Angelica.

10 This is my world, the world of haute cuisine:
 high frosted ceilings, modelled on high art,
 reflected in each carpet's rich design;
 each bed, each armchair listed a la carte.
 Come, fellow connoisseur of taste, let's start below stairs, where you'll blacken your sweet tooth, sucking a beauty whittled from harsh truth . . .

15 Mind your step! The stairway's worn and steep, let your sixth senses merge in the half-light . . .
 This muted corridor leads to the deep recesses of the house. Here, to your right, my father's realm of uncurbed appetite—
 private! The whiff of strangers breaks his spell.

20 Now left, to the dead end. Stop! Can you smell cinnamon, brown heat in the afternoon of someone else's summer? This rust key unlocks the passage to my tiny room, 25 stick-cabin, sound-proofed with a symphony of cinnamon; shrine to olfactory where I withdraw to paint in cordon bleu,⁴ shape, recreate this house; in miniature

All art is imitation: I'm a sculptor of past-imperfect; hungry, I extract 30 molasses; de- and reconstruct high culture from base material; blend art and fact in every glazed and glistening artefact housed in this doll's house. Stately home of sugar.
Of Demerara⁵ cubes secured with nougat.

Look at its hall bedecked with royal icing—
the ceiling's crossbones mirrored in the frieze, the chimneypiece. The floor is sugar glazing clear as a frozen lake. My centrepiece statue of Eve, what a creative feast!
40 A crisp Pink Lady,⁶ sculpted with my teeth, its toffee glaze filming the flesh beneath.

The music room's my favourite. I make music by echoing design: the violet-rose piped ceiling is the carpet's fine mosaic 45 of granulated violet and rose, aimed to delight the eye, the tongue, the nose.
Even the tiny chairs are steeped in flavour delicate as a demisemiquaver.⁷

50 Taste, if you like, sweet as a mothertongue . . .
See how this bedroom echoes my refrain:

the chairs, the secretaire, commode, chaise longue,
four-poster bed, all carved from sugarcane;
even the curtains that adorn its frame,
55 chiselled from the bark, each lavish fold
drizzled with tiny threads of spun 'white gold'.

The library was hardest. How to forge each candied volume wafer-thin, each word burnt sugar. In the midnight hours, I'd gorge 60 on bubbling syrup, mouth its language; learned the temperature at which burnt sugar burned, turned sweet to bitter; inked a tiny passage that overflowed into a secret passage,

the Middle Passage;⁸ made definitive that muted walkway paved with sugar plate, 65 its sugar-paper walls hand-painted with hieroglyphs invisible as sweat
but speaking volumes; leading to the sweet peardrop of a stairwell down and down 70 to this same room of aromatic brown in miniature. Here, connoisseur, I've set the doll, rough hewn from sugarcane's sweet wood:

her choker, hardboiled sweets as black as jet;
her dress, molasses-rich; her features, hard.
75 This handcarved doll, with sugar in her blood—
Europe, the Caribbean, Africa;
baptised in sugar, named Angelica,

has built a tiny house in Demerara
sugar grains secured with sugarpaste, each sculpted room a microscopic mirror 80 of its old self; and below stairs, she's placed a blind doll with kaleidoscopic taste, who boils, bakes, moulds, pipes, chisels, spins and blows

sugar, her art, the only tongue she knows.

2014

Endnotes

- Note 1: Harewood House, a country house in England built in 1759 for a plantation owner and enslaver.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Eighth Earl of Harewood; worked as a film and television producer.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Major Spanish painter (1851–1973) associated with the modernist movement of Cubism.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Blue ribbon (French).Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Historical region previously a Dutch and then British colony, now part of the country of Guyana. Demerara sugar is raw sugar extracted from sugarcane and originated in the colony.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A variety of apple.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: In music, a thirty-second note.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: The stage of the transatlantic slave trade where enslaved Africans were transported from Africa to the Americas across the Atlantic Ocean.Return to reference 8

RACHEL CUSK

b. 1967

Rachel Cusk was born in Saskatoon, Canada, to affluent British parents. Her father, a Protestant, converted to Catholicism prior to marrying her mother and the Cusk children were raised Catholic. Cusk lived briefly in Canada and Los Angeles, California, before moving to Suffolk, England, in 1974. She recalls moving frequently as a child and associating relocation with her family's discomfort with emotional confrontation. Rather than address difficult feelings, they would simply change settings. Cusk attended St. Mary's, a convent boarding school in Cambridge, and studied English at New College, Oxford. She has taught Creative Writing at Kingston University.

Cusk's early novels Saving Agnes (1993), which won the Whitbread First Novel Award, The Temporary (1995), and The Country Life (1997) feature young, well-educated women as their protagonists. Each of these women shares a sense of dissatisfaction and lack of direction: they are not living up to their potential. Cusk delves into the consciousness of her characters with a satire and wit that illuminates the gap between their desire for iconoclasm and their tendency to fall back into the roles of conventional femininity. Such protagonists are vulnerable to self-delusion, and Cusk's cool, sometimes cruel, narrative voice uses their own ruminations to skewer them.

Moving between fiction and autobiography in the early 2000s, Cusk continued to explore the compromises and disappointments of the privileged classes. In the Fold (2006) and Arlington Park (2006) explore the ennui of parents, especially wives and mothers who find little reward in the mundanity of their suburban lives. In this period, Cusk also published a searing memoir about pregnancy. In A Life's Work: On Becoming a Mother (2001), she contextualizes the experience of her first pregnancy within the public culture of motherhood. She finds such a culture, with its parenting manuals, dietary guidelines, and standards of achievement, to be conformist to its core. Further, it belittles the loss of female freedom as one's body becomes the object of another's needs, expectations, and demands: "My sex has become an exiguous, long-laid, lovingly furnished trap into which I have inadvertently wandered and from which now there is no escape. I have been tagged, as if electronically, by pregnancy. My womanly movements are being closely monitored." Cusk's dissection of sex and gender opens up meditations on the buried monstrosities of motherhood and the panic that issues from its confinements.

Cusk's memoirs allude to the absence of pregnant women and struggling mothers from canonical literature and how that literary invisibility compounds the sense of erasure she felt during her own early days of motherhood. Rather than regard marriage and motherhood as essential conditions of female accomplishment, she gives written form to the negative and improper feelings that accompany them. She also admits failure in Aftermath: On Marriage and Separation (2012), which chronicled the dissolution of her first marriage and laid the groundwork for the experimental shift that would characterize her most important work to date: The Outline Trilogy.

Consisting of Outline (2014), Transit (2016), and Kudos (2018), The Outline Trilogy established Cusk as a leading writer of "autofiction," a subgenre of the novel in which the distinction between the author and the protagonist is deliberately blurred. While autobiographical novels are nothing new (as James Joyce's A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man and Sylvia Plath's The Bell Jar attest), twenty-first-century novelists associated with autofiction (for example, Sheila Heti, Karl Ove Knausgård, and Ben Lerner) have expressed doubt about the capacity of the novel to represent reality. They turn instead to a highly personal interrogation of the writing process and question the foundational components of the novel as a genre. Cusk in particular has professed her lack of interest in the components of character and plot. She regards these elements of the novel as artifices of fiction-writing rather than the necessary formal devices for creating a literary work authentic to life.

Cusk published excerpts of The Outline Trilogy in The Paris Review while completing each volume. "Freedom" is one such excerpt that shows the relationship between choice and constraint to be more complicated than a simple opposition. Set in an upscale hair salon, it features a female first-person narrator whose primary role is to observe and become a medium for others, in this case, her hair stylist, to reflect on their own lives. Such a technique serves to establish and then question the truth of perception until the ground beneath the storyteller's feet falls away. As Cusk's style reveals itself, the reader, like the narrator, observes how ordinary choices, such as the decision to color graying hair, can lead to minor constraint, and how minor constraint can portend the extraordinary need for release.

Freedom

I asked Dale whether he could try to get rid of the gray.

It was growing dark outside, and the rain against the salon's big windows looked like ink running down a page. The traffic crawled along the blackened road beyond. The cars all had their lights on. Dale was standing behind me in the mirror, lifting long, dry fistfuls of hair and then letting them fall. His eyes were moving all over my image with a devouring expression. His face was portentous, and I watched it in the glass.

"There's nothing wrong with a few sparkles," he said reproachfully.

The other stylist, who was standing behind a customer at the next chair, half closed her long sleepy lids and smiled.

"I get mine done," she said. "A lot of people do."

"We're talking about a commitment," Dale said. "You have to keep coming back every six weeks. That's a life sentence," he added darkly, his eyes meeting mine in the mirror. "I'm just saying you need to be sure."

The other stylist looked at me sidelong with her sphinxlike smile.

"A lot of people don't find that a problem," she said. "Their lives are mostly commitments anyway. At least if it makes you feel good, that's something."

Dale asked whether my hair had ever been dyed before. The dye could accumulate, apparently, and the hair become synthetic looking and dull. It was the accumulation rather than the color itself that resulted in an unnatural appearance. People bought box after box of those home dyeing kits in search of a lifelike shade, and all they were doing was making their hair look more and more like a matted wig. But that was apparently preferable to a natural touch of frost. In fact, where hair was concerned, Dale said, the fake generally seemed to be more real than the real: so long as what they saw in the mirror wasn't the product of nature, it didn't seem to matter to most people if their hair looked like a shop-front dummy's. Though he did have one client, an older lady, who wore her gray hair loose all the way to her waist. Like an elder's beard, her hair struck Dale as her wisdom: she carried herself like a queen, he said, streaming power in the form of this gray mane. He lifted my hair again in his hands, holding it aloft and then letting it drop, while we looked at each other in the mirror.

"We're talking about your natural authority," Dale said.

The woman in the next chair was reading Glamour magazine with an expressionless face, while the other stylist's fingers worked at her intricately tinsel head, painting each strand of hair and folding it into a neat foil parcel. The stylist was diligent and careful, though her client didn't once glance up to look.

The salon was a lofty, white, brilliantly lit room with white-painted floorboards and baroque, velvet-upholstered furniture. The tall mirrors had elaborately carved white-painted frames. The light came from three big branching chandeliers that hung from the ceiling and were duplicated in dazzling reflection all around the mirrored walls. It stood in a row of dingy shops and fast-food outlets and hardware stores. The big plate-glass shop front sometimes rattled when a heavy vehicle passed outside.

In the mirror, Dale's expression was unyielding. His own hair was a dark, artful mop of gray-streaked curls. He was somewhere in his mid-forties, tall and narrow, with the elegant, upright bearing of a dancer. He wore a dark, closely fitted jersey that showed the suggestion of a potbelly above his lean hips.

"It doesn't fool anyone, you know," he said. "It just makes it obvious that you've got something to hide."

I said that seemed preferable to having what you wished hidden on public display.

"Why?" Dale said. "What's so terrible about looking like what you are?"

I didn't know, I said, but it was obviously something a lot of people feared.

"You're telling me," Dale said glumly. "A lot of people," he went on, "say it's because what they see in the mirror doesn't feel like them. I say to them, Why doesn't it? I say, What you need isn't a color wash, it's a change of attitude. I think it's the pressure," Dale said. "What people are frightened of," he said, lifting the back of my hair to look underneath, "is being unwanted."

At the other end of the room, the big glass door jangled open and a boy of twelve or thirteen came in out of the darkness. He left the door standing ajar and the cold wet air and roaring noise of traffic came in great gusts into the warm, lit-up salon.

"Can you close the door, please?" Dale called in a peevish voice.

The boy stood, frozen, a panicked expression on his face. He wore no coat, only a gray school shirt and trousers. His shirt and hair were wet from the rain. A few seconds later, a woman came in after him through the open door and closed it carefully behind her. She was very tall and upright, with a large, angular face and mahogany-colored hair carefully cut in a bob that hung exactly at the square line of her jaw. Seeing her, the boy raised his hand to plaster his own hair sideways over his forehead. The woman stood for a moment, her large eyes moving around the room, and then she said to the boy:

"Go on then. Go and give them your name."

The boy looked at her with a pleading expression. His shirt was undone at the collar, and a patch of his pale, bony chest could be seen. His arms hung by his sides, the palms opened in protest.

"Go on," she said.

Dale asked whether I was ready to have my hair washed; he would go through the color charts while I was gone and see if he could find a match. Nothing too dark, he said; I'm thinking more browns and reds, something lighter. Even if it's not what you naturally are, he said, I think you'll look more real that way. He called across to the girl who was sweeping the floors that there was a customer ready to go down. She automatically stopped sweeping and leaned the broom against the wall.

"Don't leave it there," Dale said. "Someone might trip over it and hurt themselves."

Again automatically, she turned around and, retrieving the broom, stood there holding it.

"In the cupboard," Dale said wearily. "Just put it in the cupboard."

She went away and returned empty-handed, and then came to stand beside my chair. I rose and followed her down some steps to the warm, lightless alcove where the sinks were. She fastened a nylon cape around my shoulders, and then arranged a towel on the edge of the sink so that I could lean back.

"Is that all right?" she said.

The water came in a spray, with alternating passages of hot and cold. I closed my eyes, following the successions and returns, the displacement of one temperature by another and then its reinstatement: they were so different from one another, yet each was mildly uncomfortable to the same degree. The girl rubbed shampoo over my head with tentative fingers. Later she tugged a comb through the hair and I waited, as though waiting for someone to untangle a mathematical problem.

"There you are," she said finally, stepping back from the sink.

I thanked her and returned to the salon, where Dale was absorbedly mixing a paste with a small paintbrush in a pink plastic dish. The boy was now sitting in the chair next to mine, and the Glamour-reading woman had withdrawn, her hair still in its foil parcels, to the sofa by the window, where she continued to turn the pages expressionlessly one after another. Next to her sat the woman who had come in with the boy. She was tapping at the screen of her mobile phone; a book lay beside her on the seat. The other stylist was leaning with her elbow on the reception desk, a cup of coffee beside her, talking to the receptionist.

"Sammy," Dale called to her, "your client's waiting."

Sammy exchanged a few more remarks with the receptionist and then ambled back to the chair.

"So," she said, putting her hands on the boy's shoulders so that he involuntarily flinched. "What's it going to be, then?"

"Do you ever get the feeling," Dale said to me, "that if you weren't there to make things happen, it would all just go tits-up?"¹

I said it seemed to me that just as often the reverse was true: people could become more capable when the person they relied on to tell them what to do wasn't there.

"I must be doing something wrong then," Dale said. "This lot couldn't run a bath without my help."

He picked up one of a set of silver clips and fastened it to a section of my hair. The dye would need to stay in for at least half an hour, he said: he hoped I wasn't in a hurry. He took a second clip and isolated another section. I watched his face in the mirror as he worked. He took a third clip and held it between his lips while he separated one strand of hair from another.

"Actually I'm in no particular rush myself," he said presently. "My date for this evening just canceled. Luckily," he said, "as it turns out."

In the next-door chair, the boy sat staring interestedly at himself in the mirror.

"What do you fancy?" Sammy said. "Mohican?² Buzz cut?"

He gave a sort of twitch of his shoulders and looked away. He had a soft, sallow face, with a long, rounded nose that gave him a ruminative expression. A strange, secretive smile was forever playing around his plump pink mouth. Finally he murmured something, so quietly that it was inaudible.

"What's that?" Sammy said.

She bent her head down toward him but he failed to repeat it.

"Strange as it might sound," Dale was saying, "I was quite relieved. And this is a person I really like." He paused while he fastened a section of hair with a clip. "I just keep getting this feeling more and more these days"—he paused again to fasten another—"that it's more trouble than it's worth."

What was, I asked him.

"Oh, I don't know," he said, "maybe it's just an age thing. I just feel like I can't be bothered."

There had been a time, he went on, when the prospect of spending an evening alone would have terrified him, would actually have seemed so weird and immense and empty that he would have gone anywhere and done anything just to avoid it. But now he found that he'd just as soon be on his own.

"And if other people have a problem with that," he said, "like I say, I can't be bothered with them."

I watched his dark figure in the glass, the fastidiousness of his quick fingers, the concentration on his long, narrow face. Behind him, the receptionist was approaching with a phone in her hand. She tapped his shoulder and held it out to him.

"For you," she said.

"Ask them to leave a message," Dale said. "I'm with a client."

The receptionist went away again and he rolled his eyes.

"I persist in the belief that this is a creative job," he said. "But sometimes you have to wonder."

He knew quite a lot of creative people, he went on after a while. It was just a type he happened to get on with. He had one friend in particular, a plumber, who made sculptures in his spare time. These sculptures were constructed entirely from materials he used in his plumbing job: lengths of pipe, valves and washers, drains, waste traps, you name it. He had a sort of blowtorch he used to heat the metal and bend it into different shapes.

"He makes them in his garage," Dale said. "They're actually quite good. The thing is, he can only do it when he's off his trolley."³

He took a new section of hair and began to fix the clips around it.

On what, I said.

"Crystal meth," Dale said. "The rest of the time he's quite a normal bloke. But like I say, in his spare time he gets himself tanked up on crystal meth and locks himself in his garage. He says that sometimes he'll wake up on his garage floor in the morning and there'll be this thing beside him that he's made and he's got no memory at all of making it. He can't remember a thing. It must be really strange," Dale said, inserting the last clip with pincer-like fingers. "Like seeing a part of yourself that's invisible."

He liked his friends—he thought he might have given me the wrong impression earlier—though he knew plenty of people who were still carrying on at forty the way they had been at twenty-five: he actually found it slightly depressing, the spectacle of grown men frenziedly partying, still shoving things up their noses and whirling like brides on packed dance floors; personally, he had better things to do.

He straightened up and examined his work in the mirror, his fingertips resting lightly on my shoulders.

"The thing is," he said, "that kind of life—the parties, the drugs, the staying up all night—is basically repetitive. It doesn't get you anywhere and it isn't meant to, because what it represents is freedom." He picked up the pink plastic dish and stirred its contents with the paintbrush. "And to stay free," he said, coating the brush with the thick brown paste, "you have to reject change."

I asked him what he meant by that, and he stood for a moment with his eyes fixed on mine in the mirror, the paintbrush suspended in midair. Then he looked away again, taking a strand of hair and applying the paste to it with careful strokes.

"Well it's true, isn't it," he said, somewhat petulantly.

I said I wasn't sure: when people freed themselves, they usually forced change on everyone else. But it didn't necessarily follow that to stay free was to stay the same. In fact, the first thing people sometimes did with their freedom was to find another version of the thing that had imprisoned them. Not changing, in other words, deprived them of what they'd gone to such trouble to attain.

"It's a bit like a revolving door," Dale said. "You're not inside and you're not outside. You can stay in it going round and round for as long as you like, and as long as you're doing that you can call yourself free." He laid aside the strand of painted hair and began to paint a new section. "All I'm saying," he said, "is that freedom is overrated."

Next door to us, Sammy was running her fingers through the boy's dark, unruly hair, feeling its texture and its length, while his eyes looked sideways in alarm. His hands gripped the chrome armrests of his chair. She swept the hair first to one side, then the other, looking closely at him in the mirror, then picked up her comb and made a neat parting down the middle. The boy looked immediately anxious and Sammy laughed.

"I'll leave it like that, shall I?" she said, "Don't panic, only joking. It's just so that I can get it the same length on both sides. You don't want to go around with your hair all different lengths, do you?"

The boy looked away again silently.

"What's it called," Dale said, "when you have one of those bloody great blinding flashes of insight that changes the way you look at things?"

I said I wasn't sure: a few different words sprang to mind.

Dale twitched his paintbrush irritably.

"It's something to do with a road," he said.

Road to Damascus,⁴ I said.

"I had a road to Damascus moment," he said. "Last New Year's Eve, of all times. I bloody hate New Year's. That was part of it, realizing that I bloody hated New Year's Eve."

A group of them had been at his flat, he said. They were getting ready to go out, and he starting thinking about the fact that he hated it and thinking that everyone else probably hated it, too, but that no one was prepared to say so. When everyone had their coats on, he announced that he'd decided to stay at home.

"I just suddenly couldn't be bothered," he said.

Why not, I said.

For a long time he didn't reply, painting the strands of hair one after another until I thought he either hadn't heard my question or was choosing to ignore it.

"I was sitting there on my sofa," he said, "and it just suddenly happened."

He stirred the paintbrush in the dish, coating each side again carefully with the brown paste.

"It was this bloke," he said. "I didn't really know him. He was sitting there doing lines⁵ that he'd laid out all neatly for himself on the coffee table. I suddenly just felt really sorry for him. I don't know what it was about him," Dale said. "He'd lost all his hair, poor bastard."

He unclipped a new section and began to paint it. I watched the way he distributed the paste all along the strand in even strokes. He started at the root but became more meticulous the further away from it he got, as though he had learned to resist the temptation to concentrate his labors there at the beginning.

"He had this funny, pudgy little face," Dale said, pausing with his paintbrush in the air. "It must have been the combination of the baldness and the funny face that did it. I thought, That bloke looks like a baby. What's a baby doing sitting on my sofa shoving coke up his nose? And once I'd started seeing it that way, I couldn't stop. Suddenly they all started looking like that. It was a bit like being on acid," he said, dipping his paintbrush again in the dish, "if I can cast my mind back that far."

Sammy had started gingerly snipping the boy's hair with a pair of scissors.

"What sort of things are you into, then?" she asked him.

He gave a little shrug, the secretive smile on his lips.

"Football?" she said. "Or the what's it called—the Xbox.⁶ All you boys are into those, aren't you? Do you play Xbox with your friends?"

The boy shrugged again.

Everyone obviously thought he was completely mad, Dale went on, for staying at home while all of them went off clubbing. He had had to pretend he was ill. Once upon a time it would have terrified him, the prospect of spending New Year's Eve alone, but on this occasion he couldn't get rid of them fast enough. He suddenly felt he'd seen through it, seen through them all. What he'd realized in his Damascene moment was that the people in his sitting room—himself included—weren't adults: they were children in overgrown bodies.

"And I don't mean," he said, "to sound patronizing when I say that."

"My little girl's about your age," Sammy was saying to the boy in the next chair. "You're what, eleven, twelve?"

The boy did not reply.

"You look about the same age as her," Sammy said. "With her and her friends it's all makeup and boys now. You'd think they're a bit young to be starting all that, wouldn't you? But you can't stop them. The problem with girls," she went on, "is they don't have as many hobbies as boys. They don't have as many things to do. They sit around talking while the boys are out playing football. You wouldn't believe," she said, "how complicated their relationships are already. It's all that talking: if they were outside running around they wouldn't have time for all the politics." She moved around the back of his chair, still snipping. "Girls can be quite nasty, can't they?"

The boy glanced over at the woman he had come in with. She had put down her phone and was now sitting reading her book.

"That your mum?" Sammy said.

The boy nodded.

"She must find you quiet," Sammy said. "My daughter never shuts up. Can you hold your head still, please?" she added, pausing the scissors in mid-air. "I can't cut it if you keep moving your head. No," she went on, "she never stops talking, my daughter. She's yakking all day from morning to night, on the phone to her friends."

While she spoke, the boy was moving his eyes up and down and from side to side while his head remained motionless, as if he were having an eye test.

"It's all about your friends at your age, isn't it?" Sammy said.

By now it was completely dark outside. Inside the salon, all the lights were on. There was music playing, and the droning sound of passing traffic could be faintly heard from the street. There was a great bank of glass shelves against one wall where hair products stood for sale in pristine rows, and when a lorry⁷ passed too close outside, it shuddered slightly and the jars and bottles rattled in their places. The room had become a chamber of reflecting surfaces while the world outside became opaque. Everywhere you looked, there was only the reflection of what was already there. Often I had walked past the salon in the dark and had glanced in through the windows. From the darkness of the street, it was almost like a theater, with the characters moving around in the bright light of the stage.

After that episode, Dale said, he had had a period in which every time he saw someone he knew or spoke to them—and increasingly with people he didn't know, with clients or strangers in the street—he was literally plagued by this sense of them as children in adults' bodies. He saw it in their gestures and mannerisms, in their competitiveness, their anxiety, their anger and joy, most of all in their needs, both physical and emotional: even the people he knew who were in stable partnerships—relationships he had once envied for their companionship and intimacy—now looked to him like no more than best friends in the playground. For weeks he went around in a sort of fog of pity for the human race, "like some bloke from the Middle Ages wandering about in sackcloth⁸ ringing a bell." It was quite disabling, he said: some days he actually felt physically weak and could barely drag himself to the salon. People assumed he was depressed, "and maybe I was," Dale said, "but I knew I was doing something I had to do, I was going somewhere, and I wasn't going back if it bloody killed me." At the end of it, he felt empty, in the sense of minimalism, like he'd had a massive mental clear-out. Thinking back to that New Year's Eve, what he'd felt was that there had been something enormous in the room that everyone else was pretending wasn't there.

I asked him what it was.

He was squatting down behind me by now, painting the hair at the back, so I couldn't see his face. After a while he stood up, reappearing in the mirror with the plastic dish in one hand and the paintbrush in the other.

"Fear," he said. "And I thought, I'm not running away from it. I'm going to stay here until it's gone." He scrutinized the painted hair from all sides, like an artist examining a finished canvas. "It shouldn't be long now," he said. "We'll leave it to settle in for a bit."

He just had to go and make a quick call, if I would excuse him. He had his nephew staying with him at the moment; he ought to let him know that his plans for this evening had changed and that he'd be home after all.

"With any luck," Dale said, "he might even have found it in himself to cook something."

I asked where his nephew had come from, and he said Scotland.

"And not one of the trendy bits," he said. "For some reason my sister keeps herself in the arse-end of nowhere." He'd been there once or twice to visit her, and it was only forty-eight hours before he was seriously considering talking to the sheep.

The nephew was a funny fellow, Dale said: everyone had decided he was autistic or had Asperger's or whatever it is people call you these days when you're not like everyone else. He'd left school with no qualifications: when Dale went up to visit, he was unemployed and would sit throwing rocks down the hill into the quarry for amusement.

"He's changed a bit since then, fortunately. The other night he even asked me whether I'd used fresh herbs in the pasta sauce, or 'just' "—Dale made the inverted commas with his fingers—"the dried ones."

I asked how the boy had ended up coming to London, and Dale said it was after a conversation he'd had with his sister. She told him the boy had started saying things to her that were freaking her out, that he felt he was living in the wrong body or living in the wrong person or something like that.

"He doesn't say a word in months," Dale said, "and then he suddenly comes out with that. She didn't know what to make of it. She asked me what I thought it meant." He shrugged. "I'm a hairdresser," he said, "not a psychologist." He picked at a few stray strands on my head. "But obviously I had a hunch. I told him if he could pack a bag and get himself on a train, he could stay with me in London. I said to him, I'm not looking for company: I like my life just the way it is. I've got a nice flat and a nice business and I want to keep them that way. You'd have to do your share, I said, and I'm not putting someone up who doesn't work, because I'm not a bloody charity. But you'd have your freedom, I said, and London's a big place. If you can't find what you're looking for here, you won't find it anywhere. And a week later," Dale said, "the doorbell rings and there he is."

He hadn't been entirely surprised, he admitted: his sister had tipped him off a couple of days earlier, "just so I'd have time to hide anything she might not approve of." And for those two days, he did find himself having some second thoughts. He wandered around the rooms of his flat, noticing their cleanliness and order; he savored the peace of the place, his freedom to come and go as he liked, to return home after work and find it all just as he had left it. "The idea," he said, "of having someone always there, someone I had to talk to and clean up after, someone I would basically have responsibility for, because at sixteen you're really still a child and this one had never been outside a tiny Scottish village in his life: well, you get my drift," Dale said. "I thought, I must be insane, giving all this up."

I asked whether any of those fears had been realized, and he was silent for a moment. I watched him in the mirror, his arms crossed over his stomach, where the faint paunch stood out from his lean, wolflike frame.

Obviously at the beginning, he said, they'd had some moments. He had to teach his nephew to do things as he liked them done, and nobody learns in an instant: he of all people knew that, from training up novices at the salon. You need time, he said, time and consistency. But it had been two months now, and they rubbed along together quite well. The boy had found work as a trainee mechanic; he had a bit of a budding social life, and even came out clubbing with Dale on occasion.

"When I can be bothered to put away the pipe and slippers," Dale said, "and haul myself out the door. Shared life," he went on, "can never be the same as being on your own. You lose something," he said, "and I don't know if you ever get it back. One day he'll leave, and the thought has occurred to me that I'll probably miss him; that the place might feel empty, where before it felt complete. I might have given up more than I bargained for," he said. "But you can't stop people coming in," he said, "and you can't ask what's in it for you when they do."

He crossed to the reception desk to get his phone, and I looked at the boy in the chair beside me, whose wild dark hair was now cropped short. He was shooting frequent, imploring looks at his mother, who remained determinedly absorbed in her book.

"That's coming on nicely," Sammy said to me. "You going anywhere special tonight?"

I said that I wasn't, though I had to go somewhere the following evening.

"You're usually good for two or three days if he styles it properly," Sammy said. "You should be all right. Right then," she said to the boy, "let's have a look at you."

She put her hands on his shoulders and faced him in the mirror.

"What do you think?" she said.

There was no reply.

"Come on," she said, "what have you got to say for yourself?"

I saw the boy's mother glance up from her book.

"We've got a right one here," Sammy said. "A right man of mystery."

The boy's knuckles were white where they gripped the armrests of his chair. His sallow face was pale and clenched. Sammy released her hands and in an instant he had sprung to his feet and was tearing off the nylon gown that was fastened around his shoulders.

"Take it easy!" Sammy said, stepping back with her palms raised. "There's expensive equipment in here, you know."

With strange, lunging movements, the boy strode away from the chair toward the big glass door. His mother got to her feet, the book still in her hand, and watched as he yanked the door open and the black rainy street with its hissing traffic was revealed. He had pulled the handle so forcefully that the door continued to revolve all the way around on its hinges after he had let it go. It traveled farther and farther, until finally it collided heavily with the tiers of glass shelving where the hair-care products stood in their neat rows. The boy stood frozen in the open doorway, his pale face lit up, his hair as though standing on end, and watched as the bank of shelves disgorged a landslide of bottles and jars which fell and rolled with a great thundering sound out across the salon floor, and then itself collapsed in a tremendous shrieking cascade of breaking glass.

There was a moment of silence in which everyone stood absolutely still, Dale with the phone in his hand, Sammy holding the boy's discarded cape, the mother with the book clasped in her fingers; even the Glamour-reading woman finally looked up from her magazine.

"Jesus fucking Christ," Sammy said.

The boy shot out through the doorway and disappeared into the wet, black street. For a few instants, his mother stayed where she was, in the glittering field of bottles and broken glass. She wore an expression of stony dignity. She stared at Sammy, her eyes unblinking. Then she picked up her bag, carefully put her book in it, and walked out after her son, leaving the door open behind her.

2016

Endnotes

- Note 1: Fail or fall apart (slang).Return to reference 1
- Note 2: A hairstyle with the sides of the head shaved, leaving long hair down the middle of the scalp.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Crazy (British slang).Return to reference 3

- Note 4: The site of Paul's conversion to Christianity. Paul, under his birth name Saul, had been a Pharisee and persecutor of early Christians. A road-to-Damascus (Damascene) moment is one of insight or revelation.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Lines of powdered drugs for snorting.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Video game console.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Transport truck (British English).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Coarse fabric worn in the Bible to signify grief or self-punishment.Return to reference 8

KIRAN DESAI

b. 1971

Born in New Delhi to Indian parents, Kiran Desai emigrated from India to England in 1985, when she was fourteen years old, and then to the United States a year later. Her mother, Anita Desai (b. 1937), is an acclaimed fiction writer, whose own mother was a German Jew and whose father was Bengali. Kiran Desai received a B.A. from Bennington College in Vermont in 1993, before continuing to study creative writing at Hollins University in Virginia and Columbia University in New York City, where she received her M.F.A. in 1999. An Indian citizen, she emphasizes in interviews that, despite living in the United States, she sees “everything through the lens of being an Indian,” working from the “precise emotional location” of being “part of the Indian diaspora.”

Anthologizing an early story of Desai’s, Salman Rushdie hailed her work as “welcome proof that India’s encounter with the English language, far from proving abortive, continues to give birth to new children, endowed with lavish gifts.” Desai’s fiction alludes to, and builds on, Rushdie’s carnivalesque humor, magically talented children, and fusion of folktale with historical fiction; V. S. Naipaul’s bleak transnational portraits of postcolonial despair; and Gabriel García Márquez’s family dramas and magical realist plots. As a writer with a global array of influences, when Desai won the Man Booker Prize in 2006 (as well as the National Book Critics Circle Award), she celebrated literature’s boundary-traversing capacities:

Literature is located beyond flags and anthems, simple ideas of loyalty. The vocabulary of immigration, of exile, of translation, inevitably overlaps with a realization of the multiple options for reinvention, of myriad perspectives, shifting truths, telling of lies—the great big wobbliness of it all. In a world obsessed with national boundaries and belonging, as a novelist working with a form also traditionally obsessed with place, it was a journey to come to this thought, that the less structured, the multiple, may be a possible location for fiction, perhaps a more valid ethical location in general.

The work for which Desai won the Man Booker, her expansive second novel, The Inheritance of Loss (2006), interleaves and layers plots in multiple locations, spanning India, England, and the United States, tracking a variety of characters in India and the Indian diaspora who live out the disparate impact of globalization and postcolonial history on the world's rich and its poor.

Desai's comic first novel, Hullabaloo in the Guava Orchard (1998), is more firmly situated in a single locale, a small town in northern India, south of the Himalayas, although even this relatively isolated place is traversed by modernity. Part folktale, part realist short story, "The Sermon on the Guava Tree," which was published separately but later incorporated into the novel, offers a glimpse into Desai's fruitful commingling of the English language and its literatures with the author's Indian heritage. A dreamy, indolent young man, Sampath Chawla, refusing his father's proddings toward material success, has taken refuge in a guava tree. His predictably middle-class father, the cartoonish Mr. Chawla, had found him a solid job at a post office, but once Sampath is fired, he climbs to the solitude of his leafy new home. In a 1998 interview, Desai commented on the story's origins:

I started with a very small idea, really. I'd read a story in the Times of India and heard about a character from many people, a man who was a very famous hermit in India who really did climb up a tree, who lived in a tree for many, many years, until he died. He died last year, I believe. So I began to wonder what it was about someone like this who would do something as extreme as to spend his life in a tree. So it started really with that character, and then the story built up around it.

This bizarre situation takes a still stranger turn when Sampath, whose name means “wealth” or “good fortune” in Hindi, turns out to be not such a deadbeat after all, assuming unsuspected powers akin to those of an omniscient narrator. Telling his story, Desai ironically examines intergenerational and gender relations amid the small town’s social panoply. Along with memorable characterization, good-humored satire, and realism interfused with folktale, Desai builds the story through the precise use of figurative language (“the breeze ran over the foliage the way a hand runs over an animal’s dark fur to expose a silvery underside”) and comic dialogue in Indianized English (“You are the Number One most strange mother in the world”). Desai both expands and refines the array of characters, settings, plots, tropes, and themes to be found in contemporary literature in English.

The Sermon in the Guava Tree

The day that Sampath Chawla moved into a guava tree, his family—father, mother, grandmother, and sister Pinky—took up residence outside the local police station of the small town of Shahkot. They sat on the bench beneath the station's prize yellow rose creeper and waited for news. That is, the three women sat on the bench while Mr. Chawla walked around and around the building, making the policemen dizzy by shouting through every window he passed during his revolutions. If he himself were the police chief, he said, Sampath would be right this minute ensconced in his usual vegetable-like stupor among them.

"How is it you cannot find my son?" he shouted. Surely he had suffered quite enough already where Sampath was concerned. Look at how badly he had turned out! At school, he succeeded only at failing more reliably than anyone else. And then, instead of pulling up his socks and working hard at the job Mr. Chawla begged for him at the post office, he had gotten himself fired for his incompetence. "How could you do that?" his father had said. "You have done it on purpose so now you can spend all your time doing nothing." But Sampath had merely looked at him with a blank and hopeless expression. No doubt he would spend the rest of his days drooping about the house and dreaming in the tea stalls, or singing to himself in the public gardens. If they managed to find him again, that is. "You must find my son!" he shouted at the police chief.

The town made the most of the drama. Neighbors came by regularly for news, and everyone called out their support on their way back and forth from the marketplace. In some places there are people of quiet disposition and few words. But around Shahkot this was the very rare exception.

For one awful day it seemed as if Sampath had vanished forever. But the next morning the watchman of the university research forest, who had bicycled into town to bring his married sister some curd,¹ also brought the news that beyond the compound of the retired district judge a strange man had climbed a tree and not come back down. Nobody knew why. The man, he said, would answer no questions.

"If someone in this country is crazy enough to climb up a tree, you can be sure it is Sampath," said Mr. Chawla. "There is no doubting the matter."

Holding hands, the family ran together to the bus stop, their rubber slippers slapping against their heels. They caught the same bus Sampath had taken the day before, when who knows what compulsion had driven him far from his home up into the guava tree. Here, in the place where he had taken up residence, the Chawlas made their way down the crisscross of little paths leading into an old orchard that had once borne enough fruit for it to be shipped and sold in New Delhi. But the orchard had been abandoned long ago, the fruit turning sour and the branches growing into each other, and was used now only by an occasional goatherd grazing his flock.

Searching for Sampath, the family clacked about the trees and shouted up into the leaves, the three women uttering his name with mournful wails, Mr. Chawla shouting like an Army major. At last, at the far corner of the farthest guava grove, right near the crumbling wall that bordered the forest, they discovered Sampath, sitting in his tree, his legs dangling beneath him. He had been watching their efforts with some alarm.

What on earth was he to say? He imagined himself declaring, "I am happy over here." Or asking, in a surprised fashion, "But why have you come to visit me?" He could answer their accusations with a defiant "But for some people it is normal to sit in trees." Or, serene with newfound dignity, he could say, "I am adopting a simple way of life. From now on I have no relatives." However, he did not like the thought of hurting anyone's feelings.

In the end, as it happened, he said nothing at all.

"What are you doing up there?" shouted Mr. Chawla. "Get down at once!" Sampath looked sturdily into the leafy world about him, trying to steady his wildly fluttering heart. He concentrated on the way the breeze ran over the foliage the way a hand runs over an animal's dark fur to expose a silvery underside.

Pinky felt a sudden surge of embarrassment for her brother. "Get out of the tree—the whole family is being shamed," she said bitterly.

His grandmother exclaimed, "Come down, Sampath, please. You are going to fall sick up there. Look at his thin yellow face! We had better go for the doctor."

Still he was silent.

Looking at her son, Mrs. Chawla felt her girlhood come rushing back to her, engulfing her in the memory of a time when a desperation she had sometimes felt rose and surrounded her like an enormous wall. "Let him be," she said.

"Let him be!" said Mr. Chawla. "Do families allow their sons to climb up trees? You are the Number One most strange mother in the world. Your son leaves home and climbs up a tree and you say, 'Let him be.' With you as his mother no wonder he has turned out like this. How can I keep normality within this family? I take it as a full-time job and yet it defies possibility. We must formulate a plan. Only monkeys climb up trees."

Sampath clutched at the branch he was sitting on and held on tight.

Monkeys climbed trees. Beetles lived in trees. Ants crawled up and down them. Birds sat in them. People used them for fruit and firewood, and underneath them they made each other's acquaintance in the few months between the time they got married and the time the babies arrived. But for someone to travel a considerable distance just to sit in a tree was preposterous. For that person to be sitting there a few days later was more preposterous still.

In desperation, the family called upon Dr. Banerjee, from the clinic in the bazaar, and, an energetic man, he arrived at once to view his patient. He had a mustache and round glasses and a degree from the medical school in Ranchi.² "Come down!" he shouted good-humoredly. "How do you expect me to examine you while you're sitting up in a tree?"

But, oh no, Sampath was no fool. He would not climb down to be caught and—who knows!—be put into a cage and driven off to the insane asylum on Alipur Road like the madman who had interrupted the ladies' home-economics class in the university and been lured and trapped by a single sweet. So, at the family's pleading, Dr. Banerjee, who prided himself on being a good sport, hoisted himself into the tree, stethoscope and blood-pressure pump about his neck. He climbed all the way up to Sampath so he could look into his eyes and ears, check his tongue, listen to his heart, take his blood pressure, and hit his knee with an expertly aimed karatelike move of his hand. Then he climbed down and got back into the scooter rickshaw he had arrived in. "He is a crazy person," he said, beaming, the mirth of the entire situation too much for him. "Nobody except for God can do anything about that." And he disappeared back into town.

The family went to see the doctor of Tibetan medicine who had been recommended by their neighbor Lakshmiji. "A variety of cures may be prescribed," he said. "For example, medicines derived from the scorpion, the sea scorpion, the sea dragon, and the sea mouse."

"What sea mouse? There is no such thing as sea mouse!" shouted Mr. Chawla, and he dragged the family from the dark little clinic to the homeopathic and Ayurvedic doctors, and then to the naturopath who lived all the way in Kajuwala.³

Dutifully, they pounded pellets into powders, brewed teas, and counted out the homeopathic pills that looked and smelled promising but wrought none of the miraculous changes they had been assured of.

Finally, they visited the holy man who lived outside the tea stall near the deer park. "Sorry to disturb you. Our son is afflicted."

"How is he afflicted?"

"He is suffering from madness."

"Is he shouting?"

"No."

"Having fits?"

"No."

"Is he tearing his hair out?"

"No."

"Is he biting his neighbors? Biting himself? Is he sleepwalking? Does he stick out his tongue and roll his eyes? Is he rude to strangers?"

"No. He eats and sleeps and takes good care of his hair. He doesn't shout and he doesn't bite himself. He has never been rude to strangers."

"Then he is not mad."

"But he is sitting up in a tree!"

"Arrange a marriage for him. Then you can rest in peace. You will have no further problems."

It is necessary at some point for every family to acquire a daughter-in-law.⁴ This girl must come from a good family. She must have a pleasant personality—decent and not shameless and bold. This girl should keep her eyes lowered and, because she is embarrassed and shy, her head bowed, as well. Nobody wants a girl who stares people right in the face with big froggy eyes. She should be fair-complexioned, but if she is dark the dowry must include at least one of the following items: a television set, a refrigerator, a Godrej brand steel cupboard,⁵ or a motor scooter. When this girl sings, her voice must bring tears of feeling to the eyes. When she dances, people should exclaim "Wah!" in astounded pleasure. It should be made clear that she will not dance and sing after marriage and shame the family. This girl should have passed all her examinations in the first division⁶ but will listen respectfully as you lecture her on various subjects you yourself failed in secondary school. She must not stride, or kick up her legs like a horse. She must sit quietly, with knees together. She should talk just a little to show she can: one word, or maybe two after she has been coaxed and begged several times, "Just a few sentences. Just one sentence." Her mother should urge, "Eat something. Eat a laddoo.⁷ My daughter made these with her own hands." And these laddoos must not be recognizable as coming from the sweetmeat shop down the road.

She must be able to eat with knife and fork, or at least with a spoon. She should not be fat. She should be pleasantly plump, with large hips and breasts but a small waist. Talk of husband and children should so overcome her with shyness and embarrassment that she should hide her face, pink as a rosebud, in the fold of her sari. Then, if she has fulfilled all the requirements for a sound character and impressive accomplishments, if her parents have agreed to meet all the necessary financial contributions, if the fortune-tellers have decided the stars are lucky and the planets are compatible, everyone can laugh with relief and tilt her face up by the chin and say she is exactly what the family have been looking for, that she will be a daughter to their household. This, after all, is the boy's family. They're entitled to their sense of pride.

But the family could find only one prospective daughter-in-law. She was scrawny and dark. "Like a crow," Mrs. Chawla said indignantly when the first photograph was shown to them by their old neighbor Lakshmiji, who was acting as marriage broker. "You are trying to marry poor Sampath to a crow."

"He is lucky to find anyone at all," said Mr. Chawla, who had given up all hope of motor scooters and wedding parties at the Hans Raj Hotel.

The girl arrived, along with her family, on the public bus. Apart from her family, the bus was full of singing ladies and gentlemen, pilgrims returning from a trip to the Krishna temple⁸ in a neighboring town. The Chawla family watched as the bus veered off the road like a crazy beetle and moved toward them in a cloud of dust.

The bus driver had obligingly offered to drop off the family right at Sampath's orchard. A bride-to-be should not have to walk and grow dusty and be shown to disadvantage, he said sympathetically. He himself had a daughter to marry. "Yes, yes, let's take them directly to the boy," chorused the other passengers, pausing to make this decision before resuming their hymn singing.

Despite the driver's kindness and the attention she had received with the help of a handkerchief, a little spit, and a large amount of talcum powder, the girl descended from the bus looking extremely dusty. The pilgrims, curious about what might happen during this unusual encounter between prospective marriage partners, tumbled out of the bus as well, in a messy and chaotic heap. They needed a break for lunch anyway, and a little private time behind some trees. Holding the prospective bride before them like a gift, the group moved toward the guava tree.

Sampath had always had a soft corner for the lady on the label of the coconut hair-oil bottle. He had spent a rather large amount of time in consideration of her mysterious smile upon the bathroom shelf. While squatting on the mildewed wooden platform taking his bucket baths, he had conducted a series of imagined encounters with her, complete with imagined conversations and imagined quarrels and reconciliations. She would meet him wreathed in the scent of the oil, with a smile as white as the gleaming inside of a coconut. A braid of hair had travelled downward from the top of the coconut lady's head and followed the undulations of the bottle. Sampath looked down at the veiled woman standing underneath his tree, and felt hot and horrified.

"Please come down and be introduced. You have sat in the tree long enough," said Mr. Chawla. Sampath thought he might faint.

"Climb up, daughter," the girl's father urged her. "Climb up. Come on. One step. Just a step."

The devotees raised the girl's rigid, unwilling form into the tree. "Up," they urged. Slowly she began to climb. She was encased in layers of shiny material like a large, expensive toffee. The cloth billowed about her, making her look absurdly stout. Her gold slippers slipped with every step. Her sari was pulled over her head and she held the edge of it between her teeth so as to keep as much of her face modestly covered as possible. It was clear this girl would not take well to life in a tree. It seemed an eternity before she neared Sampath. She paused and looked back down for further directions. Nobody knew quite what to expect, or how she should proceed. Even Mr. Chawla was at a loss as to what should happen next.

"Touch his feet!" someone finally shouted, in a moment of inspiration.

"Yes, touch his feet," the rest of the pilgrims cried, and, extending a single timid finger like a snail peeping from its shell, she gingerly poked at Sampath's toe. Her finger was as cold as ice, and moist. Sampath leaped up in horror. In an equal state of distress, the girl let out a faint cry. Losing her balance and her gold slippers, she tumbled indecorously out of the tree, accompanied by the more robust cries of the pilgrims and her family, who rushed at her with arms outstretched. But they failed to catch her as she fell, and she landed with a dull thump upon the ground.

The signs for marriage were not auspicious.

The devotees propped her against a tree and fanned her with a leafy branch. "What am I to do with this boy?" Mr. Chawla said, throwing his hands up in the air. "Tell me what I should do. The best education. A job. A wife. The world served to him on a platter, but, oh no, none of it is good enough for him. Mister here must run and sit in a tree. He is not in the least bit thankful for all that has been done for him."

The girl began to sneeze in tiny mouselike squeals. "Stop fanning her with that dirty branch!" someone shouted. "All the dust must have gone up her nose."

"Dust or no dust, it is yet one more inauspicious sign," another onlooker said.

Pinky felt terribly scornful of this third-rate woman who had responded to such a greatly consequential moment in her life by sneezing and whimpering. She gave her a good pinch from behind, hoping to see her jump, but the girl continued to squeak and sniffle. The talcum powder slid down her face in a milky river.

"What can I do?" Mr. Chawla asked of the crowd. "What am I to do with this boy?" He was sweating despite the pleasant breeze that rotated about them, laden with the scent of earth and burgeoning vegetation.

He was the head of a family and he liked it that way.

But oh! What good was it to be the head of a family when you had a son who ran and sat in a tree? Who slipped from beneath your fingers and shamed you?

"What am I to do?" he demanded of the devotees still milling about, to show them it was not for lack of effort and concern on his behalf that Sampath had ended up in such a pitiful state. He hit his forehead with the flat of his palm, for drama has a way of overriding the embarrassment of a situation that should be privately experienced.

The ladies and gentlemen from the bus felt a little sorry for him. "Yes, yes, how shameful," they muttered. "And coming from a decent family and all. Clearly the boy has been derailed."

They stared at Sampath, watching to see how his father's distress would affect him. Surely any son, even a son like Sampath, would respond to such a moving show of emotion. Sensitive to the atmosphere of expectation beneath him, Sampath looked down into their upturned eyes. He thought of his old school and the post office and entire roomfuls of people awaiting the answer to questions he had often not even heard. He wondered how it could be that he had never felt comfortable among people. "Go on with your own lives!" he wanted to shout. "Go on, go on! Leave me to mine."

But of course he could not say any such thing. In desperation he looked around him. Among the crowd of faces down below he recognized that of Mr. Singh, the brother-in-law of a neighbor in Shahkot. Mr. Singh, whose letters he had sometimes read in idle moments in the post office, steaming them open over glasses of tea or just prying them open, the humidity in the air having rendered the gum almost entirely ineffectual. Lazily, he had perused the contents of a large quantity of letters during his time at work. In a frantic plea for help, he shouted, "Mr. Singhji!"⁹

He remembered one particular letter sent by Mr. Singh to his father.

"Is your jewelry still safely buried beneath the tulsi¹ plant?"

Mr. Singh turned pale. "How do you know about my circumstances?" he asked.

Sampath caught sight of Mrs. Chopra. "How is that lump in your throat that travels up and down your windpipe, whispering threats and almost bursting right out of your chest?"

"Hai,"² she gasped, "who told you?"

Encouraged now by his success, Sampath brightened a little. He jabbed his finger at a bald-headed man in the crowd, and said. "And you, sir, that secret oil you got from the doctor in Side Gully. Clearly it is not working. Try a good massage with mustard oil, and your hair will sprout as thick and as plentiful as grass in the Cherrapunji rain."³

The devotees drove back into Shahkot with the news. There was a man up in the guava tree, a remarkable man. He had known all sorts of things. The dacoits⁴ were blackmailing poor Mr. Singh. Ratan Sinha had been using a special hair oil to no effect. An evil spirit had established itself in Mrs. Chopra's throat.

Clearly, there was more to this post-office clerk than to ordinary mortals. In his eyes they had detected a rare spirit.

It was at this point that Mr. Chawla had a realization—all of a sudden, with a tumble and rush of understanding, a realization so quick and so incredible in nature that his heart was caught in a state of constant pounding. Sampath might make his family's fortune. They could be rich! How many hermits were secretly wealthy? How many holy men were not at all the beggars they appeared to be? How many men of unfathomable wisdom possessed unfathomable bank accounts? What an opportunity had arisen out of nowhere. Already there was a change in the way people looked at Sampath; no longer did they snigger and smirk or make sympathetic noises with their tongues. Mr. Chawla kept his thoughts to himself and didn't say a word to anyone, but, in a sudden turnabout of policy, which both surprised and pleased his wife and his mother, who were already settling into the orchard as if it were their own long-lost home, he stopped berating Sampath for having climbed up the tree, and turned his attention to other matters.

Gradually, Sampath was provided with all sorts of comforts, and the more elaborate his living arrangements the happier he was. A cot was raised up into the tree and fastened with rope. A striped umbrella donated by a friendly servant of the retired judge was positioned over Sampath's head. He made a lovely picture seated there amid the greenery, reclining on his cot at a slight angle to the world; propped against numerous cushions tucked up, during chilly evenings, in a glamorous satin quilt covered with leopard skin spots. On his head he sported a tea-cozy-like⁵ red woollen hat that had been knitted by his grandmother and raised to him on a stick. He was particularly fond of this hat, for it kept his head snug and warm at night when the breeze was chilly, and it kept the night rustlings, the crawling of little black beetles, ants, and moths, out of his ears as well.

"I'm comfortable," he announced to his family with a gesture of dismissal when he found everything to his satisfaction, leaving them for a minute bewildered, for they were yet to get used to this reversal in their relationship. How they had scolded him once upon a time for every little thing he had done. Now here he was waving at them as if he were a rajah⁶ wishing to be left alone. When they were needed again, he summoned them with shouts, starting right at dawn, when he desired his morning tea, and then a little later when he was ready for his bath, which required elaborate arrangements to be made by the family, who were, after all, willing to do quite a bit of work in this regard, for they had always been a clean family. Bucketfuls of hot water were raised to Sampath via a rope levering system designed especially for this purpose by his father.

When it came to his meals, Pinky's efforts in climbing up with bowls and dishes had ended more often in accidents than in success, with Sampath's dinner either in the grass or, worse, splattered and scalding over the poor bearer of food.

"This is absurd," said Mr. Chawla. "This isn't working." And he attached an old wooden crate to the elementary pulley system used to deliver Sampath's bathwater, and thereafter Sampath's meals were given to him simply by pulling on a rope and raising the crate. As the fluffy chapatis and puris⁷ were made down below they were proffered up to him speared atop a bamboo stick, as were slices of pickle, bits of fruit, and other tasty tidbits.

Thus ensconced in his orchard bower, Sampath gave what came to be known as the Sermon in the Guava Tree, in which he responded to people's queries with such a mysterious charm and wit that they arrived in growing numbers to see him, making their way down the narrow path to stare with amazement at this skinny, long-legged apparition amid the leaves.

Among the first to make this trip were Miss Jyotsna and Mr. Gupta, his two colleagues from the post office.

"He must have gone through a thorough and complete transformation," said Miss Jyotsna. "Look how his face is being so different now."

Certainly it was a happier, calmer face. "Namasteji,"⁸ said Sampath, greeting them cheerfully from his cot in the tree, his new position of power. Really, he thought, he was quite fond of them. They had always meant well, unlike many others he could name.

"Hello, Sampath," said Mr. Gupta. "Why did you not take me with you? I could have had a little rest from this one here." He pointed at Miss Jyotsna with a comic expression on his face.

"Any time you want a rest from her you should send her to the sari and shalwar kameez⁹ shop," said Sampath, laughing. "You know how much this lady is loving clothes. . . . Oh, but maybe that is not such a good idea. Already she owes the Ladies' Fashion Shop a hundred and fifty-two rupees and eighty paise."¹

Once when Miss Jyotsna had been summoned to the office of the head of the post office, Sampath had had the occasion to examine the contents of her purse: the lipstick and comb, the embroidered handkerchief, the receipts and safety pins, the toffees and little vials of homeopathic medicine.

Miss Jyotsna raised a trembling hand to her mouth. The blood rushed to her face. She had kept her debt to the sari shop a strict secret. What else could Sampath say about her? She had heard of the way he had stunned the devotees of the Krishna temple with his clairvoyance; now he had used his powers to examine her.

She nudged Mr. Gupta with her elbow. "Treat him with some respect," she said, surprising him with the strange new note of reverence in her voice. She was apparently awestruck by what she saw. And even the paan-shop² man, who had also come to visit, thinking that maybe he would sell a few paans while satisfying his curiosity, turned to give Mr. Gupta a dirty look, and said, "Clearly this fellow here is unversed in spiritual matters."

"But it is only Sampath," protested Mr. Gupta.

But clearly it was not only Sampath. It was Sampath of unfathomable wisdom, sitting in his tree abode.

The sweetshop man joined them after work, then two college students skipping a lecture, the washerman on his bicycle, and a pregnant lady who wished to know if her baby would be a boy or a girl. "Ah, yes," she said with satisfaction, to those standing about the tree with her, "he has the same expression as the Tajewala sage in samadhi."³ Perhaps you have seen the photographs?"

"My son is keeping bad company," interrupted a distressed but spirited relative of Lakshmiji's who was dressed in a canary-yellow sari. "What is there to do?" she asked.

"Add lemons to milk and it will grow sour," answered Sampath in an exceptionally sociable and happy temper, mimicking the old men of Shahkot, who liked to sit at their gates on winter afternoons, basking in their socks and hats, while they lectured passersby. "But add some sugar, Madam, and wah! how good that milk will taste. These are things I do not have to tell you. You yourself know you behaved just like your son when you were young."

He impressed himself by how many details he had stowed away while reading in the post office. Why, he could just pull them out of some secret compartment in his brain the way a magician pulled rabbits from a hat. How admiringly the people below the tree were looking at him! Never before had he felt the sweet and unique pleasure of giving advice which now suffused his being and spread to shine about his face.

"By this, do you mean I should remove him from the presence of these undesirable characters?" Lakshmi's relative asked.

"If you put a chicken on the fire and leave it, in a little while it will be no longer a chicken but ash and bones. Leave a kettle on the flames, the water will grow hot, and then, if someone does not lift it off, it will all boil away until there is nothing left. If your child is playing with a dead smelly mouse, you will not debate, 'Should I let him be, should I let him play.' No, straightaway you will throw away the mouse and take your child indoors to wash his hands."

Mr. Chawla and Pinky, who had just arrived from a trip to the market in time to hear this last sentence, looked at each other in disbelief when they saw how closely people listened to Sampath.

"Did you hear?" Mr. Chawla asked Pinky.

"Dead smelly mouse?" said Pinky, incredulous.

"If you do not weed," said Sampath, "your tomato plant will not flower."

Sampath's grandmother and Mrs. Chawla, flushed with pride, were already part of the crowd. They listened to every word that was being uttered, leaning forward to hear a round-faced man ask, "I am being overtaken by spiritual matters. How can I keep my mind on my responsibilities?"

"If you talk to a young girl as she stands before the mirror, it is like talking to a deaf person. And can you keep a moth from flying into the lantern by saying she should worry about her three children?"

"But are you saying I should forgo my duties to my wife and children?"

"Once my uncle had a rooster, and an insect laid its eggs in the flesh of its rear end. It knew the young ones would have a warm place to live in and plenty to eat before they were old enough to leave."

"Which is the better way to realize God? The way of devotion or the way of knowledge?"

The questions came fast and furious.

"Some people can only digest fish cooked in a light curry. Others are of a sour disposition and should not eat pickled fish. In the South they enjoy fish cooked with coconut water. I myself have a preference for pomfret in a sauce of chili and tamarind thickened with gram flour."⁴

"Where can I begin my search? What is the starting point?"

"POST-OFFICE CLERK CLIMBS TREE," Mr. Chawla read to his astounded family a little later in the week when the news had reached the local news bureau and was deemed worthy of attention. "Fleeing tedious duties at the Shahkot Post Office, a clerk has been reported to have settled in a large guava tree. According to popular speculation, he is one of an unusual spiritual nature, his childlike ways being coupled with unfathomable wisdom."

There it was—a modest column introducing Sampath to the world, along with news of a scarcity of groundnut and an epidemic of tree frogs, and the rumor that Coca-Cola might soon be arriving in India.⁵

1997

Endnotes

- Note 1: Yogurt, or coagulated milk.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Capital of the state of Jharkand, in eastern India.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Town in the Bikaner district of the northwestern Indian state of Rajasthan, on the border with Pakistan. "Ayurvedic": practicing a traditional Indian system of medicine.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: See the opening line of Pride and Prejudice (1813) by English novelist Jane Austen (1775–1817): "It is a truth universally acknowledged, that a single man in possession of a good fortune, must be in want of a wife."Return to reference 4

- Note 5: Locker or cabinet made by a large Indian company headquartered in Mumbai.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: That is, in the highest-scoring group.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: A ball-shaped, fried Indian sweet.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Hindu temple dedicated to the god Krishna, often worshiped as a god of joy and fertility.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: As a suffix attached to a name, “-ji” shows respect in many languages of the Indian subcontinent.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Species of basil cultivated by Hindus as a sacred plant.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Exclamation of grief or frustration (Hindi and Punjabi).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Of the town in eastern India near Bangladesh, subject to very heavy rainfall and believed to be the wettest place on Earth. Mustard oil is widely used in northern India for many purposes.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Robbers.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: That is, like a quilted or knitted teapot cover.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Indian prince, chief, or noble.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Round, unleavened cakes, usually fried. “Chapatis”: unleavened bread.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Hello, or welcome (Hindi).Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Outfit of loose tunic and trousers.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: One Indian rupee is equal to 100 paise (singular paisa). In 1990, 17 rupees were worth about one U.S. dollar; thus, she owes about nine dollars.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Shop selling cigarettes and paan, a preparation of betel leaf, areca nut, and lime chewed as a stimulant.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Highest state of meditation. “Tajewala”: site of a dam on the Yamuna River in northern India.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Flour made from ground chickpeas. “Pomfret”: a type of fish. “Tamarind”: sweet, acidic fruit.Return to reference 4

- Note 5: The Coca-Cola Company was forced out of India in 1977 after it refused to reveal its secret formula to the government; it was permitted to return in 1993. "Groundnut": peanut. Return to reference 5

ZADIE SMITH

b. 1975

The London-born daughter of an English father and a Jamaican mother, Zadie Smith was a product of the great postwar demographic change in Britain, the influx of Black and Asian immigrants from the empire's former colonies. Her mother had grown up in Jamaica and, like many other West Indians, settled in Britain in the 1960s. Of her mixed heritage Smith has written, "When your personal multiplicity is printed on your face, in an almost too obviously thematic manner, in your DNA, in your hair and in the neither-this-nor-that beige of your skin—well, anyone can see you come from Dream City," her tongue-in-cheek name for the space of hybridity. "It is a place of many voices, where the unified singular self is an illusion," where "everything is doubled, everything is various. You have no choice but to cross borders and speak in tongues." Springing from the experience of "personal multiplicity," Smith's fiction has vigorously crossed borders and spoken in a cacophony of tongues.

Smith grew up in what she has called "the big, colorful, working-class sea" of the Willesden area of northwest London that figures in her fiction. When she was studying English literature at the "smaller, posher pond" (her words) of Cambridge University, where she earned her B.A. in 1997, her fiction had already attracted the interest of major publishers. The result was her prize-winning first novel, White Teeth (2000). Before its publication, no work had captured with such humor and zest the multicultural jangle of different peoples, dialects, and styles in contemporary Britain. Less riotously comic, her second novel, The Autograph Man (2002), tracks the celebrity quest of a Chinese-Jewish Londoner named Alex-Li Tandem, mourning his father's death in a world made shallow by the commodification of culture, the arts, personality, and ethnicity. Her third novel, On Beauty (2005), shifts locales from London largely to the Boston environs, where Smith spent a year, and deliberately echoes English author E. M. Forster's Howards End (1910) in telling the story of two entangled families. NW (2012) returns to North West London but in a more experimental style reminiscent of the paratactic and fractured perspectives of high modernism, while Swing Time (2016) extends across London, New York, and West Africa as it explores the complicated friendship of two women who grew up in council housing in the neighborhood of Smith's youth. The Fraud (2023), set around a real-life trial in the nineteenth century, draws a multicultural cast of characters together to ask who gets the right to narrate and why some people are believed over others.

Smith became a celebrity after the publication of White Teeth and the literary face of millennial Britain. Her wisecracking humor and rapid-fire dialogue, mimicry of an array of finely distinguished dialects and accents, and vibrant characterization of people from London's South Asian, Black, and other communities offer a portrait of London finally at home with its diversity. The focus of White Teeth is less on intercultural strife than on fluid—if often bumpy—relationships across ethnic divisions. Smith has always presented a multiracial Britain as a given rather than a novelty, but after 2010 her focus shifted more explicitly to matters of class, income inequality, gentrification, and, in the aftermath of the vote to withdraw from the European Union (Brexit), British isolationism. The epigraph to NW is from a sermon by Lollard priest John Ball given during the Peasants' Revolt of 1381. While writing the novel, Smith also published a series of essays in defense of the welfare state, which despite being slowly and systematically dismantled during the Thatcher years, provided the young Smith with essential support. Smith writes: "Some people owe everything they have to the bank accounts of their parents. I owe the state. Put simply, the state educated me, fixed my leg when it was broken, and gave me a grant that enabled me to go to university. It fixed my teeth (a bit) and found housing for my veteran father in his dotage. . . . To steal another writer's title: England made me."

In "The Embassy of Cambodia" (2013), presented here, the England that enabled Smith's upward mobility is disappearing under rising rents and the replacement of public programs with private facilities, such as the health club, which offers limited guest passes to members. The protagonist Fatou is a migrant from the Ivory Coast working under exploitative conditions in a wealthy household. The unnamed narrator claims to speak for "the people of Willesden," and the story presents a meditation on the ability of neighborhood locals to sympathize with those who have experienced adversity and atrocity in faraway countries (Cambodia and Rwanda were both sites of genocide). The story is punctuated by the "pock, smash" of a shuttlecock and organized by the increasingly lopsided score of a badminton match that Fatou hears but never sees. With her characteristic irony and wit, Smith captures, in the form of a game, a world divided into haves and have nots.

The Embassy of Cambodia

O—I¹

Who would expect the Embassy of Cambodia?² Nobody. Nobody could have expected it, or be expecting it. It's a surprise, to us all. The Embassy of Cambodia!

Next door to the embassy is a health centre. On the other side, a row of private residences, most of them belonging to wealthy Arabs (or so we, the people of Willesden,³ contend). They tend to have Corinthian pillars⁴ on either side of their front doors, and—it's widely believed—swimming pools out the back. The embassy, by contrast, is not very grand. It is only a four- or five-bedroom north London suburban villa, built at some point in the 1930s, surrounded by a red-brick wall, about eight feet high. And back and forth, cresting this wall horizontally, flies a shuttlecock. They are playing badminton in the Embassy of Cambodia. Pock, smash. Pock, smash.

The only real sign that the embassy is an embassy at all is the little brass plaque on the door (which reads: 'THE EMBASSY OF CAMBODIA') and the national flag of Cambodia (we assume that's what it is—what else could it be?) flying from the red-tiled roof. Some say, 'Oh, but it has a high wall around it, and this is what signifies that it is not a private residence, like the other houses on the street, but rather an embassy.' The people who say so are foolish. Many of the private houses have high walls, quite as high as the Embassy of Cambodia—but they are not embassies.

O—2

On 6 August, Fatou walked past the embassy for the first time, on her way to a swimming pool. It is a large pool, although not quite Olympic size. To swim a mile you must complete eighty-two lengths, which, in its very tedium, often feels as much a mental exercise as a physical one. The water is kept unusually warm, to please the majority of people who patronize the health centre, the kind who come not so much to swim as to lounge poolside or rest their bodies in the sauna. Fatou has swum here five or six times now, and she is often the youngest person in the pool by several decades. Generally, the clientele are white, or else South Asian or from the Middle East, but now and then Fatou finds herself in the water with fellow Africans. When she spots these big men, paddling frantically like babies, struggling simply to stay afloat, she prides herself on her own abilities, having taught herself to swim, several years earlier, at the Carib Beach Resort, in Accra.⁵ Not in the hotel pool—no employees were allowed in the pool. No, she learned by struggling through the rough grey sea, on the other side of the resort walls. Rising and sinking, rising and sinking, on the dirty foam. No tourist ever stepped on to the beach (it was covered with trash), much less into the cold and treacherous sea. Nor did any of the other chambermaids. Only some reckless teenage boys, late at night, and Fatou, early in the morning. There is almost no way to compare swimming at Carib Beach and swimming in the health centre, warm as it is, tranquil as a bath. And, as Fatou passes the Embassy of Cambodia, on her way to the pool, over the high wall she sees a shuttlecock, passed back and forth between two unseen players. The shuttlecock floats in a wide arc softly rightwards, and is smashed back, and this happens again and again, the first player always somehow able to retrieve the smash and transform it, once more, into a gentle, floating arc. High above, the sun tries to force its way through a cloud ceiling, grey and filled with water. Pock, smash. Pock, smash.

O-3

When the Embassy of Cambodia first appeared in our midst, a few years ago, some of us said, 'Well, if we were poets perhaps we could have written some sort of an ode about this surprising appearance of the embassy.' (For embassies are usually to be found in the centre of the city. This was the first one we had seen in the suburbs.) But we are not really a poetic people. We are from Willesden. Our minds tend towards the prosaic. I doubt there is a man or woman among us, for example, who—upon passing the Embassy of Cambodia for the first time—did not immediately think: ‘genocide’.⁶

O-4

Pock, smash. Pock, smash. This summer we watched the Olympics, becoming well attuned to grunting, and to the many other human sounds associated with effort and the triumph of the will. But the players in the garden of the Embassy of Cambodia are silent. (We can’t say for sure that it is a garden—we have a limited view over the wall. It may well be a paved area, reserved for badminton.) The only sign that a game of badminton is under way at all is the motion of the shuttlecock itself, alternately being lobbed and smashed, lobbed and smashed, and always at the hour that Fatou passes on her way to the health centre to swim (just after ten in the morning on Mondays). It should be explained that it is Fatou’s employers—and not Fatou—who are the true members of this health club; they have no idea she uses their guest passes in this way. (Mr and Mrs Derawal and their three children—aged seventeen, fifteen and ten—live on the same street as the embassy, but the road is almost a mile long, with the embassy at one end and the Derawals at the other.) Fatou’s deception is possible only because on Mondays Mr Derawal drives to Eltham⁷ to visit his mini-market there, and Mrs Derawal works the counter in the family’s second mini-mart, in Kensal Rise.⁸ In the slim drawer of a faux-Louis XVI console,⁹ in the entrance hall of the Derawals’ primary residence, one can find a stockpile of guest passes. Nobody besides Fatou seems to remember that they are there.

Since 6 August (the first occasion on which she noticed the badminton), Fatou has made a point of pausing by the bus stop opposite the embassy for five or ten minutes before she goes in to swim, idle minutes she can hardly afford (Mrs Derawal returns to the house at lunchtime) and yet seems unable to forgo. Such is the strangely compelling aura of the embassy. Usually, Fatou gains nothing from this waiting and observing, but on a few occasions she has seen people arrive at the embassy and watched as they are buzzed through the gate. Young white people carrying rucksacks.¹ Often they are scruffy, and wearing sandals, despite the cool weather. None of the visitors so far have been visibly Cambodian. These young people are likely looking for visas. They are buzzed in and then pass through the gate, although Fatou would really have to stand on top of the bus stop to get a view of whoever it is that lets them in. What she can say with certainty is that these occasional arrivals have absolutely no effect on the badminton, which continues in its steady pattern, first gentle, then fast, first soft and high, then hard and low.

O-5

On 20 August, long after the Olympians had returned to their respective countries, Fatou noticed that a basketball hoop had appeared in the far corner of the garden, its net of synthetic white rope rising high enough to be seen over the wall. But no basketball was ever played—at least not when Fatou was passing. The following week it had been moved closer to Fatou's side of the wall. (It must be a mobile hoop, on casters.) Fatou waited a week, two weeks, but still no basketball game replaced the badminton, which carried on as before.

O-6

When I say that we were surprised by the appearance of the Embassy of Cambodia, I don't mean to suggest that the embassy is in any way unique in its peculiarity. In fact, this long, wide street is notable for a number of curious buildings, in the context of which the Embassy of Cambodia does not seem especially strange. There is a mansion called GARYLAND, with something else in Arabic engraved below GARYLAND, and both the English and the Arabic text are inlaid in pink-and-green marble pillars that bookend a gigantic fence, far higher than the embassy's, better suited to a fortress. Dramatic golden gates open automatically to let vehicles in and out. At any one time, GARYLAND has five to seven cars parked in its driveway.

There is a house with a huge pink elephant on the doorstep, apparently made of mosaic tiles.

There is a Catholic nunnery with a single red Ford Focus parked in front. There is a Sikh institute. There is a faux-Tudor² house with a pool that Mickey Rooney³ rented for a season, while he was performing in the West End fifteen summers ago. That house sits opposite a dingy retirement home, where one sometimes sees distressed souls, barely covered by their dressing gowns, standing on their tiny balconies, staring into the tops of the chestnut trees.

So we are hardly strangers to curious buildings, here in Willesden and Brondesbury.⁴ And yet still we find the Embassy of Cambodia a little surprising. It is not the right sort of surprise, somehow.

O-7

In a discarded *Metro*⁵ found on the floor of the Derawal kitchen, Fatou read with interest a story about a Sudanese⁶ 'slave' living in a rich man's house in London. It was not the first time that Fatou had wondered if she herself was a slave, but this story, brief as it was, confirmed in her own mind that she was not. After all, it was her father, and not a kidnapper, who had taken her from Ivory Coast⁷ to Ghana, and when they reached Accra they had both found employment in the same hotel. Two years later, when she was eighteen, it was her father again who had organized her difficult passage to Libya⁸ and then on to Italy⁹—a not insignificant financial sacrifice on his part. Also, Fatou could read English—and speak a little Italian—and this girl in the paper could not read or speak anything except the language of her tribe. And nobody beat Fatou, although Mrs Derawal had twice slapped her in the face, and the two older children spoke to her with no respect at all and thanked her for nothing. (Sometimes she heard her name used as a term of abuse between them. 'You're as black as Fatou.' Or 'You're as stupid as Fatou.’) On the other hand, just like the girl in the newspaper, she had not seen her passport with her own eyes since she arrived at the Derawals’, and she had been told from the start that her wages were to be retained by the Derawals to pay for the food and water and heat she would require during her stay, as well as to cover the rent for the room she slept in. In the final analysis, however, Fatou was not confined to the house. She had an Oyster Card,¹ given to her by the Derawals, and was trusted to do the food shopping and other outside tasks, for which she was given cash and told to return with change and receipts for everything. If she did not go out in the evenings that was only because she had no money with which to go out, and anyway knew very few people in London. Whereas the girl in the paper was not allowed to leave her employers’ premises, not ever—she was a prisoner.

On Sunday mornings, for example, Fatou regularly left the house, to meet her church friend Andrew Okonkwo at the 98 bus stop and go with him to worship at the Sacred Heart of Jesus, just off the Kilburn High Road. Afterwards Andrew always took her to a Tunisian² café, where they had coffee and cake, which Andrew, who worked as a night guard in the City, always paid for. And on Mondays Fatou swam. In very warm water, and thankful for the semi-darkness in which the health club, for some reason, kept its clientele, as if the place were a nightclub, or a midnight Mass. The darkness helped disguise the fact that her swimming costume was in fact a sturdy black bra and a pair of plain black cotton knickers. No, on balance she did not think she was a slave.

O—8

The woman exiting the Embassy of Cambodia did not look especially like a New Person or an Old Person³—neither clearly of the city nor the country—and of course it is a long time since this division meant anything in Cambodia. Nor did these terms mean anything to Fatou, who was curious only to catch her first sighting of a possible Cambodian anywhere near the Embassy of Cambodia. She was particularly interested in the woman's clothes, which were precise and utilitarian—a grey shirt tucked tightly into a pair of tan slacks, a blue mackintosh,⁴ a droopy rain hat—just as if she were a man, or no different from a man. Her straight black hair was cut short. She had in her hands many bags from Sainsbury's,⁵ and this Fatou found a little mysterious: where was she taking all that shopping? It also surprised her that the woman from the Embassy of Cambodia should shop in the same Willesden branch of Sainsbury's where Fatou shopped for the Derawals. She had an idea that Oriental people had their own, secret establishments and shopped there. (She believed the Jews did, too.) She both admired and slightly resented this self-reliance, but had no doubt that it was the secret to holding great power, as a people. For example, when the Chinese had come to Fatou's village to take over the mine, an abiding local mystery had been: what did they eat and where did they eat it? They certainly did not buy food in the market, or from the Lebanese⁶ traders along the main road. They made their own arrangements. (Whether back home or here, the key to surviving as a people, in Fatou's opinion, was to make your own arrangements.)

But, looking again at the bags the Cambodian woman carried, Fatou wondered whether they weren't in fact very old bags—hadn't their design changed? The more she looked at them the more convinced she became that they contained not food but clothes or something else again, the outline of each bag being a little too rounded and smooth. Maybe she was simply taking out the rubbish. Fatou stood at the bus stop and watched until the Cambodian woman reached the corner, crossed and turned left towards the high road. Meanwhile, back at the embassy the badminton continued to be played, though with a little more effort now because of a wayward wind. At one point it seemed to Fatou that the next lob would blow southwards, sending the shuttlecock over the wall to land lightly in her own hands. Instead the other player, with his vicious reliability (Fatou had long ago decided that both players were men), caught the shuttlecock as it began to drift and sent it back to his opponent—another deathly, downward smash.

O—9

No doubt there are those who will be critical of the narrow, essentially local scope of Fatou's interest in the Cambodian woman from the Embassy of Cambodia, but we, the people of Willesden, have some sympathy with her attitude. The fact is if we followed the history of every little country in this world—in its dramatic as well as its quiet times—we would have no space left in which to live our own lives or to apply ourselves to our necessary tasks, never mind indulge in occasional pleasures, like swimming. Surely there is something to be said for drawing a circle around our attention and remaining within that circle. But how large should this circle be?

O—10

It was the Sunday after Fatou saw the Cambodian that she decided to put a version of this question to Andrew, as they sat in the Tunisian café eating two large fingers of dough stuffed with cream and custard and topped with a strip of chocolate icing. Specifically, she began a conversation with Andrew about the Holocaust,⁷ as Andrew was the only person she had found in London with whom she could have these deep conversations, partly because he was patient and sympathetic to her, but also because he was an educated person, presently studying for a part-time business degree at the College of North West London. With his student card he had been given free, twenty-four-hour access to the Internet.

'But more people died in Rwanda,'⁸ Fatou argued. 'And nobody speaks about that! Nobody!'

'Yes, I think that's true,' Andrew conceded, and put the first of four sugars in his coffee. 'I have to check. But, yes, millions and millions. They hide the true numbers, but you can see them online. There's always a lot of hiding; it's the same all over. It's like this bureaucratic Nigerian⁹ government—they are the greatest at numerology, hiding figures, changing them to suit their purposes. I have a name for it: I call it "demonology". Not "numerology"—"demonology".'

'Yes, but what I am saying is like this,' Fatou pressed, wary of the conversation's drifting back, as it usually did, to the financial corruption of the Nigerian government. 'Are we born to suffer? Sometimes I think we were born to suffer more than all the rest.'

Andrew pushed his professorial glasses up his nose. 'But, Fatou, you're forgetting the most important thing. Who cried most for Jesus? His mother. Who cries most for you? Your father. It's very logical, when you break it down. The Jews cry for the Jews. The Russians cry for the Russians. We cry for Africa, because we are Africans, and, even then, I'm sorry, Fatou'—Andrew's chubby face creased up in a smile—'if Nigeria plays Ivory Coast and we beat you into the ground, I'm laughing, man! I can't lie. I'm celebrating. Stomp! Stomp!'

He did a little dance with his upper body, and Fatou tried, not for the first time, to imagine what he might be like as a husband, but could see only herself as the wife, and Andrew as a teenage son of hers, bright and helpful, to be sure, but a son all the same—though in reality he was three years older than she. Surely it was wrong to find his baby fat and struggling moustache so off-putting. Here was a good man! She knew that he cared for her, was clean and had given his life to Christ. Still, some part of her rebelled against him, some unholy part.

'Hush your mouth,' she said; trying to sound more playful than disgusted, and was relieved when he stopped jiggling and laid both his hands on the table, his face suddenly quite solemn.

'Believe me, that's a natural law, Fatou, pure and simple. Only God cries for us all, because we are all his children. It's very, very logical. You just have to think about it for a moment.'

Fatou sighed, and spooned some coffee foam into her mouth. 'But I still think we have more pain. I've seen it myself. Chinese people have never been slaves. They are always protected from the worst.'

Andrew took off his glasses and rubbed them on the end of his shirt. Fatou could tell that he was preparing to lay knowledge upon her.

'Fatou, think about it for a moment, please: what about Hiroshima?'¹

It was a name Fatou had heard before, but sometimes Andrew's superior knowledge made her nervous. She would find herself struggling to remember even the things she had believed she already knew.

'The big wave . . .' she began, uncertainly—it was the wrong answer. He laughed mightily and shook his head at her.

'No, man! Big bomb. Biggest bomb in the world, made by the USA, of course. They killed five million people in one second. Can you imagine that? You think just because your eyes are like this'—he tugged the skin at both temples—'you're always protected? Think again. This bomb, even if it didn't blow you up, a week later it melted the skin off your bones.'

Fatou realized she had heard this story before, or some version of it. But she felt the same vague impatience with it as she did with all accounts of suffering in the distant past. For what could be done about the suffering of the distant past?

'OK,' she said. 'Maybe all people have their hard times, in the past of history, but I still say—'

'Here is a counterpoint,' Andrew said, reaching out and gripping her shoulder. 'Let me ask you, Fatou, seriously, think about this. I'm sorry to interrupt you, but I have thought a lot about this and I want to pass it on to you, because I know you care about things seriously, not like these people—' He waved a hand at the assortment of cake eaters at other tables. 'You're not like the other girls I know, just thinking about the club and their hair. you're a person who thinks. I told you before, anything you want to know about, ask me—I'll look it up, I'll do the research. I have access. Then I'll bring it to you.'

'You're a very good friend to me, Andrew, I know that.'

'Listen, we are friends to each other. In this world you need friends. But, Fatou, listen to my question. It's a counterpoint to what you have been saying. Tell me, why would God choose us especially for suffering when we, above all others, praise his name? Africa is the fastest-growing Christian continent! Just think about it for a minute! It doesn't even make sense!'

'But it's not him,' Fatou said quietly, looking over Andrew's shoulder to the rain beating on the window. 'It's the Devil.'

O-11

Andrew and Fatou sat in the Tunisian coffee shop, waiting for it to stop raining, but it did not stop raining and at three p.m. Fatou said she would just have to get wet. She shared Andrew's umbrella as far as the Overground,² letting him pull her into his clammy, high-smelling body as they walked. At Brondesbury station Andrew had to get the train, and so they said goodbye. Several times he tried to press his umbrella on her, but Fatou knew the walk from Acton Central to Andrew's bedsit was long and she refused to let him suffer on her account.

'Big woman. Won't let anybody protect you.'

'Rain doesn't scare me.'

Fatou took from her pocket a swimming cap she had found on the floor of the health club changing room. She wound her plaits into a bun and pulled the cap over her head.

'That's a very original idea,' Andrew said, laughing. 'You should market that! Make your first million!'

'Peace be with you,' Fatou said, and kissed him chastely on the cheek.

Andrew did the same, lingering a little longer with his kiss than was necessary.

O-12

By the time Fatou reached the Derawals' only her hair was dry, but before going to get changed she rushed to the kitchen to take the lamb out of the freezer, though it was pointless—there were not enough hours before dinner—and then upstairs to collect the dirty clothes from the matching wicker baskets in four different bedrooms.

There was no one in the master bedroom, or in Faizul's or Julie's. Downstairs a television was blaring. Entering Asma's room, hearing nothing, assuming it empty, Fatou headed straight for the laundry basket in the corner. As she opened the lid she felt a hand hit her hard on the back: she turned around.

There was the youngest, Asma, in front of her, her mouth open like a trout fish. Before Fatou could understand, Asma punched the huge pile of clothes out of her hands. Fatou stooped to retrieve them. While she was kneeling on the floor, another strike came, a kick to her arm. She left the clothes where they were and got up, frightened by her own anger. But when she looked at Asma now she saw the girl gesturing frantically at her own throat, then putting her hands together in prayer and then back to her throat once more. Her eyes were bulging. She veered suddenly to the right; she threw herself over the back of a chair. When she turned back to Fatou her face was grey and Fatou understood finally and ran to her, grabbed her round her waist and pulled upwards as she had been taught in the hotel. A marble—with an iridescent ribbon of blue at its centre, like a wave—flew from the child's mouth and landed wetly in the carpet's plush.

Asma wept and drew in frantic gulps of air. Fatou gave her a hug, and worried when the clothes would get done. Together they went down to the den, where the rest of the family was watching *Britain's Got Talent*³ on a flat-screen TV attached to the wall. Everybody stood at the sight of Asma's wild weeping. Mr Derawal paused the Sky⁴ box. Fatou explained about the marble.

'How many times I tell you not to put things in your mouth?' Mr Derawal asked, and Mrs Derawal said something in their language—Fatou heard the name of their God—and pulled Asma on to the sofa and stroked her daughter's silky black hair.

'I couldn't breathe, man! I couldn't call nobody,' Asma cried. 'I was gonna die!'

'What you putting marbles in your mouth for anyway, you idiot?' Faizul said, and unpaused the Sky box. 'What kind of chief puts a marble in her mouth? Idiot. Bet you was bricking it.'⁵

'Oi, she saved your life,' said Julie, the eldest child, whom Fatou generally liked the least. 'Fatou saved your life. That's deep.'

'I woulda just done this,' Faizul said, and performed an especially dramatic Heimlich to his own skinny body. 'And if that didn't work I woulda just start pounding myself karate style, bam bam bam bam bam—'

'Faizul!' Mr Derawal shouted, and then turned stiffly to Fatou, and spoke not to her, exactly, but to a point somewhere between her elbow and the sunburst mirror behind her head. 'Thank you, Fatou. It's lucky you were there.'

Fatou nodded and went to leave, but at the doorway to the den Mrs Derawal asked her if the lamb had defrosted and Fatou had to confess that she had only just taken it out. Mrs Derawal said something sharply in her language. Fatou waited for something further, but Mr Derawal only smiled awkwardly at her, and nodded as a sign that she could go now. Fatou went upstairs to collect the clothes.

O-13

'To keep you is no benefit. To destroy you is no loss' was one of the mottoes of the Khmer Rouge. It referred to the New People, those city dwellers who could not be made to give up city life and work on a farm. By returning everybody back to the land, the regime hoped to create a society of Old People—that is to say, of agrarian peasants. When a New Person was relocated from the city to the country, it was vital not to show weakness in the fields. Vulnerability was punishable by death.

In Willesden, we are almost all New People, though some of us, like Fatou, were, until quite recently, Old People, working the land in our various countries of origin. Of the Old and New People of Willesden I speak; I have been chosen to speak for them, though they did not choose me and must wonder what gives me the right. I could say, 'Because I was born at the crossroads of Willesden, Kilburn and Queen's Park!' But the reply would be swift and damning: 'Oh, don't be foolish, many people were born right there; it doesn't mean anything at all. We are not one people and no one can speak for us. It's all a lot of nonsense. We see you standing on the balcony, overlooking the Embassy of Cambodia, in your dressing gown, staring into the chestnut trees, looking gormless.⁶ The real reason you speak in this way is because you can't think of anything better to do.'

O-14

On Monday, Fatou went swimming. She paused to watch the badminton. She thought that the arm that delivered the smashes must make a movement similar to the one she made in the pool, with her clumsy yet effective front crawl. She entered the health centre and gave a guest pass to the girl behind the desk. In the dimly lit changing room, she put on her sturdy black underwear. As she swam, she thought of Carib Beach. Her father serving snapper to the guests on the deck, his bow tie always a little askew, the ugly tourists, the whole scene there. Of course, it was not surprising in the least to see old white men from Germany with beautiful local girls on their laps, but she would never forget the two old white women from England—red women, really, thanks to the sun—each of them as big as two women put together, with Kweku and Osai lying by their sides, the boys hooking their scrawny black bird-arms round the women's massive red shoulders, and dancing with them in the hotel 'ballroom', answering to the names Michael and David, and disappearing into the women's cabins at night. She had known the boys' real girlfriends; they were chambermaids like Fatou. Sometimes they cleaned the rooms where Kweku and Osai spent the night with the English women. And the girls themselves had 'boyfriends' among the guests. It was not a holy place, that hotel. And the pool was shaped like a kidney bean: nobody could really swim in it, or showed any sign of wanting to. Mostly, they stood in it and drank cocktails. Sometimes they even had their burgers delivered to the pool. Fatou hated to watch her father crouching to hand a burger to a man waist-high in water.

The only good thing that happened in Carib Beach was this: once a month, on a Sunday, the congregation of a local church poured out of a coach at the front gates, lined up fully dressed in the courtyard and then walked into the pool for a mass baptism. The tourists were never warned, and Fatou never understood why the congregants were allowed to do it. But she loved to watch their white shirts bloat and spread across the surface of the water, and to hear the weeping and singing. At the time—though she was not then a member of that church, or of any church except the one in her heart—she had felt that this baptism was for her, too, and that it kept her safe, and that this was somehow the reason she did not become one of the ‘girls’ at the Carib Beach Resort. In almost two years—between her father’s efforts and the grace of an unseen and unacknowledged God—she did her work, and swam Sunday mornings at the crack of dawn, and got along all right. But the Devil was waiting.

She had only a month left in Accra when she entered a bedroom to clean it one morning and heard the door shut softly behind her before she could put a hand to it. He came, this time, in Russian form. Afterwards, he cried and begged her not to tell anyone: his wife had gone to see the Cape Coast Castle⁷ and they were leaving the following morning. Fatou listened to his blubbing and realized that he thought the hotel would punish him for his action, or that the police would be called. That was when she knew that the Devil was stupid as well as evil. She spat in his face and left. Thinking about the Devil now made her swimming fast and angry, and for a while she easily lapped the young white man in the lane next to hers, the faster lane.

O—15

‘Don’t give the Devil your anger, it is his food,’ Andrew said to her, when they first met, a year ago. He handed her a leaflet as she sat eating a sandwich on a bench in Kilburn Park. ‘Don’t make it so easy for him.’ Without being invited, he took the seat next to hers and began going through the text of his leaflet. It was printed to look like a newspaper, and he started with the headline: ‘WHY IS THERE

PAIN?’ She liked him. They began a theological conversation. It continued in the Tunisian café, and every Sunday for several months. A lot of the things he said she had heard before from other people, and they did not succeed in changing her attitude. In the end, it was one thing that he said to her that really made the difference. It was after she’d told him this story:

‘One day, at the hotel, I heard a commotion on the beach. It was early morning. I went out and I saw nine children washed up dead on the beach. Ten or eleven years old, boys and girls. They had gone into the water, but they didn’t know how to swim. Some people were crying, maybe two people. Everyone else just shook their heads and carried on walking to where they were going. After a long time, the police came. The bodies were taken away. People said, “Well, they are with God now.” Everybody carried on like before. I went back to work. The next year I was in Rome. I saw a boy who was about fifteen years old knocked down on his bike. He was dead. People were screaming and crying in the street. Everybody crying. They were not his family. They were only strangers. The next day, it was in the paper.’

And Andrew replied, ‘A tap runs fast the first time you switch it on.’

O—16

Twenty more laps. Fatou tried to think of the last time she had cried. It was in Rome, but it wasn’t for the boy on the bike. She was cleaning toilets in a Catholic girls’ school. She did not know Jesus then, so it made no difference what kind of school it was—she only knew she was cleaning toilets. At midday, she had a fifteen-minute break. She would go to the little walled garden across the road to smoke a cigarette. One day, she was sitting on a bench near a fountain and spotted something odd in the bushes. A tin of green paint. A gold spray can. A Statue of Liberty costume. An identity card with the name Rajib Devanga. One shoe. An empty wallet. A plastic tub with a slit cut in the top meant for coins and euro notes—empty. A little stain of what looked like blood on this tub. Until that point, she had been envious of the Bengali boys on Via Nazionale.⁸ She felt that she, too, could paint herself green and stand still for an hour. But when she tried to find out more the Bengalis would not talk to her. It was a closed shop, for brown men only. Her place was in the toilet stalls. She thought those men had it easy. Then she saw that little sad pile of belongings in the bush and cried; for herself or for Rajib, she wasn't sure.

Now she turned on to her back in the water for the final two laps, relaxed her arms and kicked her feet out like a frog. Water made her think of more water. 'When you're baptized in our church, all sin is wiped, you start again': Andrew's promise. She had never told Andrew of the sin precisely, but she knew that he knew she was not a virgin. The day she finally became a Catholic, 6 February 2011, Andrew had taken her, hair still wet, to the Tunisian café and asked her how it felt.

She was joyful! She said, 'I feel like a new person!'

But happiness like that is hard to hold on to. Back at work the next day, picking Julie's dirty underwear up off the floor inches from the wicker basket, she had to keep reminding herself of her new relationship with Jesus and how it changed everything. Didn't it change everything? The following Sunday she expressed some of her doubt, cautiously, to Andrew.

'But did you think you'd never feel sad again? Never angry or tired or just pissed off—sorry about my language. Come on, Fatou! Wise up, man!'

Was it wrong to hope to be happy?

O—17

Lost to these watery thoughts, Fatou got home a little later than usual and was through the door only minutes before Mrs Derawal.

'How is Asma?' Fatou asked. She had heard the girl cry out in the night.

'My goodness, it was just a little marble,' Mrs Derawal said, and Fatou realized that it was not in her imagination: since Sunday night, neither of the adult Derawals had been able to look her in the eye. 'What a fuss everybody is making. I have a list for you—it's on the table.'

O-18

Fatou watched Andrew pick his way through the tables in the Tunisian café, holding a tray with a pair of mochas on it and some croissants. He hit the elbow of one man with his backside and then trailed the belt of his long, silly leather coat through the lunch of another, apologizing as he went. You could not say he was an elegant man. But he was generous, he was thoughtful. She stood up to push a teetering croissant back on to its plate. They sat down at the same time, and smiled at each other.

'A while ago you asked me about Cambodia,' Andrew said. 'Well, it's a very interesting case.' He tapped the frame of his glasses. 'If you even wore a pair of these? They would kill you. Glasses meant you thought too much. They had very primitive ideas. They were enemies of logic and progress. They wanted everybody to go back to the country and live like simple people.'

'But sometimes it's true that things are simpler in the country.'

'In some ways. I don't really know. I've never lived in the country.'

I don't really know. It was good to hear him say that! It was a good sign. She smiled cheekily at him. 'People are less sinful in the country,' she said, but he did not seem to see she was flirting with him, and began upon another lecture.

'That's true. But you can't force people to live in the country. That's what I call a Big Man Policy. I invented this phrase for my dissertation. We know all about Big Man Policies⁹ in Nigeria. They come from the top and they crush you. There's always somebody who wants to be the Big Man, and take everything for themselves, and tell everybody how to think and what to do. When, actually, it's he who is weak. But if the Big Men see that you see that they are weak they have no choice but to destroy you. That is the real tragedy.'

Fatou sighed. 'I never met a man who didn't want to tell everybody how to think and what to do,' she said.

Andrew laughed. 'Fatou, you include me? Are you a feminist now, too?'

Fatou brought her mug up to her lips and looked penetratingly at Andrew. There were good and bad kinds of weakness in men, and she had come to the conclusion that the key was to know which kind you were dealing with.

'Andrew,' she said, putting her hand on his, 'would you like to come swimming with me?'

O-19

Because Fatou believed that the Derawals' neighbours had been instructed to spy on her, she would not let Andrew come to the house to pick her up on Monday, instead leaving as she always did, just before ten, carrying misleading Sainsbury's bags and walking towards the health centre. She spotted him from a long way off—the road was so straight and he had arrived early. He stood shivering in the drizzle. She felt sorry, but also a little prideful: it was the prospect of seeing her body that had raised this big man from his bed. Still, it was a sacrifice, she knew, for her friend to come out to meet her on a weekday morning. He worked all night long and kept the daytime for sleeping. She watched him waving at her from their agreed meeting spot, just on the corner, in front of the Embassy of Cambodia. After a while, he stopped waving—because she was still so far away—and then, a little later, he began waving again. She waved back, and when she finally reached him they surprised each other by holding hands. 'I'm an excellent badminton player,' Andrew said, as they passed the Embassy of Cambodia. 'I would make you weep for mercy! Next time, instead of swimming we should play badminton somewhere.' Next time, we should go to Paris. Next time, we should go to the moon. He was a dreamer. But there are worse things, Fatou thought, than being a dreamer.

'So you're a guest and this is your guest?' the girl behind the desk asked.

'I am a guest and this is another guest,' Fatou replied.

'Yeah . . . that's not really how it works?'

'Please,' Fatou said. 'We've come from a long way.'

'I appreciate that,' the girl said. 'But I really shouldn't let you in, to be honest.'

'Please,' Fatou said again. She could think of no other argument.

The girl took out a pen and made a mark on Fatou's guest pass.

'This one time. Don't tell no one I did this, please. One time only! I'll need to cross off two separate visits.'

For one time only, then, Andrew and Fatou approached the changing rooms together and parted at the doors that led to the men's and the women's. In her changing room, Fatou got ready with lightning speed. Yet somehow he was already there on a lounge when she came out, eyes trained on the women's changing-room door, waiting for her to emerge.

'Man, this is the life!' he said, putting his arms behind his head.

'Are you getting in?' Fatou asked, and tried to place her hands, casually, in front of her groin.

'Not yet, man, I'm just taking it all in, taking it all in. You go in. I'll come in a moment.'

Fatou climbed down the steps and began to swim. Not elegant, not especially fast, but consistent and determined. Every now and then she would angle her head to try to see if Andrew was still on his chair, smiling to himself. After twenty laps, she swam to where he lay and put her elbows on the tiles.

'You're not coming in? It's so warm. Like a bath.'

'Sure, sure,' he said. 'I'll try it.'

As he sat up his stomach folded in on itself, and Fatou wondered whether he had spent all that time on the lounge to avoid her seeing its precise bulk and wobble. He came towards the stairs;

Fatou held out a hand to him, but he pushed it away. He made his way down and stood in the shallow end, splashing water over his shoulders like a prince fanning himself, and then crouching down into it.

'It is warm! Very nice. This is the life, man! You go, swim—I'll follow you.'

Fatou kicked off, creating so much splash she heard someone in the adjacent lane complain. At the wall, she turned and looked for Andrew. His method, such as it was, involved dipping deep under the water and hanging there like a hippo, then batting his arms till he crested for air, and then diving down again and hanging. It was a lot of energy to expend on a short distance, and by the time he reached the wall he was panting like a maniac. His eyes—he had no goggles—were painfully red.

'It's OK,' Fatou said, trying to take his hand again. 'If you let me, I'll show you how.' But he shrugged her off and rubbed at his eyes.

'There's too much bloody chlorine in this pool.'

'You want to leave?'

Andrew turned back to look at Fatou. His eyes were streaming. He looked, to Fatou, like a little boy trying to disguise the fact he had been crying. But then he held her hand, under the water.

'No. I'm just going to take it easy right here.'

'OK,' Fatou said.

'You swim. You're good. You swim.'

'OK,' Fatou said, and set off, and she found that each lap was more distracted and rhythmless than the last. She was not used to being watched while she swam. Ten laps later, she suddenly stood up halfway down the lane and walked the rest of the distance to the wall.

'You want to go in the Jacuzzi?' she asked him, pointing to it.

In the hot tub sat a woman dressed in a soaking tracksuit, her head covered with a headscarf. A man next to the woman, perhaps her husband, stared at Fatou and said something to the woman. He was so hairy he was almost as covered as she was. Together they rose up out of the water and left. He was wearing the tiniest of Speedos, the kind Fatou had feared Andrew might wear, and was grateful he had not. Andrew's shorts were perfectly nice, knee-length, red and solid, and looked good against his skin.

'No,' Andrew said. 'It's great just to be here with you, watching the world go by.'

O-21

That same evening, Fatou was fired. Not for the guest passes—the Derawals never found out how many miles Fatou had travelled on their membership. In fact, it was hard for Fatou to understand exactly why she was being fired, as Mrs Derawal herself did not seem able to explain it very precisely.

'What you don't understand is that we have no need for a nanny,' she said, standing in the doorway of Fatou's room—there was not really enough space in there for two people to stand without one of them being practically on the bed. 'The children are grown. We need a housekeeper, one who cleans properly. These days you care more about the children than the cleaning,' Mrs Derawal added, though Fatou had never cared for the children, not even slightly. 'And that is of no use to us.'

Fatou said nothing. She was thinking that she did not have a proper suitcase and would have to take her things from Mrs Derawal's house in plastic bags.

'And so you will want to find somewhere else to live as soon as possible,' Mrs Derawal said. 'My husband's cousin is coming to stay in this room on Friday—this Friday.'

Fatou thought about that for a moment. Then she said, 'Can I please use the phone for one call?'

Mrs Derawal inspected a piece of wood that had flaked from the doorframe. But she nodded.

'And I would like to have my passport, please.'

'Excuse me?'

'My passport, please.'

At last Mrs Derawal looked at Fatou, right into her eyes, but her face was twisted, as if Fatou had just reached over and slapped her. Anyone could see the Devil had climbed inside poor Mrs Derawal. He was lighting her up with a pure fury.

'For goodness' sake, girl, I don't have your passport! What would I want with your passport? It's probably in a drawer in the kitchen somewhere. Is that my job now, too, to look for your things?'

Fatou was left alone. She packed her things into the decoy shopping bags she usually took to the swimming pool. While she was doing this, someone pushed her passport under her door. An hour later she carried her bags downstairs and went directly to the phone in the hall. Faizul walked by and lifted his hand for a high-five. Fatou ignored him and dialled Andrew's number. From her friend's voice she knew that she had woken him, but he was not even the slightest bit angry. He listened to all she had to say and seemed to understand, too, without her having to say so, that at this moment she could not speak freely. After she had said her part, he asked a few quick technical questions and then explained clearly and carefully what was to happen.

'It will all be OK. They need cleaners in my offices—I will ask for you. In the meantime, you come here. We'll sleep in shifts. You can trust me. I respect you, Fatou.'

But she did not have her Oyster Card; it was in the kitchen, on the fridge under a magnet of Florida, and she would rather die than go in there. Fine: he could meet her at six p.m. at Brondesbury Overground station. Fatou looked at the grandfather clock in front of her: she had four hours to kill.

'Six o'clock,' she repeated. She put the phone down, took the rest of the guest passes from the drawer of the faux-Louis XVI console and left the house.

'Weighed down a bit today,' the girl at the desk of the health club said, nodding at Fatou's collection of plastic bags. Fatou held out a guest pass for a stamp and did not smile. 'See you next time,' this same girl said, an hour and a half later, as Fatou strode past, still weighed down and still unwilling to be grateful for past favours.

Gratitude was just another kind of servitude. Better to make your own arrangements.

Walking out into the cold grey, Fatou felt a sense of brightness, of being washed clean, that neither the weather nor her new circumstances could dim. Still, her limbs were weary and her hair was wet; she would probably catch a cold, waiting out here. It was only four thirty. She put her bags on the pavement and sat down next to them, just by the bus stop opposite the Embassy of Cambodia. Buses came and went, slowing down for her and then jerking forward when they realized that she had no interest in getting up and on. Many of us walked past her that afternoon, or spotted her as we rode the bus, or through the windscreens of our cars, or from our balconies. Naturally, we wondered what this girl was doing, sitting on the damp pavement in the middle of the day. We worried for her. We tend to assume the worst, here in Willesden. We watched her watching the shuttlecock. Pock, smash. Pock, smash. As if one player could imagine only a violent conclusion and the other only a hopeful return.

2013

Endnotes

- Note 1: The story is divided into twenty-one sections, which mirrors the twenty-one points needed to win a game of badminton.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Country in southeast Asia.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Area in North West London.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: An architectural style from ancient Greece characterized by ornate columns, with ornamentation at the top of the columns.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Capital of Ghana, a West African country.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: The Cambodian Genocide (1975–79) saw roughly 1.7 million people die at the hands of the Khmer Rouge regime, especially targeting ethnic minorities.Return to reference 6

- Note 7: Area in South East London.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Area in North West London.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: A style of table coming out of France during the reign of Louis XVI (1774–93), characterized by classical influences and a turn from the more ornamental Baroque furniture.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Backpacks.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: A style of architecture from the Tudor period in England (1485–1603).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: American actor (1920–2014).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Area in North West London.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Newspaper circulating in the UK.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Inhabitant or native of Sudan, a country in Northeast Africa.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Country in West Africa.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Country in North Africa.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Country in Europe across the Mediterranean Sea from North Africa. The Italian island of Lampedusa is a primary point of entry to Europe for African immigrants.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: A card used to pay for London’s public transportation system.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: From Tunisia, a country in North Africa.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The Khmer Rouge targeted “New People,” members of the urban and educated elite, who were forced into work camps. The regime defended “Old People,” those from rural areas, farms, and villages.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: A kind of raincoat.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: A chain of supermarkets in the UK.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Inhabitant or native of Lebanon, a country in the Middle East.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: The genocide of millions of European Jewish people during World War II by Nazi Germany and its allies (1941–45).Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Country in Central Africa. In 1994, armed militias killed around 600,000 people of the Tutsi ethnic minority group, and

- as many as 200,000 moderate Hutus.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: From Nigeria, a country in West Africa.Return to reference 9
 - Note 1: City in Japan. In 1945 the United States dropped an atomic bomb over the city, followed by another one three days later over the city of Nagasaki. At least 70,000 citizens were killed in Hiroshima immediately, with as many as 140,000 dying later from the effects of injury and radiation.Return to reference 1
 - Note 2: London public transit rail system.Return to reference 2
 - Note 3: British talent competition show.Return to reference 3
 - Note 4: British broadcasting company providing television service.Return to reference 4
 - Note 5: Being nervous or scared (British slang).Return to reference 5
 - Note 6: Stupid or slow (British slang).Return to reference 6
 - Note 7: Built in 1555 as a Portuguese trading post, it was later used as part of the transatlantic slave trade to hold enslaved Africans before they were transported to the Americas.Return to reference 7
 - Note 8: A major road in Rome, Italy. "Bengali": inhabitant or native of the Bengal region in South Asia.Return to reference 8
 - Note 9: Shorthand for an authoritarian government led by a dictator.Return to reference 9

CHIMAMANDA NGOZI ADICHIE

b. 1977

The novelist Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie may be most widely known for her feminism. Her TEDx talk, “We Should All Be Feminists,” was sampled by the American singer Beyoncé in “Flawless” (2013). Adichie published a sequel called Dear Ijeawele, or a Feminist Manifesto in Fifteen Suggestions (2017), in which she builds on her earlier pronouncements that girls are taught to “shrink themselves,” that is, to limit their ambition and success, while boys are raised in a “hard, small cage” of masculinity in which they learn to avoid exposing their fear and doubts. In Dear Ijeawele she adopts the intimate form of a letter to a friend who has sought advice on how to raise her daughter as a feminist. Adichie suggests that women resist predetermined gender roles and seek out full personhood—an ambition that the most memorable characters of her novels achieve. In the short story “Checking Out,” about the fate of an undocumented Nigerian migrant in contemporary London, she exposes the vulnerability and humanity of a young man named Obinze. In this story, as in her novels, she narrates the enmeshment of private lives within the racial, gender, and cultural structures that shape them.

Adichie was born in Enugu, Nigeria, raised a Roman Catholic in the university town of Nsukka, and lived in a house that was once the residence of a Nigerian Igbo writer of an earlier generation, Chinua Achebe—a novelist she has credited as her literary inspiration. Adichie's father was a professor of statistics at the University of Nigeria and her mother the university registrar. She tried to focus on medicine and pharmacy for a year and a half at the University of Nigeria but left for the United States at the age of nineteen to escape a medical career. She studied communication and political science at Drexel University and Eastern Connecticut University before earning master's degrees in creative writing at Johns Hopkins University and in African studies at Yale. She has held fellowships at Princeton and Harvard, and in 2008 was awarded a MacArthur Fellowship. In recent years she has divided her time between the United States and Nigeria.

Adichie's fiction has been praised for its vivid characterization, bold reach, and humane warmth. Her first novel, Purple Hibiscus (2003), begins with a nod to Achebe: "Things started to fall apart at home." But her novel explores tensions between Western and Igbo cultures from the perspective of a young woman, fifteen-year-old Kambili, coming of age against the backdrop of Nigeria's military coups. Her second novel, Half of a Yellow Sun (2006), pushes back in time to the Nigerian Civil War of the 1960s, reimagining the first of many such postcolonial conflicts in sub-Saharan Africa as endured by two sisters. But Adichie has also resisted what she calls the "war and hunger" representation of Africa in the West, arguing that, beyond such crises, millions of Africans live out "ordinary" experiences of love, pain, and loss, "just like everyone else." A transcript of her 2013 TED talk, "The Danger of a Single Story," which engages with the absurdity and potential harmfulness of monolithic presentations of Africa, is included earlier in this volume. Her third novel, Americanah (2013), winner of the National Book Critics Circle Award, widened her canvas, spanning Nigeria, England, and the United States in tracking the love lives and migrant hardships of her Nigerian protagonists, Ifemelu and Obinze, who fall in love as teenagers in Lagos. The title is a term for Nigerians who return from the United States with American affectations, and the book cannily observes constructions of race and gender in transnational contexts. Extending beyond Achebe's Nigerian-centered fiction, the book's intercontinental scope exemplifies what is sometimes called the "global novel."

Part of Obinze's story also appears in Adichie's "Checking Out," among her many tightly constructed short stories (an earlier collection is The Thing Around Your Neck [2009]). A reflective young man, Obinze has dreamed of relocating to the United States, but, deterred by heightened restrictions after 9/11, he winds up in London, where he struggles to make a new life for himself. Lacking legal credentials, at the mercy of unscrupulous and exploitative fellow Africans, Obinze gazes wistfully at the people around him near the London Underground: "His eyes would follow them, with a lost longing, and he would think, You can work, you are legal, you are visible, and you don't even know how fortunate you are." Although the mass media constantly circulate pictures and news of multitudes on the move, Adichie harnesses the power of fiction to take readers inside the hopes, disappointments, and musings of one such person. Granted, he is more fortunate than many. Elsewhere she has remarked: "Obinze's journey is about the ways in which we become different versions of ourselves. The generally known immigration story, especially for the African immigrant, is that of leaving war or poverty. But this is about another kind of immigration, of people who do not come from burned villages, but are seeking that sublime thing: choice." For Obinze, as for millions of migrants with similar dreams and aspirations, that sublime thing is far from being within easy reach.

Checking Out

In London, night came too soon. It hung in the morning air like a threat and then in the afternoon a blue-gray dusk descended, and the Victorian buildings all wore a mournful face. In those first weeks, the weightless menace of the cold startled Obinze, drying his nostrils, deepening his anxieties, making him urinate too often. He would walk fast, his hands swallowed up by the sleeves of the gray wool coat his cousin had lent him. Sometimes he would stop outside a tube station,¹ often by a flower or a newspaper vender, and watch the people brushing past. They walked so quickly, as if they had an important destination, a purpose to their lives. His eyes would follow them, with a lost longing, and he would think, You can work, you are legal, you are visible, and you don't even know how fortunate you are.

It was at a tube station that he met the Angolans who would arrange his marriage, exactly two years and three days after he had arrived in England; he kept count.

"We'll talk in the car," one of them had said over the phone. Their old black Mercedes was fussily maintained, the floor mats wavy from vacuuming, the leather seats shiny with polish. The two Angolans looked alike, with thick eyebrows that almost touched, and they were dressed alike, too, in leather jackets and long gold chains. Their tabletop hair, which sat on their heads like tall hats, surprised him, but perhaps having retro haircuts was part of their hip image. They spoke to him with the authority of people who had done this before, and also with a slight condescension; his fate, after all, was in their hands.

"We decided on Newcastle² because we know people there and London is too hot right now—too many marriages happening in London, yeah?—so we don't want trouble," one of them said.

"Everything is going to work out. Just make sure you keep a low profile, yeah? Don't attract any attention to yourself until the marriage is done. Don't fight in the pub, yeah?"

"I've never been a very good fighter," Obinze said dryly, but the Angolans did not smile.

"You have the money?" the other one asked.

Obinze handed over two hundred pounds, all in twenty-pound notes that he had taken out of the cash machine over two days. It was a deposit, to prove that he was serious. Later, after he met the girl, he would pay two thousand pounds.

"The rest has to be up front, yeah? We'll use some of it to do the running around and the rest goes to the girl. Man, you know we're not making anything from this. We usually ask for much more, but we're doing this for your cousin," the first one said.

Obinze did not believe them, even then. He met the girl, Cleotilde, a few days later, at a shopping center, in a McDonald's whose windows looked out onto the dank entrance of a tube station across the street. He sat at a table with the Angolans and watched people hurry past, wondering if one of them was she, while the Angolans whispered into their phones; perhaps they were arranging other marriages.

"Hello there!" she said.

She surprised him. He had expected someone with pockmarks smothered under heavy makeup, someone tough and knowing. But here she was, dewy and fresh, bespectacled, olive-skinned, almost childlike, smiling shyly at him and sucking a milkshake through a straw. She looked like a university freshman who was innocent or dumb, or both.

"I just want to be sure that you're sure about doing this," he told her. Then, worried that he might frighten her away, he added, "I'm very grateful, and it won't take too much from you—in a year I'll have my papers and we'll do the divorce. But I just wanted to meet you first and make sure you are O.K. to do this."

"Yes," she said.

He watched her, expecting more. She played with her straw, not meeting his eyes, and it took him a while to realize that she was reacting more to him than to the situation. She was attracted to him.

"I want to help my mom out. Things are tight at home," she said, a trace of a non-British accent underlining her words.

"She's with us, yeah," one of the Angolans said impatiently.

"Show him your details, Cleo," the other Angolan said.

His calling her Cleo rang false; Obinze sensed this from the slight surprise on her face. It was a forced intimacy: the Angolan had never called her Cleo before. Obinze wondered how the Angolans knew her. Did they have a list of young women with European Union passports who needed money? Cleotilde pushed at her hair, a mass of tight coils, and adjusted her glasses, as though preparing herself, then presented her passport and license. Obinze examined them. He would have thought her younger than twenty-three.

"Can I have your number?" Obinze asked.

"Just call us for anything," the Angolans said, almost at the same time. But Obinze wrote his number on a napkin and pushed it across to Cleotilde. The Angolans gave him a sly look.

The next day, on the phone, she told him that she had been living in London for six years, and was saving money to go to fashion school; the Angolans had told him that she lived in Portugal.

"Would you like to meet again?" he asked. "It will be much easier if we try to get to know each other a little."

"Yes," she said without hesitation.

They ate fish-and-chips in a pub, a thin crust of grime on the sides of the wooden table, while she talked about her love of fashion and asked him about Nigerian traditional dress. She seemed a little more mature this time; he noticed the shimmer on her cheeks, the more defined curl of her hair, and knew that she had made an effort with her appearance.

"What will you do after you get your papers?" she asked him.

"Will you bring your girlfriend from Nigeria?"

He was touched by her obviousness. "I don't have a girlfriend."

"I've never been to Africa. I'd love to go." She said "Africa" wistfully, like an admiring foreigner, loading the word with exotic excitement. Her black Angolan father had left her white Portuguese mother when she was three, she told him, and she had not seen him since, nor had she ever been to Angola. She said this with a shrug and a cynical raise of her eyebrows, as though it had never bothered her, an effort so out of character, so jarring, that it showed him just how deeply it did bother her. There were difficulties in her life that he wanted to know more about, parts of her thick, shapely body that he longed to touch, but he was wary of complicating things. He would wait until after the wedding, until the business side of their relationship was finished. She seemed to understand this without their talking about it. And so, as they met in the following weeks, sometimes practicing how they would answer questions during their immigration interview and other times just talking about football,³ there was, between them, the growing urgency of restrained desire. It was there in how close they stood, not touching, as they waited at the tube station, and in their teasing each other about his support of Arsenal and her support of Manchester United.⁴ After he paid the Angolans the additional two thousand pounds, she told him that they had given her only five hundred.

"I'm just telling you. I know you don't have any more money. I want to do this for you," she said.

He wanted to kiss her, her upper lip pinker and shinier with lip gloss than the lower, to hold her, to tell her how deeply, irrepressibly grateful he was. She would never flaunt her power over him. One Eastern European woman, Iloba had told him, had asked a Nigerian man, an hour before their wedding, to give her a thousand pounds extra not to walk away. In a panic, the man had had to call all of his friends to raise the money.

When Obinze asked the Angolans how much they had given Cleotilde, they said, "Man, we gave you a good deal," in the tone of people who knew how much they were needed. It was they, after all, who took him to a lawyer, a low-voiced Nigerian in a swivel chair, who slid backward to reach a file cabinet as he said, "You can still get married, even though your visa is expired. In fact, getting married is now your only choice." It was they who provided water and gas bills, going back six months, with his name and a Newcastle address. And it was they who found a man who would “sort out” his driver’s license, a man called Brown. Obinze met Brown at the train station in Barking;⁵ he stood near the gate, amid the bustle of people, looking around and waiting for his phone to ring, since Brown had refused to give him a phone number.

“Are you waiting for somebody?” Brown asked, when he appeared. He was a slight man, his winter hat pulled down to his eyebrows.

“Yes. I’m Obinze,” he said, feeling like a character in a spy novel. Brown led him to a quiet corner, handed over an envelope, and there it was, his license, with his photo. It had the genuine, slightly worn look of something owned for a year. A small plastic card, but it weighed down his pocket. A few days later, he walked with it into a London building that looked like a church, steepled and grave from the outside, but inside was shabby, harried, knotted with people. Signs were scrawled on whiteboards:

Births and deaths this way. Marriage registration this way.

Obinze, his expression carefully frozen in neutrality, handed the license over to the registrar behind the desk.

A woman was walking toward the door, talking loudly to her companion. “Look how crowded this place is,” she said. “It’s all sham marriages, all of them, now that Blunkett⁶ is after them.”

Perhaps she had come to register a death, and her words were merely the lonely lashings-out of grief, but he felt the familiar tightening of panic in his chest. The registrar was examining his license, taking too long. The seconds lengthened and curdled. “All sham marriages, all of them,” rang in Obinze’s head. Finally, the registrar looked up and pushed across a form.

“Getting married, are we? Congratulations!” The words came out with the mechanical good cheer of frequent repetition.

“Thank you,” Obinze said, and tried to unfreeze his face.

Behind the desk, a whiteboard was propped against a wall, with venues and dates of intended marriages scrawled in blue; a name at the bottom caught his eye. Okoli Okafor and Crystal Smith. Okoli Okafor had been his classmate in secondary school and at university, a quiet boy who had been teased for having a surname for a first name, who later joined a vicious cult at university, and then left Nigeria during one of the long strikes.⁷

The memory, clear as a beam of light, took Obinze back to a time when he still believed the universe would bend according to his will. Once, during his final year at university, the year that people danced in the streets because General Abacha⁸ had died, his mother had said, "One day, I will look up and all the people I know will be dead or abroad." For a moment, he felt as if he had betrayed her by having his own plan: to get a postgraduate degree in America, to work in America, to live in America. Of course, he knew how unreasonable the American Consulate could be—the vice-chancellor, of all people, had once been refused a visa to attend a conference—but he had never doubted his plan. He would wonder, later, why he had been so sure. Perhaps it was because he had never just wanted to go abroad, as many others did; some people were now even going to South Africa, which amused him. It had always been America, only America. A longing nurtured and nursed over many years. An advertisement on NTA⁹ for "Andrew Checking Out," which he had watched as a child, had given shape to his longings. "Men, I'm checkin' out," the character Andrew had said, staring cockily at the camera. "No good roads, no light, no water. Men, you can't even get a common bottle of soft drink!" While Andrew was checking out, General Buhari's¹ soldiers were flogging adults in the streets, lecturers were striking for better pay, and Obinze's mother decided that he could no longer have Fanta whenever he wanted but only on Sundays. America became a place where bottles of Fanta could be had without permission. Obinze would stand in front of the mirror and repeat Andrew's words: "Men, I'm checkin' out!" Later, when he sought out magazines and books and films and secondhand stories about America, his longing took on a minor mystical quality. He saw himself walking the streets of Harlem, discussing the merits of Mark Twain with his American friends, gazing at Mt. Rushmore. Days after he graduated from university, bloated with knowledge about America, he applied for a visa at the consulate in Lagos.

He already knew that the best interviewer was the man with the blond beard, and, as the line moved forward, he hoped that he would not be interviewed by the horror story, a pretty white woman famous for screaming into her microphone and insulting even grandmothers. Finally, it was his turn, and the blond-bearded man said, "Next person!" Obinze walked up and slid his forms underneath the glass. The man glanced at the forms and said, kindly, "Sorry, you don't qualify. Next person!" Obinze was stunned. He went three more times in the next few months. Each time, he was told, with barely a glance at his documents, "Sorry, you don't qualify," and each time he emerged from the air-conditioned cool of the consulate into the harsh sunlight stunned and unbelieving.

"It's the terrorism fears," his mother said. "The Americans are now averse to foreign young men."

She told him to find a job and try again in a year. But his job applications yielded nothing. He travelled to Lagos and to Port Harcourt and to Abuja to take assessment tests, which he found easy, and then attended interviews, answering questions fluidly, but only long silences followed. Some of his friends got jobs, people who did not have his second-class upper degree and who did not speak as well as he did. He wondered if employers could smell his America-pining on his breath, or sense how obsessively he still looked at the Web sites of American universities.

One day, his mother left him a note on the bathroom sink: "I have been invited to an academic conference in London. We should speak." He was puzzled. When she came home from her lecture, he was in the living room waiting for her.

"Mummy, nno,"² he said.

She acknowledged his greeting with a nod. "I'm going to put your name on my British visa application as my research assistant," she said quietly. "That should get you a six-month visa. You can stay with Nicholas in London. See what you can do with your life. Maybe you can get to America from there. I know that your mind is no longer here."

He stared at her.

"I understand this sort of thing is done nowadays," she said, sitting down on the sofa beside him, and trying to sound offhand, but in the uncommon briskness of her words he sensed her discomfort. She was a woman who asked no favors, who would not lie, who would not accept even a Christmas card from her students, because it might compromise her. Yet here she was, behaving as though truth-telling were a luxury that they could no longer afford. She had lied for him. If anyone else had lied for him, it would not have mattered as much or even at all, but she lied for him and he got a six-month visa to the United Kingdom. He felt, even before he left, like a failure. He did not contact her for months, while he stayed with his cousin Nicholas, in Essex.³ He did not contact her because there was nothing to tell and he wanted to wait until he had something to tell. Throughout his stay in England, he had spoken to her only a few times, strained conversations during which he felt her wondering why he had made nothing of himself. But she never asked for details; she only waited to hear what he was willing to tell.

Everyone joked about people who went abroad to clean toilets, and so Obinze approached his first job with irony: he was indeed abroad cleaning toilets, wearing rubber gloves and carrying a pail, in an estate agent's office on the second floor of a London building. Each time he opened the swinging door of a stall, it seemed to sigh. The beautiful woman who cleaned the ladies' toilet was Ghanaian, about his age, with the shiniest dark skin he had ever seen. He sensed, in the way she spoke and carried herself, that she came from a background similar to his, a childhood cushioned by family, regular meals, and dreams in which there was no conception of cleaning toilets in London. She ignored his friendly gestures, saying only "Good evening" as formally as she could, but she was friendly with the Polish woman who cleaned the offices upstairs, and once he saw them in a deserted café, drinking tea and talking in low tones. He stood watching them for a while, a great grievance exploding in his mind. He was too close to what she was; he knew her nuances, while with the Polish woman she was free to reinvent herself, to be whoever she wanted to be.

The toilets were not bad—some urine outside the urinal, some unfinished flushing. So he was shocked, one evening, to walk into a stall and discover a mound of shit on the toilet lid, solid, tapering, centered as though it had been carefully arranged. It looked like a puppy curled on a mat. It was a performance. He thought about the famed repression of the English. There was, in this performance, something of an unbuttoning. A person who had been fired? Denied a promotion? Obinze stared at that mound of shit for a long time, feeling smaller and smaller as he did so, until it became a personal affront, a punch to his jaw. And all for three quid⁴ an hour. He took off his gloves, placed them next to the mound of shit, and left the building.

Obinze had not remembered that Iloba now lived in London; he had last seen him days before graduation. Iloba was merely from his mother's hometown, but he had been so enthusiastic about their kinship that everyone on campus assumed that they were cousins. Iloba would often pull up a chair, smiling and uninvited, and join Obinze and his friends at a roadside bar, or appear at Obinze's door on Sunday afternoons. Once, Iloba had stopped Obinze on the General Studies quad, cheerfully calling out "Kinsman!" and then giving him a rundown of marriages and deaths of people from his mother's home town whom he hardly knew. "Udoakpuanyi died some weeks ago. Don't you know him? Their homestead is next to your mother's." Obinze nodded and made appropriate sounds, humoring Iloba, because Iloba's demeanor was always so pleasant and oblivious, his trousers always too tight and too short, showing his bony ankles; they had earned him the nickname Iloba Jump Up.

Obinze got his phone number from Nicholas and called him.

"The Zed!⁵ Kinsman! You did not tell me you were coming to London!" Iloba said, using Obinze's old nickname. "How is your mother? What of your uncle, the one who married from Abagana? How is Nicholas?" Iloba sounded full of a simple happiness. There were people who were born with an inability to be tangled up in dark emotions, in complications, and Iloba was one of them. With such people, Obinze felt both admiration and boredom. When Obinze asked if Iloba might be able to help him find a National Insurance number, he would have understood a little resentment, a little churlishness—after all, he was contacting Iloba only because he needed something—but it surprised him how sincerely eager to help Iloba was.

"I would let you use mine, but I am working with it and it is risky," Iloba said.

"Where do you work?"

"In central London. Security. It's not easy, this country is not easy, but we are managing. I like the night shifts, because it gives me time to read for my course. I'm doing a master's in management at Birkbeck College."⁶ Iloba paused. "The Zed, don't worry, we will put our heads together. Let me ask around and let you know."

Iloba called back two weeks later to say that he had found somebody. "His name is Vincent Obi. He is from Abia State."⁷ A friend of mine did the connection. He wants to meet you tomorrow evening."

They met in Iloba's flat. A claustrophobic feel pervaded the concrete neighborhood with scarred walls and no trees. Everything seemed too small, too tight.

"Nice place," Obinze said, not because the flat was nice but because Iloba had a flat in London.

"I would have told you to come and stay with me, the Zed, but I live with two of my cousins." Iloba placed bottles of beer and a small plate of fried chin-chin⁸ on the table. The ritual of hospitality raised a sharp homesickness in Obinze. He was reminded of going back to his mother's village with her at Christmas, aunties offering him plates of chin-chin.

Vincent Obi was a small round man, submerged in a large pair of jeans and an ungainly coat. As he and Obinze shook hands, they sized each other up. From the set of Vincent's shoulders and the abrasiveness of his manner, Obinze sensed that he had learned early on, as a matter of necessity, to solve his own problems. Obinze imagined Vincent's Nigerian life: a community secondary school full of barefoot children; a polytechnic paid for with the help of a number of uncles; a family of many children; and a crowd of dependents in his hometown who, whenever he visited, would expect large loaves of bread and pocket money carefully distributed to each of them. Obinze saw himself through Vincent's eyes: a university staff child who grew up eating butter and now needed his help. At first, Vincent affected a British accent, saying "innit"⁹ too many times.

"This is business, innit, but I'm helping you. You can use my N.I. number and pay me forty per cent of what you make," Vincent said. "It's business, innit. If I don't get what we agree on, I will report you."

"My brother," Obinze said. "That's a little too much. You know my situation. I don't have anything. Please try and come down."

"Thirty-five per cent is the best I can do. This is business." He lost his accent and now spoke Nigerian English. "Let me tell you, there are many people in your situation."

Iloba spoke in Igbo: "Vincent, my brother here is trying to save money and do his papers. Thirty-five is too much. Please just try and help us."

"You know that some people take half. Yes, he is in a situation, but all of us are in a situation. I am helping him, but this is business." Vincent's Igbo had a rural accent. He put the National Insurance card on the table and started to write his bank-account number on a piece of paper. That evening, as dusk fell, the sky muting to a pale violet, Obinze became Vincent.

The warehouse chief looked like the archetype of an Englishman that Obinze carried in his mind: tall and spare, sandy-haired and blue-eyed. But he was a smiling man, and in Obinze's imagination Englishmen were not smiling men. His name was Roy Snell. He vigorously shook Obinze's hand.

"So, Vincent, you're from Africa?" he asked, as he took Obinze around the warehouse, which was the size of a football field and alive with trucks being loaded, flattened cardboard boxes being folded into a deep pit, and men talking.

"Yes. I was born in Birmingham¹ and went back to Nigeria when I was six." It was the story that he and Iloba had agreed was most convincing.

"Why did you come back? How bad are things in Nigeria?"

"I just wanted to see if I could have a better life here."

Roy Snell nodded. He seemed like a person for whom the word "jolly" would always be apt. "You'll work with Nigel today—he's our youngest," he said, gesturing toward a man with a pale doughy body, spiky dark hair, and an almost cherubic face. "I think you'll like working here, Vinny Boy!" It had taken him five minutes to go from Vincent to Vinny Boy and, in the following months, when they played table tennis during lunch break, Roy would tell the men, "I've got to beat Vinny Boy for once!" And they would titter and repeat "Vinny Boy."

It amused Obinze how keenly the men flipped through their newspapers every morning, stopping at the photo of the big-breasted woman, examining it as though it were an article of great interest, different from the photo on that same page the previous day, the previous week. Their conversations, as they waited for their trucks to be loaded up, were always about cars and football and, most of all, women, each man telling stories that sounded similar to stories told the day before, the week before. Each time they mentioned knickers—"the bird flashed her knickers"—Obinze was even more amused, because knickers, in Nigerian English, were shorts rather than underwear, and he imagined these nubile women in ill-fitting khaki shorts, the kind he had worn as a junior student in secondary school.

Roy Snell's greeting every morning was a jab to his belly. "Vinny Boy! You all right? You all right?" he would ask. He always put Obinze's name up for the outside work that paid better, always asked if he wanted to work weekends, which was double time, always asked about girls. It was as if Roy held a special affection for him, which was both protective and kind.

"You haven't had a shag since you came to the U.K., have you, Vinny Boy? I could give you this bird's number," he said once.

"I have a girlfriend back home," Obinze said.

"So what's wrong with a little shag, then?"

A few men nearby laughed.

"My girlfriend has magical powers," Obinze said.

Roy found this funnier than Obinze thought it was. He laughed and laughed. "She's into witchcraft, is she? All right, then, no shags for you. I've always wanted to go to Africa, Vinny Boy. I think I'll take a holiday and go to Nigeria when you're back there for a visit. You can show me around, find me some Nigerian birds, Vinny Boy, but no witchcraft!"

"Yes, I could do that."

"Oh, I know you could! You look like you know what to do with the birds," Roy said, with another jab at Obinze's belly.

Roy often assigned Obinze to work with Nigel, perhaps because they were the youngest men in the warehouse. That first morning, Obinze noticed that the other men, drinking coffee from paper cups and checking the board to see who would be working with whom, were laughing at Nigel. Nigel had no eyebrows; the patches of slightly pink skin where his eyebrows should have been gave his plump face an unfinished, ghostly look.

"I got pissed² at the pub and my mates shaved off my eyebrows," Nigel told Obinze, almost apologetically, as they shook hands.

"No shagging for you until you grow your eyebrows back, mate," one of the men called out as Nigel and Obinze headed for the truck. Obinze secured the washing machines at the back, tightening the straps until they were snug, and then climbed in and studied the map to find the shortest routes to their delivery addresses. Nigel took bends sharply and muttered about how people drove these days. At a traffic light, he brought out a bottle of cologne from a bag he had placed at his feet, sprayed it on his neck, and then offered it to Obinze.

"No, thanks," Obinze said. Nigel shrugged. Days later, he offered it again. The truck interior was dense with the scent of his cologne and, from time to time, Obinze would take deep gulps of fresh air through the open window.

"You're just new from Africa. You haven't seen the London sights, have you, mate?" Nigel asked.

"No," Obinze said.

And so, after early deliveries in central London, Nigel would take him for a drive, showing him Buckingham Palace, the Houses of Parliament, Tower Bridge, all the while talking about his mother's arthritis, and about his girlfriend Haley's knockers. It took a while for Obinze to completely understand what Nigel said, because of his accent, each word twisted and stretched. Once Nigel said "male" and Obinze thought he had said "mile," and, when Obinze finally understood what Nigel meant, Nigel laughed and said, "You talk kind of posh, don't you? African posh."

One day, months into his job, after they had delivered a fridge to an address in Kensington,³ Nigel said, of the elderly man who had come into the kitchen while they were installing it, "He's a real gent, he is." Nigel's tone was admiring, slightly cowed. The man had looked dishevelled and hungover, his hair tousled, his robe open at the chest, and he had said, archly, "You do know how to put it all together," as though he did not think they did. It amazed Obinze that, because Nigel thought the man was a "real gent," he did not complain about the dirty kitchen, as he ordinarily would have done.

If the man had spoken with a different accent, Nigel would have called him miserly for not giving them a tip.

They were approaching their next delivery address, in South London, and Obinze had just called the homeowner to say that they were almost there, when Nigel blurted out, "What do you say to a girl you like?"

"What do you mean?" Obinze asked.

"Truth is, I'm not really shagging Haley. I like her, but I don't know how to tell her. The other day, I went round her house and there was another bloke there." Nigel paused. Obinze tried to keep his face expressionless. "You look like you know what to say to the birds, mate," Nigel added.

"Just tell her you like her," Obinze said, thinking how seamlessly Nigel, at the warehouse with the other men, contributed stories about shagging Haley, and, once, about shagging her friend while Haley was away on holiday. "No games and no lines. Just say, 'Look, I like you and I think you're beautiful.' "

Nigel gave him a wounded glance. It was as if he had convinced himself that Obinze was skilled in the art of women; he expected some profundity, which Obinze wished, as he loaded a dishwasher onto a trolley and wheeled it to the door, that he had. An Indian woman opened the door, a portly, kindly housewife, who offered them tea. Many people offered tea or water. A sad-looking woman had once offered Obinze a small pot of homemade jam, and he had hesitated, but he sensed that whatever deep unhappiness she had would be compounded if he said no, and so he had taken the jam home, where it was still languishing in the fridge, unopened.

"Thank you, thank you," the Indian woman said, as Obinze and Nigel installed the new dishwasher and rolled away the old one.

At the door, she gave Nigel a tip. Nigel was the only driver who split the tips down the middle with Obinze; the others pretended not to remember to share. Once, when Obinze was working with another driver, an old Jamaican woman pushed ten pounds into his pocket when the driver wasn't looking. "Thank you, brother," she said, and it made him want to call his mother in Nsukka⁴ and tell her about it.

One morning in early summer, Obinze arrived at the warehouse and knew right away that something was amiss. The men avoided his eyes, and Nigel turned swiftly—too swiftly—toward the toilet when he saw Obinze. They knew. They had somehow found out. They saw the headlines about asylum seekers draining the National Health Service, they thought of the hordes further crowding a crowded island, and now they knew that he was one of the damned, working with a name that was not his. Where was Roy Snell? Had he gone to call the police? Was it the police that you called? Obinze tried to remember details from the stories of people who had been caught and deported, but his mind was numb. He felt naked. He wanted to turn and run, but his body kept moving, against his will, toward the loading area. Then he sensed a movement behind him, quick and violent and too close, and, before he could turn around, a paper hat was pushed onto his head. It was Nigel, and with him a crowd of grinning men.

“Happy birthday, Vinny Boy!” they all said.

Obinze froze, frightened by the complete blankness of his mind. Then he realized what it was. Vincent’s birthday. Roy must have told the men. Even he had not remembered to remember Vincent’s date of birth.

“Oh!” was all he said, nauseated with relief.

Nigel asked him to come into the coffee room, where all the men were trooping in, passing around the muffins and Coke they had bought with their own money in honor of a birthday they believed was his. A realization brought tears to his eyes: he felt safe.

Obinze was mildly surprised when Vincent called him that night, because he had called him only once before, months ago, when he changed his bank and wanted to give him the new account number. He wondered whether to say “Happy birthday” to Vincent, whether the call was indeed related to his birthday.

“Vincent, kedu?”⁵ he said.

“I want a raise.”

Had Vincent learned that from a film? The words sounded contrived and comical. "I want forty-five per cent. I know you are working more now."

"Vincent, ahn-ahn.⁶ How much am I making? You know I am saving money to do this marriage thing."

"Forty-five per cent," Vincent said, and hung up.

Obinze decided to ignore him. He knew Vincent's type; he would push to see how far he could go and then he would retreat. If Obinze called back and tried to negotiate, it might embolden Vincent to make more demands. But he would not risk losing Obinze's regular weekly deposit entirely.

And so when, a week later, in the morning bustle of drivers and trucks, Roy said, "Vinny Boy, step into my office for a minute," Obinze thought nothing of it. On Roy's desk was a newspaper, folded at the page with the photo of the big-breasted woman. Roy slowly put his cup of coffee on top of the newspaper. He seemed uncomfortable, and wouldn't look directly at Obinze.

"Somebody called yesterday," he told Obinze. "Said you're not who you say you are—that you're illegal and working with a Brit's name." There was a pause. Obinze was stung with surprise. Roy picked up the coffee cup again. "Why don't you just bring in your passport tomorrow and we'll clear it up, all right?"

Obinze mumbled the first words that came to him. "O.K. I'll bring my passport tomorrow." He walked out of the office knowing that he would never feel again what he had felt moments ago. Was Roy merely asking him to bring in his passport to make the dismissal easier for him, to give him an exit, or did Roy really believe that the caller had been lying? Why would anybody call about such a thing unless it was true? Obinze had never made as much of an effort as he did the rest of the day to seem normal, to tame the rage that was engulfing him. It was not the thought of the power that Vincent had over him that infuriated him but the recklessness with which Vincent had exercised it. He left the warehouse that evening for the final time, wishing more than anything that he had told Nigel and Roy his real name.

The Angolans told him that things had “gone up,” or were “tough,” opaque words that were supposed to explain each new request for more money.

“This is not what we agreed to,” Obinze would say, or “I don’t have any extra cash right now,” and they would reply, “Things have gone up, yeah,” in a tone that he imagined was accompanied by a shrug. A silence would follow, a wordlessness over the phone line that told him that it was his problem, not theirs. “I’ll pay it in by Friday,” he would say, finally, before hanging up.

Nicholas gave Obinze a suit for the wedding. “It’s a good Italian suit,” he said. “It’s small for me, so it should fit you.” The trousers were big, and they bunched up when Obinze tightened his belt, but the jacket, also big, shielded the unsightly pleat of cloth at his waist. Not that he minded. He was so focussed on finally beginning his life that he would have swaddled his lower parts in a baby’s napkin² if it had been required. He and Iloba met Cleotilde near City Center. She was standing under a tree with some friends, her hair pushed back with a white band, her eyes boldly lined in black; she looked like an older, sexier person. Her ivory dress was tight at the hips. He had paid for the dress. “I haven’t got any proper going-out dress,” she had said, in apology, when she called to tell him that she had nothing that looked convincingly bridal.

She hugged him. She looked nervous, and he tried to deflect his own nervousness by thinking about them together after this—how, in less than an hour, he would be free to walk with surer steps on Britain’s streets, and free to kiss her.

“You have the rings?” Iloba asked her.

“Yes,” Cleotilde said.

She and Obinze had bought them the week before, plain, cheap matching rings from a side-street shop, and she had looked so delighted, laughingly slipping different rings on and off her finger, that he wondered if she wished it were a real wedding.

"Fifteen minutes to go," Iloba said. He took pictures, his digital camera held away from his face, saying, "Move closer! O.K., one more!" His sprightly good spirits annoyed Obinze. On the train up to Newcastle the previous day, while Obinze had spent his time looking out the window, unable even to read, Iloba had talked and talked, until his voice became a distant murmur, perhaps because he was trying to keep Obinze from worrying too much. Now he talked to Cleotilde's friends with easy friendliness about the new Chelsea manager, about "Big Brother,"⁸ as if they were all there for something ordinary and normal.

"Time to go," Iloba said. They walked toward the civic center. The afternoon was bright with sunshine. Obinze opened the door and stood aside for the others to go ahead, into the sterile hallway, where they paused to get their bearings, to be sure which way the registry office was. Two policemen stood behind the door, watching them with stony eyes. Obinze quieted his panic. There was nothing to worry about, nothing at all, he told himself; the civic center probably had policemen present as a matter of routine. But he sensed in the sudden smallness of the hallway, the sudden thickening of doom in the air, that something was wrong. Then another man approached him, his shirtsleeves rolled up, his cheeks so red that he looked as though he were wearing terrible makeup.

"Are you Obinze Maduewesi?" the red-cheeked man asked. In his hands was a sheaf of papers in which Obinze could see a photocopy of his passport.

"Yes," Obinze said quietly, and that word was an acknowledgment to the red-cheeked immigration officer, to Iloba, to Cleotilde, and to himself that it was over.

"Your visa is expired and you are not allowed to be present in the U.K.," the man said.

One of the policemen clamped handcuffs around his wrists. He felt himself watching the scene from far away, watching himself walk to the police car outside, and sink into the too-soft seat in the back. There had been so many times in the past when he had feared that this would happen, so many moments that had become one single blur of panic, and now it felt like the dull echo of an aftermath. Cleotilde flung herself on the ground and began to cry. She may never have visited her father's country, but he was convinced at that moment of her Africanness; how else would she have been able to fling herself to the ground with that perfect dramatic flourish? He wondered if her tears were for him or for herself, or for what might have been between them. She had no need to worry; the policemen barely glanced at her. It was he who felt the heaviness of the handcuffs during the drive to the police station, he who silently handed over his watch and his belt and his wallet and his phone. Nicholas's large trousers were slipping down his hips.

"Your shoes, too. Take off your shoes," the policeman said.

He took off his shoes. He was led to a cell. It was small, with brown walls, and metal bars so thick that his hand could not get around one. It reminded him of the chimpanzee cage at Nsukka's dismal, forgotten zoo. From the high ceiling, a single bulb burned. There was an emptying, echoing vastness in the tiny cell.

"Were you aware that your visa had expired?"

"Yes," Obinze said.

"Were you about to have a sham marriage?"

"No. Cleotilde and I have been dating for a while."

"I can arrange for a lawyer for you, but it's obvious you'll be deported," the immigration officer said evenly.

When the lawyer came, puffy-faced, dark arcs under his eyes, Obinze thought of all the films in which the state lawyer is distracted and exhausted. He came with a bag but did not open it, and he sat across from Obinze, holding nothing—no file, no paper, no pen. He was pleasant and sympathetic.

"The government has a strong case. We can appeal, but, to be honest, it will only delay the case. You will eventually be removed from the U.K.," he said, with the air of a man who had said those same words, in the same tone, more times than he wished to, or could, remember.

"I'm willing to go back to Nigeria," Obinze said. The last shred of his dignity was like a wrapper slipping off his waist that he was desperate to retire.

The lawyer looked surprised. "O.K., then," he said, and got up a little too hastily, as though grateful that his job had been made easier. Obinze watched him leave. He was going to check a box on a form that said that his client was willing to be removed. Removed. The word made Obinze feel inanimate. A thing to be removed. A thing without breath and mind. A thing.

2013

Endnotes

- Note 1: London Underground (subway) station.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: City in northern England.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Soccer.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Soccer team, with Arsenal, in the English Premier League.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Suburban town in East London.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: David Blunkett (b. 1947), former British politician who endorsed tighter immigration measures after the 9/11 terrorist attacks.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Faculty and staff labor strikes, some lasting months during the 1980s and 1990s.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: General Sani Abacha (1943–1998), president of Nigeria after a military coup in 1993, responsible for human-rights abuses.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Nigerian Television Authority.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Muhammadu Buhari (b. 1942), who seized control of Nigeria in 1983 after a military coup, responded harshly to critics. He was deposed in 1985 but elected president in 2015.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Welcome (Igbo).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: County northeast of London.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Pounds sterling.Return to reference 4

- Note 5: Obinze's nickname. The letter "z" is pronounced "zed" in Britain and most of its former colonies.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: A constituent college of the University of London.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: In southeastern Nigeria.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Deep-fried Nigerian snack.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Isn't it? (British slang).Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Major city in central England.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Drunk.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Affluent district in West London.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Town in southeastern Nigeria.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: What's up? (Igbo).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Or "ah-ah," expression of surprise (Igbo).Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Diaper.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Reality TV show. "Chelsea manager": soccer coach of Chelsea, another Premier League team.Return to reference 8

APPENDICES

Volume D: The Romantic Period

General Bibliography

This bibliography consists of a list of suggested general readings on English literature. Bibliographies for the authors and topical clusters in The Norton Anthology of English Literature are available online at the NAEL student site.

Histories of England and of English Literature

Even the most distinguished of the comprehensive general histories written in past generations have come to seem outmoded. Innovative research in social, cultural, and political history has made it difficult to write a single coherent account of England from the Middle Ages to the present, let alone to accommodate in a unified narrative the complex histories of Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and the other nations where writing in English has flourished. Readers who wish to explore the historical matrix out of which the works of literature collected in this anthology emerged are advised to consult the studies of particular periods listed in the appropriate sections of this bibliography. The multivolume Oxford History of England (1934–65) and New Oxford History of England (1992–2009) are useful, as are the three-volume Peoples of the British Isles: A New History, by Stanford E. Lehmberg, Samantha A. Meigs, and Thomas William Heyck (3rd ed., 1992); the nine-volume Cambridge Cultural History of Britain, ed. Boris Ford (1992); the three-volume Cambridge Social History of Britain, 1750–1950, ed. F. M. L. Thompson (1990); and the multivolume Penguin History of Britain, gen. ed. David Cannadine (1996–). For Britain's imperial history, readers can consult the five-volume Oxford History of the British Empire, ed. Wm. Roger Louis (1998–99), as well as Gender and Empire, ed. Philippa Levine (2004). Also of interest is Lisa Lowe, The Intimacies of Four Continents (2015). Given the cultural centrality of London, readers may find particular interest in The London Encyclopaedia, ed. Ben Weinreb et al. (3rd ed., 2008); Roy Porter, London: A Social History (1994); and Jerry White, London in the Nineteenth Century: "A Human Awful Wonder of God" (2007) and London in the Twentieth Century: A City and Its People (2001).

Similar observations may be made about literary history. In the light of such initiatives as women's studies, New Historicism, and postcolonialism, the range of authors deemed significant has expanded, along with the geographical and conceptual boundaries of literature in English. Attempts to capture in a unified account the great sweep of literature from Beowulf to the early twenty-first century have largely given way to studies of individual genres, carefully delimited time periods, and specific authors. Among the large-scale literary surveys, The Cambridge Guide to Literature in English, ed. Dominic Head (3rd ed., 2006), is useful, as is the nine-volume Penguin History of Literature (1987–94) and the multivolume Oxford History of Poetry in English (2022–). The Feminist Companion to Literature in English: Women Writers from the Middle Ages to the Present, ed. Virginia Blain, Isobel Grundy, and Patricia Clements (1990), is an important resource, and the editorial materials in the two-volume The Norton Anthology of Literature by Women: The Traditions in English, ed. Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar (3rd ed., 2007), constitute a concise history and set of biographies of women authors since the Middle Ages. Annals of English Literature, 1475–1950 (2nd ed., 1961), lists important publications year by year, together with the significant literary events for each year. Seven volumes have been published in The Oxford English Literary History, gen. eds. Jonathan Bate and Colin Burrow (2002–): Laura Ashe, 1000–1350: Conquest and Transformation; James Simpson, 1350–1547: Reform and Cultural Revolution; Margaret J. M. Ezell, 1645–1714: The Later Seventeenth Century; Philip Davis, 1830–1880: The Victorians; Chris Baldick, 1830–1880: The Modern Movement (1910–1940); Randall Stevenson, 1960–2000: The Last of England?; and Bruce King, 1948–2000: The Internationalization of English Literature. See also The Cambridge History of Medieval English Literature, ed. David Wallace (1999); The Cambridge History of Early Medieval English Literature, ed. Clare E. Lees (2013); The Cambridge History of Early Modern English Literature, ed. David Loewenstein and Janel Mueller (2002); The Cambridge History of English Literature, 1660–1780, ed. John Richetti (2005); The Cambridge History of English Romantic Literature, ed. James Chandler (2009); The Cambridge History of Victorian Literature, ed. Kate Flint (2012); and The Cambridge History of Twentieth-Century English Literature, ed. Laura Marcus and Peter Nicholls (2004).

Helpful treatments and surveys of English meter, rhyme, and stanza forms are Paul Fussell Jr., Poetic Meter and Poetic Form (rev. ed., 1979); Donald Wesling, The Chances of Rhyme: Device and Modernity (1980); Charles O. Hartman, Free Verse: An Essay on Prosody (1980); Derek Attridge, Poetic Rhythm: An Introduction (1995); Robert Pinsky, The Sounds of Poetry: A Brief Guide (1998); The Making of a Poem: A Norton Anthology of Poetic Forms, ed. Mark Strand and Eavan Boland (2000); John Hollander, Rhyme's Reason: A Guide to English Verse (3rd ed., 2001); Poems, Poets, Poetry: An Introduction and Anthology, ed. Helen Vendler (3rd ed., 2010); The Lyric Theory Reader: A Critical Anthology, ed. Virginia Jackson and Yopie Prins (2014); and Jonathan Culler, Theory of the Lyric (2015).

On the development and functioning of the novel as a form, see Ian Watt, The Rise of the Novel: Studies in Defoe, Richardson, and Fielding (1957); Gérard Genette, Narrative Discourse: An Essay in Method (1970; trans. 1980); Theory of the Novel: A Historical Approach, ed. Michael McKeon (2000); The Novel, ed. Franco Moretti (2 vols.; 2001–03, trans. 2006); McKeon, The Origins of the English Novel, 1600–1740 (15th anniversary ed., 2002); The Cambridge History of the English Novel, ed. Robert L. Caserio and Clement Hawes (2012); A Companion to the English Novel, ed. Stephen Arata et al. (2015); and the ten volumes to date of The Oxford History of the Novel in English (2012–). On women novelists and readers, see Nancy Armstrong, Desire and Domestic Fiction: A Political History of the Novel (1987), and Catherine Gallagher, Nobody's Story: The Vanishing Acts of Women Writers in the Marketplace, 1670–1820 (1994).

On the history of playhouse design, see Richard Leacroft, The Development of the English Playhouse: An Illustrated Survey of Theatre Building in England from Medieval to Modern Times (1988). For a survey of the plays that have appeared on these and other stages, see Allardyce Nicoll, British Drama, rev. J. C. Trewin (6th ed., 1978); the eight-volume The Revels History of Drama in English, gen. eds. Clifford Leech and T. W. Craik (1975–83); Alfred Harbage, Annals of English Drama, 975–1700, rev. S. Schoenbaum and Sylvia Wagonheim (3rd ed., 1989); and the three volumes of The Cambridge History of British Theatre, ed. Jane Milling, Peter Thomson, Joseph Donohue, and Baz Kershaw (2004).

On some of the key intellectual currents that are at once reflected in and shaped by literature and contemporary literary criticism, Arthur O. Lovejoy's classic studies The Great Chain of Being (1936) and Essays in the History of Ideas (1948) remain valuable, along with such works as Georg Simmel, The Philosophy of Money (1900; trans. 1907; 3rd enl. ed., 2004); Ernst Cassirer, The Philosophy of Symbolic Forms (4 vols., 1923–95; trans. 1953–96); Arthur O. Lovejoy and George Boas, Primitivism and Related Ideas in Antiquity (1935); Norbert Elias, The Civilizing Process (2 vols., 1939; trans. 1979–82); Simone de Beauvoir, The Second Sex (2 vols., 1949; trans. 1953, new trans. 2009); Frantz Fanon, Black Skin, White Masks (1952; trans. 1957, new trans. 2008); Ernst Kantorowicz, The King's Two Bodies: A Study in Mediaeval Political Theology (1957; new eds. 1997, 2016); Hannah Arendt, The Human Condition (1958; 2nd ed., 1998); Gaston Bachelard, The Poetics of Space (1958; trans. 1969, new ed. 1994); Richard Popkin, The History of Scepticism from Erasmus to Descartes (1960; rev. ed., 1964; rev. and expanded as The History of Scepticism: From Savonarola to Bayle, 2003); Hans Blumenberg, The Legitimacy of the Modern Age (1966; trans. 1983); M. H. Abrams, Natural Supernaturalism: Tradition and Revolution in Romantic Literature (1971); Michel Foucault, Madness and Civilization: A History of Insanity in the Age of Reason (1964; trans. 1965) and The Order of Things: An Archaeology of the Human Sciences (1966; trans. 1970); Jacques Derrida, Of Grammatology (1967; trans. 1976, 40th anniversary ed. 2016) and Dissemination (1972; trans. 1981); Martin Jay, The Dialectical Imagination: A History of the Frankfurt School and the Institute of Social Research, 1923–1950 (1973); Hayden White, Metahistory: The Historical Imagination in Nineteenth-Century Europe (1973); Roland Barthes, The Pleasure of the Text (1973; trans. 1975); Raymond Williams, Keywords: A Vocabulary of Culture and Society (1976; new ed., 2015); Pierre Bourdieu, Distinction: A Social Critique of the Judgement of Taste (1979; trans. 1984); Richard Rorty, Philosophy and the Mirror of Nature (1979; 39th anniversary ed., 2009); Gilles Deleuze and Félix Guattari, A Thousand Plateaus: Capitalism and Schizophrenia (1980; trans. 1987); Michel de Certeau, The Practice of Everyday Life (2 vols., 1980; trans. 1984–98); Jürgen Habermas, The Philosophical Discourse of Modernity: Twelve Lectures (1985; trans. 1987); Slavoj Žižek, The Sublime Object of Ideology (1989); Homi Bhabha, The Location of Culture (1994; new ed., 2004); Judith Butler, The Psychic Life of Power: Theories in Subjection (1997); Sigmund Freud, Writings on Art and Literature, ed. Neil Hertz (1997); and N. Katherine Hayles, How We Became Posthuman: Virtual Bodies in Cybernetics, Literature, and Informatics (1999).

Reference Works

The single most important tool for the study of literature in English is the Oxford English Dictionary (1884–1924; 2nd ed., 1989; 3rd ed. in process). The most current edition, updated quarterly, is available online to subscribers. The OED is written on historical principles: that is, it attempts not only to describe current word use but also to record the history and development of the language from its origins before the Norman Conquest to the present. It thus provides, for familiar as well as archaic and obscure words, the widest possible range of meanings and uses, organized chronologically and illustrated with quotations. The OED can be searched as a conventional dictionary arranged a–z and also by subject, usage, region, origin, and timeline (the first appearance of a word). Resources available for early forms of English include the online Old English and Middle English dictionaries at Lexilogos (https://www.lexilogos.com/english/english_old.htm and https://www.lexilogos.com/english/english_middle.htm); also valuable are the Dictionary of Old English (1986–) and the Middle English Dictionary (1952; digitized 2008). Beyond the OED there are many other valuable dictionaries, such as The American Heritage Dictionary (5th ed., 50th anniversary printing, 2018); The Oxford Dictionary of Abbreviations (1992); T. F. Hoad, The Concise Oxford Dictionary of English Etymology (1993); Bas Aarts, Sylvia Chalker, and Edmund Weiner, The Oxford Dictionary of English Grammar (2nd ed., 2014); Morton S. Freeman, A New Dictionary of Eponyms (1997); The Oxford Essential Dictionary of Foreign Terms in English (1999); The Oxford Dictionary of Idioms, ed. Judith Siefring (2nd ed., 2004); P. H. Matthews, The Concise Oxford Dictionary of Linguistics (3rd ed., 2014); Tom McArthur, The Oxford Guide to World English (2002); and The Concise Oxford Dictionary of Proverbs, ed. Jennifer Speake (4th ed., 2003). Other valuable reference works include The Cambridge Encyclopedia of the English Language, ed. David Crystal (3rd ed., 2018); The Concise Oxford Companion to the English Language, ed. Tom McArthur (1998); Fowler's Concise Dictionary of Modern English Usage, ed. Jeremy Butterfield (3rd ed., 2016); and the numerous guides to specialized vocabularies, slang, regional dialects, and the like.

There is a steady flow of new editions of most major and many minor writers in English, along with the publication of critical appraisals and scholarship. James L. Harner's Literary Research Guide: An Annotated List of Reference Sources in English Literary Studies (6th ed., 2014; available online at www.mla.org/public) offers thorough, evaluative annotations of a wide range of sources. For the historical record of scholarship and critical discussion, The New Cambridge Bibliography of English Literature, ed. George Watson (5 vols., 1969–77), and the third edition in process, The Cambridge Bibliography of English Literature, ed. Joanne Shattock (1 vol. to date, 2000–), are useful. The MLA International Bibliography (also online) is a key resource for following critical discussion of literatures in English. Ranging from 1926 to the present, it includes journal articles, essays, chapters from collections, books, and dissertations, and covers folklore, linguistics, and film. The Annual Bibliography of English Language and Literature (ABELL), compiled by the Modern Humanities Research Association, lists monographs, periodical articles, critical editions of literary works, book reviews, and collections of essays published anywhere in the world; unpublished doctoral dissertations are covered for the period 1920–99 (available online to subscribers directly and as part of Literature Online, <http://literature.proquest.com/marketing/index.jsp>).

For compact biographies of English authors, see the multivolume Oxford Dictionary of National Biography (DNB), ed. H. C. G. Matthew and Brian Harrison (2004); since 2004 the DNB has been extended online with updates (now monthly). Handy reference books of authors, works, and various literary terms and allusions include many volumes in the Cambridge Companion and Oxford Companion series: e.g., The Cambridge Companion to Narrative, ed. David Herman (2007); The Oxford Companion to English Literature, ed. Dinah Birch (7th ed., 2009); and The Cambridge Companion to Allegory, ed. Rita Copeland and Peter Struck (2010). The Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, editor-in-chief Roland Greene (4th ed., 2012), is available online to subscribers in Oxford Reference. Handbooks that define and illustrate literary concepts and terms include The Penguin Dictionary of Literary Terms and Literary Theory, ed. J. A. Cuddon and M. A. R. Habib (5th ed., 2015); William Harmon, A Handbook to Literature (12th ed., 2011); Critical Terms for Literary Study, ed. Frank Lentricchia and Thomas McLaughlin (2nd ed., 1995); and M. H. Abrams and Geoffrey Galt Harpham, A Glossary of Literary Terms (11th ed., 2014). Also useful are Richard A. Lanham, A Handlist of Rhetorical Terms (2nd ed., 1991); Arthur Quinn, Figures of Speech: 60 Ways to Turn a Phrase (1982); the Barnhart Concise Dictionary of Etymology, ed. Robert K. Barnhart (1995); and George A. Kennedy, A New History of Classical Rhetoric (1994).

On Greek and Roman backgrounds, see The Cambridge History of Classical Literature—vol. 1, Greek Literature, ed. P. E. Easterling and Bernard M. W. Knox (1985), and vol. 2, Latin Literature, ed. E. J. Kenney and W. V. Clausen (1982), both available to subscribers online; The Oxford Companion to Classical Literature, ed. M. C. Howatson (3rd ed., 2011); Gian Biagio Conte, Latin Literature: A History (1987; trans. 1994); The Oxford Classical Dictionary, ed. Simon Hornblower, Antony Spawforth, and Esther Eidinow (4th ed., 2012); Richard Rutherford, Classical Literature: A Concise History (2005); and Mark P. O. Morford, Robert J. Lenardon, and Michael Sham, Classical Mythology (11th ed., 2018). The Loeb Classical Library of Greek and Roman texts with facing-page English translations is now available online to subscribers at www.loebclassics.com.

Digital resources in the humanities continue to grow rapidly. Among the many useful electronic resources for the study of English literature are enormous digital archives, available to subscribers: Early English Books Online (EEBO), <http://eebo.chadwyck.com/home>; Literature Online, <http://literature.proquest.com/marketing/index.jsp>; and Eighteenth Century Collections Online (ECCO), www.gale.com/primary-sources/eighteenth-century-collections-online. There are also numerous free sites of variable quality. Many of the best of these are period- or author-specific and hence are listed in the period/author bibliographies on the NAEL website. Among the general sites, one of the most useful and wide-ranging is Voice of the Shuttle (<http://vos.ucsb.edu>), which includes links to Bartleby.com and Project Gutenberg.

Literary Criticism and Theory

The Cambridge History of Literary Criticism comprises nine volumes (1989–2013): Classical Criticism, ed. George A. Kennedy; The Middle Ages, ed. Alastair Minnis and Ian Johnson; The Renaissance, ed. Glyn P. Norton; The Eighteenth Century, ed. H. B. Nisbet and Claude Rawson; Romanticism, ed. Marshall Brown; The Nineteenth Century, c. 1830–1914, ed. M. A. R. Habib; Modernism and the New Criticism, ed. A. Walton Litz, Louis Menand, and Lawrence Rainey; From Formalism to Poststructuralism, ed. Raman Selden; and Twentieth-Century Historical, Philosophical and Psychological Perspectives, ed. Christa Knellwolf and Christopher Norris. See also M. H. Abrams, The Mirror and the Lamp: Romantic Theory and the Critical Tradition (1953); William K. Wimsatt Jr. and Cleanth Brooks, Literary Criticism: A Short History (1957); René Wellek, A History of Modern Criticism: 1750–1950 (8 vols., 1955–92); Frank Lentricchia, After the New Criticism (1980); J. Hillis Miller, On Literature (2002); and John Frow, Character and Person (2014). Raman Selden, Peter Widdowson, and Peter Brooker have written A Reader's Guide to Contemporary Literary Theory (6th ed., 2017). Other useful resources include The Johns Hopkins Guide to Literary Theory and Criticism, ed. Michael Groden, Martin Kreiswirth, and Imre Szeman (2nd ed., 2005); Literary Theory: An Anthology, ed. Julie Rivkin and Michael Ryan (3rd ed., 2017); and The Norton Anthology of Theory and Criticism, gen. ed. Vincent B. Leitch (3rd ed., 2018).

Modern approaches to English literature and literary theory were shaped by certain landmark works: William Empson, Seven Types of Ambiguity (1930; 3rd ed., 1953), Some Versions of Pastoral (1935), and The Structure of Complex Words (1951; 3rd ed., 1977); T. S. Eliot, Selected Essays (1932; 3rd ed., 1951) and On Poetry and Poets (1957); F. R. Leavis, Revaluation: Tradition and Development in English Poetry (1936) and The Great Tradition: George Eliot, Henry James, Joseph Conrad (1948); Erich Auerbach, Mimesis: The Representation of Reality in Western Literature (1946; trans. 1953); Lionel Trilling, The Liberal Imagination: Essays on Literature and Society (1950); William K. Wimsatt Jr., The Verbal Icon: Studies in the Meaning of Poetry (1954); Northrop Frye, Anatomy of Criticism: Four Essays (1957); Wayne C. Booth, The Rhetoric of Fiction (1961; 2nd ed., 1983); and W. Jackson Bate, The Burden of the Past and the English Poet (1970). René Wellek and Austin Warren, Theory of Literature (3rd ed., 1963), is a useful introduction to the variety of scholarly and critical approaches to literature up to the time of its publication. Jonathan Culler's Literary Theory: A Very Short Introduction (2nd ed., 2011), discusses recurrent issues and debates. On the discipline of criticism, see John Guillory's Professing Criticism: Essays on the Organization of Literary Study (2022); Rita Felski's The Limits of Critique (2015) is a critical assessment of contemporary criticism.

Beginning in the late 1960s, interest in literary theory as a specific field markedly intensified. Certain forms of literary study had already been influenced by the work of the Russian linguist Roman Jakobson and the Russian formalist Viktor Shklovsky—and, still more, by conceptions that derived or claimed to derive from Marx and Engels—but the full impact of these theories was not felt until what became known as the “theory revolution” of the 1970s and ’80s. For Marxist literary criticism, see Georg Lukács, Theory of the Novel: A Historico-philosophical Essay on the Forms of Great Epic Literature (1920; trans. 1971), The Historical Novel (1937; trans. 1962), and Studies in European Realism: A Sociological Survey of the Writings of Balzac, Stendhal, Zola, Tolstoy, Gorki, and Others (trans. 1950); Walter Benjamin's essays from the 1920s and ’30s, represented in Illuminations (1955; trans. 1968) and Reflections: Essays, Aphorisms, Autobiographical Writings (1975; trans. 1978); Mikhail Bakhtin's essays from the 1930s represented in The Dialogic Imagination: Four Essays (trans. 1981) and Rabelais and His World (1965; trans. 1968); Selections from the Prison Notebooks of Antonio Gramsci, ed. and trans. Quintin Hoare and Geoffrey Nowell Smith (1971); Raymond Williams, Marxism and Literature (1977); Tony Bennett, Formalism and Marxism (1979; 2nd ed., 2003); Fredric Jameson, The Political Unconscious: Narrative as a Socially Symbolic Act (1981); and Terry Eagleton, Literary Theory: An Introduction (1983; anniversary ed., 2008) and The Ideology of the Aesthetic (1990).

Structural linguistics and anthropology gave rise to a flowering of structuralist literary criticism; convenient introductions include Robert Scholes, Structuralism in Literature: An Introduction (1974), and Jonathan Culler, Structuralist Poetics: Structuralism, Linguistics and the Study of Literature (new ed., 2002). Poststructuralist challenges to this approach are epitomized in such influential works as Jacques Derrida, Writing and Difference (1967; trans. 1978), and Paul de Man, Blindness and Insight: Essays in the Rhetoric of Contemporary Criticism (1971; 2nd ed., 1983). Poststructuralism is discussed in Jonathan Culler, On Deconstruction: Theory and Criticism after Structuralism (1982; 25th anniversary ed., 2007); Slavoj Žižek, The Sublime Object of Ideology (1989); Fredric Jameson, Postmodernism; or, The Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism (1991); John McGowan, Postmodernism and Its Critics (1991); and Beyond Structuralism: The Speculations of Theory and the Experience of Reading, ed. Wendell V. Harris (1996). A figure who greatly influenced both structuralism and poststructuralism is Roland Barthes, in Mythologies (1957; trans. 1972, new trans. 2012) and S/Z (1970; trans. 1974). Among other influential contributions to literary theory are the psychoanalytic approach in Harold Bloom, The Anxiety of Influence: A Theory of Poetry (1973; 2nd ed., 1997), and the reader-response approach in Stanley Fish, Is There a Text in This Class? The Authority of Interpretive Communities (1980). For a retrospect on these decades, see Terry Eagleton, After Theory (2003).

Influenced by these theoretical currents but not restricted to them, modern feminist literary criticism was fashioned by such works as Patricia Meyer Spacks, The Female Imagination (1975); Ellen Moers, Literary Women (1976; new ed., 1986); Elaine Showalter, A Literature of Their Own: British Women Novelists from Brontë to Lessing (1977; expanded ed., 1999); and Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar, The Madwoman in the Attic: The Woman Writer and the Nineteenth-Century Literary Imagination (1979). Subsequent studies include Jane Gallop, The Daughter's Seduction: Feminism and Psychoanalysis (1982); Luce Irigaray, This Sex Which Is Not One (1977; trans. 1985); Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak, In Other Worlds: Essays in Cultural Politics (1987; new ed., 2006); Barbara Johnson, A World of Difference (1987); Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar, No Man's Land: The Place of the Woman Writer in the Twentieth Century (3 vols., 1988–94); Judith Butler, Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity (1990; 2nd ed., 1999); and the critical views sampled in The New Feminist Criticism: Essays on Women, Literature, and Theory, ed. Elaine Showalter (1985); Feminist Literary Theory: A Reader, ed. Mary Eagleton (1986; 3rd ed., 2011); and Feminisms: An Anthology of Literary Theory and Criticism, ed. Robyn R. Warhol and Diane Price Herndl (1991; rev. in 2009 as Feminisms Redux: An Anthology of Literary Theory and Criticism); The Hélène Cixous Reader, ed. Susan Sellers (1994); The Cambridge Companion to Feminist Literary Theory, ed. Ellen Rooney (2006); and Feminist Literary Theory and Criticism: A Norton Reader, ed. Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar (2007).

Just as feminist critics used poststructuralist and psychoanalytic methods to place literature in conversation with gender theory, a new school emerged placing literature in conversation with critical race theory. Comprehensive introductions include Critical Race Theory: The Key Writings That Formed the Movement, ed. Kimberlé Crenshaw et al. (1995); and Richard Delgado and Jean Stefancic, Critical Race Theory: An Introduction (3rd ed., 2017); and The Routledge Companion to Race and Ethnicity, ed. Stephen M. Caliendo and Charlton D. McIlwain (2nd ed., 2021). For an important precursor in cultural studies, see Stuart Hall et al., Policing the Crisis: Mugging, the State and Law and Order (1978; 2nd ed., 2013). Seminal works include Henry Louis Gates Jr., The Signifying Monkey: A Theory of African-American Literary Criticism (1988; 25th anniversary ed., 2014); Patricia Williams, The Alchemy of Race and Rights (1991); Toni Morrison, Playing in the Dark: Whiteness and the Literary Imagination (1992); Cornel West, Race Matters (1993; 25th anniversary ed., 2017); Gene Andrew Jarrett, Representing the Race: A New Political History of African American Literature (2011); Fred Moten, Black and Blur (2017); and Saidiya V. Hartman, Wayward Lives, Beautiful Experiments: Intimate Histories of Social Upheaval (2019). Other important works include Kathleen Davis, Periodization and Sovereignty: How Ideas of Feudalism and Secularization Govern the Politics of Time (2008; rpt. 2017); Alexander G.

Weheliye, Habeas Viscus: Racializing Assemblages, Biopolitics, and Black Feminist Theories of the Human (2014); Christina Sharpe, In the Wake: On Blackness and Being (2016); and Geraldine Heng, The Invention of Race in the European Middle Ages (2018). Helpful anthologies and collections of essays have emerged in recent decades, such as The Oxford Companion to African American Literature, ed. William L. Andrews, Frances Smith Foster, and Trudier Harris (1997), and also their Concise Oxford Companion to African American Literature (2001); Unchained Voices: An Anthology of Black Authors in the English-Speaking World of the Eighteenth Century, ed. Vincent Carretta (1996; updated 2003); The Cambridge Companion to Jewish American Literature, ed. Hana Wirth-Nesher and Michael P. Kramer (2003); A Companion to African American Literature, ed. Gene Andrew Jarrett (2010); The Routledge Companion to Anglophone Caribbean Literature, ed. Michael A. Bucknor and Alison Donnell (2011); The Routledge Companion to Latino/a Literature, ed. Suzanne Bost and Frances R. Aparicio (2013); The Routledge Companion to Asian American and Pacific Islander Literature, ed. Rachel C. Lee (2014); The Cambridge Companion to Asian American Literature, ed. Crystal Parikh and Daniel Y. Kim (2015); and The Cambridge Companion to British Black and Asian Literature, 1945–2010, ed. Deirdre Osborne (2016).

Gay literature and queer studies are represented in collections including Inside/Out: Lesbian Theories, Gay Theories, ed. Diana Fuss (1991); The Lesbian and Gay Studies Reader, ed. Henry Abelove, Michèle Aina Barale, and David Halperin (1993); The Columbia Anthology of Gay Literature: Readings from Western Antiquity to the Present Day, ed. Byrne R. S. Fone (1998); The Cambridge History of Gay and Lesbian Literature, ed. E. L. McCallum and Mikko Tuhkanen (2014); and The Cambridge Companion to Lesbian Literature, ed. Jodie Medd (2015), and by such books as Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick, Between Men: English Literature and Male Homosocial Desire (1985; 30th anniversary ed., 2015) and Epistemology of the Closet (1990; updated ed., 2008); Diana Fuss, Essentially Speaking: Feminism, Nature, and Difference (1989); Terry Castle, The Apparitional Lesbian: Female Homosexuality and Modern Culture (1993); Leo Bersani, Homos (1995); Gregory Woods, A History of Gay Literature: The Male Tradition (1998); David Halperin, How to Do the History of Homosexuality (2002); Judith Halberstam, In a Queer Time and Place: Transgender Bodies, Subcultural Lives (2005); Heather Love, Feeling Backward: Loss and the Politics of Queer History (2007); and Brian Glavey, The Wallflower Avant-garde: Modernism, Sexuality, and Queer Ekphrasis (2016).

New Historicism is represented in Stephen Greenblatt, Learning to Curse: Essays in Early Modern Culture (1990; new ed., 2007); New Historical Literary Study: Essays on Reproducing Texts, Representing History, ed. Jeffrey N. Cox and Larry J. Reynolds (1993); The New Historicism Reader, ed. H. Aram Veeser (1994); and Catherine Gallagher and Stephen Greenblatt, Practicing New Historicism (2000). The related social and historical dimension of texts is discussed in Jerome McGann, Critique of Modern Textual Criticism (1983), and Scholarly Editing: A Guide to Research, ed. D. C. Greetham (1995). Characteristic of New Historicism is an expansion of the field of literary interpretation still further in cultural studies; for a broad sampling of the range of interests, see Cultural Studies, ed. Lawrence Grossberg, Cary Nelson, and Paula A. Treichler (1992); A Cultural Studies Reader: History, Theory, Practice, ed. Jessica Munns and Gita Rajan (1995); and The Cultural Studies Reader, ed. Simon During (3rd ed., 2007).

This expansion of the field is similarly reflected in postcolonial studies: see Frantz Fanon, Black Skin, White Masks (cited above) and The Wretched of the Earth (1961; trans. 1963, 60th anniversary ed. 2021); Edward Said, Orientalism (1978) and Culture and Imperialism (1993); Nation and Narration, ed. Homi K. Bhabha (1990); The Post-Colonial Studies Reader, ed. Bill Ashcroft, Gareth Griffiths and Helen Tiffin (2nd ed., 2006); and such influential books as Bill Ashcroft, Gareth Griffiths, and Helen Tiffin, The Empire Writes Back: Theory and Practice in Post-Colonial Literatures (1989; 2nd ed., 2002); Homi K. Bhabha, The Location of Culture (1994; new ed., 2004); Elleke Boehmer, Colonial and Postcolonial Literature: Migrant Metaphors (1995; 2nd ed., 2005); Dipesh Chakrabarty, Provincializing Europe: Postcolonial Thought and Historical Difference (2000; new ed., 2008); and Robert J. C. Young, Postcolonialism: An Historical Introduction (2001; anniversary ed., 2016). Useful collections include The Cambridge History of Postcolonial Literature, ed. Ato Quayson (2 vols., 2011–12); The Cambridge Companion to the Postcolonial Novel, ed. Ato Quayson (2016); and The Cambridge Companion to Postcolonial Poetry, ed. Jahan Ramazani (2017).

In the wake of the theory revolution, critics have focused on a wide array of topics, which can be only briefly surveyed here. One current of work, focusing on the history of emotion, is represented in Brian Massumi, Parables for the Virtual: Movement, Affect, Sensation (2002); Sianne Ngai, Ugly Feelings (2005); The Affect Theory Reader, ed. Melissa Gregg and Gregory J. Seigworth (2010); and Judith Butler, Senses of the Subject (2015). A somewhat related current, examining the special role of traumatic memory in literature, is exemplified in Trauma: Explorations in Memory, ed. Cathy Caruth (1995), and Dominic LaCapra, Writing History, Writing Trauma (2001; new ed., 2014). Work on the literary implications of cognitive science may be glimpsed in Introduction to Cognitive Cultural Studies, ed. Lisa Zunshine (2010). Interest in quantitative approaches to literature was sparked by Franco Moretti's Graphs, Maps, Trees: Abstract Models for Literary History (2005). For the field of digital humanities, see Moretti, Distant Reading (2013); Defining Digital Humanities: A Reader, ed. Melissa Terras, Julianne Nyhan, and Edward Vanhoutte (2013); and A New Companion to Digital Humanities, ed. Susan Schreibman, Ray Siemens, and John Unsworth (2016). For ecocriticism, or studies of literature and the environment, see The Ecocriticism Reader: Landmarks in Literary Ecology, ed. Cheryll Glotfelty and Harold Fromm (1996); Writing the Environment: Ecocriticism and Literature, ed. Richard Kerridge and Neil Sammells (1998); Jonathan Bate, The Song of the Earth (2000); Lawrence Buell, The Future of Environmental Criticism: Environmental Crisis and Literary Imagination (2005); Timothy Morton, Ecology Without Nature: Rethinking Environmental Aesthetics (2007); Jane Bennett, Vibrant Matter: A Political Ecology of Things (2010); Rob Nixon, Slow Violence and the Environmentalism of the Poor (2011); The Oxford Handbook of Ecocriticism, ed. Greg Garrard (2014); and Anthropocene Reading: Literary History in Geologic Times, ed. Tobias Menely and Jesse Oak Taylor (2017). Related are the fields of animal studies and posthumanism, whose key works include Bruno Latour, We Have Never Been Modern (1991; trans. 1993); Steve Baker, The Postmodern Animal (2000); Cary Wolfe, Animal Rites: American Culture, the Discourse of Species, and Posthumanist Theory (2003) and What Is Posthumanism? (2009); Jacques Derrida, The Animal That Therefore I Am (2006; trans. 2008); Kari Weil, Thinking Animals: Why Animal Studies Now? (2012); Animals and the Human Imagination: A Companion to Animal Studies, ed. Aaron Gross and Anne Vallely (2012); and Critical Animal Studies: Thinking the Unthinkable, ed. John Sorenson (2014). The relationship between literature and law is central to such works as Interpreting Law and Literature: A Hermeneutic Reader, ed. Sanford Levinson and Steven Mailloux (1988); Law's Stories: Narrative and Rhetoric in the Law, ed. Peter Brooks and Paul Gewirtz (1996); Literature and Legal Problem Solving: Law and Literature as Ethical Discourse, ed. Paul J. Heald (1998); and New Directions in Law and Literature, ed. Elizabeth

S. Anker and Bernadette Meyler (2017). Ethical questions in literature have been usefully explored by, among others, Geoffrey Galt Harpham in Getting It Right: Language, Literature, and Ethics (1992) and Derek Attridge in The Singularity of Literature (2004). Finally, some approaches to literature, such as formalism and literary biography, that seemed superseded in the theoretical ferment of the late twentieth century have had a resurgence. A renewed interest in form is evident in Susan Stewart, Poetry and the Fate of the Senses (2002); Reading for Form, ed. Susan J. Wolfson and Marshall Brown (2006); and Caroline Levine, Forms: Whole, Rhythm, Hierarchy, Network (2015). Interest in the history of the book was spearheaded by D. F. McKenzie's Bibliography and the Sociology of Texts (1986), Jerome J. McGann's The Textual Condition (1991), and Roger Chartier's The Order of Books: Readers, Authors, and Libraries in Europe Between the Fourteenth and Eighteenth Centuries (1992; trans. 1994). See also The Practice and Representation of Reading in England, ed. James Raven, Helen Small, and Naomi Tadmor (1996); The Cambridge History of the Book in Britain (7 vols., 1999–2019); The Book History Reader, ed. David Finkelstein and Alistair McCleery (2nd ed., 2006); and The Cambridge Companion to the History of the Book, ed. Leslie Howsam (2015). For studies in new media and digital or electronic literature, see N. Katherine Hayles, Electronic Literature: New Horizons for the Literary (2008); Matthew G. Kirschenbaum, Track Changes: A Literary History of Word Processing (2016); and Jessica Pressman's Bookishness: Loving Books in a Digital Age (2020).

Anthologies representing a range of recent approaches include Modern Criticism and Theory, ed. David Lodge with Nigel Wood (2nd ed., 2000); Contemporary Literary Criticism, ed. Robert Con Davis and Ronald Schleifer (4th ed., 1998); and The Norton Anthology of Theory and Criticism (cited above).

Literary Terminology*

Using simple technical terms can sharpen our understanding and streamline our discussion of literary works. Some terms, such as the ones in section A, below, help us address the internal style, structure, form, and kind of works. Other terms, such as those in section B, provide insight into the material forms in which literary works have been produced.

In analyzing what they called “rhetoric,” ancient Greek and Roman writers determined the elements of what we call “style” and “structure.” Most of our literary terms are derived, via medieval and Renaissance intermediaries, from the Greek and Latin sources. In the definitions that follow, the etymology, or root, of the word is given when it helps illuminate the word’s current usage.

Many of the examples are drawn from texts in The Norton Anthology of English Literature.

Words boldfaced within definitions are themselves defined in this appendix. Some terms are defined within definitions; such words are italicized.

A. Terms of Style, Structure, Form, and Kind

accent (synonym “stress”): a term of rhythm. The special force devoted to the voicing of one syllable in a word over others. In the noun “accent,” for example, the accent, or stress, is on the first syllable.

act: the major subdivision of a play, usually divided into scenes.

aesthetics (from Greek, “to feel, apprehend by the senses”): the philosophy of artistic meaning as a distinct mode of apprehending untranslatable truth, defined as an alternative to rational enquiry, which is purely abstract. Developed in the late eighteenth century by the German philosopher Immanuel Kant especially.

Alexandrine: a term of meter. In French verse a line of twelve syllables, and, by analogy, in English verse a line of six stresses. See hexameter.

allegory (Greek “saying otherwise”): saying one thing (the “vehicle” of the allegory) and meaning another (the allegory’s “tenor”). Allegories may be momentary aspects of a work, as in metaphor (“John is a lion”), or, through extended metaphor, may constitute the basis of narrative, as in Bunyan’s Pilgrim’s Progress: this second meaning is the dominant one. See also symbol and type. Allegory is one of the most significant figures of thought.

alliteration (from Latin “litera,” alphabetic letter): a figure of speech. The repetition of an initial consonant sound or consonant cluster in consecutive or closely positioned words.

This pattern is often an inseparable part of the meter in Germanic languages, where the tonic, or accented syllable, is usually the first syllable. Thus all Old English poetry and some varieties of Middle English poetry use alliteration as part of their basic metrical practice. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, line 1: "Once the siege and assault of Troy had ceased" (see vol. A, p. 415). Otherwise used for local effects; Stevie Smith, "Pretty," lines 4–5: "And in the pretty pool the pike stalks / He stalks his prey . . ." (see vol. F, p. 589).

allusion: Literary allusion is a passing but illuminating reference within a literary text to another, well-known text (often biblical or classical). Topical allusions are also, of course, common in certain modes, especially satire.

anagnorisis (Greek "recognition"): the moment of protagonist's recognition in a narrative, which is also often the moment of moral understanding.

anapest: a term of rhythm. A three-syllable foot following the rhythmic pattern, in English verse, of two unstressed (uu) syllables followed by one stressed (/). Thus, for example, "Illinois."

anaphora (Greek "carrying back"): a figure of speech. The repetition of words or groups of words at the beginning of consecutive sentences, clauses, or phrases. Blake, "London," lines 5–8: "In every cry of every Man, / In every Infant's cry of fear, / In every voice, in every ban . . ." (see vol. D, p. 137); Louise Bennett, "Jamaica Oman," lines 17–20: "Some backa man a push, some side-a / Man a hole him han, / Some a lick sense eena him head, / Some a guide him pon him plan!" (see vol. F, p. 724).

animal fable: a genre. A short narrative of speaking animals, followed by moralizing comment, written in a low style and gathered into a collection. Robert Henryson, "The Cock and the Jasper" (see vol. A, p. 679).

antithesis (Greek "placing against"): a figure of thought. The juxtaposition of opposed terms in clauses or sentences that are next to or near each other. Milton, Paradise Lost 1.777–80: "They but now who seemed / In bigness to surpass Earth's giant sons / Now less than smallest dwarfs, in narrow room / Throng numberless" (see vol. B, p. 1448).

apostrophe (from Greek "turning away"): a figure of thought. An address, often to an absent person, a force, or a quality. For example, a poet makes an apostrophe to a Muse when invoking her for inspiration.

apposition: a term of syntax. The repetition of elements serving an identical grammatical function in one sentence. The effect of this repetition is to arrest the flow of the sentence, but in doing so to add extra semantic nuance to repeated elements. This is an especially important feature of Old English poetic style. See, for example, Caedmon's Hymn (vol. A, p. 31), where the phrases "heaven-kingdom's Guardian," "the Measurer's might," "his mind-plans," and "the work of the Glory-Father" each serve an identical syntactic function as the direct objects of "praise."

assonance (Latin "sounding to"): a figure of speech. The repetition of identical or near identical stressed vowel sounds in words whose final consonants differ, producing half-rhyme. Tennyson, "The Lady of Shalott," line 100: "His broad clear brow in sunlight glowed" (see vol. E, p. 210).

aubade (originally from Spanish "alba," dawn): a genre. A lover's dawn song or lyric bewailing the arrival of the day and the necessary separation of the lovers; Donne, "The Sun Rising" (see vol. B, p. 888). Larkin recasts the genre in "Aubade" (see vol. F, p. 795).

autobiography (Greek "self-life writing"): a genre. A narrative of a life written by the subject; Wordsworth, The Prelude (see vol. D, p. 391). There are subgenres, such as the spiritual autobiography, narrating the author's path to conversion and subsequent spiritual trials, as in Bunyan's Grace Abounding.

ballad stanza: a verse form. Usually a quatrain in alternating iambic tetrameter and iambic trimeter lines, rhyming abcb. See "Sir Patrick Spens" (vol. D, p. 38); Louise Bennett's poems (vol. F, pp. 719–24); Eliot, "Sweeney among the Nightingales" (vol. F, p. 501); Larkin, "This Be The Verse" (vol. F, p. 795).

ballade: a verse form. A form consisting usually of three stanzas followed by a four-line envoi (French, "send off"). The last line of the first stanza establishes a refrain, which is repeated, or subtly varied, as the last line of each stanza. The form was derived from French medieval poetry; English poets, from the fourteenth to the sixteenth centuries especially, used it with varying stanza forms. Chaucer, "The Complaint of Chaucer to His Purse" (see vol. A, p. 575).

bathos (Greek "depth"): a figure of thought. A sudden and sometimes ridiculous descent of tone; Pope, The Rape of the Lock 3.157–58: "Not louder shrieks to pitying heaven are cast, / When husbands, or when lapdogs breathe their last" (see vol. C, p. 549).

beast epic: a genre. A continuous, unmoralized narrative, in prose or verse, relating the victories of the wholly unscrupulous but brilliant strategist Reynard the Fox over all adversaries. Chaucer arouses, only to deflate, expectations of the genre in The Nun's Priest's Tale (see vol. A, p. 556).

biography (Greek "life-writing"): a genre. A life as the subject of an extended narrative.

blank verse: a verse form. Unrhymed iambic pentameter lines. Blank verse has no stanzas, but is broken up into uneven units (verse paragraphs) determined by sense rather than form. First devised in English by Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, in his translation of two books of Virgil's Aeneid, this very flexible verse type became the standard form for dramatic poetry in the seventeenth century, as in most of Shakespeare's plays. Milton and Wordsworth, among many others, also used it to create an English equivalent to classical epic.

blazon: strictly, a heraldic shield; in rhetorical usage, a topos whereby the individual elements of a beloved's face and body are singled out for hyperbolic admiration. Spenser, Epithalamion, lines 167–84 (see vol. B, p. 459). For an inversion of the topos, see Shakespeare, Sonnet 130 (vol. B, p. 637).

burlesque (French and Italian “mocking”): a work that adopts the conventions of a genre with the aim less of comically mocking the genre than of satirically mocking the society so represented (see satire). Thus Pope’s Rape of the Lock (see vol. C, p. 537) does not mock classical epic so much as contemporary mores.

caesura (Latin “cut”) (plural “caesurae”): a term of meter. A pause or breathing space within a line of verse, generally occurring between syntactic units; Louise Bennett, “Colonization in Reverse,” lines 5–8: “By de hundred, by de tousan, / From country an from town, / By de ship-load, by de plane-load, / Jamaica is Englan boun” (see vol. F, p. 722), where the caesurae occur in lines 5 and 7.

canon (Greek “rule”): the group of texts regarded as worthy of special respect or attention by a given institution. Also, the group of texts regarded as definitely having been written by a certain author.

catastrophe (Greek “overturning”): the decisive turn in tragedy by which the plot is resolved and, usually, the protagonist dies.

catharsis (Greek “cleansing”): According to Aristotle, the effect of tragedy on its audience, through their experience of pity and terror, was a kind of spiritual cleansing, or catharsis.

character (Greek “stamp, impression”): a person, personified animal, or other figure represented in a literary work, especially in narrative and drama. The more a character seems to generate the action of a narrative, and the less he or she seems merely to serve a preordained narrative pattern, the “fuller,” or more “rounded,” a character is said to be. A “stock” character, common particularly in many comic genres, will perform a predictable function in different works of a given genre.

chiasmus (Greek “crosswise”): a figure of speech. The inversion of an already established sequence. This can involve verbal echoes: Pope, “Eloisa to Abelard,” line 104, “The crime was common, common be the pain” (see vol. C, p. 560); or it can be purely a matter of syntactic inversion: Pope, Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, line 8: “They pierce my thickets, through my grot they glide” (see vol. C, p. 575).

classical, classicism, classic: Each term can be widely applied, but in English literary discourse, “classical” primarily describes the works of either Greek or Roman antiquity. “Classicism” denotes the practice of art forms inspired by classical antiquity, in particular the observance of rhetorical norms of decorum and balance, as opposed to following the dictates of untutored inspiration, as in Romanticism. “Classic” denotes an especially famous work within a given canon.

climax (Greek “ladder”): a moment of great intensity and structural change, especially in drama. Also a figure of speech whereby a sequence of verbally linked clauses is made, in which each successive clause is of greater consequence than its predecessor. Bacon, Of Studies: “Studies serve for pastimes, for ornaments, and for abilities. Their chief use for pastimes is in privateness and retiring; for ornament, is in discourse; and for ability, is in judgement” (see vol. B, pp. 1167–68).

comedy: a genre. A term primarily applied to drama, and derived from ancient drama, in opposition to tragedy. Comedy deals with humorously confusing, sometimes ridiculous situations in which the ending is, nevertheless, happy. A comedy often ends in one or more marriages.

comic mode: Many genres (for example, romance, fabliau, comedy) involve a happy ending in which justice is done, the ravages of time are arrested, and that which is lost is found. Such genres participate in a comic mode.

connotation: To understand connotation, we need to understand denotation. While many words can denote the same concept—that is, have the same basic meaning—those words can evoke different associations, or connotations. Contrast, for example, the clinical-sounding term “depression” and the more colorful, musical, even poetic phrase “the blues.”

consonance (Latin “sounding with”): a figure of speech. The repetition of final consonants in words or stressed syllables whose vowel sounds are different. Herbert, “Easter,” line 13: “Consort, both heart and lute . . .” (see vol. B, p. 1183).

convention: a repeatedly recurring feature (in either form or content) of works, occurring in combination with other recurring formal features, which constitutes a convention of a particular genre.

couplet: a verse form. In English verse two consecutive, rhyming lines usually containing the same number of stresses. Chaucer first introduced the iambic pentameter couplet into English (Canterbury Tales); the form was later used in many types of writing, including drama; imitations and translations of classical epic (thus heroic couplet); essays; and satire (see Dryden and Pope). The distich (Greek “two lines”) is a couplet usually making complete sense; Aemilia Lanyer, Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum, lines 5–6: “Read it fair queen, though it defective be, / Your excellence can grace both it and me” (see vol. B, p. 925).

dactyl (Greek “finger,” because of the finger’s three joints): a term of rhythm. A three-syllable foot following the rhythmic pattern, in English verse, of one stressed followed by two unstressed syllables. Thus, for example, “Oregon.”

decorum (Latin “that which is fitting”): a rhetorical principle whereby each formal aspect of a work should be in keeping with its subject matter and/or audience.

deixis (Greek “pointing”): relevant to point of view. Every work has, implicitly or explicitly, a “here” and a “now” from which it is narrated. Words that refer to or imply this point from which the voice of the work is projected (such as “here,” “there,” “this,” “that,” “now,” “then”) are examples of deixis, or “deictics.” This technique is especially important in drama, where it is used to create a sense of the events happening as the spectator witnesses them.

denotation: A word has a basic, “prosaic” (factual) meaning prior to the associations it connotes (see connotation). The word “steed,” for example, might call to mind a horse fitted with battle gear, to be ridden by a warrior, but its denotation is simply “horse.”

denouement (French “unknotting”): the point at which a narrative can be resolved and so ended.

dialogue (Greek “conversation”): a genre. Dialogue is a feature of many genres, especially in both the novel and drama. As a genre itself, dialogue is used in philosophical traditions especially (most famously in Plato’s Dialogues), as the representation of a conversation in which a philosophical question is pursued among various speakers.

diction, or “lexis” (from, respectively, Latin dictio and Greek lexis, each meaning “word”): the actual words used in any utterance—speech, writing, and, for our purposes here, literary works. The choice of words contributes significantly to the style of a given work.

didactic mode (Greek “teaching mode”): Genres in a didactic mode are designed to instruct or teach, sometimes explicitly (for example, sermons, philosophical discourses, georgic), and sometimes through the medium of fiction (for example, animal fable, parable).

diegesis (Greek for “narration”): a term that simply means “narration,” but is used in literary criticism to distinguish one kind of story from another. In a mimetic story, the events are played out before us (see mimesis), whereas in diegesis someone recounts the story to us. Drama is for the most part mimetic, whereas the novel is for the most part diegetic. In novels the narrator is not, usually, part of the action of the narrative; they is therefore extradiegetic.

dimeter (Greek “two measure”): a term of meter. A two-stress line, rarely used as the meter of whole poems, though used with great frequency in single poems by Skelton, for example, “The Tunning of Elinour Ruming” (see vol. B, p. 41). Otherwise used for single lines, as in Herbert, “Discipline,” line 3: “O my God” (see vol. B, p. 1197).

discourse (Latin “running to and fro”): broadly, any nonfictional speech or writing; as a more specific genre, a philosophical meditation on a set theme.

dramatic irony: a feature of narrative and drama, whereby the audience knows that the outcome of an action will be the opposite of that intended by a character.

dramatic monologue (Greek “single speaking”): a genre. A poem in which the voice of a historical or fictional character speaks, unmediated by any narrator, to an implied though silent audience. See Tennyson, “Ulysses” (vol. E, p. 217); Browning, “The Bishop Orders His Tomb” (vol. E, p. 416); Eliot, “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock” (vol. F, p. 498); Carol Ann Duffy, “Medusa” and “Mrs Lazarus” (vol. F).

ecphrasis (Greek “speaking out”): a topos whereby a work of visual art is represented in a literary work. Auden, “Musée des Beaux Arts” (see vol. F, p. 677).

elegy: a genre. In classical literature elegy was a form written in elegiac couplets (a hexameter followed by a pentameter) devoted to many possible topics. In Ovidian elegy a lover meditates on the trials of erotic desire (for example, Ovid’s Amores). The sonnet sequences of both Sidney and Shakespeare exploit this genre, and, while it was still practiced in classical tradition by Donne (“On His Mistress” see vol. B, [p. 903]), by the later seventeenth century the term came to denote the poetry of loss, especially through the death of a loved person. See Tennyson, In Memoriam (vol. E, p. 231); Auden, "In Memory of W. B. Yeats" (see vol. F, p. 677); Heaney, "Clearances" (vol. F).

emblem (Greek "an insertion"): a figure of thought. A picture allegorically expressing a moral, or a verbal picture open to such interpretation.

end-stopping: the placement of a complete syntactic unit within a complete poetic line, fulfilling the metrical pattern; Auden, "In Memory of W. B. Yeats," line 42: "Earth, receive an honoured guest" (see vol. F, p. 679). Compare enjambment.

enjambment (French "striding," encroaching): The opposite of end-stopping, enjambment occurs when the syntactic unit does not end with the end of the poetic line and the fulfillment of the metrical pattern. When the sense of the line overflows its meter and, therefore, the line break, we have enjambment; Auden, "In Memory of W. B. Yeats," lines 44–45: "Let the Irish vessel lie / Emptied of its poetry" (see vol. F, p. 679).

epic (synonym, heroic poetry): a genre. An extended narrative poem celebrating martial heroes, invoking divine inspiration, beginning in medias res (see order), written in a high style (including the deployment of epic similes; on high style, see register), and divided into long narrative sequences. Homer's Iliad and Virgil's Aeneid were the prime models for English writers of epic verse. Thus Milton, Paradise Lost (see vol. B, p. 1427); Wordsworth, The Prelude (see vol. D, p. 391); and Walcott, Omeros (see vol. F, p. 808). With its precise repertoire of stylistic resources, epic lent itself easily to parodic and burlesque forms, known as mock epic; thus Pope, The Rape of the Lock (see vol. C, p. 537).

epigram: a genre. A short, pithy poem wittily expressed, often with wounding intent. See Jonson, Epigrams (see vol. B, p. 1049).

epigraph (Greek "inscription"): a genre. Any formal statement inscribed on stone; also the brief formulation on a book's title page, or a quotation at the beginning of a poem, introducing the work's themes in the most compressed form possible.

epistle (Latin "letter"): a genre. The letter can be shaped as a literary form, involving an intimate address often between equals. The Epistles of Horace provided a model for English writers from the sixteenth century. Thus Wyatt, "Mine Own John Poins" (see vol. B, p. 131), or Leapor, "An Epistle to a Lady" (vol. C, p. 771). Letters can be shaped to form the matter of an extended fiction, as the eighteenth-century epistolary novel (for example, Samuel Richardson's Pamela).

epitaph: a genre. A pithy formulation to be inscribed on a funeral monument. Thus Raleigh, "The Author's Epitaph, Made by Himself" (see vol. B, p. 479).

epithalamion (Greek "concerning the bridal chamber"): a genre. A wedding poem, celebrating the marriage and wishing the couple good fortune. Thus Spenser, Epithalamion (see vol. B, p. 455).

epyllion (plural "epyllia") (Greek: "little epic"): a genre. A relatively short poem in the meter of epic poetry. See, for example, Marlowe, Hero and Leander (vol. B, p. 562).

essay (French “trial, attempt”): a genre. An informal philosophical meditation, usually in prose and sometimes in verse. The journalistic periodical essay was developed in the early eighteenth century. Thus Addison and Steele, periodical essays (see vol. C, p. 281); Pope, An Essay on Criticism (see vol. C, p. 521).

euphemism (Greek “sweet saying”): a figure of thought. The figure by which something distasteful is described in alternative, less repugnant terms (for example, “he passed away”).

exegesis (Greek “leading out”): interpretation, traditionally of the biblical text, but, by transference, of any text.

exemplum (Latin “example”): an example inserted into a usually nonfictional writing (for example, sermon or essay) to give extra force to an abstract thesis.

fabliau (French “little story,” plural fabliaux): a genre. A short, funny, often bawdy narrative in low style (see register) imitated and developed from French models, most subtly by Chaucer; see The Miller’s Prologue and Tale (vol. A, p. 494).

farce (French “stuffing”): a genre. A play designed to provoke laughter through the often humiliating antics of stock characters. Congreve’s The Way of the World (see vol. C, p. 221) draws on this tradition.

figures of speech: Literary language often employs patterns perceptible to the eye and/or to the ear. Such patterns are called “figures of speech”; in classical rhetoric they were called “schemes” (from Greek schema, meaning “form, figure”).

figures of thought: Language can also be patterned conceptually, even outside the rules that normally govern it. Literary language in particular exploits this licensed linguistic irregularity. Synonyms for figures of thought are “trope” (Greek “twisting,” referring to the irregularity of use) and “conceit” (Latin “concept,” referring to the fact that these figures are perceptible only to the mind). Be careful not to confuse trope with topos (a common error).

first-person narration: relevant to point of view, a narrative in which the voice narrating refers to itself with forms of the first-person pronoun (“I,” “me,” “my,” etc., or possibly “we,” “us,” “our”), and in which the narrative is determined by the limitations of that voice. Thus Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley, Frankenstein.

frame narrative: Some narratives, particularly collections of narratives, involve a frame narrative that explains the genesis of, and/or gives a perspective on, the main narrative or narratives to follow. Thus Chaucer, Canterbury Tales; Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley, Frankenstein; or Conrad, Heart of Darkness.

free indirect style: relevant to point of view, a narratorial voice that manages, without explicit reference, to imply, and often implicitly to comment on, the voice of a character in the narrative itself. Virginia Woolf, “A Sketch of the Past,” where the voice, although strictly that of the adult narrator, manages to convey the child’s manner of perception: “—I begin:

the first memory. This was of red and purple flowers on a black background—my mother's dress."

genre and mode: The style, structure, and, often, length of a work, when coupled with a certain subject matter, raise expectations that a literary work conforms to a certain genre (French "kind"). Good writers might upset these expectations, but they remain aware of the expectations and thwart them purposefully. Works in different genres may nevertheless participate in the same mode, a broader category designating the fundamental perspectives governing various genres of writing. For mode, see tragic, comic, satiric, and didactic modes. Genres are fluid, sometimes very fluid (for example, the novel); the word "usually" should be added to almost every account of the characteristics of a given genre!

georgic (Greek "farming"): a genre. Virgil's Georgics treat agricultural and occasionally scientific subjects, giving instructions on the proper management of farms. Unlike pastoral, which treats the countryside as a place of recreational idleness among shepherds, the georgic treats it as a place of productive labor.

hermeneutics (from the Greek god Hermes, messenger between the gods and humankind): the science of interpretation, first formulated as such by the German philosophical theologian Friedrich Schleiermacher in the early nineteenth century.

heroic poetry: see epic.

hexameter (Greek "six measure"): a term of meter. The hexameter line (a six-stress line) is the meter of classical Latin epic; while not imitated in that form for epic verse in English, some instances of the hexameter exist. See, for example, the last line of a Spenserian stanza, Faerie Queene 1.1.2: "O help thou my weake wit, and sharpen my dull tong" (vol. B, p. 269), or Yeats, "The Lake Isle of Innisfree," line 1: "I will arise and go now, and go to Innisfree" (vol. F, p. 221).

homily (Greek "discourse"): a genre. A sermon, to be preached in church; Book of Homilies (see vol. B, p. 164). Writers of literary fiction sometimes exploit the homily, or sermon, as in Chaucer, The Pardoner's Tale (see vol. A, p. 540).

homophone (Greek "same sound"): a figure of speech. A word that sounds identical to another word but has a different meaning ("bear" / "bare").

hyperbaton (Greek "overstepping"): a term of syntax. The rearrangement, or inversion, of the expected word order in a sentence or clause. Gray, "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard," line 38: "If Memory o'er their tomb no trophies raise" (vol. C, p. 899). Poets can suspend the expected syntax over many lines, as in the first sentences of the Canterbury Tales (vol. A, p. 474) and of Paradise Lost (vol. B, p. 1430).

hyperbole (Greek "throwing over"): a figure of thought. Overstatement, exaggeration; Marvell, "To His Coy Mistress," lines 11–12: "My vegetable love should grow / Vaster than empires, and more slow" (see vol. B, p. 1273); Auden, "As I Walked Out One Evening," lines 9–12: "I'll love you, dear, I'll love you / Till China and Africa meet / And the river jumps over the mountain / And the salmon sing in the street" (see vol. F, p. 675).

hypermetrical (adj.; Greek "over measured"): a term of meter; the word describes a breaking of the expected metrical pattern by at least one extra syllable.

hypotaxis, or subordination (respectively Greek and Latin "ordering under"): a term of syntax. The subordination, by the use of subordinate clauses, of different elements of a sentence to a single main verb. Milton, Paradise Lost 9.513–15: "As when a ship by skillful steersman wrought / Nigh river's mouth or foreland, where the wind / Veers oft, as oft so steers, and shifts her sail; So varied he" (vol. B, p. 1588). The contrary principle to parataxis.

iamb: a term of rhythm. The basic foot of English verse; two syllables following the rhythmic pattern of unstressed followed by stressed and producing a rising effect. Thus, for example, "Vermont."

imitation: the practice whereby writers strive ideally to reproduce and yet renew the conventions of an older form, often derived from classical civilization. Such a practice will be praised in periods of classicism (for example, the eighteenth century) and repudiated in periods dominated by a model of inspiration (for example, Romanticism).

irony (Greek "dissimulation"): a figure of thought. In broad usage, irony designates the result of inconsistency between a statement and a context that undermines the statement. "It's a beautiful day" is unironic if it's a beautiful day; if, however, the weather is terrible, then the inconsistency between statement and context is ironic. The effect is often amusing; the need to be ironic is sometimes produced by censorship of one kind or another. Strictly, irony is a subset of allegory: whereas allegory says one thing and means another, irony says one thing and means its opposite. For an extended example of irony, see Swift's "Modest Proposal" (vol. C, p. 511). See also dramatic irony.

journal (French "daily"): a genre. A diary, or daily record of ephemeral experience, whose perspectives are concentrated on, and limited by, the experiences of single days. Thus Pepys, Diary (see vol. C, p. 74).

lai: a genre. A short narrative, often characterized by images of great intensity; a French term, and a form practiced by Marie de France (see vol. A, p. 159).

legend (Latin "requiring to be read"): a genre. A narrative of a celebrated, possibly historical, but mortal protagonist. To be distinguished from myth. Thus the "Arthurian legend" but the "myth of Proserpine."

lexical set: Words that habitually recur together (for example, January, February, March, etc.; or red, white, and blue) form a lexical set.

litotes (from Greek "smooth"): a figure of thought. Strictly, understatement by denying the contrary; More, Utopia: "differences of no slight import" (see vol. B, p. 49). More loosely, understatement; Stevie Smith, "Sunt Leones," lines 11–12: "And if the Christians felt a little blue— / Well people being eaten often do" (see vol. F, p. 585).

lullaby: a genre. A bedtime, sleep-inducing song for children, in simple and regular meter. Adapted by Auden, "Lullaby" (see vol. F, p. 671).

lyric (from Greek "lyre"): Initially meaning a song, "lyric" refers to a short poetic form, without restriction of meter, in which the expression of personal emotion, often by a voice in the first person, is given primacy over narrative sequence. Thus "The Wife's Lament" (see vol. A, p. 126); Yeats, "The Wild Swans at Coole" (see vol. F, p. 229).

masque: a genre. Costly entertainments of the Stuart court, involving dance, song, speech, and elaborate stage effects, in which courtiers themselves participated.

metaphor (Greek "carrying across," etymologically parallel to Latin "translation"): One of the most significant figures of thought, metaphor designates identification or implicit identification of one thing with another with which it is not literally identifiable. Blake, "London," lines 11–12: "And the hapless Soldier's sigh / Runs in blood down Palace walls" (see vol. D, p. 137).

meter: Verse (from Latin versus, turned) is distinguished from prose (from Latin prosus, "straightforward") as a more compressed form of expression, shaped by metrical norms.

Meter (Greek "measure") refers to the regularly recurring sound pattern of verse lines. The means of producing sound patterns across lines differ in different poetic traditions. Verse may be quantitative, or determined by the quantities of syllables (set patterns of long and short syllables), as in Latin and Greek poetry. It may be syllabic, determined by fixed numbers of syllables in the line, as in the verse of Romance languages (for example, French and Italian). It may be accentual, determined by the number of accents, or stresses in the line, with variable numbers of syllables, as in Old English and some varieties of Middle English alliterative verse. Or it may be accentual-syllabic, determined by the numbers of accents, but possessing a regular pattern of stressed and unstressed syllables, so as to produce regular numbers of syllables per line. Since Chaucer, English verse has worked primarily within the many possibilities of accentual-syllabic meter. The unit of meter is the foot. In English verse the number of feet per line corresponds to the number of accents in a line. For the types and examples of different meters, see monometer, dimeter, trimeter, tetrameter, pentameter, and hexameter. In the definitions below, "u" designates one unstressed syllable, and "/" one stressed syllable.

metonymy (Greek "change of name"): one of the most significant figures of thought. Using a word to denote another concept or other concepts, by virtue of habitual association. Thus "The Press," designating printed news media. Fictional names often work by associations of this kind. Closely related to synecdoche.

mimesis (Greek for "imitation"): A central function of literature and drama has been to provide a plausible imitation of the reality of the world beyond the literary work; mimesis is the representation and imitation of what is taken to be reality.

mise-en-abyme (French for "cast into the abyss"): Some works of art represent themselves in themselves; if they do so effectively, the represented artifact also represents itself, and so ad infinitum. The effect achieved is called "mise-en-abyme." Hoccleve's Complaint, for example, represents a depressed man reading about a depressed man. This sequence threatens to become a mise-en-abyme.

monometer (Greek "one measure"): a term of meter. An entire line with just one stress; Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, line 15, "most (u) grand (/)" (see vol. A, p. 415).

myth: a genre. The narrative of protagonists with, or subject to, superhuman powers. A myth expresses some profound foundational truth, often by accounting for the origin of natural phenomena. To be distinguished from legend. Thus the "Arthurian legend" but the "myth of Proserpine."

novel: an extremely flexible genre in both form and subject matter. Usually in prose, giving high priority to narration of events, with a certain expectation of length, novels are preponderantly rooted in a specific, and often complex, social world; sensitive to the realities of material life; and often focused on one character or a small circle of central characters. By contrast with chivalric romance (the main European narrative genre prior to the novel), novels tend to eschew the marvelous in favor of a recognizable social world and credible action. The novel's openness allows it to participate in all modes, and to be co-opted for a huge variety of subgenres. In English literature the novel dates from the late seventeenth century and has been astonishingly successful in appealing to a huge readership, particularly in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The English and Irish tradition of the novel includes, for example, Fielding, Austen, the Brontë sisters, Dickens, George Eliot, Conrad, Woolf, Lawrence, and Joyce, to name but a few very great exponents of the genre.

novella: a genre. A short novel, often characterized by imagistic intensity. Conrad, Heart of Darkness (see vol. F, p. 70).

occupatio (Latin "taking possession"): a figure of thought. Denying that one will discuss a subject while actually discussing it; also known as "praeteritio" (Latin "passing by"). See Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, lines 414–31 (see vol. A, p. 565).

ode (Greek "song"): a genre. A lyric poem in elevated, or high style (see register), often addressed to a natural force, a person, or an abstract quality. The Pindaric ode in English is made up of stanzas of unequal length, while the Horatian ode has stanzas of equal length. For examples of both types, see, respectively, Wordsworth, "Ode: Intimations of Immortality" (vol. D, p. 381); and Marvell, "An Horatian Ode" (vol. B, p. 1282), or Keats, "Ode on Melancholy" (vol. D, p. 973). For a fuller discussion, see the headnote to Jonson's "Ode on Cary and Morison" (vol. B, pp. 1058–59).

omniscient narrator (Latin "all-knowing narrator"): relevant to point of view. A narrator who, in the fiction of the narrative, has complete access to both the deeds and the thoughts of all characters in the narrative. Thus Thomas Hardy, "On the Western Circuit" (see vol. F, p. 36).

onomatopoeia (Greek "name making"): a figure of speech. Verbal sounds that imitate and evoke the sounds they denote. Hopkins, "Binsey Poplars," lines 10–12 (about some felled trees): "O if we but knew what we do / When we delve [dig] or hew— / Hack and rack the growing green!" (see vol. E, p. 726).

order: A story may be told in different narrative orders. A narrator might use the sequence of events as they happened, and thereby follow what classical rhetoricians called the natural order; alternatively, the narrator might reorder the sequence of events, beginning the narration either in the middle or at the end of the sequence of events, thereby following an artificial order. If a narrator begins in the middle of events, he or she is said to begin in medias res (Latin “in the middle of the matter”). For a brief discussion of these concepts, see Spenser, Faerie Queene, “A Letter of the Authors” (vol. B, p. 265). Modern narratology makes a related distinction, between histoire (French “story”) for the natural order that readers mentally reconstruct, and discours (French, here “narration”) for the narrative as presented. See also plot and story.

ottava rima: a verse form. An eight-line stanza form, rhyming abababcc, using iambic pentameter; Yeats, “Sailing to Byzantium” (see vol. F, p. 234). Derived from the Italian poet Boccaccio, an eight-line stanza was used by fifteenth-century English poets for inset passages (for example, Christ’s speech from the Cross in Lydgate’s Testament, lines 754–897). The form in this rhyme scheme was used in English poetry for long narrative by, for example, Byron (Don Juan; see vol. D, p. 690).

oxymoron (Greek “sharp blunt”): a figure of thought. The conjunction of normally incompatible terms; Milton, Paradise Lost 1.63: “darkness visible” (see vol. B, p. 1431).

panegyric: a genre. Demonstrative, or epideictic (Greek “showing”), rhetoric was a branch of classical rhetoric. Its own two main branches were the rhetoric of praise on the one hand and of vituperation on the other. Panegyric, or eulogy (Greek “sweet speaking”), or encomium (plural encomia), is the term used to describe the speeches or writings of praise.

parable: a genre. A simple story designed to provoke, and often accompanied by, allegorical interpretation, most famously by Christ as reported in the Gospels.

paradox (Greek “contrary to received opinion”): a figure of thought. An apparent contradiction that requires thought to reveal an inner consistency. Chaucer, “Troilus’s Song,” line 12: “O sweete harm so quainte” (see vol. A, p. 574).

parataxis, or coordination (respectively Greek and Latin “ordering beside”): a term of syntax. The coordination, by the use of coordinating conjunctions, of different main clauses in a single sentence. Malory, Morte Darthur: “So Sir Lancelot departed and took his sword under his arm, and so he walked in his mantel, that noble knight, and put himself in great jeopardy” (see vol. A, p. 607). The opposite principle to hypotaxis.

parody: a work that uses the conventions of a particular genre with the aim of comically mocking a topos, a genre, or a particular exponent of a genre. Shakespeare parodies the topos of blazon in Sonnet 130 (see vol. B, p. 637).

pastoral (from Latin pastor, “shepherd”): a genre. Pastoral is set among shepherds, making often refined allusion to other apparently unconnected subjects (sometimes politics) from the potentially idyllic world of highly literary if illiterate shepherds. Pastoral is distinguished from georgic by representing recreational rural idleness, whereas the georgic offers instruction on how to manage rural labor. English writers had classical models in the Idylls of Theocritus in Greek and Virgil’s Eclogues in Latin. Pastoral is also called bucolic (from the Greek word for “herdsman”). Thus Spenser, Shepherd’s Calendar (see vol. B, p. 257).

pathetic fallacy: the attribution of sentiment to natural phenomena, as if they were in sympathy with human feelings. Thus Milton, Lycidas, lines 146–47: “With cowslips wan that hang the pensive head, / And every flower that sad embroidery wears” (see vol. B, p. 1406). For critique of the practice, see Ruskin (who coined the term), “Of the Pathetic Fallacy” (vol. E, p. 467).

pentameter (Greek “five measure”): a term of meter. In English verse, a five-stress line. Between the late fourteenth and the nineteenth centuries, this meter, frequently employing an iambic rhythm, was the basic line of English verse. Chaucer, Shakespeare, Milton, and Wordsworth each, for example, deployed this very flexible line as their primary resource; Milton, Paradise Lost 1.128: “O Prince, O Chief of many thronèd Powers” (see vol. B, p. 1433).

performative: Verbal expressions have many different functions. They can, for example, be descriptive, or constative (if they make an argument), or performative, for example. A performative utterance is one that makes something happen in the world by virtue of its utterance. “I hereby sentence you to ten years in prison,” if uttered in the appropriate circumstances, itself performs an action; it makes something happen in the world. By virtue of its performing an action, it is called a “performative.” See also speech act.

peripeteia (Greek “turning about”): the sudden reversal of fortune (in both directions) in a dramatic work.

periphrasis (Greek “declaring around”): a figure of thought. Circumlocution; the use of many words to express what could be expressed in few or one; Sidney, Astrophil and Stella 39.1–4.

persona (Latin “sound through”): originally the mask worn in the Roman theater to magnify an actor’s voice; in literary discourse persona (plural personae) refers to the narrator or speaker of a text, whose voice is coherent and whose person need have no relation to the person of the actual author of a text. Eliot, “The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock” (see vol. F, p. 498).

personification, or prosopopoeia (Greek “person making”): a figure of thought. The attribution of human qualities to nonhuman forces or objects; Keats, “Ode on a Grecian Urn,” lines 1–2: “Thou still unvanish’d bride of quietness, / Thou foster-child of silence and slow time” (see vol. D, p. 971).

plot: the sequence of events in a story as narrated, as distinct from story, which refers to the sequence of events as we reconstruct them from the plot. See also order.

point of view: All of the many kinds of writing involve a point of view from which a text is, or seems to be, generated. The presence of such a point of view may be powerful and explicit, as in many novels, or deliberately invisible, as in much drama. In some genres, such as the novel, the narrator does not necessarily tell the story from a position we can predict; that is, the needs of a particular story, not the conventions of the genre, determine the narrator’s position. In other genres, the narrator’s position is fixed by convention; in certain kinds of love poetry, for example, the narrating voice is always that of a suffering lover. Not only does the point of view significantly inform the style of a work, but it also informs the structure of that work.

protagonist (Greek "first actor"): the hero or heroine of a drama or narrative.

pun: a figure of thought. A sometimes irresolvable doubleness of meaning in a single word or expression; Shakespeare, Sonnet 135, line 1: "Whoever hath her wish, thou hast thy Will" (see vol. B, p. 637).

quatrain: a verse form. A stanza of four lines, usually rhyming abcb, abab, or abba. Of many possible examples, see Crashaw, "On the Wounds of Our Crucified Lord" (see vol. B, p. 1214).

refrain: usually a single line repeated as the last line of consecutive stanzas, sometimes with subtly different wording and ideally with subtly different meaning as the poem progresses.

register: The register of a word is its stylistic level, which can be distinguished by degree of technicality but also by degree of formality. We choose our words from different registers according to context, that is, audience and/or environment. Thus a chemist in a laboratory will say "sodium chloride," a cook in a kitchen "salt." A formal register designates the kind of language used in polite society (for example, "Mr. President"), while an informal or colloquial register is used in less formal or more relaxed social situations (for example, "the boss"). In classical and medieval rhetoric, these registers of formality were called high style and low style. A middle style was defined as the style fit for narrative, not drawing attention to itself.

rhetoric: the art of verbal persuasion. Classical rhetoricians distinguished three areas of rhetoric: the forensic, to be used in law courts; the deliberative, to be used in political or philosophical deliberations; and the demonstrative, or epideictic, to be used for the purposes of public praise or blame. Rhetorical manuals covered all the skills required of a speaker, from the management of style and structure to delivery. These manuals powerfully influenced the theory of poetics as a separate branch of verbal practice, particularly in the matter of style.

rhyme: a figure of speech. The repetition of identical vowel sounds in stressed syllables whose initial consonants differ ("dead" / "head"). In poetry, rhyme often links the end of one line with another. Masculine rhyme: full rhyme on the final syllable of the line ("decays" / "days"). Feminine rhyme: full rhyme on syllables that are followed by unaccented syllables ("fountains" / "mountains"). Internal rhyme: full rhyme within a single line; Coleridge, The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, line 7: "The guests are met, the feast is set" (see vol. D, p. 475). Rhyme riche: rhyming on homophones; Chaucer, General Prologue, lines 17–18: "seeke" / "seke." Off rhyme (also known as half rhyme, near rhyme, or slant rhyme): differs from perfect rhyme in changing the vowel sound and/or the concluding consonants expected of perfect rhyme; Byron, "They say that Hope is Happiness," lines 5–7: "most" / "lost." Pararhyme: stressed vowel sounds differ but are flanked by identical or similar consonants; Owen, "Miners," lines 9–11: "simmer" / "summer" (see vol. F, p. 169).

rhyme royal: a verse form. A stanza of seven iambic pentameter lines, rhyming ababbcc; first introduced by Chaucer and called "royal" because the form was used by James I of Scotland for his Kingis Quair in the early fifteenth century. Chaucer, "Troilus's Song" (see vol. A, p. 574).

rhythm: Rhythm is not absolutely distinguishable from meter. One way of making a clear distinction between these terms is to say that rhythm (from the Greek "to flow") denotes the patterns of sound within the feet of verse lines and the combination of those feet. Very often a particular meter will raise expectations that a given rhythm will be used regularly through a whole line or a whole poem. Thus in English verse the pentameter regularly uses an iambic rhythm. Rhythm, however, is much more fluid than meter, and many lines within the same poem using a single meter will frequently exploit different rhythmic possibilities. For examples of different rhythms, see iamb, trochee, anapest, spondee, and dactyl.

romance: a genre. From the twelfth to the sixteenth century, the main form of European narrative, in either verse or prose, was that of chivalric romance. Romance, like the later novel, is a very fluid genre, but romances are often characterized by (i) a tripartite structure of social integration, followed by disintegration, involving moral tests and often marvelous events, itself the prelude to reintegration in a happy ending, frequently of marriage; and (ii) aristocratic social milieux. Thus Sir Gawain and the Green Knight (see vol. A, p. 415); Spenser's (unfinished) Faerie Queene (vol. B, p. 263). The immensely popular, fertile genre was absorbed, in both domesticated and undomesticated form, by the novel. For an adaptation of romance, see Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Tale (vol. A, p. 512).

sarcasm (Greek "flesh tearing"): a figure of thought. A wounding expression, often expressed ironically; Boswell, Life of Johnson: Johnson [asked if any man of the modern age could have written the epic poem Fingal] replied, "Yes, Sir, many men, many women, and many children" (see vol. C, p. 891).

satire (Latin for "a bowl of mixed fruits"): a genre. In Roman literature (for example, Juvenal), the communication, in the form of a letter between equals, complaining of the ills of contemporary society. The genre in this form is characterized by a first-person narrator exasperated by social ills; the letter form; a high frequency of contemporary reference; and the use of invective in low-style language. Pope practices the genre thus in the Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot (see vol. C, p. 573). Wyatt's "Mine Own John Pains" (see vol. B, p. 131) draws ultimately on a gentler, Horatian model of the genre.

satiric mode: Works in a very large variety of genres are devoted to the more or less savage attack on social ills. Thus Swift's travel narrative Gulliver's Travels (see vol. C, p. 377), his essay "A Modest Proposal" (vol. C, p. 511), and Gay's Beggar's Opera (vol. C, p. 587), to look no further than the eighteenth century, are all within a satiric mode.

scene: a subdivision of an act, itself a subdivision of a dramatic performance and/or text. The action of a scene usually occurs in one place.

sensibility (from Latin, "capable of being perceived by the senses"): as a literary term, an eighteenth-century concept derived from moral philosophy that stressed the social importance of fellow feeling and particularly of sympathy in social relations. The concept generated a literature of "sensibility," such as the sentimental novel (the most famous of which was Goethe's Sorrows of the Young Werther [1774]), or sentimental poetry, such as Cowper's passage on the stricken deer in The Task (see vol. C, p. 1076).

short story: a genre. Generically similar to, though shorter and more concentrated than, the novel; often published as part of a collection. Thus Mansfield, "The Daughters of the Late Colonel" (see vol. F, p. 542).

simile (Latin "like"): a figure of thought. Comparison, usually using the word "like" or "as," of one thing with another so as to produce sometimes surprising analogies. Donne, "The Storm," lines 29–30: "Sooner than you read this line did the gale, / Like shot, not feared till felt, our sails assail." Frequently used, in extended form, in epic poetry; Milton, Paradise Lost 1.338–46 (see vol. B, p. 1438).

soliloquy (Latin "single speaking"): a topos of drama, in which a character, alone or thinking to be alone on stage, speaks so as to give the audience access to his or her private thoughts.

sonnet: a verse form. A form combining a variable number of units of rhymed lines to produce a fourteen-line poem, usually in rhyming iambic pentameter lines. In English there are two principal varieties: the Petrarchan sonnet, formed by an octave (an eight-line stanza, often broken into two quatrains having the same rhyme scheme, typically abba abba) and a sestet (a six-line stanza, typically cdecde or cdcdcd); and the Shakespearean sonnet, formed by three quatrains (abab cdcd efef) and a couplet (gg). The declaration of a sonnet can take a sharp turn, or "volta," often at the decisive formal shift from octave to sestet in the Petrarchan sonnet, or in the final couplet of a Shakespearean sonnet, introducing a trenchant counterstatement. Derived from Italian poetry, and especially from the poetry of Petrarch, the sonnet was first introduced to English poetry by Wyatt, and initially used principally for the expression of unrequited erotic love, though later poets used the form for many other purposes. See Wyatt, "Whoso List to Hunt" (vol. B, p. 123); Sidney, Astrophil and Stella (vol. B, p. 541); Shakespeare, Sonnets (vol. B, p. 624); Wordsworth, "London, 1802" (vol. D, p. 390); McKay, "If We Must Die" (vol. F, p. 576); Heaney, "Clearances" (vol. F).

speech act: Words and deeds are often distinguished, but words are often (perhaps always) themselves deeds. Utterances can perform different speech acts, such as promising, declaring, casting a spell, encouraging, persuading, denying, lying, and so on. See also performative.

Spenserian stanza: a verse form. The stanza developed by Spenser for The Faerie Queene; nine iambic lines, the first eight of which are pentameters, followed by one hexameter, rhyming ababbcbcc. See also, for example, Shelley, Adonais (vol. D, p. 851), and Keats, The Eve of St. Agnes (vol. D, p. 953).

spondee: a term of meter. A two-syllable foot following the rhythmic pattern, in English verse, of two stressed syllables. Thus, for example, "Utah."

stanza (Italian "room"): groupings of two or more lines, though "stanza" is usually reserved for groupings of at least four lines. Stanzas are often joined by rhyme, often in sequence, where each group shares the same metrical pattern and, when rhymed, rhyme scheme. Stanzas can themselves be arranged into larger groupings. Poets often invent new verse forms, or they may work within established forms.

story: a narrative's sequence of events, which we reconstruct from those events as they have been recounted by the narrator (i.e., the plot). See also order.

stream of consciousness: usually a first-person narrative that seems to give the reader access to the narrator's mind as it perceives or reflects on events, prior to organizing those perceptions into a coherent narrative. Thus (though generated from a third-person narrative) Joyce, Ulysses, "Penelope" (see vol. F, p. 452).

style (from Latin for "writing instrument"): In literary works the manner in which something is expressed contributes substantially to its meaning. The expressions "sun," "mass of helium at the center of the solar system," "heaven's golden orb" all designate "sun," but do so in different manners, or styles, which produce different meanings. The manner of a literary work is its "style," the effect of which is its "tone." We often can intuit the tone of a text; from that intuition of tone we can analyze the stylistic resources by which it was produced. We can analyze the style of literary works through consideration of different elements of style; for example, diction, figures of thought, figures of speech, meter and rhythm, verse form, syntax, point of view.

sublime: As a concept generating a literary movement, the sublime refers to the realm of experience beyond the measurable, and so beyond the rational, produced especially by the terrors and grandeur of natural phenomena. Derived especially from the first-century Greek treatise On the Sublime, sometimes attributed to Longinus, the notion of the sublime was in the later eighteenth century a spur to Romanticism.

syllable: the smallest unit of sound in a pronounced word. The syllable that receives the greatest stress is called the tonic syllable.

symbol (Greek "token"): a figure of thought. Something that stands for something else, and yet seems necessarily to evoke that other thing. In Neoplatonic, and therefore Romantic, theory, to be distinguished from allegory thus: whereas allegory involves connections between vehicle and tenor agreed by convention or made explicit, the meanings of a symbol are supposedly inherent to it.

synecdoche (Greek "to take with something else"): a figure of thought. Using a part to express the whole, or vice versa; for example, "all hands on deck." Closely related to metonymy.

syntax (Greek "ordering with"): Syntax designates the rules by which sentences are constructed in a given language. Discussion of meter is impossible without some reference to syntax, since the overall effect of a poem is, in part, always the product of a subtle balance of meter and sentence construction. Syntax is also essential to the understanding of prose style, since prose writers, deprived of the full shaping possibilities of meter, rely all the more heavily on syntactic resources. A working command of syntactical practice requires an understanding of the parts of speech (nouns, verbs, adjectives, adverbs, conjunctions, pronouns, prepositions, and interjections), since writers exploit syntactic possibilities by using particular combinations and concentrations of the parts of speech.

taste (from Italian "touch"): Although medieval monastic traditions used eating and tasting as a metaphor for reading, the concept of taste as a personal ideal to be cultivated by, and applied to, the appreciation and judgment of works of art in general was developed in the eighteenth century.

tercet: a verse form. A stanza or group of three lines, used in larger forms such as terza rima, the Petrarchan sonnet, and the villanelle.

terza rima: a verse form. A sequence of rhymed tercets linked by rhyme thus: aba bcb cdc, etc. first used extensively by Dante in The Divine Comedy, the form was adapted in English iambic pentameters by Wyatt and revived in the nineteenth century. See Wyatt, "Mine Own John Pains" (vol. B, p. 131); Shelley, "Ode to the West Wind" (vol. D, p. 802); and Morris, "The Defence of Guinevere" (vol. E, p. 657). For modern adaptations see Eliot, lines 78–149 (though unrhymed) of "Little Gidding" (vol. F, pp. 523–25); Heaney, "Station Island" (vol. F); Walcott, Omeros (vol. F, p. 808).

tetrameter (Greek "four measure"): a term of meter. A line with four stresses. Coleridge, Christabel, line 31: "She stole along, she nothing spoke" (see vol. D, p. 495).

theme (Greek "proposition"): In literary criticism the term designates what the work is about; the theme is the concept that unifies a given work of literature.

third-person narration: relevant to point of view. A narration in which the narrator recounts a narrative of characters referred to explicitly or implicitly by third-person pronouns ("he," "she," etc.), without the limitation of a first-person narration. Thus Johnson, The History of Rasselas.

topographical poem (Greek "place writing"): a genre. A poem devoted to the meditative description of particular places.

topos (Greek "place," plural topoi): a commonplace in the content of a given kind of literature. Originally, in classical rhetoric, the topoi were tried-and-tested stimuli to literary invention: lists of standard headings under which a subject might be investigated. In medieval narrative poems, for example, it was commonplace to begin with a description of spring. Writers did, of course, render the commonplace uncommon, as in Chaucer's spring scene at the opening of The Canterbury Tales (see vol. A, p. 474).

tradition (from Latin "passing on"): A literary tradition is whatever is passed on or revived from the past in a single literary culture, or drawn from others to enrich a writer's culture. "Tradition" is fluid in reference, ranging from small to large referents: thus it may refer to a relatively small aspect of texts (for example, the tradition of iambic pentameter), or it may, at the other extreme, refer to the body of texts that constitute a canon.

tragedy: a genre. A dramatic representation of the fall of kings or nobles, beginning in happiness and ending in catastrophe. Later transferred to other social milieux. The opposite of comedy; thus Shakespeare, Othello (see vol. B, p. 640).

tragic mode: Many genres (epic poetry, legendary chronicles, tragedy, the novel) either do or can participate in a tragic mode, by representing the fall of noble protagonists and the irreparable ravages of human society and history.

tragicomedy: a genre. A play in which potentially tragic events turn out to have a happy, or comic, ending. Thus Shakespeare, Measure for Measure.

translation (Latin "carrying across"): the rendering of a text written in one language into another.

trimeter (Greek "three measure"): a term of meter. A line with three stresses. Herbert, "Discipline," line 1: "Throw away thy rod" (see vol. B, p. 1197).

triplet: a verse form. A tercet rhyming on the same sound. Pope inserts triplets among heroic couplets to emphasize a particular thought; see Essay on Criticism, 315–17 (vol. C, p. 521).

trochee: a term of rhythm. A two-syllable foot following the pattern, in English verse, of stressed followed by unstressed syllable, producing a falling effect. Thus, for example, "Texas."

type (Greek "impression, figure"): a figure of thought. In Christian allegorical interpretation of the Old Testament, pre-Christian figures were regarded as "types," or foreshadowings, of Christ or the Christian dispensation. Typology has been the source of much visual and literary art in which the parallelisms between old and new are extended to nonbiblical figures; thus the virtuous plowman in Piers Plowman becomes a type of Christ.

unities: According to a theory supposedly derived from Aristotle's Poetics, the events represented in a play should have unity of time, place, and action: that the play take up no more time than the time of the play, or at most a day; that the space of action should be within a single city; and that there should be no subplot. See Johnson, The Preface to Shakespeare (vol. C, p. 876).

vernacular (from Latin verna, "servant"): the language of the people, as distinguished from learned and arcane languages. From the later Middle Ages especially, the "vernacular" languages and literatures of Europe distinguished themselves from the learned languages and literatures of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew.

verse form: The terms related to meter and rhythm describe the shape of individual lines. Lines of verse are combined to produce larger groupings, called verse forms. These larger groupings are in the first instance stanzas. The combination of a certain meter and stanza shape constitutes the verse form, of which there are many standard kinds.

villanelle: a verse form. A fixed form of usually five tercets and a quatrain employing only two rhyme sounds altogether, rhyming aba for the tercets and abaa for the quatrain, with a complex pattern of two refrains. Derived from a French fixed form. Thomas, "Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night" (see vol. F, p. 693).

wit: Originally a synonym for "reason" in Old and Middle English, "wit" became a literary ideal in the Renaissance as brilliant play of the full range of mental resources. For eighteenth-century writers, the notion necessarily involved pleasing expression, as in Pope's definition of true wit as “Nature to advantage dressed, / What oft was thought, but ne’er so well expressed” (Essay on Criticism, lines 297–98; see vol. C, p. 527). Romantic theory of the imagination deprived wit of its full range of apprehension, whence the word came to be restricted to its modern sense, as the clever play of mind that produces laughter.

zeugma (Greek “a yoking”): a figure of thought. A figure whereby one word applies to two or more words in a sentence, and in which the applications are surprising, either because one is unusual, or because the applications are made in very different ways; Pope, Rape of the Lock 3.7–8, in which the word “take” is used in two senses: “Here thou, great Anna! whom three realms obey, / Dost sometimes counsel take—and sometimes tea” (see vol. C, p. 546).

B: Publishing History, Censorship

By the time we read texts in published books, they have already been treated—that is, changed by authors, editors, and printers—in many ways. Although there are differences across history, in each period literary works are subject to pressures of many kinds, which apply before, while, and after an author writes. The pressures might be financial, as in the relations of author and patron; commercial, as in the marketing of books; and legal, as in, during some periods, the negotiation through official and unofficial censorship. In addition, texts in all periods undergo technological processes, as they move from the material forms in which an author produced them to the forms in which they are presented to readers. Some of the terms below designate important material forms in which books were produced, disseminated, and surveyed across the historical span of this anthology. Others designate the skills developed to understand these processes. The anthology’s introductions to individual periods discuss the particular forms these phenomena took in different eras.

bookseller: In England, and particularly in London, commercial bookmaking and -selling enterprises came into being in the early fourteenth century. These were loose organizations of artisans who usually lived in the same neighborhoods (around St. Paul’s Cathedral in London). A bookseller or dealer would coordinate the production of hand-copied books for wealthy patrons (see patronage), who would order books to be custom-made. After the introduction of printing in the late fifteenth century, authors generally sold the rights to their work to booksellers, without any further royalties. Booksellers, who often had their own shops, belonged to the Stationers’ Company. This system lasted into the eighteenth century. In 1710, however, authors were for the first time granted copyright, which tipped the commercial balance in their favor, against booksellers.

censorship: The term applies to any mechanism for restricting what can be published. Historically, the reasons for imposing censorship are heresy, sedition, blasphemy, libel, or obscenity. External censorship is imposed by institutions having legislative sanctions at their disposal. Thus the pre-Reformation Church imposed the Constitutions of Archbishop Arundel of 1409, aimed at repressing the Lollard "heresy." After the Reformation, some key events in the history of censorship are as follows: 1547, when anti-Lollard legislation and legislation made by Henry VIII concerning treason by writing (1534) were abolished; the Licensing Order of 1643, which legislated that works be licensed, through the Stationers' Company, prior to publication; and 1695, when the last such Act stipulating prepublication licensing lapsed. Postpublication censorship continued in different periods for different reasons. Thus, for example, British publication of D. H. Lawrence's Lady Chatterley's Lover (1928) was obstructed (though unsuccessfully) in 1960, under the Obscene Publications Act of 1959. Censorship can also be international: although not published in Iran, Salman Rushdie's Satanic Verses (1988) was censored in that country, where the leader, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, proclaimed a fatwa (religious decree) promising the author's execution. Very often censorship is not imposed externally, however: authors or publishers can censor work in anticipation of what will incur the wrath of readers or the penalties of the law. Victorian and Edwardian publishers of novels, for example, urged authors to remove potentially offensive material, especially for serial publication in popular magazines.

codex: the physical format of most modern books and medieval manuscripts, consisting of a series of separate leaves gathered into quires and bound together, often with a cover. In late antiquity, the codex largely replaced the scroll, the standard form of written documents in Roman culture.

copy text: the particular text of a work used by a textual editor as the basis of an edition of that work.

copyright: the legal protection afforded to authors for control of their work's publication, in an attempt to ensure due financial reward. Some key dates in the history of copyright in the United Kingdom are as follows: 1710, when a statute gave authors the exclusive right to publish their work for fourteen years, and fourteen years more if the author were still alive when the first term had expired; 1842, when the period of authorial control was extended to forty-two years; and 1911, when the term was extended yet further, to fifty years after the author's death. In 1995 the period of protection was harmonized with the laws in other European countries to be the life of the author plus seventy years. In the United States no works first published before 1923 are in copyright. Works published since 1978 are, as in the United Kingdom, protected for the life of the author plus seventy years.

folio: the leaf formed by both sides of a single page. Each folio has two sides: a recto (the front side of the leaf, on the right side of a double-page spread in an open codex), and a verso (the back side of the leaf, on the left side of a double-page spread). Modern book pagination follows the pattern 1, 2, 3, 4, while medieval manuscript pagination follows the pattern 1r, 1v, 2r, 2v. "Folio" can also designate the size of a printed book. Books come in different shapes, depending originally on the number of times a standard sheet of paper is folded. One fold produces a large volume, a folio book; two folds produce a quarto, four an octavo, and six a very small duodecimo. Generally speaking, the larger the book, the grander and more expensive. Shakespeare's plays were, for example, first printed in quartos, but were gathered into a folio edition in 1623.

foul papers: versions of a work before an author has produced, if she or he has, a final copy (a "fair copy") with all corrections removed.

incunabulum (plural "incunabula"): any printed book produced in Europe before 1501. Famous incunabula include the Gutenberg Bible, printed in 1455.

manuscript (Latin, "written by hand"): Any text written physically by hand is a manuscript. Before the introduction of printing with moveable type in 1476, all texts in England were produced and reproduced by hand, in manuscript. This is an extremely labor-intensive task, using expensive materials (for example, vellum, or parchment); the cost of books produced thereby was, accordingly, very high. Even after the introduction of printing, many texts continued to be produced in manuscript. This is obviously true of letters, for example, but until the eighteenth century, poetry written within aristocratic circles was often transmitted in manuscript copies.

paleography (Greek "ancient writing"): the art of deciphering, describing, and dating forms of handwriting.

parchment: animal skin, used as the material for handwritten books before the introduction of paper. See also vellum.

patronage, patron (Latin "protector"): Many technological, legal, and commercial supports were necessary before professional authorship became possible. Although some playwrights (for example, Shakespeare) made a living by writing for the theater, other authors needed, principally, the large-scale reproductive capacities of printing and the security of copyright to make a living from writing. Before these conditions obtained, many authors had another main occupation, and most authors had to rely on patronage. In different periods, institutions or individuals offered material support, or patronage, to authors. Thus in Anglo-Saxon England, monasteries afforded the conditions of writing to monastic authors. Between the twelfth and the seventeenth centuries, the main source of patronage was the royal court. Authors offered patrons prestige and ideological support in return for financial support. Even as the conditions of professional authorship came into being at the beginning of the eighteenth century, older forms of direct patronage were not altogether displaced until the middle of the century.

periodical: Whereas journalism, strictly, applies to daily writing (from French jour, "day"), periodical writing appears at larger, but still frequent, intervals, characteristically in the form of the essay. Periodicals were developed especially in the eighteenth century.

printing: Printing, or the mechanical reproduction of books using moveable type, was invented in Germany in the mid-fifteenth century by Johannes Gutenberg; it quickly spread throughout Europe. William Caxton brought printing into England from the Low Countries in 1476. Much greater powers of reproduction at much lower prices transformed every aspect of literary culture.

publisher: the person or company responsible for the commissioning and publicizing of printed matter. In the early period of printing, publisher, printer, and bookseller were often the same person. This trend continued in the ascendancy of the Stationers' Company, between the middle of the sixteenth and the end of the seventeenth centuries. Toward the end of the seventeenth century, these three functions began to separate, leading to their modern distinctions.

quire: When medieval manuscripts were assembled, a few loose sheets of parchment or paper would first be folded together and sewn along the fold. This formed a quire (also known as a "gathering" or "signature"). Folded in this way, four large sheets of parchment would produce eight smaller manuscript leaves. Multiple quires could then be bound together to form a codex.

royalties: an agreed-upon proportion of the price of each copy of a work sold, paid by the publisher to the author, or an agreed-upon fee paid to the playwright for each performance of a play.

scribe: In manuscript culture, the scribe is the copyist who reproduces a text by hand.

scriptorium (plural "scriptoria"): a place for producing written documents and manuscripts.

serial publication: generally referring to the practice, especially common in the nineteenth century, of publishing novels a few chapters at a time, in periodicals.

Stationers' Company: The Stationers' Company was an English guild incorporating various tradesmen, including printers, publishers, and booksellers, skilled in the production and selling of books. It was formed in 1403, received its royal charter in 1557, and served as a means both of producing and of regulating books. Authors would sell the manuscripts of their books to individual stationers, who incurred the risks and took the profits of producing and selling the books. The stationers entered their rights over given books in the Stationers' Register. They also regulated the book trade and held their monopoly by licensing books and by being empowered to seize unauthorized books and imprison resisters. This system of licensing broke down in the social unrest of the Civil War and Interregnum (1640–60), and it ended in 1695. Even after the end of licensing, the Stationers' Company continued to be an intrinsic part of the copyright process, since the 1710 copyright statute directed that copyright had to be registered at Stationers' Hall.

subscription: An eighteenth-century system of bookselling somewhere between direct patronage and impersonal sales. A subscriber paid half the cost of a book before publication and half on delivery. The author received these payments directly. The subscriber's name appeared in the prefatory pages.

textual criticism: Works in all periods often exist in many subtly or not so subtly different forms. This is especially true with regard to manuscript textual reproduction, but it also applies to printed texts. Textual criticism is the art, developed from the fifteenth century in Italy but raised to new levels of sophistication from the eighteenth century, of deciphering different historical states of texts. This art involves the analysis of textual variants, often with the aim of distinguishing authorial from scribal forms.

variants: differences that appear among different manuscripts or printed editions of the same text.

vellum: animal skin, used as the material for handwritten books before the introduction of paper. See also parchment.

watermark: the trademark of a paper manufacturer, impressed into the paper but largely invisible unless held up to light.

Endnotes

- Note *: This appendix was devised and compiled by James Simpson with the collaboration of all the editors. We especially thank Professor Lara Bovilsky of the University of Oregon at Eugene for her help. Return to reference *

Geographic Nomenclature

The British Isles refers to the prominent group of islands off the northwest coast of Europe, especially to the two largest, Great Britain and Ireland. At present these comprise two sovereign states: the Republic of Ireland, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland—known for short as the United Kingdom or the U.K. Most of the smaller islands are part of the U.K. but a few, like the Isle of Man and the tiny Channel Islands, are largely independent. The U.K. is often loosely referred to as “Britain” or “Great Britain” and is sometimes called simply, if inaccurately, “England.” For obvious reasons, the latter usage is rarely heard among the inhabitants of the other countries of the U.K.—Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland (sometimes called Ulster). England is by far the most populous part of the kingdom, as well as the seat of its capital, London.

From the first to the fifth century C.E. most of what is now England and Wales was a province of the Roman Empire called Britain (in Latin, Britannia). After the fall of Rome, much of the island was invaded and settled by peoples from northern Germany and Denmark speaking what we now call Old English. These peoples are known as the Angles and the Saxons (the word England is related to Angles). By the time of the Norman Conquest (1066) most of the kingdoms founded by the Angles, the Saxons, and the subsequent Viking invaders had coalesced into the kingdom of England, which, in the latter Middle Ages, conquered and largely absorbed the neighboring Celtic kingdom of Wales. In 1603 James VI of Scotland inherited the island's other throne as James I of England, and for the next hundred years—except for the two decades of Puritan rule—Scotland (both its English-speaking Lowlands and its Gaelic-speaking Highlands) and England (with Wales) were two kingdoms under a single king. In 1707 the Act of Union brought them together as the United Kingdom of Great Britain. Ireland, where English rule had begun in the twelfth century and been tightened in the sixteenth, was incorporated by the 1800–1801 Act of Union into the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. With the division of Ireland and the establishment of the Irish Free State after World War I, this name was modified to its present form, and in 1949 the Irish Free State became the Republic of Ireland, or Éire. In 1999 Scotland elected a separate parliament it had relinquished in 1707, and Wales elected an assembly it lost in 1409; neither Scotland nor Wales ceased to be part of the United Kingdom.

The British Isles are further divided into counties, which in Great Britain are also known as shires. This word, with its vowel shortened in pronunciation, forms the suffix in the names of many counties, such as Yorkshire, Wiltshire, Somersetshire.

The Latin names Britannia (Britain), Caledonia (Scotland), and Hibernia (Ireland) are sometimes used in poetic diction; so too is Britain's ancient Celtic name, Albion. Because of its accidental resemblance to albus (Latin for “white”), Albion is especially associated with the chalk cliffs that seem to gird much of the English coast like defensive walls.

The British Empire took its name from the British Isles because it was created not only by the English but also by the Irish, Scots, and Welsh, as well as by civilians and servicemen from other constituent countries of the empire. Some of the empire's overseas colonies, or crown colonies, were populated largely by settlers of European origin and their descendants. These predominantly White settler colonies, such as Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, were allowed significant self-government in the nineteenth century and recognized as dominions in the early twentieth century. The White dominions became members of the Commonwealth of Nations, also called the Commonwealth, the British Commonwealth, and "the Old Commonwealth" at different times, an association of sovereign states under the symbolic leadership of the British monarch.

Other overseas colonies of the empire had mostly Indigenous populations (or, in the Caribbean, the descendants of enslaved people, indentured servants, and others). These colonies were granted political independence after World War II, later than the dominions, and have often been referred to since as postcolonial nations. In South and Southeast Asia, India and Pakistan gained independence in 1947, followed by other countries including Sri Lanka (formerly Ceylon), Burma (now Myanmar), Malaya (now Malaysia), and Singapore. In West and East Africa, the Gold Coast was decolonized as Ghana in 1957, Nigeria in 1960, Sierra Leone in 1961, Uganda in 1962, Kenya in 1963, and so forth, while in southern Africa, the White minority government of South Africa was already independent in 1931, though majority rule did not come until 1994. In the Caribbean, Jamaica and Trinidad and Tobago became independent in 1962, followed by Barbados in 1966, and other islands of the British West Indies in the 1970s and '80s. Other regions from which nations emerged out of British colonial rule included Central America (British Honduras, now Belize), South America (British Guiana, now Guyana), the Pacific islands (Fiji), and Europe (Cyprus, Malta). After decolonization, many of these nations chose to remain within a newly conceived Commonwealth and are sometimes referred to as "New Commonwealth" countries. Some nations, such as Ireland, Pakistan, and South Africa, withdrew from the Commonwealth, though South Africa and Pakistan eventually rejoined, and others, such as Burma (now Myanmar), gained independence outside the Commonwealth. Britain's last major overseas colony, Hong Kong, was returned to Chinese sovereignty in 1997, but while Britain retains only a handful of dependent territories, such as Bermuda and Montserrat, the scope of the Commonwealth remains vast, with approximately 30 percent of the world's population.

British Money

One of the most dramatic changes to the system of British money came in 1971. In the system previously in place, the pound consisted of 20 shillings, each containing 12 pence, making 240 pence to the pound. Since 1971, British money has been calculated on the decimal system, with 100 pence to the pound. Britons' experience of paper money did not change very drastically: as before, 5- and 10-pound notes constitute the majority of bills passing through their hands (in addition, 20- and 50-pound notes have been added). But the shift necessitated a whole new way of thinking about and exchanging coins and marked the demise of the shilling, one of the fundamental units of British monetary history. Many other coins, still frequently encountered in literature, had already passed. These include the groat, worth 4 pence (the word "groat" is often used to signify a trifling sum); the angel (which depicted the archangel Michael triumphing over a dragon), valued at 10 shillings; the mark, worth in its day two-thirds of a pound or 13 shillings 4 pence; and the sovereign, a gold coin initially worth 22 shillings 6 pence, later valued at 1 pound, last circulated in 1932. One prominent older coin, the guinea, was worth a pound and a shilling; though it has not been minted since 1813, a very few quality items or prestige awards (like the purse in a horse race) may still be quoted in guineas. (The table below includes some other obsolete coins.) Colloquially, a pound was (and is) called a quid; a shilling a bob; sixpence, a tanner; a copper could refer to a penny, a half-penny, or a farthing ($\frac{1}{4}$ penny).

Old Currency	New Currency
1 pound note	1 pound coin (or note in Scotland)
10 shilling (half-pound note)	50 pence
5 shilling (crown)
21/2 shilling (half crown)	20 pence
2 shilling (florin)	10 pence
1 shilling	5 pence
6 pence
21/2 pence	1 penny
2 pence
1 penny
1/2 penny
1/4 penny (farthing)

Throughout its tenure as a member of the European Union (1973–2020), Britain contemplated but did not make the change to the EU's common currency, the Euro, reflecting many Britons' strong identification of their country with its rich commercial history and view of their currency as a national symbol.

Even more challenging than sorting out the values of obsolete coins is calculating for any given period the purchasing power of money, which fluctuates over time by its very nature. As difficult as it is to generalize, it is clear that money used to be worth much more than it is currently. During the early Middle Ages, the most valuable circulating coin was the silver penny: four would buy a sheep. Beyond long-term inflationary trends, prices varied from times of plenty to those marked by poor harvests; from peacetime to wartime; from the country to the metropolis (life in London has always been very expensive); and wages varied according to the availability of labor (wages would sharply rise, for instance, during the devastating Black Death in the fourteenth century). The following chart provides a glimpse of some actual prices of given periods and their changes across time, though all the variables mentioned above prevent them from being definitive. Even from one year to the next, an added tax on gin or tea could drastically raise prices, and a lottery ticket could cost much more the night before the drawing than just a month earlier. Still, the prices quoted below do indicate important trends, such as the disparity of incomes in British society and the costs of basic commodities. In the chart on the following pages, the symbol £ is used for pound, s. for shilling, d. for a penny (from Latin denarius); a sum would normally be written £2.19.3—that is 2 pounds, 19 shillings, 3 pence. (This is Leopold Bloom's budget for the day depicted in Joyce's novel Ulysses [1922]; in the new currency, it would be about £2.96.)

circa	1390	1590	1650	1750	1815	1875	1950
food and drink	gallon (8 pints) of ale, 1.5d.	tankard of beer, .5d.	coffee, 1d. a dish	"drunk for a penny, dead drunk for two-pence" (gin shop sign in Hogarth print)	ounce of laudanum, 3d.	pint of beer, 3d.	pint of Guinness stout, 11d.
	gallon (8 pints) of wine, 3 to 4d.	pound of beef, 2s. 5d.	chicken, 1s. 4d.	dinner at a steakhouse, 1s.	ham and potato dinner for two, 7s.	dinner in a good hotel, 5s.	pound of beef, 2s. 2d.
	pound of cinnamon, 1 to 3s.	pound of cinnamon, 10s. 6d.	pound of tea, £3 10s.	pound of tea, 16s.	bottle of French claret, 12s.	pound of tea, 2s.	dinner on railway car, 7s. 6d.
entertainment	no cost to watch a cycle play	admission to public theater, 1 to 3d.	falcon, £11 5s.	theater tickets, 1 to 5s.	admission to Covent Garden theater, 1 to 7s.	theater tickets, 6d. to 7s.	admission to Old Vic theater, 1s. 6d. to 10s. 6d.
	contributory admission to professional troupe theater	cheap seat in private theater, 6d.	billiard table, £25	admission to Vauxhall Gardens, 1s.	annual subscription to Almack's (exclusive club), 10 guineas	admission to Madam Tussaud's waxworks, 1s.	admission to Odeon cinema, Manchester, 1s 3d.
	maintenance for royal hounds at Windsor, .75d. a day	"to see a dead Indian" (The Tempest 2.2.32), 1.25d. (ten "doits")	three-quarter length portrait painting, £31	lottery ticket, £20 (shares were sold)	Jane Austen's piano, 30 guineas	annual fees at a gentleman's club, 7 to 10 guineas	tropical fish tank, £4 4s.
reading	cheap romance, 1s.	play quarto, 6d.	pamphlet, 1 to 6d.	issue of The Gentleman's Magazine , 6d.	issue of Edinburgh Review , 6s.	copy of the Times , 3d.	copy of the Times , 3d.

	a Latin Bible, 2 to £4	Shakespeare's First Folio (1623), £1	student Bible, 6s.	cheap edition of Milton, 2s.	membership in circulating library (3rd class), £1 4s. a year	illustrated edition of Through the Looking-glass , 6s.	issue of Eagle comics, 4.5d.
	payment for illuminating a liturgical book, £22 9s.	Foxe's Acts and Monuments , 24s.	Hobbes's Leviathan , 8s.	Johnson's Dictionary , folio, 2 vols., £4 10s.	1st edition of Austen's Pride and Prejudice , 18s.	1st edition of Trollope's The Way We Live Now , 2 vols., £1 1s.	Orwell's Nineteen Eighty Four , paperback, 3s. 6d.
transportation	night's supply of hay for horse, 2d.	wherry (whole boat) across Thames, 1d.	day's journey, coach, 10s.	boat across Thames, 4d.	coach ride, outside, 2 to 3d. a mile; inside, 4 to 5d. a mile	15-minute journey in a London cab, 1s. 6d.	London tube fare, about 2d. a mile
	coach, £8	hiring a horse for a day, 12d.	coach horse, £30	coach fare, London to Edinburgh, £4 10s.	palanquin transport in Madras, 5s. a day	railway, 3rd class, London to Plymouth, 18s. 8d. (about 1d. a mile)	petrol, 3s. a gallon
	quality horse, £10	hiring a coach for a day, 10s.	fancy carriage, £170	transport to America, £5	passage, Liverpool to New York, £10	passage to India, 1st class, £50	midsize Austin sedan, £449 plus £188 4s. 2d. tax clothes	clothing allowance for peasant, 3s. a year	shoes with buckles, 8d.	footman's frieze coat, 15s.	working woman's gown, 6s. 6d.	checked muslin, 7s. per yard	flannel for a cheap petticoat, 1s. 3d. a yard	woman's sundress, £3 13s. 10d.
	shoes for gentry wearer, 4d.	woman's gloves, £1 5s.	falconer's hat, 10s.	gentleman's suit, £8	hiring a dressmaker for a pelisse, 8s.	overcoat for an Eton schoolboy, £1 1s.	tweed sports jacket, £3 16s. 6d.
	hat for gentry wearer, 10d.	fine cloak, £16	black cloth for mourning household of an earl, £100	very fine wig, £30	ladies silk stockings, 12s.	set of false teeth, £2 10s.	"Teddy boy" drape suit, £20
labor/incomes	hiring a skilled building worker, 4d. a day	actor's daily wage during playing season, 1s.	agricultural laborer, 6s. 5d. a week	price of enslaved boy, £32	lowest-paid sailor on Royal Navy ship, 10s. 9d. a month	seasonal agricultural laborer, 14s. a week	minimum wage, agricultural laborer, £4 14s. per

							47-hour week
	wage for professional scribe, £2 3s. 4d. a year + cloak	household servant 2 to £5 a year + food, clothing	tutor to nobleman's children, £30 a year	housemaid's wage, £6 to £8 a year	contributor to Quarterly Review , 10 guineas per sheet	housemaid's wage, £10 to £25 a year	shorthand typist, £367 a year
	minimum income to be called gentleman, £10 a year; for knighthood, 40 to £400	minimum income for eligibility for knighthood, £30 a year	Milton's salary as Secretary of Foreign Tongues, £288 a year	Boswell's allowance, £200 a year	minimum income for a "genteel" family, £100 a year	income of the "comfortable" classes, £800 and up a year	middle manager's salary, £1,480 a year income from land of richest magnates, £3,500 a year	income from land of average earl, £4,000 a year	Earl of Bedford's income, £8,000 a year	Duke of Newcastle's income, £40,000 a year	Mr. Darcy's income, Pride and Prejudice , £10,000	Trollope's income, £4,000 a year	barrister's salary, £2,032 a year

The British Baronage

The English monarchy is in principle hereditary, though at times during the Middle Ages the rules were subject to dispute. As it stands now, authority passes from parent to eldest surviving child, to siblings in order of seniority if there are no children, and in default of direct descendants to collateral lines (cousins, nephews, nieces) in order of closeness. There have been breaks in the order of succession (1066, 1399, 1688), but so far as possible the usurpers have always sought to paper over the break with a legitimate, that is, hereditary, claim. When a queen succeeds to the throne and takes a husband, he does not become king unless he is in the line of blood succession; rather, he is named prince consort, as Albert was to Victoria. He may be the father of kings, but he is not one himself.

The original Saxon nobles were the king's thanes, ealdormen, or earls, who provided the king with military service and counsel in return for booty, gifts, or landed estates. William the Conqueror, arriving from France, where feudalism was fully developed, considerably expanded this group. In addition, as the king distributed the lands of his new kingdom, he also distributed dignities to men who became known collectively as "the baronage." "Baron" in its root meaning signifies simply "man," and barons were the king's men. As the title was common, a distinction was early made between greater and lesser barons, the former gradually assuming loftier and more impressive titles. The first English "duke" was created in 1337; the title of "marquess," or "marquis" (pronounced "markwis"), followed in 1385, and "viscount" ("vyekount") in 1440. Though "earl" is the oldest title of all, an earl now comes between a marquess and a viscount in order of dignity and precedence, and the old term "baron" now designates a rank just below viscount. "Baronets" were created in 1611 as a means of raising revenue for the crown (the title could be purchased for about £1,000); they are marginal nobility and have never sat in the House of Lords.

Kings and queens are addressed as "Your Majesty," princes and princesses as "Your Highness," the other hereditary nobility as "My Lord" or "Your Lordship." Peers receive their titles either by inheritance (like Lord Byron, the sixth baron of that line) or from the monarch (like Alfred, Lord Tennyson, created 1st Baron Tennyson by Victoria). The children, even of a duke, are commoners unless they are specifically granted some other title or inherit their father's title from him. A peerage can be forfeited by act of attainder, as for example when a lord is convicted of treason; and, when forfeited, or lapsed for lack of a successor, can be bestowed on another family. Thus in 1605 Robert Cecil was made first Earl of Salisbury in the third creation, the first creation dating from 1149, the second from 1337, the title having been in abeyance since 1539. Titles descend by right of succession and do not depend on tenure of land; thus, a title does not always indicate where a lord dwells or holds power. Indeed, noble titles do not always refer to a real place at all. At Prince Edward's marriage in 1999, the queen created him Earl of Wessex, although the old kingdom of Wessex has had no political existence since 1066, and the name was all but forgotten until it was resurrected by Thomas Hardy as the setting of his novels. (This is perhaps but one of many ways in which the world of the aristocracy increasingly resembles the realm of literature.)

The king and queen	(These are all of the royal line.)
Prince and princess
Duke and duchess	(These may or may not be of the royal line, but are ordinarily remote from the succession.)
Marquess and marchioness
Earl and countess
Viscount and viscountess
Baron and baroness
Baronet and lady

Scottish peers sat in the parliament of Scotland, as English peers did in the parliament of England, till at the Act of Union (1707) Scottish peers were granted sixteen seats in the English House of Lords, to be filled by election. (In 1963, all Scottish lords were allowed to sit.) Similarly, Irish peers, when the Irish parliament was abolished in 1801, were granted the right to elect twenty-eight of their number to the House of Lords in Westminster. (Now that the Republic of Ireland is a separate nation, this no longer applies.) Women members (peeresses) were first allowed to sit in the House as nonhereditary Life Peers in 1958 (when that status was created for members of both genders); women first sat by their own hereditary right in 1963. Today the House of Lords still retains some power to influence or delay legislation, but its future is uncertain. In 1999, the hereditary peers (then amounting to 750) were reduced to 92 temporary members elected by their fellow peers. Holders of Life Peerages remain, as do senior bishops of the Church of England and high-court judges (the "Law Lords").

Below the peerage the chief title of honor is "knight." Knighthood, which is not hereditary, is generally a reward for services rendered. A knight (Sir John Black) is addressed, using his first name, as "Sir John"; his wife, using the last name, is "Lady Black"—unless she is the daughter of an earl or nobleman of higher rank, in which case she will be "Lady Arabella." The female equivalent of a knight bears the title of "Dame." Though the word knight itself comes from the Old English cniht, there is some doubt as to whether knighthood amounted to much before the arrival of the Normans. The feudal system required military service as a condition of land tenure, and a man who came to serve his king at the head of an army of tenants required a title of authority and badges of identity—hence the title of knighthood and the coat of arms. During the Crusades, when men were far removed from their land (or even sold it in order to go on crusade), more elaborate forms of fealty sprang up that soon expanded into orders of knighthood. The Templars, Hospitallers, Knights of the Teutonic Order, Knights of Malta, and Knights of the Golden Fleece were but a few of these companionships; not all of them were available at all times in England.

Gradually, with the rise of centralized government and the decline of feudal tenures, military knighthood became obsolete, and the rank largely honorific; sometimes, as under James I, it degenerated into a scheme of the royal government for making money. For hundreds of years after its establishment in the fourteenth century, the Order of the Garter was the only English order of knighthood, an exclusive courtly companionship. Then, during the late seventeenth, the eighteenth, and the nineteenth centuries, a number of additional orders were created, with names such as the Thistle, Saint Patrick, the Bath, Saint Michael, and Saint George, plus a number of special Victorian and Indian orders. They retain the terminology, ceremony, and dignity of knighthood, but the military implications are vestigial.

Although the British Empire now belongs to history, appointments to the Order of the British Empire continue to be conferred for services to that empire at home or abroad. Such honors (commonly referred to as “gongs”) are granted by the monarch in New Year’s and Birthday lists, but the decisions are now made by the government in power. In recent years there have been efforts to popularize and democratize the dispensation of honors, with recipients including celebrities of all types. But this does not prevent large sectors of British society from regarding both knighthood and the peerage as largely irrelevant to modern life.

The Royal Lines of England and Great Britain

England

SAXONS AND DANES

Egbert, king of Wessex802–839

Ethelwulf, son of Egbert839–858

Ethelbald, second son of Ethelwulf858–860

Ethelbert, third son of Ethelwulf860–866

Ethelred I, fourth son of Ethelwulf866–871

Alfred the Great, fifth son of Ethelwulf871–899

Edward the Elder, son of Alfred899–924

Athelstan the Glorious, son of Edward924–940

Edmund I, third son of Edward940–946

Edred, fourth son of Edward946–955

Edwy the Fair, son of Edmund955–959

Edgar the Peaceful, second son of Edmund959–975

Edward the Martyr, son of Edgar975–978 (murdered)

Ethelred II, the Unready, second son of Edgar978–1016

Edmund II, Ironside, son of Ethelred II1016–1016

Canute the Dane1016–1035

Harold I, Harefoot, natural son of Canute1035–1040

Hardecanute, son of Canute1040–1042

Edward the Confessor, son of Ethelred II1042–1066

Harold II, brother-in-law of Edward1066–1066 (died in battle)

HOUSE OF NORMANDY

William I, the Conqueror 1066–1087

William II, Rufus, third son of William I 1087–1100 (shot from ambush)

Henry I, Beauclerc, youngest son of William I 1100–1135

HOUSE OF BLOIS

Stephen, son of Adela, daughter of William I 1135–1154

HOUSE OF PLANTAGENET

Henry II, son of Geoffrey Plantagenet by Matilda, daughter of Henry I 1154–1189

Richard I, Coeur de Lion, son of Henry II 1189–1199

John Lackland, son of Henry II 1199–1216

Henry III, son of John 1216–1272

Edward I, Longshanks, son of Henry III 1272–1307

Edward II, son of Edward I 1307–1327 (deposed)

Edward III of Windsor, son of Edward II 1327–1377

Richard II, grandson of Edward III 1377–1399 (deposed)

HOUSE OF LANCASTER

Henry IV, son of John of Gaunt, son of Edward III 1399–1413

Henry V, Prince Hal, son of Henry IV 1413–1422

Henry VI, son of Henry V 1422–1461 (deposed),
1470–1471 (deposed)

HOUSE OF YORK

Edward IV, great-great-grandson of Edward III1461–1470 (deposed), 1471–1483

Edward V, son of Edward IV1483–1483 (murdered)

Richard III, Crookback1483–1485 (died in battle)

HOUSE OF TUDOR

Henry VII, married daughter of Edward IV1485–1509

Henry VIII, son of Henry VII1509–1547

Edward VI, son of Henry VIII1547–1553

Mary I, "Bloody," daughter of Henry VIII1553–1558

Elizabeth I, daughter of Henry VIII1558–1603

HOUSE OF STUART

James I (James VI of Scotland)1603–1625

Charles I, son of James I1625–1649 (executed)

COMMONWEALTH & PROTECTORATE

Council of State1649–1653

Oliver Cromwell, Lord Protector1653–1658

Richard Cromwell, son of Oliver1658–1660 (resigned)

HOUSE OF STUART (RESTORED)

Charles II, son of Charles I1660–1685

James II, second son of Charles I1685–1688

(INTERREGNUM, 11 DECEMBER 1688 TO 13 FEBRUARY 1689)

HOUSE OF ORANGE-NASSAU

William III of Orange, by Mary, daughter of Charles I
and Mary II, daughter of James II 1689–1701–1694

Anne, second daughter of James II 1702–1714

Great Britain

HOUSE OF HANOVER

George I, son of Elector of Hanover and Sophia, granddaughter of James I 1714–1727

George II, son of George I 1727–1760

George III, grandson of George II 1760–1820

George IV, son of George III 1820–1830

William IV, third son of George III 1830–1837

Victoria, daughter of Edward, fourth son of George III 1837–1901

HOUSE OF SAXE-COBURG AND GOTHA

Edward VII, son of Victoria 1901–1910

HOUSE OF WINDSOR (NAME ADOPTED 17 JULY 1917)

George V, second son of Edward VII 1910–1936

Edward VIII, eldest son of George V 1936–1936 (abdicated)

George VI, second son of George V 1936–1952

Elizabeth II, daughter of George VI1952–2022

Charles III, son of Elizabeth II2022–

Religions in Great Britain

In the late sixth century C.E., missionaries from Rome introduced Christianity to Britons—actually, reintroduced it, since it had briefly flourished in the southern parts of the British Isles during the Roman occupation, and even after the Roman withdrawal had persisted in the Celtic regions of Scotland and Wales. By the time the earliest poems included in The Norton Anthology of English Literature were composed (the seventh century), therefore, there had been a Christian presence in the British Isles for hundreds of years. The conversion of the Germanic occupiers of England can, however, be dated only from 597. Our knowledge of the religion of pre-Christian Britain is sketchy, but it is likely that vestiges of Germanic polytheism assimilated into, or coexisted with, the practice of Christianity: fertility rites were incorporated into the celebration of Easter resurrection, rituals commemorating the dead into All-Hallows Eve and All Saints Day, and elements of winter solstice festivals into the celebration of Christmas. The most durable polytheistic remains are the days of the week, each of which except “Saturday” derives from the name of a Germanic pagan god, and the word “Easter,” deriving, according to the great monastic scholar Bede (ca. 673–735), from the name of a Germanic pagan goddess, Eostre. In English literature such “folkloric” elements sometimes elicit romantic nostalgia. Geoffrey Chaucer’s “Wife of Bath” looks back to a magical time before the arrival of Christianity in which the land was “fulfild of fairye.” Hundreds of years later, the seventeenth-century writer Robert Herrick honors the amalgamation of Christian and pagan elements in agrarian British culture in such poems as “Corinna’s Gone A-Maying” and “The Hock Cart.”

Medieval Christianity was fairly uniform, if complex, across Western Europe—hence called “catholic,” or universally shared. The Church was composed of the so-called “regular” and “secular” orders, the regular orders being those who followed a rule in a community under an abbot or an abbess (that is, monks, nuns, friars, and canons), while the secular clergy of priests served parish communities under the governance of a bishop. In the unstable period from the sixth until the twelfth century, monasteries were the intellectual powerhouse of the Church. From the beginning of the thirteenth century, with the development of an urban Christian spirituality in Europe, friars dominated the recently invented institution of universities, as well as devoting themselves, in theory at least, to the urban poor.

The Catholic Church was also an international power structure. With its hierarchy of pope, cardinals, archbishops, and bishops, it offered a model of the centralized, bureaucratic state from the late eleventh century. That ecclesiastical power structure coexisted alongside a separate, often less centralized and feudal structure of lay authorities, with theoretically different and often competing spheres of social responsibilities. The sharing of lay and ecclesiastical authority in medieval England was sometimes a source of conflict. Chaucer’s pilgrims are on their way to visit the memorial shrine to one victim of such exemplary struggle: Thomas à Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, who opposed the policies of King Henry II, was assassinated by indirect suggestion of the king in 1170, and later made a saint. The Church, in turn, produced its own victims: Jews were subject to persecution in the late twelfth century in England, before being expelled in 1290. From the beginning of the fifteenth century, the English Church targeted Lollard heretics (see below) with capital punishment, for the first time.

As an international organization, the Church conducted its business in the universal language of Latin. Thus although in the period the largest segment of literate persons was made up of clerics, the clerical contribution to great literary writing in vernacular languages (for example, French and English) was, so far as we know, relatively modest, with some great exceptions in the later Middle Ages (for example, William Langland). Lay, vernacular writers of the period certainly reflect the importance of the Church as an institution and the pervasiveness of religion in the rituals that marked everyday life, as well as contesting institutional authority. From the late fourteenth century, indeed, England witnessed an active and articulate, proto-Protestant movement known as Lollardy, which attacked clerical hierarchy and promoted vernacular scriptures.

Beginning in 1517 the German monk Martin Luther, in Wittenberg, Germany, openly challenged many aspects of Catholic practice and by 1520 had completely repudiated the authority of the pope, setting in motion the Protestant Reformation. Luther argued that the Roman Catholic Church had strayed far from the pattern of Christianity laid out in scripture. He rejected Catholic doctrines for which no biblical authority was to be found, such as the belief in Purgatory, and translated the Bible into German, on the grounds that the importance of scripture for all Christians made its translation into the vernacular tongue essential. Luther was not the first to advance such views—Lollard followers of the Englishman John Wycliffe had translated the Bible in the late fourteenth century. But Luther, protected by powerful German rulers, was able to speak out without fear of punishment and convert others to his views, rather than suffer the persecution usually meted out to heretics. Soon other reformers were following in Luther's footsteps: of these, the Swiss Ulrich Zwingli and the French Jean Calvin would be especially influential for English religious thought.

At first England remained staunchly Catholic. Its king, Henry VIII, was so severe to heretics that the pope awarded him the title "Defender of the Faith," which British monarchs have retained to this day. In 1534, however, Henry rejected the authority of the pope to prevent his divorce from his queen, Catherine of Aragon, and his marriage to his mistress, Ann Boleyn. In doing so, Henry appropriated to himself ecclesiastical as well as secular authority. Thomas More, author of Utopia, was executed in 1535 for refusing to endorse Henry's right to govern the English church. Over the following six years, Henry consolidated his grip on the ecclesiastical establishment by dissolving the powerful, populous Catholic monasteries and redistributing their massive landholdings to his own lay followers. Yet Henry's church largely retained Catholic doctrine and liturgy. When Henry died and his young son, Edward, came to the throne in 1547, the English church embarked on a more Protestant path, a direction abruptly reversed when Edward died and his older sister Mary, the daughter of Catherine of Aragon, took the throne in 1553 and attempted to reintroduce Roman Catholicism. Mary's reign was also short, however, and her successor, Elizabeth I, the daughter of Ann Boleyn, was a Protestant. Elizabeth attempted to establish a "middle way" Christianity, compromising between Roman Catholic practices and beliefs and reformed ones.

The Church of England, though it laid claim to a national rather than pan-European authority, aspired like its predecessor to be the universal church of all English subjects. It retained the Catholic structure of parishes and dioceses and the Catholic hierarchy of bishops, though the ecclesiastical authority was now the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Church's "Supreme Governor" was the monarch. Yet disagreement and controversy persisted. Some members of the Church of England wanted to retain many of the ritual and liturgical elements of Catholicism. Others, the Puritans, advocated a more thoroughgoing reformation. Most Puritans remained within the Church of England, but a minority, the "Separatists" or "Congregationalists," split from the established church altogether. These dissenters no longer thought of the ideal church as an organization to which everybody belonged; instead, they conceived it as a more exclusive group of likeminded people, one not necessarily attached to a larger body of believers.

In the seventeenth century, the succession of the Scottish king James to the English throne produced another problem. England and Scotland were separate nations, and in the sixteenth century Scotland had developed its own national Presbyterian church, or "kirk," under the leadership of the reformer John Knox. The kirk retained fewer Catholic liturgical elements than did the Church of England, and its authorities, or "presbyters," were elected by assemblies of their fellow clerics, rather than appointed by the king. James I and his son Charles I, especially the latter, wanted to bring the Scottish kirk into conformity with Church of England practices. The Scots violently resisted these efforts, with the collaboration of many English Puritans, in a conflict that eventually developed into the English Civil War in the mid-seventeenth century. The effect of these disputes is visible in the poetry of such writers as John Milton, Robert Herrick, Henry Vaughan, and Thomas Traherne, and in the prose of Thomas Browne, Lucy Hutchinson, and Dorothy Waugh. Just as in the mid-sixteenth century, when a succession of monarchs with different religious commitments destabilized the church, so the seventeenth century endured spiritual whiplash. King Charles I's highly ritualistic Church of England was violently overturned by the Puritan victors in the Civil War—until 1660, after the death of the Puritan leader, Oliver Cromwell, when the Church of England was restored along with the monarchy.

The religious and political upheavals of the seventeenth century produced Christian sects that de-emphasized the ceremony of the established church and rejected as well its top-down authority structure. Some of these groups were ephemeral, but the Baptists (founded in 1608 in Amsterdam by the English expatriate John Smyth) and Quakers, or Society of Friends (founded by George Fox in the 1640s), flourished outside the established church, sometimes despite cruel persecution. John Bunyan, a Baptist, wrote the Christian allegory Pilgrim's Progress while in prison. Some dissenters, like the Baptists, shared the reformed reverence for the absolute authority of scripture but interpreted the scriptural texts differently from their fellow Protestants. Others, like the Quakers, favored, even over the authority of the Bible, the "inner light" or voice of individual conscience, which they took to be the working of the Holy Spirit in the lives of individuals.

The Protestant dissenters were not England's only religious minorities. Despite crushing fines and the threat of imprisonment, a minority of Catholics under Elizabeth and James openly refused to give their allegiance to the new church, and others remained secret adherents to the old ways. John Donne was brought up in an ardently Catholic family, and several other writers converted to Catholicism as adults—Ben Jonson for a considerable part of his career, Elizabeth Carey and Richard Crashaw permanently, and at profound personal cost. In the eighteenth century, Catholics remained objects of suspicion as possible agents of sedition, especially after the "Glorious Revolution" in 1688 deposed the Catholic James II in favor of the Protestant William and Mary. Anti-Catholic prejudice affected John Dryden, a Catholic convert, as well as the lifelong Catholic Alexander Pope. By contrast, the English colony of Ireland remained overwhelmingly Roman Catholic, the fervor of its religious commitment at least partly inspired by resistance to English occupation. Starting in the reign of Elizabeth, England shored up its own authority in Ireland by encouraging Protestant immigrants from Scotland to settle in the north of Ireland, producing a virulent religious divide the effects of which are still felt today.

A small community of Jews had moved from France to London after 1066, when the Norman William the Conqueror came to the English throne. Although despised and persecuted by many Christians, they were allowed to remain as moneylenders to the Crown, until the thirteenth century, when the king developed alternative sources of credit. At this point, in 1290, the Jews were expelled from England. In 1655 Oliver Cromwell permitted a few to return, and in the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries the Jewish population slowly increased, mainly by immigration from Germany. In the mid-eighteenth century some prominent Jews had their children brought up as Christians so as to facilitate their full integration into English society: thus the nineteenth-century writer and politician Benjamin Disraeli, although he and his father were members of the Church of England, was widely considered a Jew insofar as his ancestry was Jewish.

In the late seventeenth century, as the Church of England reasserted itself, Catholics, Jews, and dissenting Protestants found themselves subject to significant legal restrictions. The Corporation Act, passed in 1661, and the Test Act, passed in 1673, excluded all who refused to take communion in the Church of England from voting, attending university, or working in government or in the professions. Members of religious minorities, as well as Church of England communicants, paid mandatory taxes in support of Church of England ministers and buildings. In 1689 the dissenters gained the right to worship in public, but Jews and Catholics were not permitted to do so.

During the eighteenth century, political, intellectual, and religious history remained closely intertwined. The Church of England came to accommodate a good deal of variety. "Low church" services resembled those of the dissenting Protestant churches, minimizing ritual and emphasizing the sermon; the "high church" retained more elaborate ritual elements, yet its prestige was under attack on several fronts. Many Enlightenment thinkers subjected the Bible to rational critique and found it wanting: the philosopher David Hume, for instance, argued that the "miracles" described therein were more probably lies or errors than real breaches of the laws of nature. Within the Church of England, the "broad church" Latitudinarians welcomed this rationalism, advocating theological openness and an emphasis on ethics rather than dogma. More radically, the Unitarian movement rejected the divinity of Christ while professing to accept his ethical teachings. Taking a different tack, the preacher John Wesley, founder of Methodism, responded to the rationalists' challenge with a newly fervent call to evangelism and personal discipline; his movement was particularly successful in Wales. Revolutions in America and France at the end of the century generated considerable millenarian excitement and fostered more new religious ideas, often in conjunction with a radical social agenda. Many important writers of the Romantic period were indebted to traditions of protestant dissent: Unitarian and rationalist protestant ideas influenced William Hazlitt, Anna Barbauld, Mary Wollstonecraft, and the young Samuel Taylor Coleridge. William Blake created a highly idiosyncratic poetic mythology loosely indebted to radical strains of Christian mysticism. Others were even more heterodox: Lord Byron and Robert Burns, brought up as Scots Presbyterians, rebelled fiercely, and Percy Shelley's writing of an atheistic pamphlet resulted in his expulsion from Oxford.

Great Britain never erected an American-style "wall of separation" between church and state, but in practice religion and secular affairs grew more and more distinct during the nineteenth century. In consequence, members of religious minorities no longer seemed to pose a threat to the commonweal. A movement to repeal the Test Act failed in the 1790s, but a renewed effort resulted in the extension of the franchise to dissenting Protestants in 1828 and to Catholics in 1829. The numbers of Roman Catholics in England were swelled by immigration from Ireland, but there were also some prominent English adherents. Among writers, the converts John Newman and Gerard Manley Hopkins are especially important. The political participation and social integration of Jews presented a thornier challenge. Lionel de Rothschild, repeatedly elected to represent London in Parliament during the 1840s and 1850s, was not permitted to take his seat there because he refused to take his oath of office "on the true faith of a Christian"; finally, in 1858, the Jewish Disabilities Act allowed him to omit these words. Only in 1871, however, were Oxford and Cambridge opened to non-Anglicans.

Meanwhile geological discoveries and Charles Darwin's evolutionary theories increasingly cast doubt on the literal truth of the Creation story, and close philological analysis of the biblical text suggested that its origins were human rather than divine. By the end of the nineteenth century, many writers were bearing witness to a world in which Christianity no longer seemed fundamentally plausible. In his poetry and prose, Thomas Hardy depicts a world devoid of benevolent providence. Matthew Arnold's poem "Dover Beach" is in part an elegy to lost spiritual assurance, as the "Sea of Faith" goes out like the tide: "But now I only hear / Its melancholy, long, withdrawing roar / Retreating." For Arnold, literature must replace religion as a source of spiritual truth, and intimacy between individuals substitute for the lost communal solidarity of the universal church.

The work of many twentieth-century writers shows the influence of a religious upbringing or a religious conversion in adulthood. T. S. Eliot and W. H. Auden embrace Anglicanism, William Butler Yeats spiritualism. James Joyce repudiates Irish Catholicism but remains obsessed with it. Yet religion, or lack of it, is a matter of individual choice and conscience, not social or legal mandate. Over the past several decades, church attendance has plummeted in Great Britain. Only about 46 percent of the population identified itself as "Christian" on the 2021 census. Meanwhile, immigration from former British colonies as well as other countries has swelled the ranks of religions once uncommon in the British Isles—Muslim, Sikh, Hindu, Buddhist—though the numbers of adherents remain small relative to the total population.

Volume E: The Victorian Age

General Bibliography

This bibliography consists of a list of suggested general readings on English literature. Bibliographies for the authors and topical clusters in The Norton Anthology of English Literature are available online at the NAEL student site.

Histories of England and of English Literature

Even the most distinguished of the comprehensive general histories written in past generations have come to seem outmoded. Innovative research in social, cultural, and political history has made it difficult to write a single coherent account of England from the Middle Ages to the present, let alone to accommodate in a unified narrative the complex histories of Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and the other nations where writing in English has flourished. Readers who wish to explore the historical matrix out of which the works of literature collected in this anthology emerged are advised to consult the studies of particular periods listed in the appropriate sections of this bibliography. The multivolume Oxford History of England (1934–65) and New Oxford History of England (1992–2009) are useful, as are the three-volume Peoples of the British Isles: A New History, by Stanford E. Lehmberg, Samantha A. Meigs, and Thomas William Heyck (3rd ed., 1992); the nine-volume Cambridge Cultural History of Britain, ed. Boris Ford (1992); the three-volume Cambridge Social History of Britain, 1750–1950, ed. F. M. L. Thompson (1990); and the multivolume Penguin History of Britain, gen. ed. David Cannadine (1996–). For Britain's imperial history, readers can consult the five-volume Oxford History of the British Empire, ed. Wm. Roger Louis (1998–99), as well as Gender and Empire, ed. Philippa Levine (2004). Also of interest is Lisa Lowe, The Intimacies of Four

Continents (2015). Given the cultural centrality of London, readers may find particular interest in The London Encyclopaedia, ed. Ben Weinreb et al. (3rd ed., 2008); Roy Porter, London: A Social History (1994); and Jerry White, London in the Nineteenth Century: "A Human Awful Wonder of God" (2007) and London in the Twentieth Century: A City and Its People (2001).

Similar observations may be made about literary history. In the light of such initiatives as women's studies, New Historicism, and postcolonialism, the range of authors deemed significant has expanded, along with the geographical and conceptual boundaries of literature in English. Attempts to capture in a unified account the great sweep of literature from Beowulf to the early twenty-first century have largely given way to studies of individual genres, carefully delimited time periods, and specific authors. Among the large-scale literary surveys, The Cambridge Guide to Literature in English, ed. Dominic Head (3rd ed., 2006), is useful, as is the nine-volume Penguin History of Literature (1987–94) and the multivolume Oxford History of Poetry in English (2022–). The Feminist Companion to Literature in English: Women Writers from the Middle Ages to the Present, ed. Virginia Blain, Isobel Grundy, and Patricia Clements (1990), is an important resource, and the editorial materials in the two-volume The Norton Anthology of Literature by Women: The Traditions in English, ed. Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar (3rd ed., 2007), constitute a concise history and set of biographies of women authors since the Middle Ages. Annals of English Literature, 1475–1950 (2nd ed., 1961), lists important publications year by year, together with the significant literary events for each year. Seven volumes have been published in The Oxford English Literary History, gen. eds. Jonathan Bate and Colin Burrow (2002–): Laura Ashe, 1000–1350: Conquest and Transformation; James Simpson, 1350–1547: Reform and Cultural Revolution; Margaret J. M. Ezell, 1645–1714: The Later Seventeenth Century; Philip Davis, 1830–1880: The Victorians; Chris Baldick, 1830–1880: The Modern Movement (1910–1940); Randall Stevenson, 1960–2000: The Last of England?; and Bruce King, 1948–2000: The Internationalization of English.

Literature. See also The Cambridge History of Medieval English Literature, ed. David Wallace (1999); The Cambridge History of Early Medieval English Literature, ed. Clare E. Lees (2013); The Cambridge History of Early Modern English Literature, ed. David Loewenstein and Janel Mueller (2002); The Cambridge History of English Literature, 1660–1780, ed. John Richetti (2005); The Cambridge History of English Romantic Literature, ed. James Chandler (2009); The Cambridge History of Victorian Literature, ed. Kate Flint (2012); and The Cambridge History of Twentieth-Century English Literature, ed. Laura Marcus and Peter Nicholls (2004).

Helpful treatments and surveys of English meter, rhyme, and stanza forms are Paul Fussell Jr., Poetic Meter and Poetic Form (rev. ed., 1979); Donald Wesling, The Chances of Rhyme: Device and Modernity (1980); Charles O. Hartman, Free Verse: An Essay on Prosody (1980); Derek Attridge, Poetic Rhythm: An Introduction (1995); Robert Pinsky, The Sounds of Poetry: A Brief Guide (1998); The Making of a Poem: A Norton Anthology of Poetic Forms, ed. Mark Strand and Eavan Boland (2000); John Hollander, Rhyme's Reason: A Guide to English Verse (3rd ed., 2001); Poems, Poets, Poetry: An Introduction and Anthology, ed. Helen Vendler (3rd ed., 2010); The Lyric Theory Reader: A Critical Anthology, ed. Virginia Jackson and Yopie Prins (2014); and Jonathan Culler, Theory of the Lyric (2015).

On the development and functioning of the novel as a form, see Ian Watt, The Rise of the Novel: Studies in Defoe, Richardson, and Fielding (1957); Gérard Genette, Narrative Discourse: An Essay in Method (1970; trans. 1980); Theory of the Novel: A Historical Approach, ed. Michael McKeon (2000); The Novel, ed. Franco Moretti (2 vols.; 2001–03, trans. 2006); McKeon, The Origins of the English Novel, 1600–1740 (15th anniversary ed., 2002); The Cambridge History of the English Novel, ed. Robert L. Caserio and Clement Hawes (2012); A Companion to the English Novel, ed. Stephen Arata et al. (2015); and the ten volumes to date of The Oxford History of the Novel in English (2012–). On women novelists and readers, see Nancy Armstrong, Desire and Domestic Fiction: A Political History of the Novel (1987), and Catherine Gallagher, Nobody's Story: The Vanishing Acts of Women Writers in the Marketplace, 1670–1820 (1994).

On the history of playhouse design, see Richard Leacroft, The Development of the English Playhouse: An Illustrated Survey of Theatre Building in England from Medieval to Modern Times (1988). For a survey of the plays that have appeared on these and other stages, see Allardyce Nicoll, British Drama, rev. J. C. Trewin (6th ed., 1978); the eight-volume The Revels History of Drama in English, gen. eds. Clifford Leech and T. W. Craik (1975–83); Alfred Harbage, Annals of English Drama, 975–1700, rev. S. Schoenbaum and Sylvia Wagonheim (3rd ed., 1989); and the three volumes of The Cambridge History of British Theatre, ed. Jane Milling, Peter Thomson, Joseph Donohue, and Baz Kershaw (2004).

On some of the key intellectual currents that are at once reflected in and shaped by literature and contemporary literary criticism, Arthur O. Lovejoy's classic studies The Great Chain of Being (1936) and Essays in the History of Ideas (1948) remain valuable, along with such works as Georg Simmel, The Philosophy of Money (1900; trans. 1907; 3rd enl. ed., 2004); Ernst Cassirer, The Philosophy of Symbolic Forms (4 vols., 1923–95; trans. 1953–96); Arthur O. Lovejoy and George Boas, Primitivism and Related Ideas in Antiquity (1935); Norbert Elias, The Civilizing Process (2 vols., 1939; trans. 1979–82); Simone de Beauvoir, The Second Sex (2 vols., 1949; trans. 1953, new trans. 2009); Frantz Fanon, Black Skin, White Masks (1952; trans. 1957, new trans. 2008); Ernst Kantorowicz, The King's Two Bodies: A Study in Mediaeval Political Theology (1957; new eds. 1997, 2016); Hannah Arendt, The Human Condition (1958; 2nd ed., 1998); Gaston Bachelard, The Poetics of Space (1958; trans. 1969, new ed. 1994); Richard Popkin, The History of Scepticism from Erasmus to Descartes (1960; rev. ed., 1964; rev. and expanded as The History of Scepticism: From Savonarola to Bayle, 2003); Hans Blumenberg, The Legitimacy of the Modern Age (1966; trans. 1983); M. H. Abrams, Natural Supernaturalism: Tradition and Revolution in Romantic Literature

(1971); Michel Foucault, Madness and Civilization: A History of Insanity in the Age of Reason (1964; trans. 1965) and The Order of Things: An Archaeology of the Human Sciences (1966; trans. 1970); Jacques Derrida, Of Grammatology (1967; trans. 1976, 40th anniversary ed. 2016) and Dissemination (1972; trans. 1981); Martin Jay, The Dialectical Imagination: A History of the Frankfurt School and the Institute of Social Research, 1923–1950 (1973); Hayden White, Metahistory: The Historical Imagination in Nineteenth-Century Europe (1973); Roland Barthes, The Pleasure of the Text (1973; trans. 1975); Raymond Williams, Keywords: A Vocabulary of Culture and Society (1976; new ed., 2015); Pierre Bourdieu, Distinction: A Social Critique of the Judgement of Taste (1979; trans. 1984); Richard Rorty, Philosophy and the Mirror of Nature (1979; 39th anniversary ed., 2009); Gilles Deleuze and Félix Guattari, A Thousand Plateaus: Capitalism and Schizophrenia (1980; trans. 1987); Michel de Certeau, The Practice of Everyday Life (2 vols., 1980; trans. 1984–98); Jürgen Habermas, The Philosophical Discourse of Modernity: Twelve Lectures (1985; trans. 1987); Slavoj Žižek, The Sublime Object of Ideology (1989); Homi Bhabha, The Location of Culture (1994; new ed., 2004); Judith Butler, The Psychic Life of Power: Theories in Subjection (1997); Sigmund Freud, Writings on Art and Literature, ed. Neil Hertz (1997); and N. Katherine Hayles, How We Became Posthuman: Virtual Bodies in Cybernetics, Literature, and Informatics (1999).

Reference Works

The single most important tool for the study of literature in English is the Oxford English Dictionary (1884–1924; 2nd ed., 1989; 3rd ed. in process). The most current edition, updated quarterly, is available online to subscribers. The OED is written on historical principles: that is, it attempts not only to describe current word use but also to record the history and development of the language from its origins before the Norman Conquest to the present. It thus provides, for familiar as well as archaic and obscure words, the widest possible range of meanings and uses, organized chronologically and illustrated with quotations. The OED can be searched as a conventional dictionary arranged a–z and also by subject, usage, region, origin, and timeline (the first appearance of a word). Resources available for early forms of English include the online Old English and Middle English dictionaries at Lexilogos (https://www.lexilogos.com/english/english_old.htm and https://www.lexilogos.com/english/english_middle.htm); also valuable are the Dictionary of Old English (1986–) and the Middle English Dictionary (1952; digitized 2008). Beyond the OED there are many other valuable dictionaries, such as The American Heritage Dictionary (5th ed., 50th anniversary printing, 2018); The Oxford Dictionary of Abbreviations (1992); T. F. Hoad, The Concise Oxford Dictionary of English Etymology (1993); Bas Aarts, Sylvia Chalker, and Edmund Weiner, The Oxford Dictionary of English Grammar (2nd ed., 2014); Morton S. Freeman, A New Dictionary of Eponyms (1997); The Oxford Essential Dictionary of Foreign Terms in English (1999); The Oxford Dictionary of Idioms, ed. Judith Siefring (2nd ed., 2004); P. H. Matthews, The Concise Oxford Dictionary of Linguistics (3rd ed., 2014); Tom McArthur, The Oxford Guide to World English (2002); and The Concise Oxford Dictionary of Proverbs, ed. Jennifer Speake (4th ed., 2003). Other valuable reference works include The Cambridge Encyclopedia of the English Language, ed. David Crystal (3rd ed., 2018); The Concise Oxford Companion to the English Language, ed. Tom McArthur (1998); Fowler's Concise Dictionary of Modern English Usage, ed. Jeremy Butterfield (3rd ed., 2016); and the numerous guides to specialized vocabularies, slang, regional dialects, and the like.

There is a steady flow of new editions of most major and many minor writers in English, along with the publication of critical appraisals and scholarship. James L. Harner's Literary Research Guide: An Annotated List of Reference Sources in English Literary Studies (6th ed., 2014; available online at www.mlalrg.org/public) offers thorough, evaluative annotations of a wide range of sources. For the historical record of scholarship and critical discussion, The

New Cambridge Bibliography of English Literature, ed. George Watson (5 vols., 1969–77), and the third edition in process, The Cambridge Bibliography of English Literature, ed. Joanne Shattock (1 vol. to date, 2000–), are useful. The MLA International Bibliography (also online) is a key resource for following critical discussion of literatures in English. Ranging from 1926 to the present, it includes journal articles, essays, chapters from collections, books, and dissertations, and covers folklore, linguistics, and film. The Annual Bibliography of English Language and Literature (ABELL), compiled by the Modern Humanities Research Association, lists monographs, periodical articles, critical editions of literary works, book reviews, and collections of essays published anywhere in the world; unpublished doctoral dissertations are covered for the period 1920–99 (available online to subscribers directly and as part of Literature Online, <http://literature.proquest.com/marketing/index.jsp>).

For compact biographies of English authors, see the multivolume Oxford Dictionary of National Biography (DNB), ed. H. C. G. Matthew and Brian Harrison (2004); since 2004 the DNB has been extended online with updates (now monthly). Handy reference books of authors, works, and various literary terms and allusions include many volumes in the Cambridge Companion and Oxford Companion series: e.g., The Cambridge Companion to Narrative, ed. David Herman (2007); The Oxford Companion to English Literature, ed. Dinah Birch (7th ed., 2009); and The Cambridge Companion to Allegory, ed. Rita Copeland and Peter Struck (2010). The Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, editor-in-chief Roland Greene (4th ed., 2012), is available online to subscribers in Oxford Reference. Handbooks that define and illustrate literary concepts and terms include The Penguin Dictionary of Literary Terms and Literary Theory, ed. J. A. Cuddon and M. A. R. Habib (5th ed., 2015); William Harmon, A Handbook to Literature (12th ed., 2011); Critical Terms for Literary Study, ed. Frank Lentricchia and Thomas McLaughlin (2nd ed., 1995); and M. H. Abrams and Geoffrey Galt Harpham, A Glossary of Literary Terms (11th ed., 2014). Also useful are Richard A. Lanham, A Handlist of Rhetorical Terms (2nd ed., 1991); Arthur

Quinn, Figures of Speech: 60 Ways to Turn a Phrase (1982); the Barnhart Concise Dictionary of Etymology, ed. Robert K. Barnhart (1995); and George A. Kennedy, A New History of Classical Rhetoric (1994).

On Greek and Roman backgrounds, see The Cambridge History of Classical Literature—vol. 1, Greek Literature, ed. P. E. Easterling and Bernard M. W. Knox (1985), and vol. 2, Latin Literature, ed. E. J. Kenney and W. V. Clausen (1982), both available to subscribers online; The Oxford Companion to Classical Literature, ed. M. C. Howatson (3rd ed., 2011); Gian Biagio Conte, Latin Literature: A History (1987; trans. 1994); The Oxford Classical Dictionary, ed. Simon Hornblower, Antony Spawforth, and Esther Eidinow (4th ed., 2012); Richard Rutherford, Classical Literature: A Concise History (2005); and Mark P. O. Morford, Robert J. Lenardon, and Michael Sham, Classical Mythology (11th ed., 2018). The Loeb Classical Library of Greek and Roman texts with facing-page English translations is now available online to subscribers at www.loebclassics.com.

Digital resources in the humanities continue to grow rapidly. Among the many useful electronic resources for the study of English literature are enormous digital archives, available to subscribers: Early English Books Online (EEBO), <http://eebo.chadwyck.com/home>; Literature Online, <http://literature.proquest.com/marketing/index.jsp>; and Eighteenth Century Collections Online (ECCO), www.gale.com/primary-sources/eighteenth-century-collections-online. There are also numerous free sites of variable quality. Many of the best of these are period- or author-specific and hence are listed in the period/author bibliographies on the NAEL website. Among the general sites, one of the most useful and wide-ranging is Voice of the Shuttle (<http://vos.ucsb.edu>), which includes links to Bartleby.com and Project Gutenberg.

Literary Criticism and Theory

The Cambridge History of Literary Criticism comprises nine volumes (1989–2013): Classical Criticism, ed. George A. Kennedy; The Middle Ages, ed. Alastair Minnis and Ian Johnson; The Renaissance, ed. Glyn P. Norton; The Eighteenth Century, ed. H. B. Nisbet and Claude Rawson; Romanticism, ed. Marshall Brown; The Nineteenth Century, c. 1830–1914, ed. M. A. R. Habib; Modernism and the New Criticism, ed. A. Walton Litz, Louis Menand, and Lawrence Rainey; From Formalism to Poststructuralism, ed. Raman Selden; and Twentieth-Century Historical, Philosophical and Psychological Perspectives, ed. Christa Knellwolf and Christopher Norris. See also M. H. Abrams, The Mirror and the Lamp: Romantic Theory and the Critical Tradition (1953); William K. Wimsatt Jr. and Cleanth Brooks, Literary Criticism: A Short History (1957); René Wellek, A History of Modern Criticism: 1750–1950 (8 vols., 1955–92); Frank Lentricchia, After the New Criticism (1980); J. Hillis Miller, On Literature (2002); and John Frow, Character and Person (2014). Raman Selden, Peter Widdowson, and Peter Brooker have written A Reader's Guide to Contemporary Literary Theory (6th ed., 2017). Other useful resources include The Johns Hopkins Guide to Literary Theory and Criticism, ed. Michael Groden, Martin Kreiswirth, and Imre Szeman (2nd ed., 2005); Literary Theory: An Anthology, ed. Julie Rivkin and Michael Ryan (3rd ed., 2017); and The Norton Anthology of Theory and Criticism, gen. ed. Vincent B. Leitch (3rd ed., 2018).

Modern approaches to English literature and literary theory were shaped by certain landmark works: William Empson, Seven Types of Ambiguity (1930; 3rd ed., 1953), Some Versions of Pastoral (1935), and The Structure of Complex Words (1951; 3rd ed., 1977); T. S. Eliot, Selected Essays (1932; 3rd ed., 1951) and On Poetry and Poets (1957); F. R. Leavis, Revaluation: Tradition and Development in English Poetry (1936) and The Great Tradition: George Eliot, Henry James, Joseph Conrad (1948); Erich Auerbach, Mimesis: The Representation of Reality in Western Literature (1946; trans. 1953); Lionel Trilling, The Liberal Imagination: Essays on Literature and Society (1950); William K. Wimsatt Jr., The Verbal Icon: Studies in the Meaning of Poetry (1954); Northrop Frye, Anatomy of Criticism:

Four Essays (1957); Wayne C. Booth, The Rhetoric of Fiction (1961; 2nd ed., 1983); and W. Jackson Bate, The Burden of the Past and the English Poet (1970). René Wellek and Austin Warren, Theory of Literature (3rd ed., 1963), is a useful introduction to the variety of scholarly and critical approaches to literature up to the time of its publication. Jonathan Culler's Literary Theory: A Very Short Introduction (2nd ed., 2011), discusses recurrent issues and debates. On the discipline of criticism, see John Guillory's Professing Criticism: Essays on the Organization of Literary Study (2022); Rita Felski's The Limits of Critique (2015) is a critical assessment of contemporary criticism.

Beginning in the late 1960s, interest in literary theory as a specific field markedly intensified. Certain forms of literary study had already been influenced by the work of the Russian linguist Roman Jakobson and the Russian formalist Viktor Shklovsky—and, still more, by conceptions that derived or claimed to derive from Marx and Engels—but the full impact of these theories was not felt until what became known as the “theory revolution” of the 1970s and '80s. For Marxist literary criticism, see Georg Lukács, Theory of the Novel: A Historico-philosophical Essay on the Forms of Great Epic Literature (1920; trans. 1971), The Historical Novel (1937; trans. 1962), and Studies in European Realism: A Sociological Survey of the Writings of Balzac, Stendhal, Zola, Tolstoy, Gorki, and Others (trans. 1950); Walter Benjamin's essays from the 1920s and '30s, represented in Illuminations (1955; trans. 1968) and Reflections: Essays, Aphorisms, Autobiographical Writings (1975; trans. 1978); Mikhail Bakhtin's essays from the 1930s represented in The Dialogic Imagination: Four Essays (trans. 1981) and Rabelais and His World (1965; trans. 1968); Selections from the Prison Notebooks of Antonio Gramsci, ed. and trans. Quintin Hoare and Geoffrey Nowell Smith (1971); Raymond Williams, Marxism and Literature (1977); Tony Bennett, Formalism and Marxism (1979; 2nd ed., 2003); Fredric Jameson, The Political Unconscious: Narrative as a Socially Symbolic Act (1981); and Terry Eagleton, Literary Theory: An Introduction (1983; anniversary ed., 2008) and The Ideology of the Aesthetic (1990).

Structural linguistics and anthropology gave rise to a flowering of structuralist literary criticism; convenient introductions include Robert Scholes, Structuralism in Literature: An Introduction (1974), and Jonathan Culler, Structuralist Poetics: Structuralism, Linguistics and the Study of Literature (new ed., 2002). Poststructuralist challenges to this approach are epitomized in such influential works as Jacques Derrida, Writing and Difference (1967; trans. 1978), and Paul de Man, Blindness and Insight: Essays in the Rhetoric of Contemporary Criticism (1971; 2nd ed., 1983). Poststructuralism is discussed in Jonathan Culler, On Deconstruction: Theory and Criticism after Structuralism (1982; 25th anniversary ed., 2007); Slavoj Žižek, The Sublime Object of Ideology (1989); Fredric Jameson, Postmodernism; or, The Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism (1991); John McGowan, Postmodernism and Its Critics (1991); and Beyond Structuralism: The Speculations of Theory and the Experience of Reading, ed. Wendell V. Harris (1996). A figure who greatly influenced both structuralism and poststructuralism is Roland Barthes, in Mythologies (1957; trans. 1972, new trans. 2012) and S/Z (1970; trans. 1974). Among other influential contributions to literary theory are the psychoanalytic approach in Harold Bloom, The Anxiety of Influence: A Theory of Poetry (1973; 2nd ed., 1997), and the reader-response approach in Stanley Fish, Is There a Text in This Class? The Authority of Interpretive Communities (1980). For a retrospect on these decades, see Terry Eagleton, After Theory (2003).

Influenced by these theoretical currents but not restricted to them, modern feminist literary criticism was fashioned by such works as Patricia Meyer Spacks, The Female Imagination (1975); Ellen Moers, Literary Women (1976; new ed., 1986); Elaine Showalter, A Literature of Their Own: British Women Novelists from Brontë to Lessing (1977; expanded ed., 1999); and Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar, The Madwoman in the Attic: The Woman Writer and the Nineteenth-Century Literary Imagination (1979). Subsequent studies include Jane Gallop, The Daughter's Seduction: Feminism and Psychoanalysis (1982); Luce Irigaray, This Sex Which Is Not One (1977; trans. 1985); Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak, In Other Worlds: Essays in Cultural Politics (1987; new ed., 2006); Barbara Johnson, A World of Difference (1987); Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar, No Man's Land: The Place of the Woman Writer in the Twentieth Century (3 vols., 1988–94); Judith Butler, Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity (1990; 2nd ed., 1999); and the critical views sampled in The New Feminist Criticism: Essays on Women, Literature, and Theory, ed. Elaine Showalter (1985); Feminist Literary Theory: A Reader, ed. Mary Eagleton (1986; 3rd ed., 2011); and Feminisms: An Anthology of Literary Theory and Criticism, ed. Robyn R. Warhol and Diane Price Herndl (1991; rev. in 2009 as Feminisms Redux: An Anthology of Literary Theory and Criticism); The Hélène Cixous Reader, ed. Susan Sellers (1994); The Cambridge Companion to Feminist Literary Theory, ed. Ellen Rooney (2006); and Feminist Literary Theory and Criticism: A Norton Reader, ed. Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar (2007).

Just as feminist critics used poststructuralist and psychoanalytic methods to place literature in conversation with gender theory, a new school emerged placing literature in conversation with critical race theory. Comprehensive introductions include Critical Race Theory: The Key Writings That Formed the Movement, ed. Kimberlé Crenshaw et al. (1995); and Richard Delgado and Jean Stefancic, Critical Race Theory: An Introduction (3rd ed., 2017); and The Routledge Companion to Race and Ethnicity, ed. Stephen M. Caliendo and Charlton D. McIlwain (2nd ed., 2021). For an important precursor in cultural studies, see Stuart Hall et al., Policing the Crisis: Mugging, the State and Law and Order (1978; 2nd ed., 2013). Seminal works include Henry Louis Gates Jr., The Signifying Monkey: A Theory of African-American Literary Criticism (1988; 25th anniversary ed., 2014); Patricia Williams, The Alchemy of Race and Rights (1991); Toni Morrison, Playing in the Dark: Whiteness and the Literary Imagination (1992); Cornel West, Race Matters (1993; 25th anniversary ed., 2017); Gene Andrew Jarrett, Representing the Race: A New Political History of African American Literature (2011); Fred Moten, Black and Blur (2017); and Saidiya V. Hartman, Wayward Lives, Beautiful Experiments: Intimate Histories of Social Upheaval (2019). Other important works include Kathleen Davis, Periodization and Sovereignty: How Ideas of Feudalism and Secularization Govern the Politics of Time (2008; rpt. 2017); Alexander G. Weheliye, Habeas Viscus: Racializing Assemblages, Biopolitics, and Black Feminist Theories of the Human (2014); Christina Sharpe, In the Wake: On Blackness and Being (2016); and Geraldine Heng, The Invention of Race in the European Middle Ages (2018). Helpful anthologies and collections of essays have emerged in recent decades, such as The Oxford Companion to African American Literature, ed. William L. Andrews, Frances Smith Foster, and Trudier Harris (1997), and also their Concise Oxford Companion to African American Literature (2001); Unchained Voices: An Anthology of Black Authors in the English-Speaking World of the Eighteenth Century, ed. Vincent Carretta (1996; updated 2003); The Cambridge Companion to Jewish American Literature, ed. Hana Wirth-Nesher and Michael P. Kramer (2003); A Companion to African American Literature, ed. Gene Andrew Jarrett (2010); The Routledge Companion to Anglophone Caribbean Literature, ed. Michael A. Bucknor and Alison Donnell (2011); The Routledge Companion to Latino/a Literature, ed. Suzanne Bost and Frances R. Aparicio (2013); The Routledge Companion to Asian American and Pacific Islander Literature, ed. Rachel C. Lee (2014); The Cambridge Companion to Asian American Literature, ed. Crystal Parikh and Daniel Y. Kim (2015); and The Cambridge Companion to British Black and Asian Literature, 1945–2010, ed. Deirdre Osborne (2016).

Gay literature and queer studies are represented in collections including Inside/Out: Lesbian Theories, Gay Theories, ed. Diana Fuss (1991); The Lesbian and Gay Studies Reader, ed. Henry Abelove, Michèle Aina Barale, and David Halperin (1993); The Columbia Anthology of Gay Literature: Readings from Western Antiquity to the Present Day, ed. Byrne R. S. Fone (1998); The Cambridge History of Gay and Lesbian Literature, ed. E. L. McCallum and Mikko Tuhkanen

(2014); and The Cambridge Companion to Lesbian Literature, ed. Jodie Medd (2015), and by such books as Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick, Between Men: English Literature and Male Homosocial Desire (1985; 30th anniversary ed., 2015) and Epistemology of the Closet (1990; updated ed., 2008); Diana Fuss, Essentially Speaking: Feminism, Nature, and Difference (1989); Terry Castle, The Apparitional Lesbian: Female Homosexuality and Modern Culture (1993); Leo Bersani, Homos (1995); Gregory Woods, A History of Gay Literature: The Male Tradition (1998); David Halperin, How to Do the History of Homosexuality (2002); Judith Halberstam, In a Queer Time and Place: Transgender Bodies, Subcultural Lives (2005); Heather Love, Feeling Backward: Loss and the Politics of Queer History (2007); and Brian Glavey, The Wallflower Avant-garde: Modernism, Sexuality, and Queer Ekphrasis (2016).

New Historicism is represented in Stephen Greenblatt, Learning to Curse: Essays in Early Modern Culture (1990; new ed., 2007); New Historical Literary Study: Essays on Reproducing Texts, Representing History, ed. Jeffrey N. Cox and Larry J. Reynolds (1993); The New Historicism Reader, ed. H. Aram Veeser (1994); and Catherine Gallagher and Stephen Greenblatt, Practicing New Historicism (2000). The related social and historical dimension of texts is discussed in Jerome McGann, Critique of Modern Textual Criticism (1983), and Scholarly Editing: A Guide to Research, ed. D. C. Greetham (1995). Characteristic of New Historicism is an expansion of the field of literary interpretation still further in cultural studies; for a broad sampling of the range of interests, see Cultural Studies, ed. Lawrence Grossberg, Cary Nelson, and Paula A. Treichler (1992); A Cultural Studies Reader: History, Theory, Practice, ed. Jessica Munns and Gita Rajan (1995); and The Cultural Studies Reader, ed. Simon During (3rd ed., 2007).

This expansion of the field is similarly reflected in postcolonial studies: see Frantz Fanon, Black Skin, White Masks (cited above) and The Wretched of the Earth (1961; trans. 1963, 60th anniversary ed. 2021); Edward Said, Orientalism (1978) and Culture and Imperialism (1993); Nation and Narration, ed. Homi K. Bhabha

(1990); The Post-Colonial Studies Reader, ed. Bill Ashcroft, Gareth Griffiths and Helen Tiffin (2nd ed., 2006); and such influential books as Bill Ashcroft, Gareth Griffiths, and Helen Tiffin, The Empire Writes Back: Theory and Practice in Post-Colonial Literatures (1989; 2nd ed., 2002); Homi K. Bhabha, The Location of Culture (1994; new ed., 2004); Elleke Boehmer, Colonial and Postcolonial Literature: Migrant Metaphors (1995; 2nd ed., 2005); Dipesh Chakrabarty, Provincializing Europe: Postcolonial Thought and Historical Difference (2000; new ed., 2008); and Robert J. C. Young, Postcolonialism: An Historical Introduction (2001; anniversary ed., 2016). Useful collections include The Cambridge History of Postcolonial Literature, ed. Ato Quayson (2 vols., 2011–12); The Cambridge Companion to the Postcolonial Novel, ed. Ato Quayson (2016); and The Cambridge Companion to Postcolonial Poetry, ed. Jahan Ramazani (2017).

In the wake of the theory revolution, critics have focused on a wide array of topics, which can be only briefly surveyed here. One current of work, focusing on the history of emotion, is represented in Brian Massumi, Parables for the Virtual: Movement, Affect, Sensation (2002); Sianne Ngai, Ugly Feelings (2005); The Affect Theory Reader, ed. Melissa Gregg and Gregory J. Seigworth (2010); and Judith Butler, Senses of the Subject (2015). A somewhat related current, examining the special role of traumatic memory in literature, is exemplified in Trauma: Explorations in Memory, ed. Cathy Caruth (1995), and Dominic LaCapra, Writing History, Writing Trauma (2001; new ed., 2014). Work on the literary implications of cognitive science may be glimpsed in Introduction to Cognitive Cultural Studies, ed. Lisa Zunshine (2010). Interest in quantitative approaches to literature was sparked by Franco Moretti's Graphs, Maps, Trees: Abstract Models for Literary History (2005). For the field of digital humanities, see Moretti, Distant Reading (2013); Defining Digital Humanities: A Reader, ed. Melissa Terras, Julianne Nyhan, and Edward Vanhoutte (2013); and A New Companion to Digital Humanities, ed. Susan Schreibman, Ray Siemens, and John Unsworth (2016). For ecocriticism, or studies of literature and the environment, see The Ecocriticism Reader: Landmarks in Literary

Ecology, ed. Cheryll Glotfelty and Harold Fromm (1996); Writing the Environment: Ecocriticism and Literature, ed. Richard Kerridge and Neil Sammells (1998); Jonathan Bate, The Song of the Earth (2000); Lawrence Buell, The Future of Environmental Criticism: Environmental Crisis and Literary Imagination (2005); Timothy Morton, Ecology Without Nature: Rethinking Environmental Aesthetics (2007); Jane Bennett, Vibrant Matter: A Political Ecology of Things (2010); Rob Nixon, Slow Violence and the Environmentalism of the Poor (2011); The Oxford Handbook of Ecocriticism, ed. Greg Garrard (2014); and Anthropocene Reading: Literary History in Geologic Times, ed. Tobias Menely and Jesse Oak Taylor (2017). Related are the fields of animal studies and posthumanism, whose key works include Bruno Latour, We Have Never Been Modern (1991; trans. 1993); Steve Baker, The Postmodern Animal (2000); Cary Wolfe, Animal Rites: American Culture, the Discourse of Species, and Posthumanist Theory (2003) and What Is Posthumanism? (2009); Jacques Derrida, The Animal That Therefore I Am (2006; trans. 2008); Kari Weil, Thinking Animals: Why Animal Studies Now? (2012); Animals and the Human Imagination: A Companion to Animal Studies, ed. Aaron Gross and Anne Vallely (2012); and Critical Animal Studies: Thinking the Unthinkable, ed. John Sorenson (2014). The relationship between literature and law is central to such works as Interpreting Law and Literature: A Hermeneutic Reader, ed. Sanford Levinson and Steven Mailloux (1988); Law's Stories: Narrative and Rhetoric in the Law, ed. Peter Brooks and Paul Gewirtz (1996); Literature and Legal Problem Solving: Law and Literature as Ethical Discourse, ed. Paul J. Heald (1998); and New Directions in Law and Literature, ed. Elizabeth S. Anker and Bernadette Meyler (2017). Ethical questions in literature have been usefully explored by, among others, Geoffrey Galt Harpham in Getting It Right: Language, Literature, and Ethics (1992) and Derek Attridge in The Singularity of Literature (2004). Finally, some approaches to literature, such as formalism and literary biography, that seemed superseded in the theoretical ferment of the late twentieth century have had a resurgence. A renewed interest in form is evident in Susan Stewart, Poetry and the Fate of the Senses

(2002); Reading for Form, ed. Susan J. Wolfson and Marshall Brown (2006); and Caroline Levine, Forms: Whole, Rhythm, Hierarchy, Network (2015). Interest in the history of the book was spearheaded by D. F. McKenzie's Bibliography and the Sociology of Texts (1986), Jerome J. McGann's The Textual Condition (1991), and Roger Chartier's The Order of Books: Readers, Authors, and Libraries in Europe Between the Fourteenth and Eighteenth Centuries (1992; trans. 1994). See also The Practice and Representation of Reading in England, ed. James Raven, Helen Small, and Naomi Tadmor (1996); The Cambridge History of the Book in Britain (7 vols., 1999–2019); The Book History Reader, ed. David Finkelstein and Alistair McCleery (2nd ed., 2006); and The Cambridge Companion to the History of the Book, ed. Leslie Howsam (2015). For studies in new media and digital or electronic literature, see N. Katherine Hayles, Electronic Literature: New Horizons for the Literary (2008); Matthew G. Kirschenbaum, Track Changes: A Literary History of Word Processing (2016); and Jessica Pressman's Bookishness: Loving Books in a Digital Age (2020).

Anthologies representing a range of recent approaches include Modern Criticism and Theory, ed. David Lodge with Nigel Wood (2nd ed., 2000); Contemporary Literary Criticism, ed. Robert Con Davis and Ronald Schleifer (4th ed., 1998); and The Norton Anthology of Theory and Criticism (cited above).

Literary Terminology*

Using simple technical terms can sharpen our understanding and streamline our discussion of literary works. Some terms, such as the ones in section A, below, help us address the internal style, structure, form, and kind of works. Other terms, such as those in section B, provide insight into the material forms in which literary works have been produced.

In analyzing what they called “rhetoric,” ancient Greek and Roman writers determined the elements of what we call “style” and “structure.” Most of our literary terms are derived, via medieval and Renaissance intermediaries, from the Greek and Latin sources. In the definitions that follow, the etymology, or root, of the word is given when it helps illuminate the word’s current usage.

Many of the examples are drawn from texts in The Norton Anthology of English Literature.

Words boldfaced within definitions are themselves defined in this appendix. Some terms are defined within definitions; such words are italicized.

A. Terms of Style, Structure, Form, and Kind

accent (synonym “stress”): a term of rhythm. The special force devoted to the voicing of one syllable in a word over others. In the noun “accent,” for example, the accent, or stress, is on the first syllable.

act: the major subdivision of a play, usually divided into scenes.

aesthetics (from Greek, “to feel, apprehend by the senses”): the philosophy of artistic meaning as a distinct mode of apprehending

untranslatable truth, defined as an alternative to rational enquiry, which is purely abstract. Developed in the late eighteenth century by the German philosopher Immanuel Kant especially.

Alexandrine: a term of meter. In French verse a line of twelve syllables, and, by analogy, in English verse a line of six stresses. See hexameter.

a llegory (Greek "saying otherwise"): saying one thing (the "vehicle" of the allegory) and meaning another (the allegory's "tenor"). Allegories may be momentary aspects of a work, as in metaphor ("John is a lion"), or, through extended metaphor, may constitute the basis of narrative, as in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress: this second meaning is the dominant one. See also symbol and type. Allegory is one of the most significant figures of thought.

a lliteration (from Latin "litera," alphabetic letter): a figure of speech. The repetition of an initial consonant sound or consonant cluster in consecutive or closely positioned words. This pattern is often an inseparable part of the meter in Germanic languages, where the tonic, or accented syllable, is usually the first syllable. Thus all Old English poetry and some varieties of Middle English poetry use alliteration as part of their basic metrical practice. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, line 1: "Once the siege and assault of Troy had ceased" (see vol. A, p. 415). Otherwise used for local effects; Stevie Smith, "Pretty," lines 4–5: "And in the pretty pool the pike stalks / He stalks his prey . . ." (see vol. F, p. 589).

allusion: Literary allusion is a passing but illuminating reference within a literary text to another, well-known text (often biblical or classical). Topical allusions are also, of course, common in certain modes, especially satire.

anagnorisis (Greek "recognition"): the moment of protagonist's recognition in a narrative, which is also often the moment of moral understanding.

anapest: a term of rhythm. A three-syllable foot following the rhythmic pattern, in English verse, of two unstressed (uu) syllables followed by one stressed (/). Thus, for example, "Illinois."

anaphora (Greek "carrying back"): a figure of speech. The repetition of words or groups of words at the beginning of consecutive sentences, clauses, or phrases. Blake, "London," lines 5–8: "In every cry of every Man, / In every Infant's cry of fear, / In every voice, in every ban . . ." (see vol. D, p. 137); Louise Bennett, "Jamaica Oman," lines 17–20: "Some backa man a push, some side-a / Man a hole him han, / Some a lick sense eena him head, / Some a guide him pon him plan!" (see vol. F, p. 724).

a nimal fable: a genre. A short narrative of speaking animals, followed by moralizing comment, written in a low style and gathered into a collection. Robert Henryson, "The Cock and the Jasper" (see vol. A, p. 679).

a ntithesis (Greek "placing against"): a figure of thought. The juxtaposition of opposed terms in clauses or sentences that are next to or near each other. Milton, Paradise Lost 1.777–80: "They but now who seemed / In bigness to surpass Earth's giant sons / Now less than smallest dwarfs, in narrow room / Throng numberless" (see vol. B, p. 1448).

a postrophe (from Greek "turning away"): a figure of thought. An address, often to an absent person, a force, or a quality. For example, a poet makes an apostrophe to a Muse when invoking her for inspiration.

apposition: a term of syntax. The repetition of elements serving an identical grammatical function in one sentence. The effect of this repetition is to arrest the flow of the sentence, but in doing so to add extra semantic nuance to repeated elements. This is an especially important feature of Old English poetic style. See, for example, Caedmon's Hymn (vol. A, p. 31), where the phrases

"heaven-kingdom's Guardian," "the Measurer's might," "his mind-plans," and "the work of the Glory-Father" each serve an identical syntactic function as the direct objects of "praise."

assonance (Latin "sounding to"): a figure of speech. The repetition of identical or near identical stressed vowel sounds in words whose final consonants differ, producing half-rhyme. Tennyson, "The Lady of Shalott," line 100: "His broad clear brow in sunlight glowed" (see vol. E, p. 210).

aubade (originally from Spanish "alba," dawn): a genre. A lover's dawn song or lyric bewailing the arrival of the day and the necessary separation of the lovers; Donne, "The Sun Rising" (see vol. B, p. 888). Larkin recasts the genre in "Aubade" (see vol. F, p. 795).

autobiography (Greek "self-life writing"): a genre. A narrative of a life written by the subject; Wordsworth, The Prelude (see vol. D, p. 391). There are subgenres, such as the spiritual autobiography, narrating the author's path to conversion and subsequent spiritual trials, as in Bunyan's Grace Abounding.

ballad stanza: a verse form. Usually a quatrain in alternating iambic tetrameter and iambic trimeter lines, rhyming abcb. See "Sir Patrick Spens" (vol. D, p. 38); Louise Bennett's poems (vol. F, pp. 719–24); Eliot, "Sweeney among the Nightingales" (vol. F, p. 501); Larkin, "This Be The Verse" (vol. F, p. 795).

ballade: a verse form. A form consisting usually of three stanzas followed by a four-line envoi (French, "send off"). The last line of the first stanza establishes a refrain, which is repeated, or subtly varied, as the last line of each stanza. The form was derived from French medieval poetry; English poets, from the fourteenth to the sixteenth centuries especially, used it with varying stanza forms. Chaucer, "The Complaint of Chaucer to His Purse" (see vol. A, p. 575).

bathos (Greek “depth”): a figure of thought. A sudden and sometimes ridiculous descent of tone; Pope, The Rape of the Lock 3.157–58: “Not louder shrieks to pitying heaven are cast, / When husbands, or when lapdogs breathe their last” (see vol. C, p. 549).

beast epic: a genre. A continuous, unmoralized narrative, in prose or verse, relating the victories of the wholly unscrupulous but brilliant strategist Reynard the Fox over all adversaries. Chaucer arouses, only to deflate, expectations of the genre in The Nun’s Priest’s Tale (see vol. A, p. 556).

biography (Greek “life-writing”): a genre. A life as the subject of an extended narrative.

blank verse: a verse form. Unrhymed iambic pentameter lines. Blank verse has no stanzas, but is broken up into uneven units (verse paragraphs) determined by sense rather than form. First devised in English by Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, in his translation of two books of Virgil’s Aeneid, this very flexible verse type became the standard form for dramatic poetry in the seventeenth century, as in most of Shakespeare’s plays. Milton and Wordsworth, among many others, also used it to create an English equivalent to classical epic.

blazon: strictly, a heraldic shield; in rhetorical usage, a topos whereby the individual elements of a beloved’s face and body are singled out for hyperbolic admiration. Spenser, Epithalamion, lines 167–84 (see vol. B, p. 459). For an inversion of the topos, see Shakespeare, Sonnet 130 (vol. B, p. 637).

burlesque (French and Italian “mocking”): a work that adopts the conventions of a genre with the aim less of comically mocking the genre than of satirically mocking the society so represented (see satire). Thus Pope’s Rape of the Lock (see vol. C, p. 537) does not mock classical epic so much as contemporary mores.

caesura (Latin "cut") (plural "caesurae"): a term of meter. A pause or breathing space within a line of verse, generally occurring between syntactic units; Louise Bennett, "Colonization in Reverse," lines 5–8: "By de hundred, by de tousan, / From country an from town, / By de ship-load, by de plane-load, / Jamaica is Englan boun" (see vol. F, p. 722), where the caesurae occur in lines 5 and 7.

canon (Greek "rule"): the group of texts regarded as worthy of special respect or attention by a given institution. Also, the group of texts regarded as definitely having been written by a certain author.

catastrophe (Greek "overturning"): the decisive turn in tragedy by which the plot is resolved and, usually, the protagonist dies.

catharsis (Greek "cleansing"): According to Aristotle, the effect of tragedy on its audience, through their experience of pity and terror, was a kind of spiritual cleansing, or catharsis.

character (Greek "stamp, impression"): a person, personified animal, or other figure represented in a literary work, especially in narrative and drama. The more a character seems to generate the action of a narrative, and the less he or she seems merely to serve a preordained narrative pattern, the "fuller," or more "rounded," a character is said to be. A "stock" character, common particularly in many comic genres, will perform a predictable function in different works of a given genre.

chiasmus (Greek "crosswise"): a figure of speech. The inversion of an already established sequence. This can involve verbal echoes: Pope, "Eloisa to Abelard," line 104, "The crime was common, common be the pain" (see vol. C, p. 560); or it can be purely a matter of syntactic inversion: Pope, Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, line 8: "They pierce my thickets, through my grot they glide" (see vol. C, p. 575).

classical, classicism, classic: Each term can be widely applied, but in English literary discourse, "classical" primarily describes the works of either Greek or Roman antiquity. "Classicism" denotes the practice of art forms inspired by classical antiquity, in particular the observance of rhetorical norms of decorum and balance, as opposed to following the dictates of untutored inspiration, as in Romanticism. "Classic" denotes an especially famous work within a given canon.

climax (Greek "ladder"): a moment of great intensity and structural change, especially in drama. Also a figure of speech whereby a sequence of verbally linked clauses is made, in which each successive clause is of greater consequence than its predecessor. Bacon, Of Studies: "Studies serve for pastimes, for ornaments, and for abilities. Their chief use for pastimes is in privateness and retiring; for ornament, is in discourse; and for ability, is in judgement" (see vol. B, pp. 1167–68).

comedy: a genre. A term primarily applied to drama, and derived from ancient drama, in opposition to tragedy. Comedy deals with humorously confusing, sometimes ridiculous situations in which the ending is, nevertheless, happy. A comedy often ends in one or more marriages.

comic mode: Many genres (for example, romance, fabliau, comedy) involve a happy ending in which justice is done, the ravages of time are arrested, and that which is lost is found. Such genres participate in a comic mode.

connotation: To understand connotation, we need to understand denotation. While many words can denote the same concept—that is, have the same basic meaning—those words can evoke different associations, or connotations. Contrast, for example, the clinical-sounding term "depression" and the more colorful, musical, even poetic phrase "the blues."

consonance (Latin "sounding with"): a figure of speech. The repetition of final consonants in words or stressed syllables whose vowel sounds are different. Herbert, "Easter," line 13: "Consort, both heart and lute . . ." (see vol. B, p. 1183).

convention: a repeatedly recurring feature (in either form or content) of works, occurring in combination with other recurring formal features, which constitutes a convention of a particular genre.

couplet: a verse form. In English verse two consecutive, rhyming lines usually containing the same number of stresses. Chaucer first introduced the iambic pentameter couplet into English (Canterbury Tales); the form was later used in many types of writing, including drama; imitations and translations of classical epic (thus heroic couplet); essays; and satire (see Dryden and Pope). The distich (Greek "two lines") is a couplet usually making complete sense; Aemilia Lanyer, Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum, lines 5–6: "Read it fair queen, though it defective be, / Your excellence can grace both it and me" (see vol. B, p. 925).

dactyl (Greek "finger," because of the finger's three joints): a term of rhythm. A three-syllable foot following the rhythmic pattern, in English verse, of one stressed followed by two unstressed syllables. Thus, for example, "Oregon."

decorum (Latin "that which is fitting"): a rhetorical principle whereby each formal aspect of a work should be in keeping with its subject matter and/or audience.

deixis (Greek "pointing"): relevant to point of view. Every work has, implicitly or explicitly, a "here" and a "now" from which it is narrated. Words that refer to or imply this point from which the voice of the work is projected (such as "here," "there," "this," "that," "now," "then") are examples of deixis, or "deictics." This technique is especially important in drama, where it is used to create a sense of the events happening as the spectator witnesses them.

denotation: A word has a basic, "prosaic" (factual) meaning prior to the associations it connotes (see connotation). The word

“steed,” for example, might call to mind a horse fitted with battle gear, to be ridden by a warrior, but its denotation is simply “horse.”

denouement (French “unknotting”): the point at which a narrative can be resolved and so ended.

dialogue (Greek “conversation”): a genre. Dialogue is a feature of many genres, especially in both the novel and drama. As a genre itself, dialogue is used in philosophical traditions especially (most famously in Plato’s Dialogues), as the representation of a conversation in which a philosophical question is pursued among various speakers.

diction, or “lexis” (from, respectively, Latin dictio and Greek lexis, each meaning “word”): the actual words used in any utterance—speech, writing, and, for our purposes here, literary works. The choice of words contributes significantly to the style of a given work.

didactic mode (Greek “teaching mode”): Genres in a didactic mode are designed to instruct or teach, sometimes explicitly (for example, sermons, philosophical discourses, georgic), and sometimes through the medium of fiction (for example, animal fable, parable).

diegesis (Greek for “narration”): a term that simply means “narration,” but is used in literary criticism to distinguish one kind of story from another. In a mimetic story, the events are played out before us (see mimesis), whereas in diegesis someone recounts the story to us. Drama is for the most part mimetic, whereas the novel is for the most part diegetic. In novels the narrator is not, usually, part of the action of the narrative; s/he is therefore extradiegetic.

dimeter (Greek “two measure”): a term of meter. A two-stress line, rarely used as the meter of whole poems, though used with great frequency in single poems by Skelton, for example, “The Tunning of Elinour Rumming” (see vol. B, p. 41). Otherwise used for single lines, as in Herbert, "Discipline," line 3: "O my God" (see vol. B, p. 1197).

discourse (Latin "running to and fro"): broadly, any nonfictional speech or writing; as a more specific genre, a philosophical meditation on a set theme.

dramatic irony: a feature of narrative and drama, whereby the audience knows that the outcome of an action will be the opposite of that intended by a character.

dramatic monologue (Greek "single speaking"): a genre. A poem in which the voice of a historical or fictional character speaks, unmediated by any narrator, to an implied though silent audience. See Tennyson, "Ulysses" (vol. E, p. 217); Browning, "The Bishop Orders His Tomb" (vol. E, p. 416); Eliot, "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" (vol. F, p. 498); Carol Ann Duffy, "Medusa" and "Mrs Lazarus" (vol. F).

ecphrasis (Greek "speaking out"): a topos whereby a work of visual art is represented in a literary work. Auden, "Musée des Beaux Arts" (see vol. F, p. 677).

elegy: a genre. In classical literature elegy was a form written in elegiac couplets (a hexameter followed by a pentameter) devoted to many possible topics. In Ovidian elegy a lover meditates on the trials of erotic desire (for example, Ovid's Amores). The sonnet sequences of both Sidney and Shakespeare exploit this genre, and, while it was still practiced in classical tradition by Donne ("On His Mistress" see vol. B, [p. 903]), by the later seventeenth century the term came to denote the poetry of loss, especially through the death of a loved person. See Tennyson, In Memoriam (vol. E, p. 231); Auden, "In Memory of W. B. Yeats" (see vol. F, p. 677); Heaney, "Clearances" (vol. F, p. 970).

emblem (Greek "an insertion"): a figure of thought. A picture allegorically expressing a moral, or a verbal picture open to such

interpretation.

end-stopping: the placement of a complete syntactic unit within a complete poetic line, fulfilling the metrical pattern; Auden, "In Memory of W. B. Yeats," line 42: "Earth, receive an honoured guest" (see vol. F, p. 679). Compare enjambment.

enjambment (French "striding," encroaching): The opposite of end-stopping, enjambment occurs when the syntactic unit does not end with the end of the poetic line and the fulfillment of the metrical pattern. When the sense of the line overflows its meter and, therefore, the line break, we have enjambment; Auden, "In Memory of W. B. Yeats," lines 44–45: "Let the Irish vessel lie / Emptied of its poetry" (see vol. F, p. 679).

epic (synonym, heroic poetry): a genre. An extended narrative poem celebrating martial heroes, invoking divine inspiration, beginning in medias res (see order), written in a high style (including the deployment of epic similes; on high style, see register), and divided into long narrative sequences. Homer's Iliad and Virgil's Aeneid were the prime models for English writers of epic verse. Thus Milton, Paradise Lost (see vol. B, p. 1427); Wordsworth, The Prelude (see vol. D, p. 391); and Walcott, Omeros (see vol. F, p. 808). With its precise repertoire of stylistic resources, epic lent itself easily to parodic and burlesque forms, known as mock epic; thus Pope, The Rape of the Lock (see vol. C, p. 537).

epigram: a genre. A short, pithy poem wittily expressed, often with wounding intent. See Jonson, Epigrams (see vol. B, p. 1049).

epigraph (Greek "inscription"): a genre. Any formal statement inscribed on stone; also the brief formulation on a book's title page, or a quotation at the beginning of a poem, introducing the work's themes in the most compressed form possible.

epistle (Latin "letter"): a genre. The letter can be shaped as a literary form, involving an intimate address often between equals.

The Epistles of Horace provided a model for English writers from the sixteenth century. Thus Wyatt, "Mine Own John Poins" (see vol. B, p. 131), or Leapor, "An Epistle to a Lady" (vol. C, p. 771). Letters can be shaped to form the matter of an extended fiction, as the eighteenth-century epistolary novel (for example, Samuel Richardson's Pamela).

epitaph: a genre. A pithy formulation to be inscribed on a funeral monument. Thus Raleigh, "The Author's Epitaph, Made by Himself" (see vol. B, p. 479).

epithalamion (Greek "concerning the bridal chamber"): a genre. A wedding poem, celebrating the marriage and wishing the couple good fortune. Thus Spenser, Epithalamion (see vol. B, p. 455).

epyllion (plural "epyllia") (Greek: "little epic"): a genre. A relatively short poem in the meter of epic poetry. See, for example, Marlowe, Hero and Leander (vol. B, p. 562).

essay (French "trial, attempt"): a genre. An informal philosophical meditation, usually in prose and sometimes in verse. The journalistic periodical essay was developed in the early eighteenth century. Thus Addison and Steele, periodical essays (see vol. C, p. 281); Pope, An Essay on Criticism (see vol. C, p. 521).

euphemism (Greek "sweet saying"): a figure of thought. The figure by which something distasteful is described in alternative, less repugnant terms (for example, "he passed away").

exegesis (Greek "leading out"): interpretation, traditionally of the biblical text, but, by transference, of any text.

exemplum (Latin "example"): an example inserted into a usually nonfictional writing (for example, sermon or essay) to give extra force to an abstract thesis.

fabliau (French “little story,” plural fabliaux): a genre. A short, funny, often bawdy narrative in low style (see register) imitated and developed from French models, most subtly by Chaucer; see The Miller’s Prologue and Tale (vol. A, p. 494).

farce (French “stuffing”): a genre. A play designed to provoke laughter through the often humiliating antics of stock characters. Congreve’s The Way of the World (see vol. C, p. 221) draws on this tradition.

figures of speech: Literary language often employs patterns perceptible to the eye and/or to the ear. Such patterns are called “figures of speech”; in classical rhetoric they were called “schemes” (from Greek schema, meaning “form, figure”).

figures of thought: Language can also be patterned conceptually, even outside the rules that normally govern it. Literary language in particular exploits this licensed linguistic irregularity. Synonyms for figures of thought are “trope” (Greek “twisting,” referring to the irregularity of use) and “conceit” (Latin “concept,” referring to the fact that these figures are perceptible only to the mind). Be careful not to confuse trope with topos (a common error).

first-person narration: relevant to point of view, a narrative in which the voice narrating refers to itself with forms of the first-person pronoun (“I,” “me,” “my,” etc., or possibly “we,” “us,” “our”), and in which the narrative is determined by the limitations of that voice. Thus Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley, Frankenstein.

frame narrative: Some narratives, particularly collections of narratives, involve a frame narrative that explains the genesis of, and/or gives a perspective on, the main narrative or narratives to follow. Thus Chaucer, Canterbury Tales; Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley, Frankenstein; or Conrad, Heart of Darkness.

free indirect style: relevant to point of view, a narratorial voice that manages, without explicit reference, to imply, and often implicitly to comment on, the voice of a character in the narrative itself. Virginia Woolf, "A Sketch of the Past," where the voice, although strictly that of the adult narrator, manages to convey the child's manner of perception: "—I begin: the first memory. This was of red and purple flowers on a black background—my mother's dress."

genre and mode: The style, structure, and, often, length of a work, when coupled with a certain subject matter, raise expectations that a literary work conforms to a certain genre (French "kind"). Good writers might upset these expectations, but they remain aware of the expectations and thwart them purposefully. Works in different genres may nevertheless participate in the same mode, a broader category designating the fundamental perspectives governing various genres of writing. For mode, see tragic, comic, satiric, and didactic modes. Genres are fluid, sometimes very fluid (for example, the novel); the word "usually" should be added to almost every account of the characteristics of a given genre!

georgic (Greek "farming"): a genre. Virgil's Georgics treat agricultural and occasionally scientific subjects, giving instructions on the proper management of farms. Unlike pastoral, which treats the countryside as a place of recreational idleness among shepherds, the georgic treats it as a place of productive labor.

hermeneutics (from the Greek god Hermes, messenger between the gods and humankind): the science of interpretation, first formulated as such by the German philosophical theologian Friedrich Schleiermacher in the early nineteenth century.

heroic poetry: see epic.

hexameter (Greek "six measure"): a term of meter. The hexameter line (a six-stress line) is the meter of classical Latin epic; while not imitated in that form for epic verse in English, some instances of the hexameter exist. See, for example, the last line of a homily (Greek "discourse"): a genre. A sermon, to be preached in church; Book of Homilies (see vol. B, p. 164). Writers of literary fiction sometimes exploit the homily, or sermon, as in Chaucer, The Pardoner's Tale (see vol. A, p. 540).

Spenserian stanza, Faerie Queene 1.1.2: "O help thou my weake wit, and sharpen my dull tong" (vol. B, p. 269), or Yeats, "The Lake Isle of Innisfree," line 1: "I will arise and go now, and go to Innisfree" (vol. F, p. 221).

homophone (Greek "same sound"): a figure of speech. A word that sounds identical to another word but has a different meaning ("bear" / "bare").

hyperbaton (Greek "overstepping"): a term of syntax. The rearrangement, or inversion, of the expected word order in a sentence or clause. Gray, "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard," line 38: "If Memory o'er their tomb no trophies raise" (vol. C, p. 899). Poets can suspend the expected syntax over many lines, as in the first sentences of the Canterbury Tales (vol. A, p. 474) and of Paradise Lost (vol. B, p. 1430).

hyperbole (Greek "throwing over"): a figure of thought. Overstatement, exaggeration; Marvell, "To His Coy Mistress," lines 11–12: "My vegetable love should grow / Vaster than empires, and more slow" (see vol. B, p. 1273); Auden, "As I Walked Out One Evening," lines 9–12: "I'll love you, dear, I'll love you / Till China and Africa meet / And the river jumps over the mountain / And the salmon sing in the street" (see vol. F, p. 675).

hypermetrical (adj.; Greek "over measured"): a term of meter; the word describes a breaking of the expected metrical pattern by at least one extra syllable.

hypotaxis, or subordination (respectively Greek and Latin "ordering under"): a term of syntax. The subordination, by the use of subordinate clauses, of different elements of a sentence to a single main verb. Milton, Paradise Lost 9.513–15: “As when a ship by skillful steersman wrought / Nigh river’s mouth or foreland, where the wind / Veers oft, as oft so steers, and shifts her sail; So varied he” (vol. B, p. 1588). The contrary principle to parataxis.

iamb: a term of rhythm. The basic foot of English verse; two syllables following the rhythmic pattern of unstressed followed by stressed and producing a rising effect. Thus, for example, “Vermont.”

imitation: the practice whereby writers strive ideally to reproduce and yet renew the conventions of an older form, often derived from classical civilization. Such a practice will be praised in periods of classicism (for example, the eighteenth century) and repudiated in periods dominated by a model of inspiration (for example, Romanticism).

irony (Greek “dissimulation”): a figure of thought. In broad usage, irony designates the result of inconsistency between a statement and a context that undermines the statement. “It’s a beautiful day” is unironic if it’s a beautiful day; if, however, the weather is terrible, then the inconsistency between statement and context is ironic. The effect is often amusing; the need to be ironic is sometimes produced by censorship of one kind or another. Strictly, irony is a subset of allegory: whereas allegory says one thing and means another, irony says one thing and means its opposite. For an extended example of irony, see Swift’s “Modest Proposal” (vol. C, p. 511). See also dramatic irony.

journal (French “daily”): a genre. A diary, or daily record of ephemeral experience, whose perspectives are concentrated on, and limited by, the experiences of single days. Thus Pepys, Diary (see vol. C, p. 74).

lai: a genre. A short narrative, often characterized by images of great intensity; a French term, and a form practiced by Marie de France (see vol. A, p. 159).

legend (Latin “requiring to be read”): a genre. A narrative of a celebrated, possibly historical, but mortal protagonist. To be distinguished from myth. Thus the “Arthurian legend” but the “myth of Proserpine.”

lexical set: Words that habitually recur together (for example, January, February, March, etc.; or red, white, and blue) form a lexical set.

litotes (from Greek “smooth”): a figure of thought. Strictly, understatement by denying the contrary; More, Utopia: “differences of no slight import” (see vol. B, p. 49). More loosely, understatement; Stevie Smith, “Sunt Leones,” lines 11–12: “And if the Christians felt a little blue— / Well people being eaten often do” (see vol. F, p. 585).

lullaby: a genre. A bedtime, sleep-inducing song for children, in simple and regular meter. Adapted by Auden, “Lullaby” (see vol. F, p. 671).

lyric (from Greek “lyre”): Initially meaning a song, “lyric” refers to a short poetic form, without restriction of meter, in which the expression of personal emotion, often by a voice in the first person, is given primacy over narrative sequence. Thus “The Wife’s Lament” (see vol. A, p. 126); Yeats, “The Wild Swans at Coole” (see vol. F, p. 229).

masque: a genre. Costly entertainments of the Stuart court, involving dance, song, speech, and elaborate stage effects, in which courtiers themselves participated.

metaphor (Greek “carrying across,” etymologically parallel to Latin “translation”): One of the most significant figures of thought, metaphor designates identification or implicit identification of one thing with another with which it is not literally identifiable. Blake, “London,” lines 11–12: “And the hapless Soldier’s sigh / Runs in blood down Palace walls” (see vol. D, p. 137).

meter: Verse (from Latin versus, turned) is distinguished from prose (from Latin prorsus, "straightforward") as a more compressed form of expression, shaped by metrical norms. Meter (Greek "measure") refers to the regularly recurring sound pattern of verse lines. The means of producing sound patterns across lines differ in different poetic traditions. Verse may be quantitative, or determined by the quantities of syllables (set patterns of long and short syllables), as in Latin and Greek poetry. It may be syllabic, determined by fixed numbers of syllables in the line, as in the verse of Romance languages (for example, French and Italian). It may be accentual, determined by the number of accents, or stresses in the line, with variable numbers of syllables, as in Old English and some varieties of Middle English alliterative verse. Or it may be accentual-syllabic, determined by the numbers of accents, but possessing a regular pattern of stressed and unstressed syllables, so as to produce regular numbers of syllables per line. Since Chaucer, English verse has worked primarily within the many possibilities of accentual-syllabic meter. The unit of meter is the foot. In English verse the number of feet per line corresponds to the number of accents in a line. For the types and examples of different meters, see monometer, dimeter, trimeter, tetrameter, pentameter, and hexameter. In the definitions below, "u" designates one unstressed syllable, and "/" one stressed syllable.

metonymy (Greek "change of name"): one of the most significant figures of thought. Using a word to denote another concept or other concepts, by virtue of habitual association. Thus "The Press," designating printed news media. Fictional names often work by associations of this kind. Closely related to synecdoche.

mimesis (Greek for "imitation"): A central function of literature and drama has been to provide a plausible imitation of the reality of the world beyond the literary work; mimesis is the representation and imitation of what is taken to be reality.

mise-en-abyme (French for “cast into the abyss”): Some works of art represent themselves in themselves; if they do so effectively, the represented artifact also represents itself, and so ad infinitum. The effect achieved is called “mise-en-abyme.” Hoccleve’s Complaint, for example, represents a depressed man reading about a depressed man. This sequence threatens to become a mise-en-abyme.

monometer (Greek “one measure”): a term of meter. An entire line with just one stress; Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, line 15, “most (u) grand (/)” (see vol. A, p. 415).

myth: a genre. The narrative of protagonists with, or subject to, superhuman powers. A myth expresses some profound foundational truth, often by accounting for the origin of natural phenomena. To be distinguished from legend. Thus the “Arthurian legend” but the “myth of Proserpine.”

novel: an extremely flexible genre in both form and subject matter. Usually in prose, giving high priority to narration of events, with a certain expectation of length, novels are preponderantly rooted in a specific, and often complex, social world; sensitive to the realities of material life; and often focused on one character or a small circle of central characters. By contrast with chivalric romance (the main European narrative genre prior to the novel), novels tend to eschew the marvelous in favor of a recognizable social world and credible action. The novel’s openness allows it to participate in all modes, and to be co-opted for a huge variety of subgenres. In English literature the novel dates from the late seventeenth century and has been astonishingly successful in appealing to a huge readership, particularly in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The English and Irish tradition of the novel includes, for example, Fielding, Austen, the Brontë sisters, Dickens, George Eliot, Conrad, Woolf, Lawrence, and Joyce, to name but a few very great exponents of the genre.

novella: a genre. A short novel, often characterized by imagistic intensity. Conrad, Heart of Darkness (see vol. F, p. 70).

occupatio (Latin “taking possession”): a figure of thought. Denying that one will discuss a subject while actually discussing it; also known as “praeteritio” (Latin “passing by”). See Chaucer, Nun’s Priest’s Tale, lines 414–31 (see vol. A, p. 565).

ode (Greek “song”): a genre. A lyric poem in elevated, or high style (see register), often addressed to a natural force, a person, or an abstract quality. The Pindaric ode in English is made up of stanzas of unequal length, while the Horatian ode has stanzas of equal length. For examples of both types, see, respectively, Wordsworth, “Ode: Intimations of Immortality” (vol. D, p. 381); and Marvell, “An Horatian Ode” (vol. B, p. 1282), or Keats, “Ode on Melancholy” (vol. D, p. 973). For a fuller discussion, see the headnote to Jonson’s “Ode on Cary and Morison” (vol. B, pp. 1058–59).

omniscient narrator (Latin “all-knowing narrator”): relevant to point of view. A narrator who, in the fiction of the narrative, has complete access to both the deeds and the thoughts of all characters in the narrative. Thus Thomas Hardy, “On the Western Circuit” (see vol. F, p. 36).

onomatopoeia (Greek “name making”): a figure of speech. Verbal sounds that imitate and evoke the sounds they denote. Hopkins, “Binsey Poplars,” lines 10–12 (about some felled trees): “O if we but knew what we do / When we delve [dig] or hew— / Hack and rack the growing green!” (see vol. E, p. 726).

order: A story may be told in different narrative orders. A narrator might use the sequence of events as they happened, and thereby follow what classical rhetoricians called the natural order; alternatively, the narrator might reorder the sequence of events, beginning the narration either in the middle or at the end of the sequence of events, thereby following an artificial order. If a narrator begins in the middle of events, he or she is said to begin in medias res (Latin “in the middle of the matter”). For a brief discussion of these concepts, see Spenser, Faerie Queene, “A Letter of the Authors” (vol. B, p. 265). Modern narratology makes a related distinction, between histoire (French “story”) for the natural order that readers mentally reconstruct, and discours (French, here “narration”) for the narrative as presented. See also plot and story.

ottava rima: a verse form. An eight-line stanza form, rhyming abababcc, using iambic pentameter; Yeats, “Sailing to Byzantium” (see vol. F, p. 234). Derived from the Italian poet Boccaccio, an eight-line stanza was used by fifteenth-century English poets for inset passages (for example, Christ’s speech from the Cross in Lydgate’s Testament, lines 754–897). The form in this rhyme scheme was used in English poetry for long narrative by, for example, Byron (Don Juan; see vol. D, p. 690).

oxymoron (Greek “sharp blunt”): a figure of thought. The conjunction of normally incompatible terms; Milton, Paradise Lost 1.63: “darkness visible” (see vol. B, p. 1431).

panegyric: a genre. Demonstrative, or epideictic (Greek “showing”), rhetoric was a branch of classical rhetoric. Its own two main branches were the rhetoric of praise on the one hand and of vituperation on the other. Panegyric, or eulogy (Greek “sweet speaking”), or encomium (plural encomia), is the term used to describe the speeches or writings of praise.

parable: a genre. A simple story designed to provoke, and often accompanied by, allegorical interpretation, most famously by Christ as reported in the Gospels.

paradox (Greek “contrary to received opinion”): a figure of thought. An apparent contradiction that requires thought to reveal an inner consistency. Chaucer, "Troilus's Song," line 12: "O sweete harm so quaint" (see vol. A, p. 574).

parataxis, or coordination (respectively Greek and Latin "ordering beside"): a term of syntax. The coordination, by the use of coordinating conjunctions, of different main clauses in a single sentence. Malory, Morte Darthur: "So Sir Lancelot departed and took his sword under his arm, and so he walked in his mantel, that noble knight, and put himself in great jeopardy" (see vol. A, p. 607). The opposite principle to hypotaxis.

parody: a work that uses the conventions of a particular genre with the aim of comically mocking a topos, a genre, or a particular exponent of a genre. Shakespeare parodies the topos of blazon in Sonnet 130 (see vol. B, p. 637).

pastoral (from Latin pastor, "shepherd"): a genre. Pastoral is set among shepherds, making often refined allusion to other apparently unconnected subjects (sometimes politics) from the potentially idyllic world of highly literary if illiterate shepherds. Pastoral is distinguished from georgic by representing recreational rural idleness, whereas the georgic offers instruction on how to manage rural labor. English writers had classical models in the Idylls of Theocritus in Greek and Virgil's Eclogues in Latin. Pastoral is also called bucolic (from the Greek word for "herdsman"). Thus Spenser, Shepherd's Calendar (see vol. B, p. 257).

pathetic fallacy: the attribution of sentiment to natural phenomena, as if they were in sympathy with human feelings. Thus Milton, Lycidas, lines 146–47: "With cowslips wan that hang the pensive head, / And every flower that sad embroidery wears" (see vol. B, p. 1406). For critique of the practice, see Ruskin (who coined the term), "Of the Pathetic Fallacy" (vol. E, p. 467).

pentameter (Greek "five measure"): a term of meter. In English verse, a five-stress line. Between the late fourteenth and the nineteenth centuries, this meter, frequently employing an iambic rhythm, was the basic line of English verse. Chaucer, Shakespeare, Milton, and Wordsworth each, for example, deployed this very flexible line as their primary resource; Milton, Paradise Lost 1.128: "O Prince, O Chief of many thronèd Powers" (see vol. B, p. 1433).

performative: Verbal expressions have many different functions. They can, for example, be descriptive, or constative (if they make an argument), or performative, for example. A performative utterance is one that makes something happen in the world by virtue of its utterance. "I hereby sentence you to ten years in prison," if uttered in the appropriate circumstances, itself performs an action; it makes something happen in the world. By virtue of its performing an action, it is called a "performative." See also speech act.

peripeteia (Greek "turning about"): the sudden reversal of fortune (in both directions) in a dramatic work.

periphrasis (Greek "declaring around"): a figure of thought. Circumlocution; the use of many words to express what could be expressed in few or one; Sidney, Astrophil and Stella 39.1–4.

persona (Latin "sound through"): originally the mask worn in the Roman theater to magnify an actor's voice; in literary discourse persona (plural personae) refers to the narrator or speaker of a text, whose voice is coherent and whose person need have no relation to the person of the actual author of a text. Eliot, "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" (see vol. F, p. 498).

personification, or prosopopoeia (Greek "person making"): a figure of thought. The attribution of human qualities to nonhuman forces or objects; Keats, "Ode on a Grecian Urn," lines 1–2: "Thou still unvanish'd bride of quietness, / Thou foster-child of silence and slow time" (see vol. D, p. 971).

plot: the sequence of events in a story as narrated, as distinct from story, which refers to the sequence of events as we reconstruct them from the plot. See also order.

point of view: All of the many kinds of writing involve a point of view from which a text is, or seems to be, generated. The presence of such a point of view may be powerful and explicit, as in many novels, or deliberately invisible, as in much drama. In some genres, such as the novel, the narrator does not necessarily tell the story from a position we can predict; that is, the needs of a particular story, not the conventions of the genre, determine the narrator's position. In other genres, the narrator's position is fixed by convention; in certain kinds of love poetry, for example, the narrating voice is always that of a suffering lover. Not only does the point of view significantly inform the style of a work, but it also informs the structure of that work.

protagonist (Greek "first actor"): the hero or heroine of a drama or narrative.

pun: a figure of thought. A sometimes irresolvable doubleness of meaning in a single word or expression; Shakespeare, Sonnet 135, line 1: "Whoever hath her wish, thou hast thy Will" (see vol. B, p. 637).

quatrain: a verse form. A stanza of four lines, usually rhyming abcb, abab, or abba. Of many possible examples, see Crashaw, "On the Wounds of Our Crucified Lord" (see vol. B, p. 1214).

refrain: usually a single line repeated as the last line of consecutive stanzas, sometimes with subtly different wording and ideally with subtly different meaning as the poem progresses.

register: The register of a word is its stylistic level, which can be distinguished by degree of technicality but also by degree of formality. We choose our words from different registers according to context, that is, audience and/or environment. Thus a chemist in a laboratory will say "sodium chloride," a cook in a kitchen "salt." A formal register designates the kind of language used in polite society rhetoric: the art of verbal persuasion. Classical rhetoricians distinguished three areas of rhetoric: the forensic, to be used in law courts; the deliberative, to be used in political or philosophical deliberations; and the demonstrative, or epideictic, to be used for the purposes of public praise or blame. Rhetorical manuals covered all the skills required of a speaker, from the management of style and structure to delivery. These manuals powerfully influenced the theory of poetics as a separate branch of verbal practice, particularly in the matter of style.

(for example, "Mr. President"), while an informal or colloquial register is used in less formal or more relaxed social situations (for example, "the boss"). In classical and medieval rhetoric, these registers of formality were called high style and low style. A middle style was defined as the style fit for narrative, not drawing attention to itself.

rhyme: a figure of speech. The repetition of identical vowel sounds in stressed syllables whose initial consonants differ ("dead" / "head"). In poetry, rhyme often links the end of one line with another. Masculine rhyme: full rhyme on the final syllable of the line ("decays" / "days"). Feminine rhyme: full rhyme on syllables that are followed by unaccented syllables ("fountains" / "mountains"). Internal rhyme: full rhyme within a single line; Coleridge, The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, line 7: "The guests are met, the feast is set" (see vol. D, p. 475). Rhyme riche: rhyming on homophones; Chaucer, General Prologue, lines 17–18: "seeke" / "seke." Off rhyme (also known as half rhyme, near rhyme, or slant rhyme): differs from perfect rhyme in changing the vowel sound and/or the concluding consonants expected of perfect rhyme; Byron, "They say that Hope is Happiness," lines 5–7: "most" / "lost." Pararhyme: stressed vowel sounds differ but are flanked by identical or similar consonants; Owen, "Miners," lines 9–11: "simmer" / "summer" (see vol. F, p. 169).

rhyme royal: a verse form. A stanza of seven iambic pentameter lines, rhyming ababbcc; first introduced by Chaucer and called "royal" because the form was used by James I of Scotland for his Kingis Quair in the early fifteenth century. Chaucer, "Troilus's Song" (see vol. A, p. 574).

rhythm: Rhythm is not absolutely distinguishable from meter. One way of making a clear distinction between these terms is to say that rhythm (from the Greek "to flow") denotes the patterns of sound within the feet of verse lines and the combination of those feet. Very often a particular meter will raise expectations that a given rhythm will be used regularly through a whole line or a whole poem. Thus in English verse the pentameter regularly uses an iambic rhythm. Rhythm, however, is much more fluid than meter, and many lines within the same poem using a single meter will frequently exploit different rhythmic possibilities. For examples of different rhythms, see iamb, trochee, anapest, spondee, and dactyl.

romance: a genre. From the twelfth to the sixteenth century, the main form of European narrative, in either verse or prose, was that of chivalric romance. Romance, like the later novel, is a very fluid genre, but romances are often characterized by (i) a tripartite structure of social integration, followed by disintegration, involving moral tests and often marvelous events, itself the prelude to reintegration in a happy ending, frequently of marriage; and (ii) aristocratic social milieux. Thus Sir Gawain and the Green Knight (see vol. A, p. 415); Spenser's (unfinished) Faerie Queene (vol. B, p. 263). The immensely popular, fertile genre was absorbed, in both domesticated and undomesticated form, by the novel. For an adaptation of romance, see Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Tale (vol. A, p. 512).

sarcasm (Greek "flesh tearing"): a figure of thought. A wounding expression, often expressed ironically; Boswell, Life of Johnson: Johnson [asked if any man of the modern age could have written the epic poem Fingal] replied, "Yes, Sir, many men, many women, and many children" (see vol. C, p. 891).

satire (Latin for "a bowl of mixed fruits"): a genre. In Roman literature (for example, Juvenal), the communication, in the form of a letter between equals, complaining of the ills of contemporary society. The genre in this form is characterized by a first-person narrator exasperated by social ills; the letter form; a high frequency of contemporary reference; and the use of invective in low-style language. Pope practices the genre thus in the Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot (see vol. C, p. 573). Wyatt's "Mine Own John Pains" (see vol. B, p. 131) draws ultimately on a gentler, Horatian model of the genre.

satiric mode: Works in a very large variety of genres are devoted to the more or less savage attack on social ills. Thus Swift's travel narrative Gulliver's Travels (see vol. C, p. 377), his essay "A Modest Proposal" (vol. C, p. 511), and Gay's Beggar's Opera (vol. C, p. 587), to look no further than the eighteenth century, are all within a satiric mode.

scene: a subdivision of an act, itself a subdivision of a dramatic performance and/or text. The action of a scene usually occurs in one place.

sensibility (from Latin, "capable of being perceived by the senses"): as a literary term, an eighteenth-century concept derived from moral philosophy that stressed the social importance of fellow feeling and particularly of sympathy in social relations. The concept generated a literature of "sensibility," such as the sentimental novel (the most famous of which was Goethe's Sorrows of the Young Werther [1774]), or sentimental poetry, such as Cowper's passage on the stricken deer in The Task (see vol. C, p. 1076).

short story: a genre. Generically similar to, though shorter and more concentrated than, the novel; often published as part of a collection. Thus Mansfield, "The Daughters of the Late Colonel" (see vol. F, p. 542).

simile (Latin "like"): a figure of thought. Comparison, usually using the word "like" or "as," of one thing with another so as to produce sometimes surprising analogies. Donne, "The Storm," lines 29–30: "Sooner than you read this line did the gale, / Like shot, not feared till felt, our sails assail." Frequently used, in extended form, in epic poetry; Milton, Paradise Lost 1.338–46 (see vol. B, p. 1438).

soliloquy (Latin "single speaking"): a topos of drama, in which a character, alone or thinking to be alone on stage, speaks so as to give the audience access to his or her private thoughts.

sonnet: a verse form. A form combining a variable number of units of rhymed lines to produce a fourteen-line poem, usually in rhyming iambic pentameter lines. In English there are two principal varieties: the Petrarchan sonnet, formed by an octave (an eight-line stanza, often broken into two quatrains having the same rhyme scheme, typically abba abba) and a sestet (a six-line stanza, typically cdecde or cdcdcd); and the Shakespearean sonnet, formed by three quatrains (abab cdcd efef) and a couplet (gg). The declaration of a sonnet can take a sharp turn, or "volta," often at the decisive formal shift from octave to sestet in the Petrarchan sonnet, or in the final couplet of a Shakespearean sonnet, introducing a trenchant counterstatement. Derived from Italian poetry, and especially from the poetry of Petrarch, the sonnet was first introduced to English poetry by Wyatt, and initially used principally for the expression of unrequited erotic love, though later poets used the form for many other purposes. See Wyatt, "Whoso List to Hunt" (vol. B, p. 123); Sidney, Astrophil and Stella (vol. B, p. 541); Shakespeare, Sonnets (vol. B, p. 624); Wordsworth, "London, 1802" (vol. D, p. 390); McKay, "If We Must Die" (vol. F, p. 576); Heaney, "Clearances" (vol. F, p. 970).

speech act: Words and deeds are often distinguished, but words are often (perhaps always) themselves deeds. Utterances can perform different speech acts, such as promising, declaring, casting a spell, encouraging, persuading, denying, lying, and so on. See also performative.

Spenserian stanza: a verse form. The stanza developed by Spenser for The Faerie Queene; nine iambic lines, the first eight of which are pentameters, followed by one hexameter, rhyming ababbcbcc. See also, for example, Shelley, Adonais (vol. D, p. 851), and Keats, The Eve of St. Agnes (vol. D, p. 953).

spondee: a term of meter. A two-syllable foot following the rhythmic pattern, in English verse, of two stressed syllables. Thus, for example, "Utah."

stanza (Italian "room"): groupings of two or more lines, though "stanza" is usually reserved for groupings of at least four lines. Stanzas are often joined by rhyme, often in sequence, where each group shares the same metrical pattern and, when rhymed, rhyme scheme. Stanzas can themselves be arranged into larger groupings. Poets often invent new verse forms, or they may work within established forms.

story: a narrative's sequence of events, which we reconstruct from those events as they have been recounted by the narrator (i.e., the plot). See also order.

stream of consciousness: usually a first-person narrative that seems to give the reader access to the narrator's mind as it perceives or reflects on events, prior to organizing those perceptions into a coherent narrative. Thus (though generated from a third-person narrative) Joyce, Ulysses, "Penelope" (see vol. F, p. 452).

style (from Latin for "writing instrument"): In literary works the manner in which something is expressed contributes substantially to its meaning. The expressions "sun," "mass of helium at the center of the solar system," "heaven's golden orb" all designate "sun," but do so in different manners, or styles, which produce different meanings. The manner of a literary work is its "style," the effect of which is its "tone." We often can intuit the tone of a text; from that intuition of tone we can analyze the stylistic resources by which it was produced. We can analyze the style of literary works through consideration of different elements of style; for example, diction, figures of thought, figures of speech, meter and rhythm, verse form, syntax, point of view.

sublime: As a concept generating a literary movement, the sublime refers to the realm of experience beyond the measurable, and so beyond the rational, produced especially by the terrors and grandeur of natural phenomena. Derived especially from the first-century Greek treatise On the Sublime, sometimes attributed to Longinus, the notion of the sublime was in the later eighteenth century a spur to Romanticism.

syllable: the smallest unit of sound in a pronounced word. The syllable that receives the greatest stress is called the tonic syllable.

symbol (Greek "token"): a figure of thought. Something that stands for something else, and yet seems necessarily to evoke that other thing. In Neoplatonic, and therefore Romantic, theory, to be distinguished from allegory thus: whereas allegory involves connections between vehicle and tenor agreed by convention or made explicit, the meanings of a symbol are supposedly inherent to it.

synecdoche (Greek "to take with something else"): a figure of thought. Using a part to express the whole, or vice versa; for example, "all hands on deck." Closely related to metonymy.

syntax (Greek "ordering with"): Syntax designates the rules by which sentences are constructed in a given language. Discussion of meter is impossible without some reference to syntax, since the overall effect of a poem is, in part, always the product of a subtle balance of meter and sentence construction. Syntax is also essential to the understanding of prose style, since prose writers, deprived of the full shaping possibilities of meter, rely all the more heavily on syntactic resources. A working command of syntactical practice requires an understanding of the parts of speech (nouns, verbs, adjectives, adverbs, conjunctions, pronouns, prepositions, and interjections), since writers exploit syntactic possibilities by using particular combinations and concentrations of the parts of speech.

taste (from Italian “touch”): Although medieval monastic traditions used eating and tasting as a metaphor for reading, the concept of taste as a personal ideal to be cultivated by, and applied to, the appreciation and judgment of works of art in general was developed in the eighteenth century.

tercet: a verse form. A stanza or group of three lines, used in larger forms such as terza rima, the Petrarchan sonnet, and the villanelle.

terza rima: a verse form. A sequence of rhymed tercets linked by rhyme thus: aba bcb cdc, etc. first used extensively by Dante in The Divine Comedy, the form was adapted in English iambic pentameters by Wyatt and revived in the nineteenth century. See Wyatt, “Mine Own John Poins” (vol. B, p. 131); Shelley, “Ode to the West Wind” (vol. D, p. 802); and Morris, “The Defence of Guinevere” (vol. E, p. 657). For modern adaptations see Eliot, lines 78–149 (though unrhymed) of “Little Gidding” (vol. F, pp. 523–25); Heaney, “Station Island” (vol. F, p. 968); Walcott, Omeros (vol. F, p. 801).

tetrameter (Greek “four measure”): a term of meter. A line with four stresses. Coleridge, Christabel, line 31: “She stole along, she nothing spoke” (see vol. D, p. 495).

theme (Greek “proposition”): In literary criticism the term designates what the work is about; the theme is the concept that unifies a given work of literature.

third-person narration: relevant to point of view. A narration in which the narrator recounts a narrative of characters referred to explicitly or implicitly by third-person pronouns ("he," "she," etc.), without the limitation of a first-person narration. Thus Johnson, The History of Rasselas.

topographical poem (Greek "place writing"): a genre. A poem devoted to the meditative description of particular places.

topos (Greek "place," plural topoi): a commonplace in the content of a given kind of literature. Originally, in classical rhetoric, the topoi were tried-and-tested stimuli to literary invention: lists of standard headings under which a subject might be investigated. In medieval narrative poems, for example, it was commonplace to begin with a description of spring. Writers did, of course, render the commonplace uncommon, as in Chaucer's spring scene at the opening of The Canterbury Tales (see vol. A, p. 474).

tradition (from Latin "passing on"): A literary tradition is whatever is passed on or revived from the past in a single literary culture, or drawn from others to enrich a writer's culture. "Tradition" is fluid in reference, ranging from small to large referents: thus it may refer to a relatively small aspect of texts (for example, the tradition of iambic pentameter), or it may, at the other extreme, refer to the body of texts that constitute a canon.

tragedy: a genre. A dramatic representation of the fall of kings or nobles, beginning in happiness and ending in catastrophe. Later transferred to other social milieus. The opposite of comedy; thus Shakespeare, Othello (see vol. B, p. 640).

tragic mode: Many genres (epic poetry, legendary chronicles, tragedy, the novel) either do or can participate in a tragic mode, by representing the fall of noble protagonists and the irreparable ravages of human society and history.

tragicomedy: a genre. A play in which potentially tragic events turn out to have a happy, or comic, ending. Thus Shakespeare, Measure for Measure.

translation (Latin “carrying across”): the rendering of a text written in one language into another.

trimeter (Greek “three measure”): a term of meter. A line with three stresses. Herbert, “Discipline,” line 1: “Throw away thy rod” (see vol. B, p. 1197).

triplet: a verse form. A tercet rhyming on the same sound. Pope inserts triplets among heroic couplets to emphasize a particular thought; see Essay on Criticism, 315–17 (vol. C, p. 521).

trochee: a term of rhythm. A two-syllable foot following the pattern, in English verse, of stressed followed by unstressed syllable, producing a falling effect. Thus, for example, “Texas.”

type (Greek “impression, figure”): a figure of thought. In Christian allegorical interpretation of the Old Testament, pre-Christian figures were regarded as “types,” or foreshadowings, of Christ or the Christian dispensation. Typology has been the source of much visual and literary art in which the parallelisms between old and new are extended to nonbiblical figures; thus the virtuous plowman in Piers Plowman becomes a type of Christ.

unities: According to a theory supposedly derived from Aristotle’s Poetics, the events represented in a play should have unity of time, place, and action: that the play take up no more time than the time of the play, or at most a day; that the space of action should be within a single city; and that there should be no subplot. See Johnson, The Preface to Shakespeare (vol. C, p. 876).

vernacular (from Latin verna, “servant”): the language of the people, as distinguished from learned and arcane languages. From the later Middle Ages especially, the “vernacular” languages and literatures of Europe distinguished themselves from the learned languages and literatures of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew.

verse form: The terms related to meter and rhythm describe the shape of individual lines. Lines of verse are combined to produce larger groupings, called verse forms. These larger groupings are in the first instance stanzas. The combination of a certain meter and stanza shape constitutes the verse form, of which there are many standard kinds.

villanelle: a verse form. A fixed form of usually five tercets and a quatrain employing only two rhyme sounds altogether, rhyming aba for the tercets and abaa for the quatrain, with a complex pattern of two refrains. Derived from a French fixed form. Thomas, "Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night" (see vol. F, p. 693).

wit: Originally a synonym for "reason" in Old and Middle English, "wit" became a literary ideal in the Renaissance as brilliant play of the full range of mental resources. For eighteenth-century writers, the notion necessarily involved pleasing expression, as in Pope's definition of true wit as "Nature to advantage dressed, / What oft was thought, but ne'er so well expressed" (Essay on Criticism, lines 297–98; see vol. C, p. 527). Romantic theory of the imagination deprived wit of its full range of apprehension, whence the word came to be restricted to its modern sense, as the clever play of mind that produces laughter.

zeugma (Greek "a yoking"): a figure of thought. A figure whereby one word applies to two or more words in a sentence, and in which the applications are surprising, either because one is unusual, or because the applications are made in very different ways; Pope, Rape of the Lock 3.7–8, in which the word "take" is used in two senses: "Here thou, great Anna! whom three realms obey, / Dost sometimes counsel take—and sometimes tea" (see vol. C, p. 546).

B: Publishing History, Censorship

By the time we read texts in published books, they have already been treated—that is, changed by authors, editors, and printers—in many ways. Although there are differences across history, in each period literary works are subject to pressures of many kinds, which apply before, while, and after an author writes. The pressures might be financial, as in the relations of author and patron; commercial, as in the marketing of books; and legal, as in, during some periods, the negotiation through official and unofficial censorship. In addition, texts in all periods undergo technological processes, as they move from the material forms in which an author produced them to the forms in which they are presented to readers. Some of the terms below designate important material forms in which books were produced, disseminated, and surveyed across the historical span of this anthology. Others designate the skills developed to understand these processes. The anthology's introductions to individual periods discuss the particular forms these phenomena took in different eras.

bookseller: In England, and particularly in London, commercial bookmaking and -selling enterprises came into being in the early fourteenth century. These were loose organizations of artisans who usually lived in the same neighborhoods (around St. Paul's Cathedral in London). A bookseller or dealer would coordinate the production of hand-copied books for wealthy patrons (see patronage), who would order books to be custom-made. After the introduction of printing in the late fifteenth century, authors generally sold the rights to their work to booksellers, without any further royalties. Booksellers, who often had their own shops, belonged to the Stationers' Company. This system lasted into the eighteenth century. In 1710, however, authors were for the first time granted copyright, which tipped the commercial balance in their favor, against booksellers.

censorship: The term applies to any mechanism for restricting what can be published. Historically, the reasons for imposing censorship are heresy, sedition, blasphemy, libel, or obscenity. External censorship is imposed by institutions having legislative sanctions at their disposal. Thus the pre-Reformation Church imposed the Constitutions of Archbishop Arundel of 1409, aimed at repressing the Lollard “heresy.” After the Reformation, some key events in the history of censorship are as follows: 1547, when anti-Lollard legislation and legislation made by Henry VIII concerning treason by writing (1534) were abolished; the Licensing Order of 1643, which legislated that works be licensed, through the Stationers’ Company, prior to publication; and 1695, when the last such Act stipulating prepublication licensing lapsed. Postpublication censorship continued in different periods for different reasons. Thus, for example, British publication of D. H. Lawrence’s Lady Chatterley’s Lover (1928) was obstructed (though unsuccessfully) in 1960, under the Obscene Publications Act of 1959. Censorship can also be international: although not published in Iran, Salman Rushdie’s Satanic Verses (1988) was censored in that country, where the leader, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, proclaimed a fatwa (religious decree) promising the author’s execution. Very often censorship is not imposed externally, however: authors or publishers can censor work in anticipation of what will incur the wrath of readers or the penalties of the law. Victorian and Edwardian publishers of novels, for example, urged authors to remove potentially offensive material, especially for serial publication in popular magazines.

codex: the physical format of most modern books and medieval manuscripts, consisting of a series of separate leaves gathered into quires and bound together, often with a cover. In late antiquity, the codex largely replaced the scroll, the standard form of written documents in Roman culture.

copy text: the particular text of a work used by a textual editor as the basis of an edition of that work.

copyright: the legal protection afforded to authors for control of their work's publication, in an attempt to ensure due financial reward. Some key dates in the history of copyright in the United Kingdom are as follows: 1710, when a statute gave authors the exclusive right to publish their work for fourteen years, and fourteen years more if the author were still alive when the first term had expired; 1842, when the period of authorial control was extended to forty-two years; and 1911, when the term was extended yet further, to fifty years after the author's death. In 1995 the period of protection was harmonized with the laws in other European countries to be the life of the author plus seventy years. In the United States no works first published before 1923 are in copyright. Works published since 1978 are, as in the United Kingdom, protected for the life of the author plus seventy years.

folio: the leaf formed by both sides of a single page. Each folio has two sides: a recto (the front side of the leaf, on the right side of a double-page spread in an open codex), and a verso (the back side of the leaf, on the left side of a double-page spread). Modern book pagination follows the pattern 1, 2, 3, 4, while medieval manuscript pagination follows the pattern 1r, 1v, 2r, 2v. "Folio" can also designate the size of a printed book. Books come in different shapes, depending originally on the number of times a standard sheet of paper is folded. One fold produces a large volume, a folio book; two folds produce a quarto, four an octavo, and six a very small duodecimo. Generally speaking, the larger the book, the grander and more expensive. Shakespeare's plays were, for example, first printed in quartos, but were gathered into a folio edition in 1623.

foul papers: versions of a work before an author has produced, if she or he has, a final copy (a "fair copy") with all corrections removed.

incunabulum (plural "incunabula"): any printed book produced in Europe before 1501. Famous incunabula include the Gutenberg Bible, printed in 1455.

manuscript (Latin, “written by hand”): Any text written physically by hand is a manuscript. Before the introduction of printing with moveable type in 1476, all texts in England were produced and reproduced by hand, in manuscript. This is an extremely labor-intensive task, using expensive materials (for example, vellum, or parchment); the cost of books produced thereby was, accordingly, very high. Even after the introduction of printing, many texts continued to be produced in manuscript. This is obviously true of letters, for example, but until the eighteenth century, poetry written within aristocratic circles was often transmitted in manuscript copies.

paleography (Greek “ancient writing”): the art of deciphering, describing, and dating forms of handwriting.

parchment: animal skin, used as the material for handwritten books before the introduction of paper. See also vellum.

patronage, patron (Latin “protector”): Many technological, legal, and commercial supports were necessary before professional authorship became possible. Although some playwrights (for example, Shakespeare) made a living by writing for the theater, other authors needed, principally, the large-scale reproductive capacities of printing and the security of copyright to make a living from writing. Before these conditions obtained, many authors had another main occupation, and most authors had to rely on patronage. In different periods, institutions or individuals offered material support, or patronage, to authors. Thus in Anglo-Saxon England, monasteries afforded the conditions of writing to monastic authors. Between the twelfth and the seventeenth centuries, the main source of patronage was the royal court. Authors offered patrons prestige and ideological support in return for financial support. Even as the conditions of professional authorship came into being at the beginning of the eighteenth century, older forms of direct patronage were not altogether displaced until the middle of the century.

periodical: Whereas journalism, strictly, applies to daily writing (from French jour, “day”), periodical writing appears at larger, but still frequent, intervals, characteristically in the form of the essay. Periodicals were developed especially in the eighteenth century.

printing: Printing, or the mechanical reproduction of books using moveable type, was invented in Germany in the mid-fifteenth century by Johannes Gutenberg; it quickly spread throughout Europe. William Caxton brought printing into England from the Low Countries in 1476. Much greater powers of reproduction at much lower prices transformed every aspect of literary culture.

publisher: the person or company responsible for the commissioning and publicizing of printed matter. In the early period of printing, publisher, printer, and bookseller were often the same person. This trend continued in the ascendancy of the Stationers’ Company, between the middle of the sixteenth and the end of the seventeenth centuries. Toward the end of the seventeenth century, these three functions began to separate, leading to their modern distinctions.

quire: When medieval manuscripts were assembled, a few loose sheets of parchment or paper would first be folded together and sewn along the fold. This formed a quire (also known as a “gathering” or “signature”). Folded in this way, four large sheets of parchment would produce eight smaller manuscript leaves. Multiple quires could then be bound together to form a codex.

royalties: an agreed-upon proportion of the price of each copy of a work sold, paid by the publisher to the author, or an agreed-upon fee paid to the playwright for each performance of a play.

scribe: In manuscript culture, the scribe is the copyist who reproduces a text by hand.

scriptorium (plural “scriptoria”): a place for producing written documents and manuscripts.

serial publication: generally referring to the practice, especially common in the nineteenth century, of publishing novels a few chapters at a time, in periodicals.

Stationers' Company: The Stationers' Company was an English guild incorporating various tradesmen, including printers, publishers, and booksellers, skilled in the production and selling of books. It was formed in 1403, received its royal charter in 1557, and served as a means both of producing and of regulating books. Authors would sell the manuscripts of their books to individual stationers, who incurred the risks and took the profits of producing and selling the books. The stationers entered their rights over given books in the Stationers' Register. They also regulated the book trade and held their monopoly by licensing books and by being empowered to seize unauthorized books and imprison resisters. This system of licensing broke down in the social unrest of the Civil War and Interregnum (1640–60), and it ended in 1695. Even after the end of licensing, the Stationers' Company continued to be an intrinsic part of the copyright process, since the 1710 copyright statute directed that copyright had to be registered at Stationers' Hall.

subscription: An eighteenth-century system of bookselling somewhere between direct patronage and impersonal sales. A subscriber paid half the cost of a book before publication and half on delivery. The author received these payments directly. The subscriber's name appeared in the prefatory pages.

textual criticism: Works in all periods often exist in many subtly or not so subtly different forms. This is especially true with regard to manuscript textual reproduction, but it also applies to printed texts. Textual criticism is the art, developed from the fifteenth century in Italy but raised to new levels of sophistication from the eighteenth century, of deciphering different historical states of texts. This art involves the analysis of textual variants, often with the aim of distinguishing authorial from scribal forms.

variants: differences that appear among different manuscripts or printed editions of the same text.

vellum: animal skin, used as the material for handwritten books before the introduction of paper. See also parchment.

watermark: the trademark of a paper manufacturer, impressed into the paper but largely invisible unless held up to light.

Endnotes

- Note *: This appendix was devised and compiled by James Simpson with the collaboration of all the editors. We especially thank Professor Lara Bovilsky of the University of Oregon at Eugene for her help. Return to reference *

Geographic Nomenclature

The British Isles refers to the prominent group of islands off the northwest coast of Europe, especially to the two largest, Great Britain and Ireland. At present these comprise two sovereign states: the Republic of Ireland, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland—known for short as the United Kingdom or the U.K. Most of the smaller islands are part of the U.K. but a few, like the Isle of Man and the tiny Channel Islands, are largely independent. The U.K. is often loosely referred to as “Britain” or “Great Britain” and is sometimes called simply, if inaccurately, “England.” For obvious reasons, the latter usage is rarely heard among the inhabitants of the other countries of the U.K.—Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland (sometimes called Ulster). England is by far the most populous part of the kingdom, as well as the seat of its capital, London.

From the first to the fifth century C.E. most of what is now England and Wales was a province of the Roman Empire called Britain (in Latin, Britannia). After the fall of Rome, much of the island was invaded and settled by peoples from northern Germany and Denmark speaking what we now call Old English. These peoples are known as the Angles and the Saxons (the word England is related to Angles). By the time of the Norman Conquest (1066) most of the kingdoms founded by the Angles, the Saxons, and the subsequent Viking invaders had coalesced into the kingdom of England, which, in the latter Middle Ages, conquered and largely absorbed the neighboring Celtic kingdom of Wales. In 1603 James VI of Scotland inherited the island’s other throne as James I of England, and for the next hundred years—except for the two decades of Puritan rule—Scotland (both its English-speaking Lowlands and its Gaelic-speaking Highlands) and England (with Wales) were two kingdoms under a single king. In 1707 the Act of Union brought them together as the United Kingdom of Great Britain. Ireland, where English rule had begun in the twelfth century and been tightened in the sixteenth, was incorporated by the 1800–1801 Act of Union into the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. With the division of Ireland and the establishment of the Irish Free State after World War I, this name was modified to its present form, and in 1949 the Irish Free State became the Republic of Ireland, or Éire. In 1999 Scotland elected a separate parliament it had relinquished in 1707, and Wales elected an assembly it lost in 1409; neither Scotland nor Wales ceased to be part of the United Kingdom.

The British Isles are further divided into counties, which in Great Britain are also known as shires. This word, with its vowel shortened in pronunciation, forms the suffix in the names of many counties, such as Yorkshire, Wiltshire, Somersetshire.

The Latin names Britannia (Britain), Caledonia (Scotland), and Hibernia (Ireland) are sometimes used in poetic diction; so too is Britain's ancient Celtic name, Albion. Because of its accidental resemblance to albus (Latin for “white”), Albion is especially associated with the chalk cliffs that seem to gird much of the English coast like defensive walls.

The British Empire took its name from the British Isles because it was created not only by the English but also by the Irish, Scots, and Welsh, as well as by civilians and servicemen from other constituent countries of the empire. Some of the empire's overseas colonies, or crown colonies, were populated largely by settlers of European origin and their descendants. These predominantly White settler colonies, such as Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, were allowed significant self-government in the nineteenth century and recognized as dominions in the early twentieth century. The White dominions became members of the Commonwealth of Nations, also called the Commonwealth, the British Commonwealth, and “the Old Commonwealth” at different times, an association of sovereign states under the symbolic leadership of the British monarch.

Other overseas colonies of the empire had mostly Indigenous populations (or, in the Caribbean, the descendants of enslaved people, indentured servants, and others). These colonies were granted political independence after World War II, later than the dominions, and have often been referred to since as postcolonial nations. In South and Southeast Asia, India and Pakistan gained independence in 1947, followed by other countries including Sri Lanka (formerly Ceylon), Burma (now Myanmar), Malaya (now Malaysia), and Singapore. In West and East Africa, the Gold Coast was decolonized as Ghana in 1957, Nigeria in 1960, Sierra Leone in 1961, Uganda in 1962, Kenya in 1963, and so forth, while in southern Africa, the White minority government of South Africa was already independent in 1931, though majority rule did not come until 1994. In the Caribbean, Jamaica and Trinidad and Tobago became independent in 1962, followed by Barbados in 1966, and other islands of the British West Indies in the 1970s and '80s. Other regions from which nations emerged out of British colonial rule included Central America (British Honduras, now Belize), South America (British Guiana, now Guyana), the Pacific islands (Fiji), and Europe (Cyprus, Malta). After decolonization, many of these nations chose to remain within a newly conceived Commonwealth and are sometimes referred to as "New Commonwealth" countries. Some nations, such as Ireland, Pakistan, and South Africa, withdrew from the Commonwealth, though South Africa and Paki stan eventually rejoined, and others, such as Burma (now Myanmar), gained independence outside the Commonwealth. Britain's last major overseas colony, Hong Kong, was returned to Chinese sovereignty in 1997, but while Britain retains only a handful of dependent territories, such as Bermuda and Montserrat, the scope of the Commonwealth remains vast, with approximately 30 percent of the world's population.

British Money

One of the most dramatic changes to the system of British money came in 1971. In the system previously in place, the pound consisted of 20 shillings, each containing 12 pence, making 240 pence to the pound. Since 1971, British money has been calculated on the decimal system, with 100 pence to the pound. Britons' experience of paper money did not change very drastically: as before, 5- and 10-pound notes constitute the majority of bills passing through their hands (in addition, 20- and 50-pound notes have been added). But the shift necessitated a whole new way of thinking about and exchanging coins and marked the demise of the shilling, one of the fundamental units of British monetary history. Many other coins, still frequently encountered in literature, had already passed. These include the groat, worth 4 pence (the word "groat" is often used to signify a trifling sum); the angel (which depicted the archangel Michael triumphing over a dragon), valued at 10 shillings; the mark, worth in its day two-thirds of a pound or 13 shillings 4 pence; and the sovereign, a gold coin initially worth 22 shillings 6 pence, later valued at 1 pound, last circulated in 1932. One prominent older coin, the guinea, was worth a pound and a shilling; though it has not been minted since 1813, a very few quality items or prestige awards (like the purse in a horse race) may still be quoted in guineas. (The table below includes some other obsolete coins.) Colloquially, a pound was (and is) called a quid; a shilling a bob; sixpence, a tanner; a copper could refer to a penny, a half-penny, or a farthing (1/4 penny).

Old Currency	New Currency
1 pound note	1 pound coin (or note in Scotland)
10 shilling (half-pound note)	50 pence
5 shilling (crown)
2 1/2 shilling (half crown)	20 pence
2 shilling (florin)	10 pence
1 shilling	5 pence
6 pence
2 1/2 pence	1 penny
2 pence

1 penny
1/2 penny
1/4 penny (farthing)

Throughout its tenure as a member of the European Union (1973–2020), Britain contemplated but did not make the change to the EU's common currency, the Euro, reflecting many Britons' strong identification of their country with its rich commercial history and view of their currency as a national symbol.

Even more challenging than sorting out the values of obsolete coins is calculating for any given period the purchasing power of money, which fluctuates over time by its very nature. As difficult as it is to generalize, it is clear that money used to be worth much more than it is currently. During the early Middle Ages, the most valuable circulating coin was the silver penny: four would buy a sheep. Beyond long-term inflationary trends, prices varied from times of plenty to those marked by poor harvests; from peacetime to wartime; from the country to the metropolis (life in London has always been very expensive); and wages varied according to the availability of labor (wages would sharply rise, for instance, during the devastating Black Death in the fourteenth century). The following chart provides a glimpse of some actual prices of given periods and their changes across time, though all the variables mentioned above prevent them from being definitive. Even from one year to the next, an added tax on gin or tea could drastically raise prices, and a lottery ticket could cost much more the night before the drawing than just a month earlier. Still, the prices quoted below do indicate important trends, such as the disparity of incomes in British society and the costs of basic commodities. In the chart on the following pages, the symbol £ is used for pound, s. for shilling, d. for a penny (from Latin denarius); a sum would normally be written £2.19.3—that is 2 pounds, 19 shillings, 3 pence. (This is Leopold Bloom's budget for the day depicted in Joyce's novel Ulysses [1922]; in the new currency, it would be about £2.96.)

circa	1390	1590	1650	1750	1815	1875
food and drink	gallon (8 pints) of ale, 1.5d.	tankard of beer, .5d.	coffee, 1d. a dish	"drunk for a penny, dead drunk for two-pence" (gin shop sign in Hogarth print)	ounce of laudanum, 3d.	pint of beer, 3d.
	gallon (8 pints) of wine, 3 to 4d.	pound of beef, 2s. 5d.	chicken, 1s. 4d.	dinner at a steakhouse, 1s.	ham and potato dinner for two, 7s.	dinner in a good hotel, 5s.
	pound of cinnamon, 1	pound of cinnamon,	pound of tea, £3	pound of tea, 16s.	bottle of French	pound of tea, 2s.

	to 3s.	10s. 6d.	10s.		claret, 12s.
entertainment	no cost to watch a cycle play	admission to public theater, 1 to 3d.	falcon, £11 5s.	theater tickets, 1 to 5s.	admission to Covent Garden theater, 1 to 7s.	theater tickets, 6d. to 7s.
	contributory admission to professional troupe theater	cheap seat in private theater, 6d.	billiard table, £25	admission to Vauxhall Gardens, 1s.	annual subscription to Almack's (exclusive club), 10 guineas	admission to Madam Tussaud's waxworks, 1s.
	maintenance for royal hounds at Windsor, .75d. a day	"to see a dead Indian" (The Tempest 2.2.32), 1.25d. (ten "doits")	three-quarter length portrait painting, £31	lottery ticket, £20 (shares were sold)	Jane Austen's piano, 30 guineas	annual fees at a gentleman's club, 7 to 10 guineas
reading	cheap romance, 1s.	play quarto, 6d.	pamphlet, 1 to 6d.	issue of The Gentleman's Magazine , 6d.	issue of Edinburgh Review , 6s.	copy of the Times , 3d.
	a Latin Bible, 2 to £4	Shakespeare's First Folio (1623), £1	student Bible, 6s.	cheap edition of Milton, 2s.	membership in circulating library (3rd class), £1 4s. a year	illustrated edition of Through the Looking-glass , 6s.
	payment for illuminating a liturgical book, £22 9s.	Foxe's Acts and Monuments , 24s.	Hobbes's Leviathan , 8s.	Johnson's Dictionary , folio, 2 vols., £4 10s.	1st edition of Austen's Pride and Prejudice , 18s.	1st edition of Trollope's The Way We Live Now , 2 vols., £1 1s.
transportation	night's supply of hay for horse, 2d.	wherry (whole boat) across Thames, 1d.	day's journey, coach, 10s.	boat across Thames, 4d.	coach ride, outside, 2 to 3d. a mile; inside,	15-minute journey in a London cab, 1s. 6d.

					4 to 5d. a mile
	coach, £8	hiring a horse for a day, 12d.	coach horse, £30	coach fare, London to Edinburgh, £4 10s.	palanquin transport in Madras, 5s. a day	railway, 3rd class, London to Plymouth, 18s. 8d. (about 1d. a mile)
	quality horse, £10	hiring a coach for a day, 10s.	fancy carriage, £170	transport to America, £5	passage, Liverpool to New York, £10	passage to India, 1st class, £50
clothes	clothing allowance for peasant, 3s. a year	shoes with buckles, 8d.	footman's frieze coat, 15s.	working woman's gown, 6s. 6d.	checked muslin, 7s. per yard	flannel for a cheap petticoat, 1s. 3d. a yard
	shoes for gentry wearer, 4d.	woman's gloves, £1 5s.	falconer's hat, 10s.	gentleman's suit, £8	hiring a dressmaker for a pelisse, 8s.	overcoat for an Eton schoolboy, £1 1s.
	hat for gentry wearer, 10d.	fine cloak, £16	black cloth for mourning household of an earl, £100	very fine wig, £30	ladies silk stockings, 12s.	set of false teeth, £2 10s.
labor/incomes	hiring a skilled building worker, 4d. a day	actor's daily wage during playing season, 1s.	agricultural laborer, 6s. 5d. a week	price of enslaved boy, £32	lowest-paid sailor on Royal Navy ship, 10s. 9d. a month	seasonal agricultural laborer, 14s. a week
	wage for professional scribe, £2	household servant 2 to £5 a year + food, clothing	tutor to nobleman's children, £30 a year	housemaid's wage, £6 to £8 a year	contributor to Quarterly Review , 10	housemaid's wage, £10 to £25 a year

	3s. 4d. a year + cloak				guineas per sheet
	minimum income to be called gentleman, £10 a year; for knighthood, 40 to £400	minimum income for eligibility for knighthood, £30 a year	Milton's salary as Secretary of Foreign Tongues, £288 a year	Boswell's allowance, £200 a year	minimum income for a "genteel" family, £100 a year	income of the "comfortable" classes, £800 and up a year
	income from land of richest magnates, £3,500 a year	income from land of average earl, £4,000 a year	Earl of Bedford's income, £8,000 a year	Duke of Newcastle's income, £40,000 a year	Mr. Darcy's income, Pride and Prejudice , £10,000	Trollope's income, £4,000 a year

The British Baronage

The English monarchy is in principle hereditary, though at times during the Middle Ages the rules were subject to dispute. As it stands now, authority passes from parent to eldest surviving child, to siblings in order of seniority if there are no children, and in default of direct descendants to collateral lines (cousins, nephews, nieces) in order of closeness. There have been breaks in the order of succession (1066, 1399, 1688), but so far as possible the usurpers have always sought to paper over the break with a legitimate, that is, hereditary, claim. When a queen succeeds to the throne and takes a husband, he does not become king unless he is in the line of blood succession; rather, he is named prince consort, as Albert was to Victoria. He may be the father of kings, but he is not one himself.

The original Saxon nobles were the king's thanes, ealdormen, or earls, who provided the king with military service and counsel in return for booty, gifts, or landed estates. William the Conqueror, arriving from France, where feudalism was fully developed, considerably expanded this group. In addition, as the king distributed the lands of his new kingdom, he also distributed dignities to men who became known collectively as "the baronage." "Baron" in its root meaning signifies simply "man," and barons were the king's men. As the title was common, a distinction was early made between greater and lesser barons, the former gradually assuming loftier and more impressive titles. The first English "duke" was created in 1337; the title of "marquess," or "marquis" (pronounced "markwis"), followed in 1385, and "viscount" ("vyekount") in 1440. Though "earl" is the oldest title of all, an earl now comes between a marquess and a viscount in order of dignity and precedence, and the old term "baron" now designates a rank just below viscount. "Baronets" were created in 1611 as a means of raising revenue for the crown (the title could be purchased for about £1,000); they are marginal nobility and have never sat in the House of Lords.

Kings and queens are addressed as "Your Majesty," princes and princesses as "Your Highness," the other hereditary nobility as "My Lord" or "Your Lordship." Peers receive their titles either by inheritance (like Lord Byron, the sixth baron of that line) or from the monarch (like Alfred, Lord Tennyson, created 1st Baron Tennyson by Victoria). The children, even of a duke, are commoners unless they are specifically granted some other title or inherit their father's title from him. A peerage can be forfeited by act of attainder, as for example when a lord is convicted of treason; and, when forfeited, or lapsed for lack of a successor, can be bestowed on another family. Thus in 1605 Robert Cecil was made first Earl of Salisbury in the third creation, the first creation dating from 1149, the second from 1337, the title having been in abeyance since 1539. Titles descend by right of succession and do not depend on tenure of land; thus, a title does not always indicate where a lord dwells or holds power. Indeed, noble titles do not always refer to a real place at all. At Prince Edward's marriage in 1999, the queen created him Earl of Wessex, although the old kingdom of Wessex has had no political existence since 1066, and the name was all but forgotten until it was resurrected by Thomas Hardy as the setting of his novels. (This is perhaps but one of many ways in which the world of the aristocracy increasingly resembles the realm of literature.)

The king and queen	(These are all of the royal line.)
Prince and princess

Duke and duchess	(These may or may not be of the royal line, but are ordinarily remote from the succession.)
Marquess and marchioness
Earl and countess
Viscount and viscountess
Baron and baroness
Baronet and lady

Scottish peers sat in the parliament of Scotland, as English peers did in the parliament of England, till at the Act of Union (1707) Scottish peers were granted sixteen seats in the English House of Lords, to be filled by election. (In 1963, all Scottish lords were allowed to sit.) Similarly, Irish peers, when the Irish parliament was abolished in 1801, were granted the right to elect twenty-eight of their number to the House of Lords in Westminster. (Now that the Republic of Ireland is a separate nation, this no longer applies.) Women members (peeresses) were first allowed to sit in the House as nonhereditary Life Peers in 1958 (when that status was created for members of both genders); women first sat by their own hereditary right in 1963. Today the House of Lords still retains some power to influence or delay legislation, but its future is uncertain. In 1999, the hereditary peers (then amounting to 750) were reduced to 92 temporary members elected by their fellow peers. Holders of Life Peerages remain, as do senior bishops of the Church of England and high-court judges (the "Law Lords").

Below the peerage the chief title of honor is "knight." Knighthood, which is not hereditary, is generally a reward for services rendered. A knight (Sir John Black) is addressed, using his first name, as "Sir John"; his wife, using the last name, is "Lady Black"—unless she is the daughter of an earl or nobleman of higher rank, in which case she will be "Lady Arabella." The female equivalent of a knight bears the title of "Dame." Though the word knight itself comes from the Old English cniht, there is some doubt as to whether knighthood amounted to much before the arrival of the Normans. The feudal system required military service as a condition of land tenure, and a man who came to serve his king at the head of an army of tenants required a title of authority and badges of identity—hence the title of knighthood and the coat of arms. During the Crusades, when men were far removed from their land (or even sold it in order to go on crusade), more elaborate forms of fealty sprang up that soon expanded into orders of knighthood. The Templars, Hospitallers, Knights of the Teutonic Order, Knights of Malta, and Knights of the Golden Fleece were but a few of these companionships; not all of them were available at all times in England.

Gradually, with the rise of centralized government and the decline of feudal tenures, military knighthood became obsolete, and the rank largely honorific; sometimes, as under James I, it degenerated into a scheme of the royal government for making money. For hundreds of years after its establishment in the fourteenth century, the Order of the Garter was the only English order of knighthood, an exclusive courtly companionship. Then, during the late seventeenth, the eighteenth, and the nineteenth centuries, a number of additional orders were created, with names such as the Thistle, Saint Patrick, the Bath, Saint Michael, and Saint George, plus a number of special Victorian and Indian orders. They retain the terminology, ceremony, and dignity of knighthood, but the military implications are vestigial.

Although the British Empire now belongs to history, appointments to the Order of the British Empire continue to be conferred for services to that empire at home or abroad. Such honors (commonly referred to as "gongs") are granted by the monarch in New Year's and Birthday lists, but the decisions are now made by the government in power. In recent years there have been efforts to popularize and democratize the dispensation of honors, with recipients including celebrities of all types. But this does not prevent large sectors of British society from regarding both knighthood and the peerage as largely irrelevant to modern life.

The Royal Lines of England and Great Britain

England

SAXONS AND DANES

Egbert, king of Wessex802–839

Ethelwulf, son of Egbert839–858

Ethelbald, second son of Ethelwulf858–860

Ethelbert, third son of Ethelwulf860–866

Ethelred I, fourth son of Ethelwulf866–871

Alfred the Great, fifth son of Ethelwulf871–899

Edward the Elder, son of Alfred899–924

Athelstan the Glorious, son of Edward924–940

Edmund I, third son of Edward940–946

Edred, fourth son of Edward946–955

Edwy the Fair, son of Edmund955–959

Edgar the Peaceful, second son of Edmund959–975

Edward the Martyr, son of Edgar975–978 (murdered)

Ethelred II, the Unready, second son of Edgar978–1016

Edmund II, Ironside, son of Ethelred II1016–1016

Canute the Dane1016–1035

Harold I, Harefoot, natural son of Canute1035–1040

Hardecanute, son of Canute1040–1042

Edward the Confessor, son of Ethelred II1042–1066

Harold II, brother-in-law of Edward1066–1066 (died in battle)

HOUSE OF NORMANDY

William I, the Conqueror1066–1087

William II, Rufus, third son of William I1087–1100 (shot from ambush)

Henry I, Beauclerc, youngest son of William I1100–1135

HOUSE OF BLOIS

Stephen, son of Adela, daughter of William I1135–1154

HOUSE OF PLANTAGENET

Henry II, son of Geoffrey Plantagenet by Matilda, daughter of Henry I1154–1189

Richard I, Coeur de Lion, son of Henry II1189–1199

John Lackland, son of Henry II1199–1216

Henry III, son of John1216–1272

Edward I, Longshanks, son of Henry III1272–1307

Edward II, son of Edward I1307–1327 (deposed)

Edward III of Windsor, son of Edward II 1327–1377

Richard II, grandson of Edward III 1377–1399 (deposed)

HOUSE OF LANCASTER

Henry IV, son of John of Gaunt, son of Edward III 1399–1413

Henry V, Prince Hal, son of Henry IV 1413–1422

Henry VI, son of Henry V 1422–1461 (deposed),
1470–1471 (deposed)

HOUSE OF YORK

Edward IV, great-great-grandson of Edward III 1461–1470
(deposed),
1471–1483

Edward V, son of Edward IV 1483–1483 (murdered)

Richard III, Crookback 1483–1485 (died in battle)

HOUSE OF TUDOR

Henry VII, married daughter of Edward IV 1485–1509

Henry VIII, son of Henry VII 1509–1547

Edward VI, son of Henry VIII 1547–1553

Mary I, "Bloody," daughter of Henry VIII 1553–1558

Elizabeth I, daughter of Henry VIII 1558–1603

HOUSE OF STUART

James I (James VI of Scotland)1603–1625

Charles I, son of James I1625–1649 (executed)

COMMONWEALTH & PROTECTORATE

Council of State1649–1653

Oliver Cromwell, Lord Protector1653–1658

Richard Cromwell, son of Oliver1658–1660 (resigned)

HOUSE OF STUART (RESTORED)

Charles II, son of Charles I1660–1685

James II, second son of Charles I1685–1688

(INTERREGNUM, 11 DECEMBER 1688 TO 13 FEBRUARY 1689)

HOUSE OF ORANGE-NASSAU

William III of Orange, by

Mary, daughter of Charles I1689–1701

and Mary II, daughter of James II –1694

Anne, second daughter of James II1702–1714

Great Britain

HOUSE OF HANOVER

George I, son of Elector of Hanover and Sophia, granddaughter of James I1714–1727

George II, son of George I 1727–1760

George III, grandson of George II 1760–1820

George IV, son of George III 1820–1830

William IV, third son of George III 1830–1837

Victoria, daughter of Edward, fourth son of George III 1837–1901

HOUSE OF SAXE-COBURG AND GOTHA

Edward VII, son of Victoria 1901–1910

HOUSE OF WINDSOR (NAME ADOPTED 17 JULY 1917)

George V, second son of Edward VII 1910–1936

Edward VIII, eldest son of George V 1936–1936 (abdicated)

George VI, second son of George V 1936–1952

Elizabeth II, daughter of George VI 1952–2022

Charles III, son of Elizabeth II 2022–

Religions in Great Britain

In the late sixth century C.E., missionaries from Rome introduced Christianity to Britons—actually, reintroduced it, since it had briefly flourished in the southern parts of the British Isles during the Roman occupation, and even after the Roman withdrawal had persisted in the Celtic regions of Scotland and Wales. By the time the earliest poems included in The Norton Anthology of English Literature were composed (the seventh century), therefore, there had been a Christian presence in the British Isles for hundreds of years. The conversion of the Germanic occupiers of England can, however, be dated only from 597. Our knowledge of the religion of pre-Christian Britain is sketchy, but it is likely that vestiges of Germanic polytheism assimilated into, or coexisted with, the practice of Christianity: fertility rites were incorporated into the celebration of Easter resurrection, rituals commemorating the dead into All-Hallows Eve and All Saints Day, and elements of winter solstice festivals into the celebration of Christmas. The most durable polytheistic remains are the days of the week, each of which except “Saturday” derives from the name of a Germanic pagan god, and the word “Easter,” deriving, according to the great monastic scholar Bede (ca. 673–735), from the name of a Germanic pagan goddess, Eostre. In English literature such “folkloric” elements sometimes elicit romantic nostalgia. Geoffrey Chaucer’s “Wife of Bath” looks back to a magical time before the arrival of Christianity in which the land was “fulfild of fairye.” Hundreds of years later, the seventeenth-century writer Robert Herrick honors the amalgamation of Christian and pagan elements in agrarian British culture in such poems as “Corinna’s Gone A-Maying” and “The Hock Cart.”

Medieval Christianity was fairly uniform, if complex, across Western Europe—hence called “catholic,” or universally shared. The Church was composed of the so-called “regular” and “secular” orders, the regular orders being those who followed a rule in a community under an abbot or an abbess (that is, monks, nuns, friars, and canons), while the secular clergy of priests served parish communities under the governance of a bishop. In the unstable period from the sixth until the twelfth century, monasteries were the intellectual powerhouse of the Church. From the beginning of the thirteenth century, with the development of an urban Christian spirituality in Europe, friars dominated the recently invented institution of universities, as well as devoting themselves, in theory at least, to the urban poor.

The Catholic Church was also an international power structure. With its hierarchy of pope, cardinals, archbishops, and bishops, it offered a model of the centralized, bureaucratic state from the late eleventh century. That ecclesiastical power structure coexisted alongside a separate, often less centralized and feudal structure of lay authorities, with theoretically different and often competing spheres of social responsibilities. The sharing of lay and ecclesiastical authority in medieval England was sometimes a source of conflict. Chaucer's pilgrims are on their way to visit the memorial shrine to one victim of such exemplary struggle: Thomas à Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, who opposed the policies of King Henry II, was assassinated by indirect suggestion of the king in 1170, and later made a saint. The Church, in turn, produced its own victims: Jews were subject to persecution in the late twelfth century in England, before being expelled in 1290. From the beginning of the fifteenth century, the English Church targeted Lollard heretics (see below) with capital punishment, for the first time.

As an international organization, the Church conducted its business in the universal language of Latin. Thus although in the period the largest segment of literate persons was made up of clerics, the clerical contribution to great literary writing in vernacular languages (for example, French and English) was, so far as we know, relatively modest, with some great exceptions in the later Middle Ages (for example, William Langland). Lay, vernacular writers of the period certainly reflect the importance of the Church as an institution and the pervasiveness of religion in the rituals that marked everyday life, as well as contesting institutional authority. From the late fourteenth century, indeed, England witnessed an active and articulate, proto-Protestant movement known as Lollardy, which attacked clerical hierarchy and promoted vernacular scriptures.

Beginning in 1517 the German monk Martin Luther, in Wittenberg, Germany, openly challenged many aspects of Catholic practice and by 1520 had completely repudiated the authority of the pope, setting in motion the Protestant Reformation. Luther argued that the Roman Catholic Church had strayed far from the pattern of Christianity laid out in scripture. He rejected Catholic doctrines for which no biblical authority was to be found, such as the belief in Purgatory, and translated the Bible into German, on the grounds that the importance of scripture for all Christians made its translation into the vernacular tongue essential. Luther was not the first to advance such views—Lollard followers of the Englishman John Wycliffe had translated the Bible in the late fourteenth century. But Luther, protected by powerful German rulers, was able to speak out without fear of punishment and convert others to his views, rather than suffer the persecution usually meted out to heretics. Soon other reformers were following in Luther's footsteps: of these, the Swiss Ulrich Zwingli and the French Jean Calvin would be especially influential for English religious thought.

At first England remained staunchly Catholic. Its king, Henry VIII, was so severe to heretics that the pope awarded him the title "Defender of the Faith," which British monarchs have retained to this day. In 1534, however, Henry rejected the authority of the pope to prevent his divorce from his queen, Catherine of Aragon, and his marriage to his mistress, Ann Boleyn. In doing so, Henry appropriated to himself ecclesiastical as well as secular authority. Thomas More, author of Utopia, was executed in 1535 for refusing to endorse Henry's right to govern the English church. Over the following six years, Henry consolidated his grip on the ecclesiastical establishment by dissolving the powerful, populous Catholic monasteries and redistributing their massive landholdings to his own lay followers. Yet Henry's church largely retained Catholic doctrine and liturgy. When Henry died and his young son, Edward, came to the throne in 1547, the English church embarked on a more Protestant path, a direction abruptly reversed when Edward died and his older sister Mary, the daughter of Catherine of Aragon, took the throne in 1553 and attempted to reintroduce Roman Catholicism. Mary's reign was also short, however, and her successor, Elizabeth I, the daughter of Ann Boleyn, was a Protestant. Elizabeth attempted to establish a "middle way" Christianity, compromising between Roman Catholic practices and beliefs and reformed ones.

The Church of England, though it laid claim to a national rather than pan-European authority, aspired like its predecessor to be the universal church of all English subjects. It retained the Catholic structure of parishes and dioceses and the Catholic hierarchy of bishops, though the ecclesiastical authority was now the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Church's "Supreme Governor" was the monarch. Yet disagreement and controversy persisted. Some members of the Church of England wanted to retain many of the ritual and liturgical elements of Catholicism. Others, the Puritans, advocated a more thoroughgoing reformation. Most Puritans remained within the Church of England, but a minority, the "Separatists" or "Congregationalists," split from the established church altogether. These dissenters no longer thought of the ideal church as an organization to which everybody belonged; instead, they conceived it as a more exclusive group of likeminded people, one not necessarily attached to a larger body of believers.

In the seventeenth century, the succession of the Scottish king James to the English throne produced another problem. England and Scotland were separate nations, and in the sixteenth century Scotland had developed its own national Presbyterian church, or "kirk," under the leadership of the reformer John Knox. The kirk retained fewer Catholic liturgical elements than did the Church of England, and its authorities, or "presbyters," were elected by assemblies of their fellow clerics, rather than appointed by the king. James I and his son Charles I, especially the latter, wanted to bring the Scottish kirk into conformity with Church of England practices. The Scots violently resisted these efforts, with the collaboration of many English Puritans, in a conflict that eventually developed into the English Civil War in the mid-seventeenth century. The effect of these disputes is visible in the poetry of such writers as John Milton, Robert Herrick, Henry Vaughan, and Thomas Traherne, and in the prose of Thomas Browne, Lucy Hutchinson, and Dorothy Waugh. Just as in the mid-sixteenth century, when a succession of monarchs with different religious commitments destabilized the church, so the seventeenth century endured spiritual whiplash. King Charles I's highly ritualistic Church of England was violently overturned by the Puritan victors in the Civil War—until 1660, after the death of the Puritan leader, Oliver Cromwell, when the Church of England was restored along with the monarchy.

The religious and political upheavals of the seventeenth century produced Christian sects that de-emphasized the ceremony of the established church and rejected as well its top-down authority structure. Some of these groups were ephemeral, but the Baptists (founded in 1608 in Amsterdam by the English expatriate John Smyth) and Quakers, or Society of Friends (founded by George Fox in the 1640s), flourished outside the established church, sometimes despite cruel persecution. John Bunyan, a Baptist, wrote the Christian allegory Pilgrim's Progress while in prison. Some dissenters, like the Baptists, shared the reformed reverence for the absolute authority of scripture but interpreted the scriptural texts differently from their fellow Protestants. Others, like the Quakers, favored, even over the authority of the Bible, the "inner light" or voice of individual conscience, which they took to be the working of the Holy Spirit in the lives of individuals.

The Protestant dissenters were not England's only religious minorities. Despite crushing fines and the threat of imprisonment, a minority of Catholics under Elizabeth and James openly refused to give their allegiance to the new church, and others remained secret adherents to the old ways. John Donne was brought up in an ardently Catholic family, and several other writers converted to Catholicism as adults—Ben Jonson for a considerable part of his career, Elizabeth Carey and Richard Crashaw permanently, and at profound personal cost. In the eighteenth century, Catholics remained objects of suspicion as possible agents of sedition, especially after the “Glorious Revolution” in 1688 deposed the Catholic James II in favor of the Protestant William and Mary. Anti-Catholic prejudice affected John Dryden, a Catholic convert, as well as the lifelong Catholic Alexander Pope. By contrast, the English colony of Ireland remained overwhelmingly Roman Catholic, the fervor of its religious commitment at least partly inspired by resistance to English occupation. Starting in the reign of Elizabeth, England shored up its own authority in Ireland by encouraging Protestant immigrants from Scotland to settle in the north of Ireland, producing a virulent religious divide the effects of which are still felt today.

A small community of Jews had moved from France to London after 1066, when the Norman William the Conqueror came to the English throne. Although despised and persecuted by many Christians, they were allowed to remain as moneylenders to the Crown, until the thirteenth century, when the king developed alternative sources of credit. At this point, in 1290, the Jews were expelled from England. In 1655 Oliver Cromwell permitted a few to return, and in the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries the Jewish population slowly increased, mainly by immigration from Germany. In the mid-eighteenth century some prominent Jews had their children brought up as Christians so as to facilitate their full integration into English society: thus the nineteenth-century writer and politician Benjamin Disraeli, although he and his father were members of the Church of England, was widely considered a Jew insofar as his ancestry was Jewish.

In the late seventeenth century, as the Church of England reasserted itself, Catholics, Jews, and dissenting Protestants found themselves subject to significant legal restrictions. The Corporation Act, passed in 1661, and the Test Act, passed in 1673, excluded all who refused to take communion in the Church of England from voting, attending university, or working in government or in the professions. Members of religious minorities, as well as Church of England communicants, paid mandatory taxes in support of Church of England ministers and buildings. In 1689 the dissenters gained the right to worship in public, but Jews and Catholics were not permitted to do so.

During the eighteenth century, political, intellectual, and religious history remained closely intertwined. The Church of England came to accommodate a good deal of variety. "Low church" services resembled those of the dissenting Protestant churches, minimizing ritual and emphasizing the sermon; the "high church" retained more elaborate ritual elements, yet its prestige was under attack on several fronts. Many Enlightenment thinkers subjected the Bible to rational critique and found it wanting: the philosopher David Hume, for instance, argued that the "miracles" described therein were more probably lies or errors than real breaches of the laws of nature. Within the Church of England, the "broad church" Latitudinarians welcomed this rationalism, advocating theological openness and an emphasis on ethics rather than dogma. More radically, the Unitarian movement rejected the divinity of Christ while professing to accept his ethical teachings. Taking a different tack, the preacher John Wesley, founder of Methodism, responded to the rationalists' challenge with a newly fervent call to evangelism and personal discipline; his movement was particularly successful in Wales. Revolutions in America and France at the end of the century generated considerable millenarian excitement and fostered more new religious ideas, often in conjunction with a radical social agenda. Many important writers of the Romantic period were indebted to traditions of protestant dissent: Unitarian and rationalist protestant ideas influenced William Hazlitt, Anna Barbauld, Mary Wollstonecraft, and the young Samuel Taylor Coleridge. William Blake created a highly idiosyncratic poetic mythology loosely indebted to radical strains of Christian mysticism. Others were even more heterodox: Lord Byron and Robert Burns, brought up as Scots

Presbyterians, rebelled fiercely, and Percy Shelley's writing of an atheistic pamphlet resulted in his expulsion from Oxford.

Great Britain never erected an American-style "wall of separation" between church and state, but in practice religion and secular affairs grew more and more distinct during the nineteenth century. In consequence, members of religious minorities no longer seemed to pose a threat to the commonweal. A movement to repeal the Test Act failed in the 1790s, but a renewed effort resulted in the extension of the franchise to dissenting Protestants in 1828 and to Catholics in 1829. The numbers of Roman Catholics in England were swelled by immigration from Ireland, but there were also some prominent English adherents. Among writers, the converts John Newman and Gerard Manley Hopkins are especially important. The political participation and social integration of Jews presented a thornier challenge. Lionel de Rothschild, repeatedly elected to represent London in Parliament during the 1840s and 1850s, was not permitted to take his seat there because he refused to take his oath of office "on the true faith of a Christian"; finally, in 1858, the Jewish Disabilities Act allowed him to omit these words. Only in 1871, however, were Oxford and Cambridge opened to non-Anglicans.

Meanwhile geological discoveries and Charles Darwin's evolutionary theories increasingly cast doubt on the literal truth of the Creation story, and close philological analysis of the biblical text suggested that its origins were human rather than divine. By the end of the nineteenth century, many writers were bearing witness to a world in which Christianity no longer seemed fundamentally plausible. In his poetry and prose, Thomas Hardy depicts a world devoid of benevolent providence. Matthew Arnold's poem "Dover Beach" is in part an elegy to lost spiritual assurance, as the "Sea of Faith" goes out like the tide: "But now I only hear / Its melancholy, long, withdrawing roar / Retreating." For Arnold, literature must replace religion as a source of spiritual truth, and intimacy between individuals substitute for the lost communal solidarity of the universal church.

The work of many twentieth-century writers shows the influence of a religious upbringing or a religious conversion in adulthood. T. S. Eliot and W. H. Auden embrace Anglicanism, William Butler Yeats spiritualism. James Joyce repudiates Irish Catholicism but remains obsessed with it. Yet religion, or lack of it, is a matter of individual choice and conscience, not social or legal mandate. Over the past several decades, church attendance has plummeted in Great Britain. Only about 46 percent of the population identified itself as “Christian” on the 2021 census. Meanwhile, immigration from former British colonies as well as other countries has swelled the ranks of religions once uncommon in the British Isles—Muslim, Sikh, Hindu, Buddhist—though the numbers of adherents remain small relative to the total population.

APPENDICES

General Bibliography

This bibliography consists of a list of suggested general readings on English literature. Bibliographies for the authors and topical clusters in The Norton Anthology of English Literature are available online at the NAEL student site.

Histories of England and of English Literature

Even the most distinguished of the comprehensive general histories written in past generations have come to seem outmoded. Innovative research in social, cultural, and political history has made it difficult to write a single coherent account of England from the Middle Ages to the present, let alone to accommodate in a unified narrative the complex histories of Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and the other nations where writing in English has flourished. Readers who wish to explore the historical matrix out of which the works of literature collected in this anthology emerged are advised to consult the studies of particular periods listed in the appropriate sections of this bibliography. The multivolume Oxford History of England (1934–65) and New Oxford History of England (1992–2009) are useful, as are the three-volume Peoples of the British Isles: A New History, by Stanford E. Lehmberg, Samantha A. Meigs, and Thomas William Heyck (3rd ed., 1992); the nine-volume Cambridge Cultural History of Britain, ed. Boris Ford (1992); the three-volume Cambridge Social History of Britain, 1750–1950, ed. F. M. L. Thompson (1990); and the multivolume Penguin History of Britain, gen. ed. David Cannadine (1996–). For Britain's imperial history, readers can consult the five-volume Oxford History of the British Empire, ed. Wm. Roger Louis (1998–99), as well as Gender and Empire, ed. Philippa Levine (2004). Also of interest is Lisa Lowe, The Intimacies of Four

Continents (2015). Given the cultural centrality of London, readers may find particular interest in The London Encyclopaedia, ed. Ben Weinreb et al. (3rd ed., 2008); Roy Porter, London: A Social History (1994); and Jerry White, London in the Nineteenth Century: "A Human Awful Wonder of God" (2007) and London in the Twentieth Century: A City and Its People (2001).

Similar observations may be made about literary history. In the light of such initiatives as women's studies, New Historicism, and postcolonialism, the range of authors deemed significant has expanded, along with the geographical and conceptual boundaries of literature in English. Attempts to capture in a unified account the great sweep of literature from Beowulf to the early twenty-first century have largely given way to studies of individual genres, carefully delimited time periods, and specific authors. Among the large-scale literary surveys, The Cambridge Guide to Literature in English, ed. Dominic Head (3rd ed., 2006), is useful, as is the nine-volume Penguin History of Literature (1987–94) and the multivolume Oxford History of Poetry in English (2022–). The Feminist Companion to Literature in English: Women Writers from the Middle Ages to the Present, ed. Virginia Blain, Isobel Grundy, and Patricia Clements (1990), is an important resource, and the editorial materials in the two-volume The Norton Anthology of Literature by Women: The Traditions in English, ed. Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar (3rd ed., 2007), constitute a concise history and set of biographies of women authors since the Middle Ages. Annals of English Literature, 1475–1950 (2nd ed., 1961), lists important publications year by year, together with the significant literary events for each year. Seven volumes have been published in The Oxford English Literary History, gen. eds. Jonathan Bate and Colin Burrow (2002–): Laura Ashe, 1000–1350: Conquest and Transformation; James Simpson, 1350–1547: Reform and Cultural Revolution; Margaret J. M. Ezell, 1645–1714: The Later Seventeenth Century; Philip Davis, 1830–1880: The Victorians; Chris Baldick, 1830–1880: The Modern Movement (1910–1940); Randall Stevenson, 1960–2000: The Last of England?; and Bruce King, 1948–2000: The Internationalization of English Literature. See also The Cambridge History of Medieval English Literature, ed. David Wallace (1999); The Cambridge History of Early Medieval English Literature, ed. Clare E. Lees (2013); The Cambridge History of Early Modern English Literature, ed. David Loewenstein and Janel Mueller (2002); The Cambridge History of English Literature, 1660–1780, ed. John Richetti (2005); The Cambridge History of English Romantic Literature, ed. James Chandler (2009); The Cambridge History of Victorian Literature, ed. Kate Flint (2012); and The Cambridge History of Twentieth-Century English Literature, ed. Laura Marcus and Peter Nicholls (2004).

Helpful treatments and surveys of English meter, rhyme, and stanza forms are Paul Fussell Jr., Poetic Meter and Poetic Form (rev. ed., 1979); Donald Wesling, The Chances of Rhyme: Device and Modernity (1980); Charles O. Hartman, Free Verse: An Essay on Prosody (1980); Derek Attridge, Poetic Rhythm: An Introduction (1995); Robert Pinsky, The Sounds of Poetry: A Brief Guide (1998); The Making of a Poem: A Norton Anthology of Poetic Forms, ed. Mark Strand and Eavan Boland (2000); John Hollander, Rhyme's Reason: A Guide to English Verse (3rd ed., 2001); Poems, Poets, Poetry: An Introduction and Anthology, ed. Helen Vendler (3rd ed., 2010); The Lyric Theory Reader: A Critical Anthology, ed. Virginia Jackson and Yopie Prins (2014); and Jonathan Culler, Theory of the Lyric (2015).

On the development and functioning of the novel as a form, see Ian Watt, The Rise of the Novel: Studies in Defoe, Richardson, and Fielding (1957); Gérard Genette, Narrative Discourse: An Essay in Method (1970; trans. 1980); Theory of the Novel: A Historical Approach, ed. Michael McKeon (2000); The Novel, ed. Franco Moretti (2 vols.; 2001–03, trans. 2006); McKeon, The Origins of the English Novel, 1600–1740 (15th anniversary ed., 2002); The Cambridge History of the English Novel, ed. Robert L. Caserio and Clement Hawes (2012); A Companion to the English Novel, ed. Stephen Arata et al. (2015); and the ten volumes to date of The Oxford History of the Novel in English (2012–). On women novelists and readers, see Nancy Armstrong, Desire and Domestic Fiction: A Political History of the Novel (1987), and Catherine Gallagher, Nobody's Story: The Vanishing Acts of Women Writers in the Marketplace, 1670–1820 (1994).

On the history of playhouse design, see Richard Leacroft, The Development of the English Playhouse: An Illustrated Survey of Theatre Building in England from Medieval to Modern Times (1988). For a survey of the plays that have appeared on these and other stages, see Allardyce Nicoll, British Drama, rev. J. C. Trewin (6th ed., 1978); the eight-volume The Revels History of Drama in English, gen. eds. Clifford Leech and T. W. Craik (1975–83); Alfred Harbage, Annals of English Drama, 975–1700, rev. S. Schoenbaum and Sylvia Wagonheim (3rd ed., 1989); and the three volumes of The Cambridge History of British Theatre, ed. Jane Milling, Peter Thomson, Joseph Donohue, and Baz Kershaw (2004).

On some of the key intellectual currents that are at once reflected in and shaped by literature and contemporary literary criticism, Arthur O. Lovejoy's classic studies The Great Chain of Being (1936) and Essays in the History of Ideas (1948) remain valuable, along with such works as Georg Simmel, The Philosophy of Money (1900; trans. 1907; 3rd enl. ed., 2004); Ernst Cassirer, The Philosophy of Symbolic Forms (4 vols., 1923–95; trans. 1953–96); Arthur O. Lovejoy and George Boas, Primitivism and Related Ideas in Antiquity (1935); Norbert Elias, The Civilizing Process (2 vols., 1939; trans. 1979–82); Simone de Beauvoir, The Second Sex (2 vols., 1949; trans. 1953, new trans. 2009); Frantz Fanon, Black Skin, White Masks (1952; trans. 1957, new trans. 2008); Ernst Kantorowicz, The King's Two Bodies: A Study in Mediaeval Political Theology (1957; new eds. 1997, 2016); Hannah Arendt, The Human Condition (1958; 2nd ed., 1998); Gaston Bachelard, The Poetics of Space (1958; trans. 1969, new ed. 1994); Richard Popkin, The History of Scepticism from Erasmus to Descartes (1960; rev. ed., 1964; rev. and expanded as The History of Scepticism: From Savonarola to Bayle, 2003); Hans Blumenberg, The Legitimacy of the Modern Age (1966; trans. 1983); M. H. Abrams, Natural Supernaturalism: Tradition and Revolution in Romantic Literature

(1971); Michel Foucault, Madness and Civilization: A History of Insanity in the Age of Reason (1964; trans. 1965) and The Order of Things: An Archaeology of the Human Sciences (1966; trans. 1970); Jacques Derrida, Of Grammatology (1967; trans. 1976, 40th anniversary ed. 2016) and Dissemination (1972; trans. 1981); Martin Jay, The Dialectical Imagination: A History of the Frankfurt School and the Institute of Social Research, 1923–1950 (1973); Hayden White, Metahistory: The Historical Imagination in Nineteenth-Century Europe (1973); Roland Barthes, The Pleasure of the Text (1973; trans. 1975); Raymond Williams, Keywords: A Vocabulary of Culture and Society (1976; new ed., 2015); Pierre Bourdieu, Distinction: A Social Critique of the Judgement of Taste (1979; trans. 1984); Richard Rorty, Philosophy and the Mirror of Nature (1979; 39th anniversary ed., 2009); Gilles Deleuze and Félix Guattari, A Thousand Plateaus: Capitalism and Schizophrenia (1980; trans. 1987); Michel de Certeau, The Practice of Everyday Life (2 vols., 1980; trans. 1984–98); Jürgen Habermas, The Philosophical Discourse of Modernity: Twelve Lectures (1985; trans. 1987); Slavoj Žižek, The Sublime Object of Ideology (1989); Homi Bhabha, The Location of Culture (1994; new ed., 2004); Judith Butler, The Psychic Life of Power: Theories in Subjection (1997); Sigmund Freud, Writings on Art and Literature, ed. Neil Hertz (1997); and N. Katherine Hayles, How We Became Posthuman: Virtual Bodies in Cybernetics, Literature, and Informatics (1999).

Reference Works

The single most important tool for the study of literature in English is the Oxford English Dictionary (1884–1924; 2nd ed., 1989; 3rd ed. in process). The most current edition, updated quarterly, is available online to subscribers. The OED is written on historical principles: that is, it attempts not only to describe current word use but also to record the history and development of the language from its origins before the Norman Conquest to the present. It thus provides, for familiar as well as archaic and obscure words, the widest possible range of meanings and uses, organized chronologically and illustrated with quotations. The OED can be searched as a conventional dictionary arranged a–z and also by subject, usage, region, origin, and timeline (the first appearance of a word). Resources available for early forms of English include the online Old English and Middle English dictionaries at Lexilogos (https://www.lexilogos.com/english/english_old.htm and https://www.lexilogos.com/english/english_middle.htm); also valuable are the Dictionary of Old English (1986–) and the Middle English Dictionary (1952; digitized 2008). Beyond the OED there are many other valuable dictionaries, such as The American Heritage Dictionary (5th ed., 50th anniversary printing, 2018); The Oxford Dictionary of Abbreviations (1992); T. F. Hoad, The Concise Oxford Dictionary of English Etymology (1993); Bas Aarts, Sylvia Chalker, and Edmund Weiner, The Oxford Dictionary of English Grammar (2nd ed., 2014); Morton S. Freeman, A New Dictionary of Eponyms (1997); The Oxford Essential Dictionary of Foreign Terms in English (1999); The Oxford Dictionary of Idioms, ed. Judith Siefring (2nd ed., 2004); P. H. Matthews, The Concise Oxford Dictionary of Linguistics (3rd ed., 2014); Tom McArthur, The Oxford Guide to World English (2002); and The Concise Oxford Dictionary of Proverbs, ed. Jennifer Speake (4th ed., 2003). Other valuable reference works include The Cambridge Encyclopedia of the English Language, ed. David Crystal (3rd ed., 2018); The Concise Oxford Companion to the English Language, ed. Tom McArthur (1998); Fowler's Concise Dictionary of Modern English Usage, ed. Jeremy Butterfield (3rd ed., 2016); and the numerous guides to specialized vocabularies, slang, regional dialects, and the like.

There is a steady flow of new editions of most major and many minor writers in English, along with the publication of critical appraisals and scholarship. James L. Harner's Literary Research Guide: An Annotated List of Reference Sources in English Literary Studies (6th ed., 2014; available online at www.mlalrg.org/public) offers thorough, evaluative annotations of a wide range of sources. For the historical record of scholarship and critical discussion, The New Cambridge Bibliography of English Literature, ed. George Watson (5 vols., 1969–77), and the third edition in process, The Cambridge Bibliography of English Literature, ed. Joanne Shattock (1 vol. to date, 2000–), are useful. The MLA International Bibliography (also online) is a key resource for following critical discussion of literatures in English. Ranging from 1926 to the present, it includes journal articles, essays, chapters from collections, books, and dissertations, and covers folklore, linguistics, and film. The Annual Bibliography of English Language and Literature (ABELL), compiled by the Modern Humanities Research Association, lists monographs, periodical articles, critical editions of literary works, book reviews, and collections of essays published anywhere in the world; unpublished doctoral dissertations are covered for the period 1920–99 (available online to subscribers directly and as part of Literature Online, <http://literature.proquest.com/marketing/index.jsp>).

For compact biographies of English authors, see the multivolume Oxford Dictionary of National Biography (DNB), ed. H. C. G. Matthew and Brian Harrison (2004); since 2004 the DNB has been extended online with updates (now monthly). Handy reference books of authors, works, and various literary terms and allusions include many volumes in the Cambridge Companion and Oxford Companion series: e.g., The Cambridge Companion to Narrative, ed. David Herman (2007); The Oxford Companion to English Literature, ed. Dinah Birch (7th ed., 2009); and The Cambridge Companion to Allegory, ed. Rita Copeland and Peter Struck (2010). The Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, editor-in-chief Roland Greene (4th ed., 2012), is available online to subscribers in Oxford Reference. Handbooks that define and illustrate literary concepts and terms include The Penguin Dictionary of Literary Terms and Literary Theory, ed. J. A. Cuddon and M. A. R. Habib (5th ed., 2015); William Harmon, A Handbook to Literature (12th ed., 2011); Critical Terms for Literary Study, ed. Frank Lentricchia and Thomas McLaughlin (2nd ed., 1995); and M. H. Abrams and Geoffrey Galt Harpham, A Glossary of Literary Terms (11th ed., 2014). Also useful are Richard A. Lanham, A Handlist of Rhetorical Terms (2nd ed., 1991); Arthur Quinn, Figures of Speech: 60 Ways to Turn a Phrase (1982); the Barnhart Concise Dictionary of Etymology, ed. Robert K. Barnhart (1995); and George A. Kennedy, A New History of Classical Rhetoric (1994).

On Greek and Roman backgrounds, see The Cambridge History of Classical Literature—vol. 1, Greek Literature, ed. P. E. Easterling and Bernard M. W. Knox (1985), and vol. 2, Latin Literature, ed. E. J. Kenney and W. V. Clausen (1982), both available to subscribers online; The Oxford Companion to Classical Literature, ed. M. C. Howatson (3rd ed., 2011); Gian Biagio Conte, Latin Literature: A History (1987; trans. 1994); The Oxford Classical Dictionary, ed. Simon Hornblower, Antony Spawforth, and Esther Eidinow (4th ed., 2012); Richard Rutherford, Classical Literature: A Concise History (2005); and Mark P. O. Morford, Robert J. Lenardon, and Michael Sham, Classical Mythology (11th ed., 2018). The Loeb Classical Library of Greek and Roman texts with facing-page English translations is now available online to subscribers at www.loebclassics.com.

Digital resources in the humanities continue to grow rapidly. Among the many useful electronic resources for the study of English literature are enormous digital archives, available to subscribers: Early English Books Online (EEBO), <http://eebo.chadwyck.com/home>; Literature Online, <http://literature.proquest.com/marketing/index.jsp>; and Eighteenth Century Collections Online (ECCO), www.gale.com/primary-sources/eighteenth-century-collections-online. There are also numerous free sites of variable quality. Many of the best of these are period- or author-specific and hence are listed in the period/author bibliographies on the NAEL website. Among the general sites, one of the most useful and wide-ranging is Voice of the Shuttle (<http://vos.ucsb.edu>), which includes links to Bartleby.com and Project Gutenberg.

Literary Criticism and Theory

The Cambridge History of Literary Criticism comprises nine volumes (1989–2013): Classical Criticism, ed. George A. Kennedy; The Middle Ages, ed. Alastair Minnis and Ian Johnson; The Renaissance, ed. Glyn P. Norton; The Eighteenth Century, ed. H. B. Nisbet and Claude Rawson; Romanticism, ed. Marshall Brown; The Nineteenth Century, c. 1830–1914, ed. M. A. R. Habib; Modernism and the New Criticism, ed. A. Walton Litz, Louis Menand, and Lawrence Rainey; From Formalism to Poststructuralism, ed. Raman Selden; and Twentieth-Century Historical, Philosophical and Psychological Perspectives, ed. Christa Knellwolf and Christopher Norris. See also M. H. Abrams, The Mirror and the Lamp: Romantic Theory and the Critical Tradition (1953); William K. Wimsatt Jr. and Cleanth Brooks, Literary Criticism: A Short History (1957); René Wellek, A History of Modern Criticism: 1750–1950 (8 vols., 1955–92); Frank Lentricchia, After the New Criticism (1980); J. Hillis Miller, On Literature (2002); and John Frow, Character and Person (2014). Raman Selden, Peter Widdowson, and Peter Brooker have written A Reader's Guide to Contemporary Literary Theory (6th ed., 2017). Other useful resources include The Johns Hopkins Guide to Literary Theory and Criticism, ed. Michael Groden, Martin Kreiswirth, and Imre Szeman (2nd ed., 2005); Literary Theory: An Anthology, ed. Julie Rivkin and Michael Ryan (3rd ed., 2017); and The Norton Anthology of Theory and Criticism, gen. ed. Vincent B. Leitch (3rd ed., 2018).

Modern approaches to English literature and literary theory were shaped by certain landmark works: William Empson, Seven Types of Ambiguity (1930; 3rd ed., 1953), Some Versions of Pastoral (1935), and The Structure of Complex Words (1951; 3rd ed., 1977); T. S. Eliot, Selected Essays (1932; 3rd ed., 1951) and On Poetry and Poets (1957); F. R. Leavis, Revaluation: Tradition and Development in English Poetry (1936) and The Great Tradition: George Eliot, Henry James, Joseph Conrad (1948); Erich Auerbach, Mimesis: The Representation of Reality in Western Literature (1946; trans. 1953); Lionel Trilling, The Liberal Imagination: Essays on Literature and Society (1950); William K. Wimsatt Jr., The Verbal Icon: Studies in the Meaning of Poetry (1954); Northrop Frye, Anatomy of Criticism: Four Essays (1957); Wayne C. Booth, The Rhetoric of Fiction (1961; 2nd ed., 1983); and W. Jackson Bate, The Burden of the Past and the English Poet (1970). René Wellek and Austin Warren, Theory of Literature (3rd ed., 1963), is a useful introduction to the variety of scholarly and critical approaches to literature up to the time of its publication. Jonathan Culler's Literary Theory: A Very Short Introduction (2nd ed., 2011), discusses recurrent issues and debates. On the discipline of criticism, see John Guillory's Professing Criticism: Essays on the Organization of Literary Study (2022); Rita Felski's The Limits of Critique (2015) is a critical assessment of contemporary criticism.

Beginning in the late 1960s, interest in literary theory as a specific field markedly intensified. Certain forms of literary study had already been influenced by the work of the Russian linguist Roman Jakobson and the Russian formalist Viktor Shklovsky—and, still more, by conceptions that derived or claimed to derive from Marx and Engels—but the full impact of these theories was not felt until what became known as the “theory revolution” of the 1970s and '80s. For Marxist literary criticism, see Georg Lukács, Theory of the Novel: A Historico-philosophical Essay on the Forms of Great Epic Literature (1920; trans. 1971), The Historical Novel (1937; trans. 1962), and Studies in European Realism: A Sociological Survey of the Writings of Balzac, Stendhal, Zola, Tolstoy, Gorki, and Others (trans. 1950); Walter Benjamin's essays from the 1920s and '30s, represented in Illuminations (1955; trans. 1968) and Reflections: Essays, Aphorisms, Autobiographical Writings (1975; trans. 1978); Mikhail Bakhtin's essays from the 1930s represented in The Dialogic Imagination: Four Essays (trans. 1981) and Rabelais and His World (1965; trans. 1968); Selections from the Prison Notebooks of Antonio Gramsci, ed. and trans. Quintin Hoare and Geoffrey Nowell Smith (1971); Raymond Williams, Marxism and Literature (1977); Tony Bennett, Formalism and Marxism (1979; 2nd ed., 2003); Fredric Jameson, The Political Unconscious: Narrative as a Socially Symbolic Act (1981); and Terry Eagleton, Literary Theory: An Introduction (1983; anniversary ed., 2008) and The Ideology of the Aesthetic (1990).

Structural linguistics and anthropology gave rise to a flowering of structuralist literary criticism; convenient introductions include Robert Scholes, Structuralism in Literature: An Introduction (1974), and Jonathan Culler, Structuralist Poetics: Structuralism, Linguistics and the Study of Literature (new ed., 2002). Poststructuralist challenges to this approach are epitomized in such influential works as Jacques Derrida, Writing and Difference (1967; trans. 1978), and Paul de Man, Blindness and Insight: Essays in the Rhetoric of Contemporary Criticism (1971; 2nd ed., 1983). Poststructuralism is discussed in Jonathan Culler, On Deconstruction: Theory and Criticism after Structuralism (1982; 25th anniversary ed., 2007); Slavoj Žižek, The Sublime Object of Ideology (1989); Fredric Jameson, Postmodernism; or, The Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism (1991); John McGowan, Postmodernism and Its Critics (1991); and Beyond Structuralism: The Speculations of Theory and the Experience of Reading, ed. Wendell V. Harris (1996). A figure who greatly influenced both structuralism and poststructuralism is Roland Barthes, in Mythologies (1957; trans. 1972, new trans. 2012) and S/Z (1970; trans. 1974). Among other influential contributions to literary theory are the psychoanalytic approach in Harold Bloom, The Anxiety of Influence: A Theory of Poetry (1973; 2nd ed., 1997), and the reader-response approach in Stanley Fish, Is There a Text in This Class? The Authority of Interpretive Communities (1980). For a retrospect on these decades, see Terry Eagleton, After Theory (2003).

Influenced by these theoretical currents but not restricted to them, modern feminist literary criticism was fashioned by such works as Patricia Meyer Spacks, The Female Imagination (1975); Ellen Moers, Literary Women (1976; new ed., 1986); Elaine Showalter, A Literature of Their Own: British Women Novelists from Brontë to Lessing (1977; expanded ed., 1999); and Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar, The Madwoman in the Attic: The Woman Writer and the Nineteenth-Century Literary Imagination (1979). Subsequent studies include Jane Gallop, The Daughter's Seduction: Feminism and Psychoanalysis (1982); Luce Irigaray, This Sex Which Is Not One (1977; trans. 1985); Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak, In Other Worlds: Essays in Cultural Politics (1987; new ed., 2006); Barbara Johnson, A World of Difference (1987); Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar, No Man's Land: The Place of the Woman Writer in the Twentieth Century (3 vols., 1988–94); Judith Butler, Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity (1990; 2nd ed., 1999); and the critical views sampled in The New Feminist Criticism: Essays on Women, Literature, and Theory, ed. Elaine Showalter (1985); Feminist Literary Theory: A Reader, ed. Mary Eagleton (1986; 3rd ed., 2011); and Feminisms: An Anthology of Literary Theory and Criticism, ed. Robyn R. Warhol and Diane Price Herndl (1991; rev. in 2009 as Feminisms Redux: An Anthology of Literary Theory and Criticism); The Hélène Cixous Reader, ed. Susan Sellers (1994); The Cambridge Companion to Feminist Literary Theory, ed. Ellen Rooney (2006); and Feminist Literary Theory and Criticism: A Norton Reader, ed. Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar (2007).

Just as feminist critics used poststructuralist and psychoanalytic methods to place literature in conversation with gender theory, a new school emerged placing literature in conversation with critical race theory. Comprehensive introductions include Critical Race Theory: The Key Writings That Formed the Movement, ed. Kimberlé Crenshaw et al. (1995); and Richard Delgado and Jean Stefancic, Critical Race Theory: An Introduction (3rd ed., 2017); and The Routledge Companion to Race and Ethnicity, ed. Stephen M. Caliendo and Charlton D. McIlwain (2nd ed., 2021). For an important precursor in cultural studies, see Stuart Hall et al., Policing the Crisis: Mugging, the State and Law and Order (1978; 2nd ed., 2013). Seminal works include Henry Louis Gates Jr., The Signifying Monkey: A Theory of African-American Literary Criticism (1988; 25th anniversary ed., 2014); Patricia Williams, The Alchemy of Race and Rights (1991); Toni Morrison, Playing in the Dark: Whiteness and the Literary Imagination (1992); Cornel West, Race Matters (1993; 25th anniversary ed., 2017); Gene Andrew Jarrett, Representing the Race: A New Political History of African American Literature (2011); Fred Moten, Black and Blur (2017); and Saidiya V. Hartman, Wayward Lives, Beautiful Experiments: Intimate Histories of Social Upheaval (2019). Other important works include Kathleen Davis, Periodization and Sovereignty: How Ideas of Feudalism and Secularization Govern the Politics of Time (2008; rpt. 2017); Alexander G. Weheliye, Habeas Viscus: Racializing Assemblages, Biopolitics, and Black Feminist Theories of the Human (2014); Christina Sharpe, In the Wake: On Blackness and Being (2016); and Geraldine Heng, The Invention of Race in the European Middle Ages (2018). Helpful anthologies and collections of essays have emerged in recent decades, such as The Oxford Companion to African American Literature, ed. William L. Andrews, Frances Smith Foster, and Trudier Harris (1997), and also their Concise Oxford Companion to African American Literature (2001); Unchained Voices: An Anthology of Black Authors in the English-Speaking World of the Eighteenth Century, ed. Vincent Carretta (1996; updated 2003); The Cambridge Companion to Jewish American Literature, ed. Hana Wirth-Nesher and Michael P. Kramer (2003); A Companion to African American Literature, ed. Gene Andrew Jarrett (2010); The Routledge Companion to Anglophone Caribbean Literature, ed. Michael A. Bucknor and Alison Donnell (2011); The Routledge Companion to Latino/a Literature, ed. Suzanne Bost and Frances R. Aparicio (2013); The Routledge Companion to Asian American and Pacific Islander Literature, ed. Rachel C. Lee (2014); The Cambridge Companion to Asian American Literature, ed. Crystal Parikh and Daniel Y. Kim (2015); and The Cambridge Companion to British Black and Asian Literature, 1945–2010, ed. Deirdre Osborne (2016).

Gay literature and queer studies are represented in collections including Inside/Out: Lesbian Theories, Gay Theories, ed. Diana Fuss (1991); The Lesbian and Gay Studies Reader, ed. Henry Abelove, Michèle Aina Barale, and David Halperin (1993); The Columbia Anthology of Gay Literature: Readings from Western Antiquity to the Present Day, ed. Byrne R. S. Fone (1998); The Cambridge History of Gay and Lesbian Literature, ed. E. L. McCallum and Mikko Tuhkanen (2014); and The Cambridge Companion to Lesbian Literature, ed. Jodie Medd (2015), and by such books as Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick, Between Men: English Literature and Male Homosocial Desire (1985; 30th anniversary ed., 2015) and Epistemology of the Closet (1990; updated ed., 2008); Diana Fuss, Essentially Speaking: Feminism, Nature, and Difference (1989); Terry Castle, The Apparitional Lesbian: Female Homosexuality and Modern Culture (1993); Leo Bersani, Homos (1995); Gregory Woods, A History of Gay Literature: The Male Tradition (1998); David Halperin, How to Do the History of Homosexuality (2002); Judith Halberstam, In a Queer Time and Place: Transgender Bodies, Subcultural Lives (2005); Heather Love, Feeling Backward: Loss and the Politics of Queer History (2007); and Brian Glavey, The Wallflower Avant-garde: Modernism, Sexuality, and Queer Ekphrasis (2016).

New Historicism is represented in Stephen Greenblatt, Learning to Curse: Essays in Early Modern Culture (1990; new ed., 2007); New Historical Literary Study: Essays on Reproducing Texts, Representing History, ed. Jeffrey N. Cox and Larry J. Reynolds (1993); The New Historicism Reader, ed. H. Aram Veeser (1994); and Catherine Gallagher and Stephen Greenblatt, Practicing New Historicism (2000). The related social and historical dimension of texts is discussed in Jerome McGann, Critique of Modern Textual Criticism (1983), and Scholarly Editing: A Guide to Research, ed. D. C. Greetham (1995). Characteristic of New Historicism is an expansion of the field of literary interpretation still further in cultural studies; for a broad sampling of the range of interests, see Cultural Studies, ed. Lawrence Grossberg, Cary Nelson, and Paula A. Treichler (1992); A Cultural Studies Reader: History, Theory, Practice, ed. Jessica Munns and Gita Rajan (1995); and The Cultural Studies Reader, ed. Simon During (3rd ed., 2007).

This expansion of the field is similarly reflected in postcolonial studies: see Frantz Fanon, Black Skin, White Masks (cited above) and The Wretched of the Earth (1961; trans. 1963, 60th anniversary ed. 2021); Edward Said, Orientalism (1978) and Culture and Imperialism (1993); Nation and Narration, ed. Homi K. Bhabha (1990); The Post-Colonial Studies Reader, ed. Bill Ashcroft, Gareth Griffiths and Helen Tiffin (2nd ed., 2006); and such influential books as Bill Ashcroft, Gareth Griffiths, and Helen Tiffin, The Empire Writes Back: Theory and Practice in Post-Colonial Literatures (1989; 2nd ed., 2002); Homi K. Bhabha, The Location of Culture (1994; new ed., 2004); Elleke Boehmer, Colonial and Postcolonial Literature: Migrant Metaphors (1995; 2nd ed., 2005); Dipesh Chakrabarty, Provincializing Europe: Postcolonial Thought and Historical Difference (2000; new ed., 2008); and Robert J. C. Young, Postcolonialism: An Historical Introduction (2001; anniversary ed., 2016). Useful collections include The Cambridge History of Postcolonial Literature, ed. Ato Quayson (2 vols., 2011–12); The Cambridge Companion to the Postcolonial Novel, ed. Ato Quayson (2016); and The Cambridge Companion to Postcolonial Poetry, ed. Jahan Ramazani (2017).

In the wake of the theory revolution, critics have focused on a wide array of topics, which can be only briefly surveyed here. One current of work, focusing on the history of emotion, is represented in Brian Massumi, Parables for the Virtual: Movement, Affect, Sensation (2002); Sianne Ngai, Ugly Feelings (2005); The Affect Theory Reader, ed. Melissa Gregg and Gregory J. Seigworth (2010); and Judith Butler, Senses of the Subject (2015). A somewhat related current, examining the special role of traumatic memory in literature, is exemplified in Trauma: Explorations in Memory, ed. Cathy Caruth (1995), and Dominic LaCapra, Writing History, Writing Trauma (2001; new ed., 2014). Work on the literary implications of cognitive science may be glimpsed in Introduction to Cognitive Cultural Studies, ed. Lisa Zunshine (2010). Interest in quantitative approaches to literature was sparked by Franco Moretti's Graphs, Maps, Trees: Abstract Models for Literary History (2005). For the field of digital humanities, see Moretti, Distant Reading (2013); Defining Digital Humanities: A Reader, ed. Melissa Terras, Julianne Nyhan, and Edward Vanhoutte (2013); and A New Companion to Digital Humanities, ed. Susan Schreibman, Ray Siemens, and John Unsworth (2016). For ecocriticism, or studies of literature and the environment, see The Ecocriticism Reader: Landmarks in Literary Ecology, ed. Cheryll Glotfelty and Harold Fromm (1996); Writing the Environment: Ecocriticism and Literature, ed. Richard Kerridge and

Neil Sammells (1998); Jonathan Bate, The Song of the Earth (2000); Lawrence Buell, The Future of Environmental Criticism: Environmental Crisis and Literary Imagination (2005); Timothy Morton, Ecology Without Nature: Rethinking Environmental Aesthetics (2007); Jane Bennett, Vibrant Matter: A Political Ecology of Things (2010); Rob Nixon, Slow Violence and the Environmentalism of the Poor (2011); The Oxford Handbook of Ecocriticism, ed. Greg Garrard (2014); and Anthropocene Reading: Literary History in Geologic Times, ed. Tobias Menely and Jesse Oak Taylor (2017). Related are the fields of animal studies and posthumanism, whose key works include Bruno Latour, We Have Never Been Modern (1991; trans. 1993); Steve Baker, The Postmodern Animal (2000); Cary Wolfe, Animal Rites: American Culture, the Discourse of Species, and Posthumanist Theory (2003) and What Is Posthumanism? (2009); Jacques Derrida, The Animal That Therefore I Am (2006; trans. 2008); Kari Weil, Thinking Animals: Why Animal Studies Now? (2012); Animals and the Human Imagination: A Companion to Animal Studies, ed. Aaron Gross and Anne Vallely (2012); and Critical Animal Studies: Thinking the Unthinkable, ed. John Sorenson (2014). The relationship between literature and law is central to such works as Interpreting Law and Literature: A Hermeneutic Reader, ed. Sanford Levinson and Steven Mailloux (1988); Law's Stories: Narrative and Rhetoric in the Law, ed. Peter Brooks and Paul Gewirtz (1996); Literature and Legal Problem Solving: Law and Literature as Ethical Discourse, ed. Paul J. Heald (1998); and New Directions in Law and Literature, ed. Elizabeth S. Anker and Bernadette Meyler (2017). Ethical questions in literature have been usefully explored by, among others, Geoffrey Galt Harpham in Getting It Right: Language, Literature, and Ethics (1992) and Derek Attridge in The Singularity of Literature (2004). Finally, some approaches to literature, such as formalism and literary biography, that seemed superseded in the theoretical ferment of the late twentieth century have had a resurgence. A renewed interest in form is evident in Susan Stewart, Poetry and the Fate of the Senses (2002); Reading for Form, ed. Susan J. Wolfson and Marshall Brown (2006); and Caroline Levine, Forms: Whole, Rhythm, Hierarchy, Network (2015). Interest in the history of the book was spearheaded by D. F. McKenzie's Bibliography and the Sociology of Texts (1986), Jerome J. McGann's The Textual Condition (1991), and Roger Chartier's The Order of Books: Readers, Authors, and Libraries in Europe Between the Fourteenth and Eighteenth Centuries (1992; trans. 1994). See also The Practice and Representation of Reading in England, ed. James Raven, Helen Small, and Naomi Tadmor (1996); The Cambridge History of the Book in Britain (7 vols., 1999–2019); The Book History Reader, ed. David Finkelstein and Alistair McCleery (2nd ed., 2006); and The Cambridge Companion to the History of the Book, ed. Leslie Howsam (2015). For studies in new media and digital or electronic literature, see N. Katherine Hayles, Electronic Literature: New Horizons for the Literary (2008); Matthew G. Kirschenbaum, Track Changes: A Literary History of Word Processing (2016); and Jessica Pressman's Bookishness: Loving Books in a Digital Age (2020).

Anthologies representing a range of recent approaches include Modern Criticism and Theory, ed. David Lodge with Nigel Wood (2nd ed., 2000); Contemporary Literary Criticism, ed. Robert Con Davis and Ronald Schleifer (4th ed., 1998); and The Norton Anthology of Theory and Criticism (cited above).

Literary Terminology*

Using simple technical terms can sharpen our understanding and streamline our discussion of literary works. Some terms, such as the ones in section A, below, help us address the internal style, structure, form, and kind of works. Other terms, such as those in section B, provide insight into the material forms in which literary works have been produced.

In analyzing what they called “rhetoric,” ancient Greek and Roman writers determined the elements of what we call “style” and “structure.” Most of our literary terms are derived, via medieval and Renaissance intermediaries, from the Greek and Latin sources. In the definitions that follow, the etymology, or root, of the word is given when it helps illuminate the word’s current usage.

Many of the examples are drawn from texts in The Norton Anthology of English Literature.

Words boldfaced within definitions are themselves defined in this appendix. Some terms are defined within definitions; such words are italicized.

A. Terms of Style, Structure, Form, and Kind

accent (synonym “stress”): a term of rhythm. The special force devoted to the voicing of one syllable in a word over others. In the noun “accent,” for example, the accent, or stress, is on the first syllable.

act: the major subdivision of a play, usually divided into scenes.

aesthetics (from Greek, “to feel, apprehend by the senses”): the philosophy of artistic meaning as a distinct mode of apprehending

untranslatable truth, defined as an alternative to rational enquiry, which is purely abstract. Developed in the late eighteenth century by the German philosopher Immanuel Kant especially.

Alexandrine: a term of meter. In French verse a line of twelve syllables, and, by analogy, in English verse a line of six stresses. See hexameter.

a llegory (Greek "saying otherwise"): saying one thing (the "vehicle" of the allegory) and meaning another (the allegory's "tenor"). Allegories may be momentary aspects of a work, as in metaphor ("John is a lion"), or, through extended metaphor, may constitute the basis of narrative, as in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress: this second meaning is the dominant one. See also symbol and type. Allegory is one of the most significant figures of thought.

a lliteration (from Latin "litera," alphabetic letter): a figure of speech. The repetition of an initial consonant sound or consonant cluster in consecutive or closely positioned words. This pattern is often an inseparable part of the meter in Germanic languages, where the tonic, or accented syllable, is usually the first syllable. Thus all Old English poetry and some varieties of Middle English poetry use alliteration as part of their basic metrical practice. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, line 1: "Once the siege and assault of Troy had ceased" (see vol. A, p. 415). Otherwise used for local effects; Stevie Smith, "Pretty," lines 4–5: "And in the pretty pool the pike stalks / He stalks his prey . . ." (see vol. F, p. 589).

allusion: Literary allusion is a passing but illuminating reference within a literary text to another, well-known text (often biblical or classical). Topical allusions are also, of course, common in certain modes, especially satire.

anagnorisis (Greek "recognition"): the moment of protagonist's recognition in a narrative, which is also often the moment of moral understanding.

anapest: a term of rhythm. A three-syllable foot following the rhythmic pattern, in English verse, of two unstressed (uu) syllables followed by one stressed (/). Thus, for example, "Illinois."

anaphora (Greek "carrying back"): a figure of speech. The repetition of words or groups of words at the beginning of consecutive sentences, clauses, or phrases. Blake, "London," lines 5–8: "In every cry of every Man, / In every Infant's cry of fear, / In every voice, in every ban . . ." (see vol. D, p. 137); Louise Bennett, "Jamaica Oman," lines 17–20: "Some backa man a push, some side-a / Man a hole him han, / Some a lick sense eena him head, / Some a guide him pon him plan!" (see vol. F, p. 724).

a nimal fable: a genre. A short narrative of speaking animals, followed by moralizing comment, written in a low style and gathered into a collection. Robert Henryson, "The Cock and the Jasper" (see vol. A, p. 679).

a ntithesis (Greek "placing against"): a figure of thought. The juxtaposition of opposed terms in clauses or sentences that are next to or near each other. Milton, Paradise Lost 1.777–80: "They but now who seemed / In bigness to surpass Earth's giant sons / Now less than smallest dwarfs, in narrow room / Throng numberless" (see vol. B, p. 1448).

a postrophe (from Greek "turning away"): a figure of thought. An address, often to an absent person, a force, or a quality. For example, a poet makes an apostrophe to a Muse when invoking her for inspiration.

apposition: a term of syntax. The repetition of elements serving an identical grammatical function in one sentence. The effect of this repetition is to arrest the flow of the sentence, but in doing so to add extra semantic nuance to repeated elements. This is an especially important feature of Old English poetic style. See, for example, Caedmon's Hymn (vol. A, p. 31), where the phrases

"heaven-kingdom's Guardian," "the Measurer's might," "his mind-plans," and "the work of the Glory-Father" each serve an identical syntactic function as the direct objects of "praise."

assonance (Latin "sounding to"): a figure of speech. The repetition of identical or near identical stressed vowel sounds in words whose final consonants differ, producing half-rhyme. Tennyson, "The Lady of Shalott," line 100: "His broad clear brow in sunlight glowed" (see vol. E, p. 210).

aubade (originally from Spanish "alba," dawn): a genre. A lover's dawn song or lyric bewailing the arrival of the day and the necessary separation of the lovers; Donne, "The Sun Rising" (see vol. B, p. 888). Larkin recasts the genre in "Aubade" (see vol. F, p. 795).

autobiography (Greek "self-life writing"): a genre. A narrative of a life written by the subject; Wordsworth, The Prelude (see vol. D, p. 391). There are subgenres, such as the spiritual autobiography, narrating the author's path to conversion and subsequent spiritual trials, as in Bunyan's Grace Abounding.

ballad stanza: a verse form. Usually a quatrain in alternating iambic tetrameter and iambic trimeter lines, rhyming abcb. See "Sir Patrick Spens" (vol. D, p. 38); Louise Bennett's poems (vol. F, pp. 719–24); Eliot, "Sweeney among the Nightingales" (vol. F, p. 501); Larkin, "This Be The Verse" (vol. F, p. 795).

ballade: a verse form. A form consisting usually of three stanzas followed by a four-line envoi (French, "send off"). The last line of the first stanza establishes a refrain, which is repeated, or subtly varied, as the last line of each stanza. The form was derived from French medieval poetry; English poets, from the fourteenth to the sixteenth centuries especially, used it with varying stanza forms. Chaucer, "The Complaint of Chaucer to His Purse" (see vol. A, p. 575).

bathos (Greek “depth”): a figure of thought. A sudden and sometimes ridiculous descent of tone; Pope, The Rape of the Lock 3.157–58: “Not louder shrieks to pitying heaven are cast, / When husbands, or when lapdogs breathe their last” (see vol. C, p. 549).

beast epic: a genre. A continuous, unmoralized narrative, in prose or verse, relating the victories of the wholly unscrupulous but brilliant strategist Reynard the Fox over all adversaries. Chaucer arouses, only to deflate, expectations of the genre in The Nun’s Priest’s Tale (see vol. A, p. 556).

biography (Greek “life-writing”): a genre. A life as the subject of an extended narrative.

blank verse: a verse form. Unrhymed iambic pentameter lines. Blank verse has no stanzas, but is broken up into uneven units (verse paragraphs) determined by sense rather than form. First devised in English by Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, in his translation of two books of Virgil’s Aeneid, this very flexible verse type became the standard form for dramatic poetry in the seventeenth century, as in most of Shakespeare’s plays. Milton and Wordsworth, among many others, also used it to create an English equivalent to classical epic.

blazon: strictly, a heraldic shield; in rhetorical usage, a topos whereby the individual elements of a beloved’s face and body are singled out for hyperbolic admiration. Spenser, Epithalamion, lines 167–84 (see vol. B, p. 459). For an inversion of the topos, see Shakespeare, Sonnet 130 (vol. B, p. 637).

burlesque (French and Italian “mocking”): a work that adopts the conventions of a genre with the aim less of comically mocking the genre than of satirically mocking the society so represented (see satire). Thus Pope’s Rape of the Lock (see vol. C, p. 537) does not mock classical epic so much as contemporary mores.

caesura (Latin “cut”) (plural “caesurae”): a term of meter. A pause or breathing space within a line of verse, generally occurring between syntactic units; Louise Bennett, “Colonization in Reverse,” lines 5–8: “By de hundred, by de tousan, / From country an from town, / By de ship-load, by de plane-load, / Jamaica is Englan boun” (see vol. F, p. 722), where the caesurae occur in lines 5 and 7.

canon (Greek “rule”): the group of texts regarded as worthy of special respect or attention by a given institution. Also, the group of texts regarded as definitely having been written by a certain author.

catastrophe (Greek “overturning”): the decisive turn in tragedy by which the plot is resolved and, usually, the protagonist dies.

catharsis (Greek “cleansing”): According to Aristotle, the effect of tragedy on its audience, through their experience of pity and terror, was a kind of spiritual cleansing, or catharsis.

character (Greek “stamp, impression”): a person, personified animal, or other figure represented in a literary work, especially in narrative and drama. The more a character seems to generate the action of a narrative, and the less he or she seems merely to serve a preordained narrative pattern, the “fuller,” or more “rounded,” a character is said to be. A “stock” character, common particularly in many comic genres, will perform a predictable function in different works of a given genre.

chiasmus (Greek “crosswise”): a figure of speech. The inversion of an already established sequence. This can involve verbal echoes: Pope, “Eloisa to Abelard,” line 104, “The crime was common, common be the pain” (see vol. C, p. 560); or it can be purely a matter of syntactic inversion: Pope, Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, line 8: “They pierce my thickets, through my grot they glide” (see vol. C, p. 575).

classical, classicism, classic: Each term can be widely applied, but in English literary discourse, “classical” primarily describes the works of either Greek or Roman antiquity. "Classicism" denotes the practice of art forms inspired by classical antiquity, in particular the observance of rhetorical norms of decorum and balance, as opposed to following the dictates of untutored inspiration, as in Romanticism. "Classic" denotes an especially famous work within a given canon.

climax (Greek "ladder"): a moment of great intensity and structural change, especially in drama. Also a figure of speech whereby a sequence of verbally linked clauses is made, in which each successive clause is of greater consequence than its predecessor. Bacon, Of Studies: "Studies serve for pastimes, for ornaments, and for abilities. Their chief use for pastimes is in privateness and retiring; for ornament, is in discourse; and for ability, is in judgement" (see vol. B, pp. 1167–68).

comedy: a genre. A term primarily applied to drama, and derived from ancient drama, in opposition to tragedy. Comedy deals with humorously confusing, sometimes ridiculous situations in which the ending is, nevertheless, happy. A comedy often ends in one or more marriages.

comic mode: Many genres (for example, romance, fabliau, comedy) involve a happy ending in which justice is done, the ravages of time are arrested, and that which is lost is found. Such genres participate in a comic mode.

connotation: To understand connotation, we need to understand denotation. While many words can denote the same concept—that is, have the same basic meaning—those words can evoke different associations, or connotations. Contrast, for example, the clinical-sounding term "depression" and the more colorful, musical, even poetic phrase "the blues."

consonance (Latin "sounding with"): a figure of speech. The repetition of final consonants in words or stressed syllables whose

vowel sounds are different. Herbert, "Easter," line 13: "Consort, both heart and lute . . ." (see vol. B, p. 1183).

convention: a repeatedly recurring feature (in either form or content) of works, occurring in combination with other recurring formal features, which constitutes a convention of a particular genre.

couplet: a verse form. In English verse two consecutive, rhyming lines usually containing the same number of stresses. Chaucer first introduced the iambic pentameter couplet into English (Canterbury Tales); the form was later used in many types of writing, including drama; imitations and translations of classical epic (thus heroic couplet); essays; and satire (see Dryden and Pope). The distich (Greek "two lines") is a couplet usually making complete sense; Aemilia Lanyer, Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum, lines 5–6: "Read it fair queen, though it defective be, / Your excellence can grace both it and me" (see vol. B, p. 925).

dactyl (Greek "finger," because of the finger's three joints): a term of rhythm. A three-syllable foot following the rhythmic pattern, in English verse, of one stressed followed by two unstressed syllables. Thus, for example, "Oregon."

decorum (Latin "that which is fitting"): a rhetorical principle whereby each formal aspect of a work should be in keeping with its subject matter and/or audience.

deixis (Greek "pointing"): relevant to point of view. Every work has, implicitly or explicitly, a "here" and a "now" from which it is narrated. Words that refer to or imply this point from which the voice of the work is projected (such as "here," "there," "this," "that," "now," "then") are examples of deixis, or "deictics." This technique is especially important in drama, where it is used to create a sense of the events happening as the spectator witnesses them.

denotation: A word has a basic, "prosaic" (factual) meaning prior to the associations it connotes (see connotation). The word

“steed,” for example, might call to mind a horse fitted with battle gear, to be ridden by a warrior, but its denotation is simply “horse.”

d enouement (French “unknotting”): the point at which a narrative can be resolved and so ended.

dialogue (Greek “conversation”): a genre. Dialogue is a feature of many genres, especially in both the novel and drama. As a genre itself, dialogue is used in philosophical traditions especially (most famously in Plato’s Dialogues), as the representation of a conversation in which a philosophical question is pursued among various speakers.

d iction, or “lexis” (from, respectively, Latin dictio and Greek lexis, each meaning “word”): the actual words used in any utterance—speech, writing, and, for our purposes here, literary works. The choice of words contributes significantly to the style of a given work.

d idactic mode (Greek “teaching mode”): Genres in a didactic mode are designed to instruct or teach, sometimes explicitly (for example, sermons, philosophical discourses, georgic), and sometimes through the medium of fiction (for example, animal fable, parable).

d iegesis (Greek for “narration”): a term that simply means “narration,” but is used in literary criticism to distinguish one kind of story from another. In a mimetic story, the events are played out before us (see mimesis), whereas in diegesis someone recounts the story to us. Drama is for the most part mimetic, whereas the novel is for the most part diegetic. In novels the narrator is not, usually, part of the action of the narrative; s/he is therefore extradiegetic.

dimeter (Greek “two measure”): a term of meter. A two-stress line, rarely used as the meter of whole poems, though used with great frequency in single poems by Skelton, for example, “The Tunning of Elinour Rumming” (see vol. B, p. 41). Otherwise used for single lines, as in Herbert, "Discipline," line 3: "O my God" (see vol. B, p. 1197).

d discourse (Latin "running to and fro"): broadly, any nonfictional speech or writing; as a more specific genre, a philosophical meditation on a set theme.

dramatic irony: a feature of narrative and drama, whereby the audience knows that the outcome of an action will be the opposite of that intended by a character.

dramatic monologue (Greek "single speaking"): a genre. A poem in which the voice of a historical or fictional character speaks, unmediated by any narrator, to an implied though silent audience. See Tennyson, "Ulysses" (vol. E, p. 217); Browning, "The Bishop Orders His Tomb" (vol. E, p. 416); Eliot, "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" (vol. F, p. 498); Carol Ann Duffy, "Medusa" and "Mrs Lazarus" (vol. F).

ecphrasis (Greek "speaking out"): a topos whereby a work of visual art is represented in a literary work. Auden, "Musée des Beaux Arts" (see vol. F, p. 677).

elegy: a genre. In classical literature elegy was a form written in elegiac couplets (a hexameter followed by a pentameter) devoted to many possible topics. In Ovidian elegy a lover meditates on the trials of erotic desire (for example, Ovid's Amores). The sonnet sequences of both Sidney and Shakespeare exploit this genre, and, while it was still practiced in classical tradition by Donne ("On His Mistress" see vol. B, [p. 903]), by the later seventeenth century the term came to denote the poetry of loss, especially through the death of a loved person. See Tennyson, In Memoriam (vol. E, p. 231); Auden, "In Memory of W. B. Yeats" (see vol. F, p. 677); Heaney, "Clearances" (vol. F, p. 970).

emblem (Greek "an insertion"): a figure of thought. A picture allegorically expressing a moral, or a verbal picture open to such

interpretation.

end-stopping: the placement of a complete syntactic unit within a complete poetic line, fulfilling the metrical pattern; Auden, "In Memory of W. B. Yeats," line 42: "Earth, receive an honoured guest" (see vol. F, p. 679). Compare enjambment.

enjambment (French "striding," encroaching): The opposite of end-stopping, enjambment occurs when the syntactic unit does not end with the end of the poetic line and the fulfillment of the metrical pattern. When the sense of the line overflows its meter and, therefore, the line break, we have enjambment; Auden, "In Memory of W. B. Yeats," lines 44–45: "Let the Irish vessel lie / Emptied of its poetry" (see vol. F, p. 679).

epic (synonym, heroic poetry): a genre. An extended narrative poem celebrating martial heroes, invoking divine inspiration, beginning in medias res (see order), written in a high style (including the deployment of epic similes; on high style, see register), and divided into long narrative sequences. Homer's Iliad and Virgil's Aeneid were the prime models for English writers of epic verse. Thus Milton, Paradise Lost (see vol. B, p. 1427); Wordsworth, The Prelude (see vol. D, p. 391); and Walcott, Omeros (see vol. F, p. 808). With its precise repertoire of stylistic resources, epic lent itself easily to parodic and burlesque forms, known as mock epic; thus Pope, The Rape of the Lock (see vol. C, p. 537).

epigram: a genre. A short, pithy poem wittily expressed, often with wounding intent. See Jonson, Epigrams (see vol. B, p. 1049).

epigraph (Greek "inscription"): a genre. Any formal statement inscribed on stone; also the brief formulation on a book's title page, or a quotation at the beginning of a poem, introducing the work's themes in the most compressed form possible.

epistle (Latin "letter"): a genre. The letter can be shaped as a literary form, involving an intimate address often between equals.

The Epistles of Horace provided a model for English writers from the sixteenth century. Thus Wyatt, "Mine Own John Poins" (see vol. B, p. 131), or Leapor, "An Epistle to a Lady" (vol. C, p. 771). Letters can be shaped to form the matter of an extended fiction, as the eighteenth-century epistolary novel (for example, Samuel Richardson's Pamela).

epitaph: a genre. A pithy formulation to be inscribed on a funeral monument. Thus Raleigh, "The Author's Epitaph, Made by Himself" (see vol. B, p. 479).

epithalamion (Greek "concerning the bridal chamber"): a genre. A wedding poem, celebrating the marriage and wishing the couple good fortune. Thus Spenser, Epithalamion (see vol. B, p. 455).

epyllion (plural "epyllia") (Greek: "little epic"): a genre. A relatively short poem in the meter of epic poetry. See, for example, Marlowe, Hero and Leander (vol. B, p. 562).

essay (French "trial, attempt"): a genre. An informal philosophical meditation, usually in prose and sometimes in verse. The journalistic periodical essay was developed in the early eighteenth century. Thus Addison and Steele, periodical essays (see vol. C, p. 281); Pope, An Essay on Criticism (see vol. C, p. 521).

euphemism (Greek "sweet saying"): a figure of thought. The figure by which something distasteful is described in alternative, less repugnant terms (for example, "he passed away").

exegesis (Greek "leading out"): interpretation, traditionally of the biblical text, but, by transference, of any text.

exemplum (Latin "example"): an example inserted into a usually nonfictional writing (for example, sermon or essay) to give extra force to an abstract thesis.

fabliau (French “little story,” plural fabliaux): a genre. A short, funny, often bawdy narrative in low style (see register) imitated and developed from French models, most subtly by Chaucer; see The Miller’s Prologue and Tale (vol. A, p. 494).

farce (French “stuffing”): a genre. A play designed to provoke laughter through the often humiliating antics of stock characters. Congreve’s The Way of the World (see vol. C, p. 221) draws on this tradition.

figures of speech: Literary language often employs patterns perceptible to the eye and/or to the ear. Such patterns are called “figures of speech”; in classical rhetoric they were called “schemes” (from Greek schema, meaning “form, figure”).

figures of thought: Language can also be patterned conceptually, even outside the rules that normally govern it. Literary language in particular exploits this licensed linguistic irregularity. Synonyms for figures of thought are “trope” (Greek “twisting,” referring to the irregularity of use) and “conceit” (Latin “concept,” referring to the fact that these figures are perceptible only to the mind). Be careful not to confuse trope with topos (a common error).

first-person narration: relevant to point of view, a narrative in which the voice narrating refers to itself with forms of the first-person pronoun (“I,” “me,” “my,” etc., or possibly “we,” “us,” “our”), and in which the narrative is determined by the limitations of that voice. Thus Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley, Frankenstein.

frame narrative: Some narratives, particularly collections of narratives, involve a frame narrative that explains the genesis of, and/or gives a perspective on, the main narrative or narratives to follow. Thus Chaucer, Canterbury Tales; Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley, Frankenstein; or Conrad, Heart of Darkness.

free indirect style: relevant to point of view, a narratorial voice that manages, without explicit reference, to imply, and often implicitly to comment on, the voice of a character in the narrative itself. Virginia Woolf, "A Sketch of the Past," where the voice, although strictly that of the adult narrator, manages to convey the child's manner of perception: "—I begin: the first memory. This was of red and purple flowers on a black background—my mother's dress."

genre and mode: The style, structure, and, often, length of a work, when coupled with a certain subject matter, raise expectations that a literary work conforms to a certain genre (French "kind"). Good writers might upset these expectations, but they remain aware of the expectations and thwart them purposefully. Works in different genres may nevertheless participate in the same mode, a broader category designating the fundamental perspectives governing various genres of writing. For mode, see tragic, comic, satiric, and didactic modes. Genres are fluid, sometimes very fluid (for example, the novel); the word "usually" should be added to almost every account of the characteristics of a given genre!

georgic (Greek "farming"): a genre. Virgil's Georgics treat agricultural and occasionally scientific subjects, giving instructions on the proper management of farms. Unlike pastoral, which treats the countryside as a place of recreational idleness among shepherds, the georgic treats it as a place of productive labor.

hermeneutics (from the Greek god Hermes, messenger between the gods and humankind): the science of interpretation, first formulated as such by the German philosophical theologian Friedrich Schleiermacher in the early nineteenth century.

heroic poetry: see epic.

hexameter (Greek "six measure"): a term of meter. The hexameter line (a six-stress line) is the meter of classical Latin epic; while not imitated in that form for epic verse in English, some instances of the hexameter exist. See, for example, the last line of a homily (Greek "discourse"): a genre. A sermon, to be preached in church; Book of Homilies (see vol. B, p. 164). Writers of literary fiction sometimes exploit the homily, or sermon, as in Chaucer, The Pardoner's Tale (see vol. A, p. 540).

Spenserian stanza, Faerie Queene 1.1.2: "O help thou my weake wit, and sharpen my dull tong" (vol. B, p. 269), or Yeats, "The Lake Isle of Innisfree," line 1: "I will arise and go now, and go to Innisfree" (vol. F, p. 221).

homophone (Greek "same sound"): a figure of speech. A word that sounds identical to another word but has a different meaning ("bear" / "bare").

hyperbaton (Greek "overstepping"): a term of syntax. The rearrangement, or inversion, of the expected word order in a sentence or clause. Gray, "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard," line 38: "If Memory o'er their tomb no trophies raise" (vol. C, p. 899). Poets can suspend the expected syntax over many lines, as in the first sentences of the Canterbury Tales (vol. A, p. 474) and of Paradise Lost (vol. B, p. 1430).

hyperbole (Greek "throwing over"): a figure of thought. Overstatement, exaggeration; Marvell, "To His Coy Mistress," lines 11–12: "My vegetable love should grow / Vaster than empires, and more slow" (see vol. B, p. 1273); Auden, "As I Walked Out One Evening," lines 9–12: "I'll love you, dear, I'll love you / Till China and Africa meet / And the river jumps over the mountain / And the salmon sing in the street" (see vol. F, p. 675).

hypermetrical (adj.; Greek "over measured"): a term of meter; the word describes a breaking of the expected metrical pattern by at least one extra syllable.

hypotaxis, or subordination (respectively Greek and Latin "ordering under"): a term of syntax. The subordination, by the use of subordinate clauses, of different elements of a sentence to a single main verb. Milton, Paradise Lost 9.513–15: “As when a ship by skillful steersman wrought / Nigh river’s mouth or foreland, where the wind / Veers oft, as oft so steers, and shifts her sail; So varied he” (vol. B, p. 1588). The contrary principle to parataxis.

iamb: a term of rhythm. The basic foot of English verse; two syllables following the rhythmic pattern of unstressed followed by stressed and producing a rising effect. Thus, for example, “Vermont.”

imitation: the practice whereby writers strive ideally to reproduce and yet renew the conventions of an older form, often derived from classical civilization. Such a practice will be praised in periods of classicism (for example, the eighteenth century) and repudiated in periods dominated by a model of inspiration (for example, Romanticism).

irony (Greek “dissimulation”): a figure of thought. In broad usage, irony designates the result of inconsistency between a statement and a context that undermines the statement. “It’s a beautiful day” is unironic if it’s a beautiful day; if, however, the weather is terrible, then the inconsistency between statement and context is ironic. The effect is often amusing; the need to be ironic is sometimes produced by censorship of one kind or another. Strictly, irony is a subset of allegory: whereas allegory says one thing and means another, irony says one thing and means its opposite. For an extended example of irony, see Swift’s “Modest Proposal” (vol. C, p. 511). See also dramatic irony.

journal (French “daily”): a genre. A diary, or daily record of ephemeral experience, whose perspectives are concentrated on, and limited by, the experiences of single days. Thus Pepys, Diary (see vol. C, p. 74).

lai: a genre. A short narrative, often characterized by images of great intensity; a French term, and a form practiced by Marie de France (see vol. A, p. 159).

legend (Latin “requiring to be read”): a genre. A narrative of a celebrated, possibly historical, but mortal protagonist. To be distinguished from myth. Thus the “Arthurian legend” but the “myth of Proserpine.”

lexical set: Words that habitually recur together (for example, January, February, March, etc.; or red, white, and blue) form a lexical set.

litotes (from Greek “smooth”): a figure of thought. Strictly, understatement by denying the contrary; More, Utopia: “differences of no slight import” (see vol. B, p. 49). More loosely, understatement; Stevie Smith, “Sunt Leones,” lines 11–12: “And if the Christians felt a little blue— / Well people being eaten often do” (see vol. F, p. 585).

lullaby: a genre. A bedtime, sleep-inducing song for children, in simple and regular meter. Adapted by Auden, “Lullaby” (see vol. F, p. 671).

lyric (from Greek “lyre”): Initially meaning a song, “lyric” refers to a short poetic form, without restriction of meter, in which the expression of personal emotion, often by a voice in the first person, is given primacy over narrative sequence. Thus “The Wife’s Lament” (see vol. A, p. 126); Yeats, “The Wild Swans at Coole” (see vol. F, p. 229).

masque: a genre. Costly entertainments of the Stuart court, involving dance, song, speech, and elaborate stage effects, in which courtiers themselves participated.

metaphor (Greek “carrying across,” etymologically parallel to Latin “translation”): One of the most significant figures of thought, metaphor designates identification or implicit identification of one thing with another with which it is not literally identifiable. Blake, “London,” lines 11–12: “And the hapless Soldier’s sigh / Runs in blood down Palace walls” (see vol. D, p. 137).

meter: Verse (from Latin versus, turned) is distinguished from prose (from Latin prorsus, "straightforward") as a more compressed form of expression, shaped by metrical norms. Meter (Greek "measure") refers to the regularly recurring sound pattern of verse lines. The means of producing sound patterns across lines differ in different poetic traditions. Verse may be quantitative, or determined by the quantities of syllables (set patterns of long and short syllables), as in Latin and Greek poetry. It may be syllabic, determined by fixed numbers of syllables in the line, as in the verse of Romance languages (for example, French and Italian). It may be accentual, determined by the number of accents, or stresses in the line, with variable numbers of syllables, as in Old English and some varieties of Middle English alliterative verse. Or it may be accentual-syllabic, determined by the numbers of accents, but possessing a regular pattern of stressed and unstressed syllables, so as to produce regular numbers of syllables per line. Since Chaucer, English verse has worked primarily within the many possibilities of accentual-syllabic meter. The unit of meter is the foot. In English verse the number of feet per line corresponds to the number of accents in a line. For the types and examples of different meters, see monometer, dimeter, trimeter, tetrameter, pentameter, and hexameter. In the definitions below, "u" designates one unstressed syllable, and "/" one stressed syllable.

metonymy (Greek "change of name"): one of the most significant figures of thought. Using a word to denote another concept or other concepts, by virtue of habitual association. Thus "The Press," designating printed news media. Fictional names often work by associations of this kind. Closely related to synecdoche.

mimesis (Greek for "imitation"): A central function of literature and drama has been to provide a plausible imitation of the reality of the world beyond the literary work; mimesis is the representation and imitation of what is taken to be reality.

mise-en-abyme (French for “cast into the abyss”): Some works of art represent themselves in themselves; if they do so effectively, the represented artifact also represents itself, and so ad infinitum. The effect achieved is called “mise-en-abyme.” Hoccleve’s Complaint, for example, represents a depressed man reading about a depressed man. This sequence threatens to become a mise-en-abyme.

monometer (Greek “one measure”): a term of meter. An entire line with just one stress; Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, line 15, “most (u) grand (/)” (see vol. A, p. 415).

myth: a genre. The narrative of protagonists with, or subject to, superhuman powers. A myth expresses some profound foundational truth, often by accounting for the origin of natural phenomena. To be distinguished from legend. Thus the “Arthurian legend” but the “myth of Proserpine.”

novel: an extremely flexible genre in both form and subject matter. Usually in prose, giving high priority to narration of events, with a certain expectation of length, novels are preponderantly rooted in a specific, and often complex, social world; sensitive to the realities of material life; and often focused on one character or a small circle of central characters. By contrast with chivalric romance (the main European narrative genre prior to the novel), novels tend to eschew the marvelous in favor of a recognizable social world and credible action. The novel’s openness allows it to participate in all modes, and to be co-opted for a huge variety of subgenres. In English literature the novel dates from the late seventeenth century and has been astonishingly successful in appealing to a huge readership, particularly in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The English and Irish tradition of the novel includes, for example, Fielding, Austen, the Brontë sisters, Dickens, George Eliot, Conrad, Woolf, Lawrence, and Joyce, to name but a few very great exponents of the genre.

novella: a genre. A short novel, often characterized by imagistic intensity. Conrad, Heart of Darkness (see vol. F, p. 70).

occupatio (Latin “taking possession”): a figure of thought. Denying that one will discuss a subject while actually discussing it; also known as “praeteritio” (Latin “passing by”). See Chaucer, Nun’s Priest’s Tale, lines 414–31 (see vol. A, p. 565).

ode (Greek “song”): a genre. A lyric poem in elevated, or high style (see register), often addressed to a natural force, a person, or an abstract quality. The Pindaric ode in English is made up of stanzas of unequal length, while the Horatian ode has stanzas of equal length. For examples of both types, see, respectively, Wordsworth, “Ode: Intimations of Immortality” (vol. D, p. 381); and Marvell, “An Horatian Ode” (vol. B, p. 1282), or Keats, “Ode on Melancholy” (vol. D, p. 973). For a fuller discussion, see the headnote to Jonson’s “Ode on Cary and Morison” (vol. B, p. 1058).

omniscient narrator (Latin “all-knowing narrator”): relevant to point of view. A narrator who, in the fiction of the narrative, has complete access to both the deeds and the thoughts of all characters in the narrative. Thus Thomas Hardy, “On the Western Circuit” (see vol. F, p. 36).

onomatopoeia (Greek “name making”): a figure of speech. Verbal sounds that imitate and evoke the sounds they denote. Hopkins, “Binsey Poplars,” lines 10–12 (about some felled trees): “O if we but knew what we do / When we delve [dig] or hew— / Hack and rack the growing green!” (see vol. E, p. 726).

order: A story may be told in different narrative orders. A narrator might use the sequence of events as they happened, and thereby follow what classical rhetoricians called the natural order; alternatively, the narrator might reorder the sequence of events, beginning the narration either in the middle or at the end of the sequence of events, thereby following an artificial order. If a narrator begins in the middle of events, he or she is said to begin in medias res (Latin "in the middle of the matter"). For a brief discussion of these concepts, see Spenser, Faerie Queene, "A Letter of the Authors" (vol. B, p. 265). Modern narratology makes a related distinction, between histoire (French "story") for the natural order that readers mentally reconstruct, and discours (French, here "narration") for the narrative as presented. See also plot and story.

ottava rima: a verse form. An eight-line stanza form, rhyming abababcc, using iambic pentameter; Yeats, "Sailing to Byzantium" (see vol. F, p. 234). Derived from the Italian poet Boccaccio, an eight-line stanza was used by fifteenth-century English poets for inset passages (for example, Christ's speech from the Cross in Lydgate's Testament, lines 754–897). The form in this rhyme scheme was used in English poetry for long narrative by, for example, Byron (Don Juan; see vol. D, p. 690).

oxymoron (Greek "sharp blunt"): a figure of thought. The conjunction of normally incompatible terms; Milton, Paradise Lost 1.63: "darkness visible" (see vol. B, p. 1431).

panegyric: a genre. Demonstrative, or epideictic (Greek "showing"), rhetoric was a branch of classical rhetoric. Its own two main branches were the rhetoric of praise on the one hand and of vituperation on the other. Panegyric, or eulogy (Greek "sweet speaking"), or encomium (plural encomia), is the term used to describe the speeches or writings of praise.

parable: a genre. A simple story designed to provoke, and often accompanied by, allegorical interpretation, most famously by Christ as reported in the Gospels.

paradox (Greek "contrary to received opinion"): a figure of thought. An apparent contradiction that requires thought to reveal an inner consistency. Chaucer, "Troilus's Song," line 12: "O sweete harm so quainte" (see vol. A, p. 574).

parataxis, or coordination (respectively Greek and Latin “ordering beside”): a term of syntax. The coordination, by the use of coordinating conjunctions, of different main clauses in a single sentence. Malory, Morte Darthur: “So Sir Lancelot departed and took his sword under his arm, and so he walked in his mantel, that noble knight, and put himself in great jeopardy” (see vol. A, p. 607). The opposite principle to hypotaxis.

parody: a work that uses the conventions of a particular genre with the aim of comically mocking a topos, a genre, or a particular exponent of a genre. Shakespeare parodies the topos of blazon in Sonnet 130 (see vol. B, p. 637).

pastoral (from Latin pastor, “shepherd”): a genre. Pastoral is set among shepherds, making often refined allusion to other apparently unconnected subjects (sometimes politics) from the potentially idyllic world of highly literary if illiterate shepherds. Pastoral is distinguished from georgic by representing recreational rural idleness, whereas the georgic offers instruction on how to manage rural labor. English writers had classical models in the Idylls of Theocritus in Greek and Virgil’s Eclogues in Latin. Pastoral is also called bucolic (from the Greek word for “herdsman”). Thus Spenser, Shepheardes Calender (see vol. B, p. 257).

pathetic fallacy: the attribution of sentiment to natural phenomena, as if they were in sympathy with human feelings. Thus Milton, Lycidas, lines 146–47: “With cowslips wan that hang the pensive head, / And every flower that sad embroidery wears” (see vol. B, p. 1406). For critique of the practice, see Ruskin (who coined the term), “Of the Pathetic Fallacy” (vol. E, p. 467).

pentameter (Greek “five measure”): a term of meter. In English verse, a five-stress line. Between the late fourteenth and the nineteenth centuries, this meter, frequently employing an iambic rhythm, was the basic line of English verse. Chaucer, Shakespeare, Milton, and Wordsworth each, for example, deployed this very flexible line as their primary resource; Milton, Paradise Lost 1.128: "O Prince, O Chief of many thronèd Powers" (see vol. B, p. 1433).

performative: Verbal expressions have many different functions. They can, for example, be descriptive, or constative (if they make an argument), or performative, for example. A performative utterance is one that makes something happen in the world by virtue of its utterance. "I hereby sentence you to ten years in prison," if uttered in the appropriate circumstances, itself performs an action; it makes something happen in the world. By virtue of its performing an action, it is called a "performative." See also speech act.

peripeteia (Greek "turning about"): the sudden reversal of fortune (in both directions) in a dramatic work.

periphrasis (Greek "declaring around"): a figure of thought. Circumlocution; the use of many words to express what could be expressed in few or one; Sidney, Astrophil and Stella 39.1–4.

persona (Latin "sound through"): originally the mask worn in the Roman theater to magnify an actor's voice; in literary discourse persona (plural personae) refers to the narrator or speaker of a text, whose voice is coherent and whose person need have no relation to the person of the actual author of a text. Eliot, "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" (see vol. F, p. 498).

personification, or prosopopoeia (Greek "person making"): a figure of thought. The attribution of human qualities to nonhuman forces or objects; Keats, "Ode on a Grecian Urn," lines 1–2: "Thou still unvanish'd bride of quietness, / Thou foster-child of silence and slow time" (see vol. D, p. 971).

plot: the sequence of events in a story as narrated, as distinct from story, which refers to the sequence of events as we reconstruct them from the plot. See also order.

point of view: All of the many kinds of writing involve a point of view from which a text is, or seems to be, generated. The presence of such a point of view may be powerful and explicit, as in many novels, or deliberately invisible, as in much drama. In some genres, such as the novel, the narrator does not necessarily tell the story from a position we can predict; that is, the needs of a particular story, not the conventions of the genre, determine the narrator's position. In other genres, the narrator's position is fixed by convention; in certain kinds of love poetry, for example, the narrating voice is always that of a suffering lover. Not only does the point of view significantly inform the style of a work, but it also informs the structure of that work.

protagonist (Greek "first actor"): the hero or heroine of a drama or narrative.

pun: a figure of thought. A sometimes irresolvable doubleness of meaning in a single word or expression; Shakespeare, Sonnet 135, line 1: "Whoever hath her wish, thou hast thy Will" (see vol. B, p. 637).

quatrain: a verse form. A stanza of four lines, usually rhyming abcb, abab, or abba. Of many possible examples, see Crashaw, "On the Wounds of Our Crucified Lord" (see vol. B, p. 1214).

refrain: usually a single line repeated as the last line of consecutive stanzas, sometimes with subtly different wording and ideally with subtly different meaning as the poem progresses.

register: The register of a word is its stylistic level, which can be distinguished by degree of technicality but also by degree of formality. We choose our words from different registers according to context, that is, audience and/or environment. Thus a chemist in a laboratory will say "sodium chloride," a cook in a kitchen "salt." A formal register designates the kind of language used in polite society (for example, "Mr. President"), while an informal or colloquial register is used in less formal or more relaxed social situations (for example, “the boss”). In classical and medieval rhetoric, these registers of formality were called high style and low style. A middle style was defined as the style fit for narrative, not drawing attention to itself.

rhetoric: the art of verbal persuasion. Classical rhetoricians distinguished three areas of rhetoric: the forensic, to be used in law courts; the deliberative, to be used in political or philosophical deliberations; and the demonstrative, or epideictic, to be used for the purposes of public praise or blame. Rhetorical manuals covered all the skills required of a speaker, from the management of style and structure to delivery. These manuals powerfully influenced the theory of poetics as a separate branch of verbal practice, particularly in the matter of style.

rhyme: a figure of speech. The repetition of identical vowel sounds in stressed syllables whose initial consonants differ (“dead” / “head”). In poetry, rhyme often links the end of one line with another. Masculine rhyme: full rhyme on the final syllable of the line (“decays” / “days”). Feminine rhyme: full rhyme on syllables that are followed by unaccented syllables (“fountains” / “mountains”). Internal rhyme: full rhyme within a single line; Coleridge, The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, line 7: “The guests are met, the feast is set” (see vol. D, p. 475). Rhyme riche: rhyming on homophones; Chaucer, General Prologue, lines 17–18: “seeke” / “seke.” Off rhyme (also known as half rhyme, near rhyme, or slant rhyme): differs from perfect rhyme in changing the vowel sound and/or the concluding consonants expected of perfect rhyme; Byron, “They say that Hope is Happiness,” lines 5–7: “most” / “lost.” Pararhyme: stressed vowel sounds differ but are flanked by identical or similar consonants; Owen, “Miners,” lines 9–11: “simmer” / “summer” (see vol. F, p. 169).

rhyme royal: a verse form. A stanza of seven iambic pentameter lines, rhyming ababbcc; first introduced by Chaucer and called “royal” because the form was used by James I of Scotland for his Kingis Quair in the early fifteenth century. Chaucer, “Troilus’s Song” (see vol. A, p. 574).

rhythm: Rhythm is not absolutely distinguishable from meter. One way of making a clear distinction between these terms is to say that rhythm (from the Greek “to flow”) denotes the patterns of sound within the feet of verse lines and the combination of those feet. Very often a particular meter will raise expectations that a given rhythm will be used regularly through a whole line or a whole poem. Thus in English verse the pentameter regularly uses an iambic rhythm. Rhythm, however, is much more fluid than meter, and many lines within the same poem using a single meter will frequently exploit different rhythmic possibilities. For examples of different rhythms, see iamb, trochee, anapest, spondee, and dactyl.

romance: a genre. From the twelfth to the sixteenth century, the main form of European narrative, in either verse or prose, was that of chivalric romance. Romance, like the later novel, is a very fluid genre, but romances are often characterized by (i) a tripartite structure of social integration, followed by disintegration, involving moral tests and often marvelous events, itself the prelude to reintegration in a happy ending, frequently of marriage; and (ii) aristocratic social milieux. Thus Sir Gawain and the Green Knight (see vol. A, p. 415); Spenser’s (unfinished) Faerie Queene (vol. B, p. 263). The immensely popular, fertile genre was absorbed, in both domesticated and undomesticated form, by the novel. For an adaptation of romance, see Chaucer, Wife of Bath’s Tale (vol. A, p. 512).

sarcasm (Greek “flesh tearing”): a figure of thought. A wounding expression, often expressed ironically; Boswell, Life of Johnson: Johnson [asked if any man of the modern age could have written the epic poem Fingal] replied, “Yes, Sir, many men, many women, and many children” (see vol. C, p. 891).

satire (Latin for “a bowl of mixed fruits”): a genre. In Roman literature (for example, Juvenal), the communication, in the form of a letter between equals, complaining of the ills of contemporary society. The genre in this form is characterized by a first-person narrator exasperated by social ills; the letter form; a high frequency of contemporary reference; and the use of invective in low-style language. Pope practices the genre thus in the Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot (see vol. C, p. 573). Wyatt’s “Mine Own John Pains” (see vol. B, p. 131) draws ultimately on a gentler, Horatian model of the genre.

satiric mode: Works in a very large variety of genres are devoted to the more or less savage attack on social ills. Thus Swift’s travel narrative Gulliver’s Travels (see vol. C, p. 377), his essay “A Modest Proposal” (vol. C, p. 511), and Gay’s Beggar’s Opera (vol. C, p. 587), to look no further than the eighteenth century, are all within a satiric mode.

scene: a subdivision of an act, itself a subdivision of a dramatic performance and/or text. The action of a scene usually occurs in one place.

sensibility (from Latin, “capable of being perceived by the senses”): as a literary term, an eighteenth-century concept derived from moral philosophy that stressed the social importance of fellow feeling and particularly of sympathy in social relations. The concept generated a literature of “sensibility,” such as the sentimental novel (the most famous of which was Goethe’s Sorrows of the Young Werther [1774]), or sentimental poetry, such as Cowper’s passage on the stricken deer in The Task (see vol. C, p. 1076).

short story: a genre. Generically similar to, though shorter and more concentrated than, the novel; often published as part of a collection. Thus Mansfield, “The Daughters of the Late Colonel” (see vol. F, p. 542).

simile (Latin “like”): a figure of thought. Comparison, usually using the word “like” or “as,” of one thing with another so as to produce sometimes surprising analogies. Donne, “The Storm,” lines 29–30: “Sooner than you read this line did the gale, / Like shot, not feared till felt, our sails assail.” Frequently used, in extended form, in epic poetry; Milton, Paradise Lost 1.338–46 (see vol. B, p. 1438).

soliloquy (Latin “single speaking”): a topos of drama, in which a character, alone or thinking to be alone on stage, speaks so as to give the audience access to his or her private thoughts.

sonnet: a verse form. A form combining a variable number of units of rhymed lines to produce a fourteen-line poem, usually in rhyming iambic pentameter lines. In English there are two principal varieties: the Petrarchan sonnet, formed by an octave (an eight-line stanza, often broken into two quatrains having the same rhyme scheme, typically abba abba) and a sestet (a six-line stanza, typically cdecde or cdcdcd); and the Shakespearean sonnet, formed by three quatrains (abab cdcd efef) and a couplet (gg). The declaration of a sonnet can take a sharp turn, or “volta,” often at the decisive formal shift from octave to sestet in the Petrarchan sonnet, or in the final couplet of a Shakespearean sonnet, introducing a trenchant counterstatement. Derived from Italian poetry, and especially from the poetry of Petrarch, the sonnet was first introduced to English poetry by Wyatt, and initially used principally for the expression of unrequited erotic love, though later poets used the form for many other purposes. See Wyatt, “Whoso List to Hunt” (vol. B, p. 123); Sidney, Astrophil and Stella (vol. B, p. 541); Shakespeare, Sonnets (vol. B, p. 624); Wordsworth, “London, 1802” (vol. D, p. 390); McKay, “If We Must Die” (vol. F, p. 576); Heaney, “Clearances” (vol. F, p. 970).

speech act: Words and deeds are often distinguished, but words are often (perhaps always) themselves deeds. Utterances can perform different speech acts, such as promising, declaring, casting a spell, encouraging, persuading, denying, lying, and so on. See also performative.

Spenserian stanza: a verse form. The stanza developed by Spenser for The Faerie Queene; nine iambic lines, the first eight of which are pentameters, followed by one hexameter, rhyming ababbcbcc. See also, for example, Shelley, Adonais (vol. D, p. 851), and Keats, The Eve of St. Agnes (vol. D, p. 953).

spondee: a term of meter. A two-syllable foot following the rhythmic pattern, in English verse, of two stressed syllables. Thus, for example, "Utah."

stanza (Italian "room"): groupings of two or more lines, though "stanza" is usually reserved for groupings of at least four lines. Stanzas are often joined by rhyme, often in sequence, where each group shares the same metrical pattern and, when rhymed, rhyme scheme. Stanzas can themselves be arranged into larger groupings. Poets often invent new verse forms, or they may work within established forms.

story: a narrative's sequence of events, which we reconstruct from those events as they have been recounted by the narrator (i.e., the plot). See also order.

stream of consciousness: usually a first-person narrative that seems to give the reader access to the narrator's mind as it perceives or reflects on events, prior to organizing those perceptions into a coherent narrative. Thus (though generated from a third-person narrative) Joyce, Ulysses, "Penelope" (see vol. F, p. 452).

style (from Latin for "writing instrument"): In literary works the manner in which something is expressed contributes substantially to its meaning. The expressions "sun," "mass of helium at the center of the solar system," "heaven's golden orb" all designate "sun," but do so in different manners, or styles, which produce different meanings. The manner of a literary work is its "style," the effect of which is its “tone.” We often can intuit the tone of a text; from that intuition of tone we can analyze the stylistic resources by which it was produced. We can analyze the style of literary works through consideration of different elements of style; for example, diction, figures of thought, figures of speech, meter and rhythm, verse form, syntax, point of view.

sublime: As a concept generating a literary movement, the sublime refers to the realm of experience beyond the measurable, and so beyond the rational, produced especially by the terrors and grandeur of natural phenomena. Derived especially from the first-century Greek treatise On the Sublime, sometimes attributed to Longinus, the notion of the sublime was in the later eighteenth century a spur to Romanticism.

syllable: the smallest unit of sound in a pronounced word. The syllable that receives the greatest stress is called the tonic syllable.

symbol (Greek “token”): a figure of thought. Something that stands for something else, and yet seems necessarily to evoke that other thing. In Neoplatonic, and therefore Romantic, theory, to be distinguished from allegory thus: whereas allegory involves connections between vehicle and tenor agreed by convention or made explicit, the meanings of a symbol are supposedly inherent to it.

synecdoche (Greek “to take with something else”): a figure of thought. Using a part to express the whole, or vice versa; for example, “all hands on deck.” Closely related to metonymy.

syntax (Greek “ordering with”): Syntax designates the rules by which sentences are constructed in a given language. Discussion of meter is impossible without some reference to syntax, since the overall effect of a poem is, in part, always the product of a subtle balance of meter and sentence construction. Syntax is also essential to the understanding of prose style, since prose writers, deprived of the full shaping possibilities of meter, rely all the more heavily on syntactic resources. A working command of syntactical practice requires an understanding of the parts of speech (nouns, verbs, adjectives, adverbs, conjunctions, pronouns, prepositions, and interjections), since writers exploit syntactic possibilities by using particular combinations and concentrations of the parts of speech.

taste (from Italian “touch”): Although medieval monastic traditions used eating and tasting as a metaphor for reading, the concept of taste as a personal ideal to be cultivated by, and applied to, the appreciation and judgment of works of art in general was developed in the eighteenth century.

tercet: a verse form. A stanza or group of three lines, used in larger forms such as terza rima, the Petrarchan sonnet, and the villanelle.

terza rima: a verse form. A sequence of rhymed tercets linked by rhyme thus: aba bcb cdc, etc. first used extensively by Dante in The Divine Comedy, the form was adapted in English iambic pentameters by Wyatt and revived in the nineteenth century. See Wyatt, “Mine Own John Poins” (vol. B, p. 131); Shelley, “Ode to the West Wind” (vol. D, p. 802); and Morris, “The Defence of Guinevere” (vol. E, p. 657). For modern adaptations see Eliot, lines 78–149 (though unrhymed) of “Little Gidding” (vol. F, pp. 523–25); Heaney, “Station Island” (vol. F, p. 968); Walcott, Omeros (vol. F, p. 806).

tetrameter (Greek “four measure”): a term of meter. A line with four stresses. Coleridge, Christabel, line 31: “She stole along, she nothing spoke” (see vol. D, p. 495).

theme (Greek “proposition”): In literary criticism the term designates what the work is about; the theme is the concept that unifies a given work of literature.

third-person narration: relevant to point of view. A narration in which the narrator recounts a narrative of characters referred to explicitly or implicitly by third-person pronouns ("he," "she," etc.), without the limitation of a first-person narration. Thus Johnson, The History of Rasselas.

topographical poem (Greek "place writing"): a genre. A poem devoted to the meditative description of particular places.

topos (Greek "place," plural topoi): a commonplace in the content of a given kind of literature. Originally, in classical rhetoric, the topoi were tried-and-tested stimuli to literary invention: lists of standard headings under which a subject might be investigated. In medieval narrative poems, for example, it was commonplace to begin with a description of spring. Writers did, of course, render the commonplace uncommon, as in Chaucer's spring scene at the opening of The Canterbury Tales (see vol. A, p. 474).

tradition (from Latin "passing on"): A literary tradition is whatever is passed on or revived from the past in a single literary culture, or drawn from others to enrich a writer's culture. "Tradition" is fluid in reference, ranging from small to large referents: thus it may refer to a relatively small aspect of texts (for example, the tradition of iambic pentameter), or it may, at the other extreme, refer to the body of texts that constitute a canon.

tragedy: a genre. A dramatic representation of the fall of kings or nobles, beginning in happiness and ending in catastrophe. Later transferred to other social milieux. The opposite of comedy; thus Shakespeare, Othello (see vol. B, p. 640).

tragic mode: Many genres (epic poetry, legendary chronicles, tragedy, the novel) either do or can participate in a tragic mode, by representing the fall of noble protagonists and the irreparable ravages of human society and history.

tragicomedy: a genre. A play in which potentially tragic events turn out to have a happy, or comic, ending. Thus Shakespeare, Measure for Measure.

translation (Latin “carrying across”): the rendering of a text written in one language into another.

trimeter (Greek “three measure”): a term of meter. A line with three stresses. Herbert, “Discipline,” line 1: “Throw away thy rod” (see vol. B, p. 1197).

triplet: a verse form. A tercet rhyming on the same sound. Pope inserts triplets among heroic couplets to emphasize a particular thought; see Essay on Criticism, 315–17 (vol. C, p. 521).

trochee: a term of rhythm. A two-syllable foot following the pattern, in English verse, of stressed followed by unstressed syllable, producing a falling effect. Thus, for example, “Texas.”

type (Greek “impression, figure”): a figure of thought. In Christian allegorical interpretation of the Old Testament, pre-Christian figures were regarded as “types,” or foreshadowings, of Christ or the Christian dispensation. Typology has been the source of much visual and literary art in which the parallelisms between old and new are extended to nonbiblical figures; thus the virtuous plowman in Piers Plowman becomes a type of Christ.

unities: According to a theory supposedly derived from Aristotle’s Poetics, the events represented in a play should have unity of time, place, and action: that the play take up no more time than the time of the play, or at most a day; that the space of action should be within a single city; and that there should be no subplot. See Johnson, The Preface to Shakespeare (vol. C, p. 876).

vernacular (from Latin verna, “servant”): the language of the people, as distinguished from learned and arcane languages. From the later Middle Ages especially, the “vernacular” languages and literatures of Europe distinguished themselves from the learned languages and literatures of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew.

verse form: The terms related to meter and rhythm describe the shape of individual lines. Lines of verse are combined to produce larger groupings, called verse forms. These larger groupings are in the first instance stanzas. The combination of a certain meter and stanza shape constitutes the verse form, of which there are many standard kinds.

villanelle: a verse form. A fixed form of usually five tercets and a quatrain employing only two rhyme sounds altogether, rhyming aba for the tercets and abaa for the quatrain, with a complex pattern of two refrains. Derived from a French fixed form. Thomas, "Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night" (see vol. F, p. 693).

wit: Originally a synonym for "reason" in Old and Middle English, "wit" became a literary ideal in the Renaissance as brilliant play of the full range of mental resources. For eighteenth-century writers, the notion necessarily involved pleasing expression, as in Pope's definition of true wit as "Nature to advantage dressed, / What oft was thought, but ne'er so well expressed" (Essay on Criticism, lines 297–98; see vol. C, p. 527). Romantic theory of the imagination deprived wit of its full range of apprehension, whence the word came to be restricted to its modern sense, as the clever play of mind that produces laughter.

zeugma (Greek "a yoking"): a figure of thought. A figure whereby one word applies to two or more words in a sentence, and in which the applications are surprising, either because one is unusual, or because the applications are made in very different ways; Pope, Rape of the Lock 3.7–8, in which the word "take" is used in two senses: "Here thou, great Anna! whom three realms obey, / Dost sometimes counsel take—and sometimes tea" (see vol. C, p. 546). section#b-publishing-history-censorship.doc-section

B: Publishing History, Censorship

By the time we read texts in published books, they have already been treated—that is, changed by authors, editors, and printers—in many ways. Although there are differences across history, in each period literary works are subject to pressures of many kinds, which apply before, while, and after an author writes. The pressures might be financial, as in the relations of author and patron; commercial, as in the marketing of books; and legal, as in, during some periods, the negotiation through official and unofficial censorship. In addition, texts in all periods undergo technological processes, as they move from the material forms in which an author produced them to the forms in which they are presented to readers. Some of the terms below designate important material forms in which books were produced, disseminated, and surveyed across the historical span of this anthology. Others designate the skills developed to understand these processes. The anthology's introductions to individual periods discuss the particular forms these phenomena took in different eras.

bookseller: In England, and particularly in London, commercial bookmaking and -selling enterprises came into being in the early fourteenth century. These were loose organizations of artisans who usually lived in the same neighborhoods (around St. Paul's Cathedral in London). A bookseller or dealer would coordinate the production of hand-copied books for wealthy patrons (see patronage), who would order books to be custom-made. After the introduction of printing in the late fifteenth century, authors generally sold the rights to their work to booksellers, without any further royalties. Booksellers, who often had their own shops, belonged to the Stationers' Company. This system lasted into the eighteenth century. In 1710, however, authors were for the first time granted copyright, which tipped the commercial balance in their favor, against booksellers.

censorship: The term applies to any mechanism for restricting what can be published. Historically, the reasons for imposing censorship are heresy, sedition, blasphemy, libel, or obscenity. External censorship is imposed by institutions having legislative sanctions at their disposal. Thus the pre-Reformation Church imposed the Constitutions of Archbishop Arundel of 1409, aimed at repressing the Lollard “heresy.” After the Reformation, some key events in the history of censorship are as follows: 1547, when anti-Lollard legislation and legislation made by Henry VIII concerning treason by writing (1534) were abolished; the Licensing Order of 1643, which legislated that works be licensed, through the Stationers’ Company, prior to publication; and 1695, when the last such Act stipulating prepublication licensing lapsed. Postpublication censorship continued in different periods for different reasons. Thus, for example, British publication of D. H. Lawrence’s Lady Chatterley’s Lover (1928) was obstructed (though unsuccessfully) in 1960, under the Obscene Publications Act of 1959. Censorship can also be international: although not published in Iran, Salman Rushdie’s Satanic Verses (1988) was censored in that country, where the leader, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, proclaimed a fatwa (religious decree) promising the author’s execution. Very often censorship is not imposed externally, however: authors or publishers can censor work in anticipation of what will incur the wrath of readers or the penalties of the law. Victorian and Edwardian publishers of novels, for example, urged authors to remove potentially offensive material, especially for serial publication in popular magazines.

codex: the physical format of most modern books and medieval manuscripts, consisting of a series of separate leaves gathered into quires and bound together, often with a cover. In late antiquity, the codex largely replaced the scroll, the standard form of written documents in Roman culture.

copy text: the particular text of a work used by a textual editor as the basis of an edition of that work.

copyright: the legal protection afforded to authors for control of their work’s publication, in an attempt to ensure due financial reward. Some key dates in the history of copyright in the United Kingdom are as follows: 1710, when a statute gave authors the exclusive right to publish their work for fourteen years, and fourteen years more if the author were still alive when the first term had expired; 1842, when the period of authorial control was extended to forty-two years; and 1911, when the term was extended yet further, to fifty years after the author's death. In 1995 the period of protection was harmonized with the laws in other European countries to be the life of the author plus seventy years. In the United States no works first published before 1923 are in copyright. Works published since 1978 are, as in the United Kingdom, protected for the life of the author plus seventy years.

folio: the leaf formed by both sides of a single page. Each folio has two sides: a recto (the front side of the leaf, on the right side of a double-page spread in an open codex), and a verso (the back side of the leaf, on the left side of a double-page spread). Modern book pagination follows the pattern 1, 2, 3, 4, while medieval manuscript pagination follows the pattern 1r, 1v, 2r, 2v. "Folio" can also designate the size of a printed book. Books come in different shapes, depending originally on the number of times a standard sheet of paper is folded. One fold produces a large volume, a folio book; two folds produce a quarto, four an octavo, and six a very small duodecimo. Generally speaking, the larger the book, the grander and more expensive. Shakespeare's plays were, for example, first printed in quartos, but were gathered into a folio edition in 1623.

foul papers: versions of a work before an author has produced, if she or he has, a final copy (a "fair copy") with all corrections removed.

incunabulum (plural "incunabula"): any printed book produced in Europe before 1501. Famous incunabula include the Gutenberg Bible, printed in 1455.

manuscript (Latin, "written by hand"): Any text written physically by hand is a manuscript. Before the introduction of printing with moveable type in 1476, all texts in England were produced and reproduced by hand, in manuscript. This is an extremely labor-intensive task, using expensive materials (for example, vellum, or parchment); the cost of books produced thereby was, accordingly, very high. Even after the introduction of printing, many texts continued to be produced in manuscript. This is obviously true of letters, for example, but until the eighteenth century, poetry written within aristocratic circles was often transmitted in manuscript copies.

paleography (Greek "ancient writing"): the art of deciphering, describing, and dating forms of handwriting.

parchment: animal skin, used as the material for handwritten books before the introduction of paper. See also vellum.

patronage, patron (Latin "protector"): Many technological, legal, and commercial supports were necessary before professional authorship became possible. Although some playwrights (for example, Shakespeare) made a living by writing for the theater, other authors needed, principally, the large-scale reproductive capacities of printing and the security of copyright to make a living from writing. Before these conditions obtained, many authors had another main occupation, and most authors had to rely on patronage. In different periods, institutions or individuals offered material support, or patronage, to authors. Thus in Anglo-Saxon England, monasteries afforded the conditions of writing to monastic authors. Between the twelfth and the seventeenth centuries, the main source of patronage was the royal court. Authors offered patrons prestige and ideological support in return for financial support. Even as the conditions of professional authorship came into being at the beginning of the eighteenth century, older forms of direct patronage were not altogether displaced until the middle of the century.

p eriodical: Whereas journalism, strictly, applies to daily writing (from French jour, "day"), periodical writing appears at larger, but still frequent, intervals, characteristically in the form of the essay. Periodicals were developed especially in the eighteenth century.

p rinting: Printing, or the mechanical reproduction of books using moveable type, was invented in Germany in the mid-fifteenth century by Johannes Gutenberg; it quickly spread throughout Europe. William Caxton brought printing into England from the Low Countries in 1476. Much greater powers of reproduction at much lower prices transformed every aspect of literary culture.

p ublisher: the person or company responsible for the commissioning and publicizing of printed matter. In the early period of printing, publisher, printer, and bookseller were often the same person. This trend continued in the ascendancy of the Stationers' Company, between the middle of the sixteenth and the end of the seventeenth centuries. Toward the end of the seventeenth century, these three functions began to separate, leading to their modern distinctions.

quire: When medieval manuscripts were assembled, a few loose sheets of parchment or paper would first be folded together and sewn along the fold. This formed a quire (also known as a "gathering" or "signature"). Folded in this way, four large sheets of parchment would produce eight smaller manuscript leaves. Multiple quires could then be bound together to form a codex.

royalties: an agreed-upon proportion of the price of each copy of a work sold, paid by the publisher to the author, or an agreed-upon fee paid to the playwright for each performance of a play.

scribe: In manuscript culture, the scribe is the copyist who reproduces a text by hand.

s criptorium (plural "scriptoria"): a place for producing written documents and manuscripts.

serial publication: generally referring to the practice, especially common in the nineteenth century, of publishing novels a few chapters at a time, in periodicals.

Stationers' Company: The Stationers' Company was an English guild incorporating various tradesmen, including printers, publishers, and booksellers, skilled in the production and selling of books. It was formed in 1403, received its royal charter in 1557, and served as a means both of producing and of regulating books. Authors would sell the manuscripts of their books to individual stationers, who incurred the risks and took the profits of producing and selling the books. The stationers entered their rights over given books in the Stationers' Register. They also regulated the book trade and held their monopoly by licensing books and by being empowered to seize unauthorized books and imprison resisters. This system of licensing broke down in the social unrest of the Civil War and Interregnum (1640–60), and it ended in 1695. Even after the end of licensing, the Stationers' Company continued to be an intrinsic part of the copyright process, since the 1710 copyright statute directed that copyright had to be registered at Stationers' Hall.

subscription: An eighteenth-century system of bookselling somewhere between direct patronage and impersonal sales. A subscriber paid half the cost of a book before publication and half on delivery. The author received these payments directly. The subscriber's name appeared in the prefatory pages.

textual criticism: Works in all periods often exist in many subtly or not so subtly different forms. This is especially true with regard to manuscript textual reproduction, but it also applies to printed texts. Textual criticism is the art, developed from the fifteenth century in Italy but raised to new levels of sophistication from the eighteenth century, of deciphering different historical states of texts. This art involves the analysis of textual variants, often with the aim of distinguishing authorial from scribal forms.

variants: differences that appear among different manuscripts or printed editions of the same text.

vellum: animal skin, used as the material for handwritten books before the introduction of paper. See also parchment.

watermark: the trademark of a paper manufacturer, impressed into the paper but largely invisible unless held up to light.

Endnotes

- Note *: This appendix was devised and compiled by James Simpson with the collaboration of all the editors. We especially thank Professor Lara Bovilsky of the University of Oregon at Eugene for her help. Return to reference *

Geographic Nomenclature

The British Isles refers to the prominent group of islands off the northwest coast of Europe, especially to the two largest, Great Britain and Ireland. At present these comprise two sovereign states: the Republic of Ireland, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland—known for short as the United Kingdom or the U.K. Most of the smaller islands are part of the U.K. but a few, like the Isle of Man and the tiny Channel Islands, are largely independent. The U.K. is often loosely referred to as “Britain” or “Great Britain” and is sometimes called simply, if inaccurately, “England.” For obvious reasons, the latter usage is rarely heard among the inhabitants of the other countries of the U.K.—Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland (sometimes called Ulster). England is by far the most populous part of the kingdom, as well as the seat of its capital, London.

From the first to the fifth century C.E. most of what is now England and Wales was a province of the Roman Empire called Britain (in Latin, Britannia). After the fall of Rome, much of the island was invaded and settled by peoples from northern Germany and Denmark speaking what we now call Old English. These peoples are known as the Angles and the Saxons (the word England is related to Angles). By the time of the Norman Conquest (1066) most of the kingdoms founded by the Angles, the Saxons, and the subsequent Viking invaders had coalesced into the kingdom of England, which, in the latter Middle Ages, conquered and largely absorbed the neighboring Celtic kingdom of Wales. In 1603 James VI of Scotland inherited the island’s other throne as James I of England, and for the next hundred years—except for the two decades of Puritan rule—Scotland (both its English-speaking Lowlands and its Gaelic-speaking Highlands) and England (with Wales) were two kingdoms under a single king. In 1707 the Act of Union brought them together as the United Kingdom of Great Britain. Ireland, where English rule had begun in the twelfth century and been tightened in the sixteenth, was incorporated by the 1800–1801 Act of Union into the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. With the division of Ireland and the establishment of the Irish Free State after World War I, this name was modified to its present form, and in 1949 the Irish Free State became the Republic of Ireland, or Éire. In 1999 Scotland elected a separate parliament it had relinquished in 1707, and Wales elected an assembly it lost in 1409; neither Scotland nor Wales ceased to be part of the United Kingdom.

The British Isles are further divided into counties, which in Great Britain are also known as shires. This word, with its vowel shortened in pronunciation, forms the suffix in the names of many counties, such as Yorkshire, Wiltshire, Somersetshire.

The Latin names Britannia (Britain), Caledonia (Scotland), and Hibernia (Ireland) are sometimes used in poetic diction; so too is Britain's ancient Celtic name, Albion. Because of its accidental resemblance to albus (Latin for “white”), Albion is especially associated with the chalk cliffs that seem to gird much of the English coast like defensive walls.

The British Empire took its name from the British Isles because it was created not only by the English but also by the Irish, Scots, and Welsh, as well as by civilians and servicemen from other constituent countries of the empire. Some of the empire's overseas colonies, or crown colonies, were populated largely by settlers of European origin and their descendants. These predominantly White settler colonies, such as Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, were allowed significant self-government in the nineteenth century and recognized as dominions in the early twentieth century. The White dominions became members of the Commonwealth of Nations, also called the Commonwealth, the British Commonwealth, and “the Old Commonwealth” at different times, an association of sovereign states under the symbolic leadership of the British monarch.

Other overseas colonies of the empire had mostly Indigenous populations (or, in the Caribbean, the descendants of enslaved people, indentured servants, and others). These colonies were granted political independence after World War II, later than the dominions, and have often been referred to since as postcolonial nations. In South and Southeast Asia, India and Pakistan gained independence in 1947, followed by other countries including Sri Lanka (formerly Ceylon), Burma (now Myanmar), Malaya (now Malaysia), and Singapore. In West and East Africa, the Gold Coast was decolonized as Ghana in 1957, Nigeria in 1960, Sierra Leone in 1961, Uganda in 1962, Kenya in 1963, and so forth, while in southern Africa, the White minority government of South Africa was already independent in 1931, though majority rule did not come until 1994. In the Caribbean, Jamaica and Trinidad and Tobago became independent in 1962, followed by Barbados in 1966, and other islands of the British West Indies in the 1970s and '80s. Other regions from which nations emerged out of British colonial rule included Central America (British Honduras, now Belize), South America (British Guiana, now Guyana), the Pacific islands (Fiji), and Europe (Cyprus, Malta). After decolonization, many of these nations chose to remain within a newly conceived Commonwealth and are sometimes referred to as "New Commonwealth" countries. Some nations, such as Ireland, Pakistan, and South Africa, withdrew from the Commonwealth, though South Africa and Paki stan eventually rejoined, and others, such as Burma (now Myanmar), gained independence outside the Commonwealth. Britain's last major overseas colony, Hong Kong, was returned to Chinese sovereignty in 1997, but while Britain retains only a handful of dependent territories, such as Bermuda and Montserrat, the scope of the Commonwealth remains vast, with approximately 30 percent of the world's population.

British Money

One of the most dramatic changes to the system of British money came in 1971. In the system previously in place, the pound consisted of 20 shillings, each containing 12 pence, making 240 pence to the pound. Since 1971, British money has been calculated on the decimal system, with 100 pence to the pound. Britons' experience of paper money did not change very drastically: as before, 5- and 10-pound notes constitute the majority of bills passing through their hands (in addition, 20- and 50-pound notes have been added). But the shift necessitated a whole new way of thinking about and exchanging coins and marked the demise of the shilling, one of the fundamental units of British monetary history. Many other coins, still frequently encountered in literature, had already passed. These include the groat, worth 4 pence (the word "groat" is often used to signify a trifling sum); the angel (which depicted the archangel Michael triumphing over a dragon), valued at 10 shillings; the mark, worth in its day two-thirds of a pound or 13 shillings 4 pence; and the sovereign, a gold coin initially worth 22 shillings 6 pence, later valued at 1 pound, last circulated in 1932. One prominent older coin, the guinea, was worth a pound and a shilling; though it has not been minted since 1813, a very few quality items or prestige awards (like the purse in a horse race) may still be quoted in guineas. (The table below includes some other obsolete coins.) Colloquially, a pound was (and is) called a quid; a shilling a bob; sixpence, a tanner; a copper could refer to a penny, a half-penny, or a farthing (1/4 penny).

Old Currency	New Currency
1 pound note	1 pound coin (or note in Scotland)
10 shilling (half-pound note)	50 pence
5 shilling (crown)
2 1/2 shilling (half crown)	20 pence
2 shilling (florin)	10 pence
1 shilling	5 pence
6 pence
2 1/2 pence	1 penny
2 pence

1 penny
1/2 penny
1/4 penny (farthing)

Throughout its tenure as a member of the European Union (1973–2020), Britain contemplated but did not make the change to the EU’s common currency, the Euro, reflecting many Britons’ strong identification of their country with its rich commercial history and view of their currency as a national symbol.

Even more challenging than sorting out the values of obsolete coins is calculating for any given period the purchasing power of money, which fluctuates over time by its very nature. As difficult as it is to generalize, it is clear that money used to be worth much more than it is currently. During the early Middle Ages, the most valuable circulating coin was the silver penny: four would buy a sheep. Beyond long-term inflationary trends, prices varied from times of plenty to those marked by poor harvests; from peacetime to wartime; from the country to the metropolis (life in London has always been very expensive); and wages varied according to the availability of labor (wages would sharply rise, for instance, during the devastating Black Death in the fourteenth century). The following chart provides a glimpse of some actual prices of given periods and their changes across time, though all the variables mentioned above prevent them from being definitive. Even from one year to the next, an added tax on gin or tea could drastically raise prices, and a lottery ticket could cost much more the night before the drawing than just a month earlier. Still, the prices quoted below do indicate important trends, such as the disparity of incomes in British society and the costs of basic commodities. In the chart on the following pages, the symbol £ is used for pound, s. for shilling, d. for a penny (from Latin denarius); a sum would normally be written £2.19.3—that is 2 pounds, 19 shillings, 3 pence. (This is Leopold Bloom’s budget for the day depicted in Joyce’s novel Ulysses [1922]; in the new currency, it would be about £2.96.)

circa	1390	1590	1650	1750	1815	1875
food and drink	gallon (8 pints) of ale, 1.5d.	tankard of beer, .5d.	coffee, 1d. a dish	“drunk for a penny, dead drunk for two-pence” (gin shop sign in Hogarth print)	ounce of laudanum, 3d.	pint of beer, 3d.
	gallon (8 pints) of wine, 3 to 4d.	pound of beef, 2s. 5d.	chicken, 1s. 4d.	dinner at a steakhouse, 1s.	ham and potato dinner for two, 7s.	dinner in a good hotel, 5s.
	pound of cinnamon, 1	pound of cinnamon,	pound of tea, £3	pound of tea, 16s.	bottle of French	pound of tea, 2s.

	to 3s.	10s. 6d.	10s.		claret, 12s.
entertainment	no cost to watch a cycle play	admission to public theater, 1 to 3d.	falcon, £11 5s.	theater tickets, 1 to 5s.	admission to Covent Garden theater, 1 to 7s.	theater tickets, 6d. to 7s.
	contributory admission to professional troupe theater	cheap seat in private theater, 6d.	billiard table, £25	admission to Vauxhall Gardens, 1s.	annual subscription to Almack's (exclusive club), 10 guineas	admission to Madam Tussaud's waxworks, 1s.
	maintenance for royal hounds at Windsor, .75d. a day	"to see a dead Indian" (The Tempest 2.2.32), 1.25d. (ten "doits")	three-quarter length portrait painting, £31	lottery ticket, £20 (shares were sold)	Jane Austen's piano, 30 guineas	annual fees at a gentleman's club, 7 to 10 guineas
reading	cheap romance, 1s.	play quarto, 6d.	pamphlet, 1 to 6d.	issue of The Gentleman's Magazine , 6d.	issue of Edinburgh Review , 6s.	copy of the Times , 3d.
	a Latin Bible, 2 to £4	Shakespeare's First Folio (1623), £1	student Bible, 6s.	cheap edition of Milton, 2s.	membership in circulating library (3rd class), £1 4s. a year	illustrated edition of Through the Looking-glass , 6s.
	payment for illuminating a liturgical book, £22 9s.	Foxe's Acts and Monuments , 24s.	Hobbes's Leviathan , 8s.	Johnson's Dictionary , folio, 2 vols., £4 10s.	1st edition of Austen's Pride and Prejudice , 18s.	1st edition of Trollope's The Way We Live Now , 2 vols., £1 1s.
transportation	night's supply of hay for horse, 2d.	wherry (whole boat) across Thames, 1d.	day's journey, coach, 10s.	boat across Thames, 4d.	coach ride, outside, 2 to 3d. a mile; inside,	15-minute journey in a London cab, 1s. 6d.

					4 to 5d. a mile
	coach, £8	hiring a horse for a day, 12d.	coach horse, £30	coach fare, London to Edinburgh, £4 10s.	palanquin transport in Madras, 5s. a day	railway, 3rd class, London to Plymouth, 18s. 8d. (about 1d. a mile)
	quality horse, £10	hiring a coach for a day, 10s.	fancy carriage, £170	transport to America, £5	passage, Liverpool to New York, £10	passage to India, 1st class, £50
clothes	clothing allowance for peasant, 3s. a year	shoes with buckles, 8d.	footman's frieze coat, 15s.	working woman's gown, 6s. 6d.	checked muslin, 7s. per yard	flannel for a cheap petticoat, 1s. 3d. a yard
	shoes for gentry wearer, 4d.	woman's gloves, £1 5s.	falconer's hat, 10s.	gentleman's suit, £8	hiring a dressmaker for a pelisse, 8s.	overcoat for an Eton schoolboy, £1 1s.
	hat for gentry wearer, 10d.	fine cloak, £16	black cloth for mourning household of an earl, £100	very fine wig, £30	ladies silk stockings, 12s.	set of false teeth, £2 10s.
labor/incomes	hiring a skilled building worker, 4d. a day	actor's daily wage during playing season, 1s.	agricultural laborer, 6s. 5d. a week	price of enslaved boy, £32	lowest-paid sailor on Royal Navy ship, 10s. 9d. a month	seasonal agricultural laborer, 14s. a week
	wage for professional scribe, £2	household servant 2 to £5 a year + food, clothing	tutor to nobleman's children, £30 a year	housemaid's wage, £6 to £8 a year	contributor to Quarterly Review , 10	housemaid's wage, £10 to £25 a year

	3s. 4d. a year + cloak				guineas per sheet
	minimum income to be called gentleman, £10 a year; for knighthood, 40 to £400	minimum income for eligibility for knighthood, £30 a year	Milton's salary as Secretary of Foreign Tongues, £288 a year	Boswell's allowance, £200 a year	minimum income for a "genteel" family, £100 a year	income of the "comfortable" classes, £800 and up a year
	income from land of richest magnates, £3,500 a year	income from land of average earl, £4,000 a year	Earl of Bedford's income, £8,000 a year	Duke of Newcastle's income, £40,000 a year	Mr. Darcy's income, Pride and Prejudice , £10,000	Trollope's income, £4,000 a year

The British Baronage

The English monarchy is in principle hereditary, though at times during the Middle Ages the rules were subject to dispute. As it stands now, authority passes from parent to eldest surviving child, to siblings in order of seniority if there are no children, and in default of direct descendants to collateral lines (cousins, nephews, nieces) in order of closeness. There have been breaks in the order of succession (1066, 1399, 1688), but so far as possible the usurpers have always sought to paper over the break with a legitimate, that is, hereditary, claim. When a queen succeeds to the throne and takes a husband, he does not become king unless he is in the line of blood succession; rather, he is named prince consort, as Albert was to Victoria. He may be the father of kings, but he is not one himself.

The original Saxon nobles were the king's thanes, ealdormen, or earls, who provided the king with military service and counsel in return for booty, gifts, or landed estates. William the Conqueror, arriving from France, where feudalism was fully developed, considerably expanded this group. In addition, as the king distributed the lands of his new kingdom, he also distributed dignities to men who became known collectively as "the baronage." "Baron" in its root meaning signifies simply "man," and barons were the king's men. As the title was common, a distinction was early made between greater and lesser barons, the former gradually assuming loftier and more impressive titles. The first English "duke" was created in 1337; the title of "marquess," or "marquis" (pronounced "markwis"), followed in 1385, and "viscount" ("vyekount") in 1440. Though "earl" is the oldest title of all, an earl now comes between a marquess and a viscount in order of dignity and precedence, and the old term "baron" now designates a rank just below viscount. "Baronets" were created in 1611 as a means of raising revenue for the crown (the title could be purchased for about

£1,000); they are marginal nobility and have never sat in the House of Lords.

Kings and queens are addressed as "Your Majesty," princes and princesses as "Your Highness," the other hereditary nobility as "My Lord" or "Your Lordship." Peers receive their titles either by inheritance (like Lord Byron, the sixth baron of that line) or from the monarch (like Alfred, Lord Tennyson, created 1st Baron Tennyson by Victoria). The children, even of a duke, are commoners unless they are specifically granted some other title or inherit their father's title from him. A peerage can be forfeited by act of attainder, as for example when a lord is convicted of treason; and, when forfeited, or lapsed for lack of a successor, can be bestowed on another family. Thus in 1605 Robert Cecil was made first Earl of Salisbury in the third creation, the first creation dating from 1149, the second from 1337, the title having been in abeyance since 1539. Titles descend by right of succession and do not depend on tenure of land; thus, a title does not always indicate where a lord dwells or holds power. Indeed, noble titles do not always refer to a real place at all. At Prince Edward's marriage in 1999, the queen created him Earl of Wessex, although the old kingdom of Wessex has had no political existence since 1066, and the name was all but forgotten until it was resurrected by Thomas Hardy as the setting of his novels. (This is perhaps but one of many ways in which the world of the aristocracy increasingly resembles the realm of literature.)

Scottish peers sat in the parliament of Scotland, as English peers did in the parliament of England, till at the Act of Union (1707) Scottish peers were granted sixteen seats in the English House of Lords, to be filled by election. (In 1963, all Scottish lords were allowed to sit.) Similarly, Irish peers, when the Irish parliament was abolished in 1801, were granted the right to elect twenty-eight of their number to the House of Lords in Westminster. (Now that the Republic of Ireland is a separate nation, this no longer applies.) Women members (peeresses) were first allowed to sit in the House as nonhereditary Life Peers in 1958 (when that status was created for members of both genders); women first sat by their own hereditary right in 1963. Today the House of Lords still retains some power to influence or delay legislation, but its future is uncertain. In 1999, the hereditary peers (then amounting to 750) were reduced to 92 temporary members elected by their fellow peers. Holders of Life Peerages remain, as do senior bishops of the Church of England and high-court judges (the “Law Lords”).

The king and queen	(These are all of the royal line.)
Prince and princess
Duke and duchess	(These may or may not be of the royal line, but are ordinarily remote from the succession.)
Marquess and marchioness
Earl and countess
Viscount and viscountess
Baron and baroness
Baronet and lady

--	--

Below the peerage the chief title of honor is “knight.” Knighthood, which is not hereditary, is generally a reward for services rendered. A knight (Sir John Black) is addressed, using his first name, as “Sir John”; his wife, using the last name, is “Lady Black”—unless she is the daughter of an earl or nobleman of higher rank, in which case she will be “Lady Arabella.” The female equivalent of a knight bears the title of “Dame.” Though the word knight itself comes from the Old English cniht, there is some doubt as to whether knighthood amounted to much before the arrival of the Normans. The feudal system required military service as a condition of land tenure, and a man who came to serve his king at the head of an army of tenants required a title of authority and badges of identity—hence the title of knighthood and the coat of arms. During the Crusades, when men were far removed from their land (or even sold it in order to go on crusade), more elaborate forms of fealty sprang up that soon expanded into orders of knighthood. The Templars, Hospitallers, Knights of the Teutonic Order, Knights of Malta, and Knights of the Golden Fleece were but a few of these companionships; not all of them were available at all times in England.

Gradually, with the rise of centralized government and the decline of feudal tenures, military knighthood became obsolete, and the rank largely honorific; sometimes, as under James I, it degenerated into a scheme of the royal government for making money. For hundreds of years after its establishment in the fourteenth century, the Order of the Garter was the only English order of knighthood, an exclusive courtly companionship. Then, during the late seventeenth, the eighteenth, and the nineteenth centuries, a number of additional orders were created, with names such as the Thistle, Saint Patrick, the Bath, Saint Michael, and Saint George, plus a number of special Victorian and Indian orders. They retain the terminology, ceremony, and dignity of knighthood, but the military implications are vestigial.

Although the British Empire now belongs to history, appointments to the Order of the British Empire continue to be conferred for services to that empire at home or abroad. Such honors (commonly referred to as “gongs”) are granted by the monarch in New Year’s and Birthday lists, but the decisions are now made by the government in power. In recent years there have been efforts to popularize and democratize the dispensation of honors, with recipients including celebrities of all types. But this does not prevent large sectors of British society from regarding both knighthood and the peerage as largely irrelevant to modern life.

The Royal Lines of England and Great Britain

England

SAXONS AND DANES

Egbert, king of Wessex802–839

Ethelwulf, son of Egbert839–858

Ethelbald, second son of Ethelwulf858–860

Ethelbert, third son of Ethelwulf860–866

Ethelred I, fourth son of Ethelwulf866–871

Alfred the Great, fifth son of Ethelwulf871–899

Edward the Elder, son of Alfred899–924

Athelstan the Glorious, son of Edward924–940

Edmund I, third son of Edward940–946

Edred, fourth son of Edward946–955

Edwy the Fair, son of Edmund955–959

Edgar the Peaceful, second son of Edmund959–975

Edward the Martyr, son of Edgar975–978 (murdered)

Ethelred II, the Unready, second son of Edgar978–1016

Edmund II, Ironside, son of Ethelred II1016–1016

Canute the Dane1016–1035

Harold I, Harefoot, natural son of Canute1035–1040

Hardecanute, son of Canute1040–1042

Edward the Confessor, son of Ethelred II1042–1066

Harold II, brother-in-law of Edward1066–1066 (died in battle)

HOUSE OF NORMANDY

William I, the Conqueror1066–1087

William II, Rufus, third son of William I1087–1100 (shot from ambush)

Henry I, Beauclerc, youngest son of William I1100–1135

HOUSE OF BLOIS

Stephen, son of Adela, daughter of William I1135–1154

HOUSE OF PLANTAGENET

Henry II, son of Geoffrey Plantagenet by Matilda, daughter of Henry I1154–1189

Richard I, Coeur de Lion, son of Henry II1189–1199

John Lackland, son of Henry II1199–1216

Henry III, son of John1216–1272

Edward I, Longshanks, son of Henry III1272–1307

Edward II, son of Edward I1307–1327 (deposed)

Edward III of Windsor, son of Edward II 1327–1377

Richard II, grandson of Edward III 1377–1399 (deposed)

HOUSE OF LANCASTER

Henry IV, son of John of Gaunt, son of Edward III 1399–1413

Henry V, Prince Hal, son of Henry IV 1413–1422

Henry VI, son of Henry V 1422–1461 (deposed),
1470–1471 (deposed)

HOUSE OF YORK

Edward IV, great-great-grandson of Edward III 1461–1470
(deposed), 1471–1483

Edward V, son of Edward IV 1483–1483 (murdered)

Richard III, Crookback 1483–1485 (died in battle)

HOUSE OF TUDOR

Henry VII, married daughter of Edward IV 1485–1509

Henry VIII, son of Henry VII 1509–1547

Edward VI, son of Henry VIII 1547–1553

Mary I, “Bloody,” daughter of Henry VIII 1553–1558

Elizabeth I, daughter of Henry VIII 1558–1603

HOUSE OF STUART

James I (James VI of Scotland)1603–1625

Charles I, son of James I1625–1649 (executed)

COMMONWEALTH & PROTECTORATE

Council of State1649–1653

Oliver Cromwell, Lord Protector1653–1658

Richard Cromwell, son of Oliver1658–1660 (resigned)

HOUSE OF STUART (RESTORED)

Charles II, son of Charles I1660–1685

James II, second son of Charles I1685–1688

(INTERREGNUM, 11 DECEMBER 1688 TO 13 FEBRUARY 1689)

HOUSE OF ORANGE-NASSAU

William III of Orange, by Mary, daughter of Charles I
and Mary II, daughter of James II1689–1701

–1694

Anne, second daughter of James II1702–1714

Great Britain

HOUSE OF HANOVER

George I, son of Elector of Hanover and Sophia, granddaughter of James I 1714–1727

George II, son of George I 1727–1760

George III, grandson of George II 1760–1820

George IV, son of George III 1820–1830

William IV, third son of George III 1830–1837

Victoria, daughter of Edward, fourth son of George III 1837–1901

HOUSE OF SAXE-COBURG AND GOTHA

Edward VII, son of Victoria 1901–1910

HOUSE OF WINDSOR (NAME ADOPTED 17 JULY 1917)

George V, second son of Edward VII 1910–1936

Edward VIII, eldest son of George V 1936–1936 (abdicated)

George VI, second son of George V 1936–1952

Elizabeth II, daughter of George VI 1952–2022

Charles III, son of Elizabeth II 2022–

Religions in Great Britain

In the late sixth century C.E., missionaries from Rome introduced Christianity to Britons—actually, reintroduced it, since it had briefly flourished in the southern parts of the British Isles during the Roman occupation, and even after the Roman withdrawal had persisted in the Celtic regions of Scotland and Wales. By the time the earliest poems included in The Norton Anthology of English Literature were composed (the seventh century), therefore, there had been a Christian presence in the British Isles for hundreds of years. The conversion of the Germanic occupiers of England can, however, be dated only from 597. Our knowledge of the religion of pre-Christian Britain is sketchy, but it is likely that vestiges of Germanic polytheism assimilated into, or coexisted with, the practice of Christianity: fertility rites were incorporated into the celebration of Easter resurrection, rituals commemorating the dead into All-Hallows Eve and All Saints Day, and elements of winter solstice festivals into the celebration of Christmas. The most durable polytheistic remains are the days of the week, each of which except “Saturday” derives from the name of a Germanic pagan god, and the word “Easter,” deriving, according to the great monastic scholar Bede (ca. 673–735), from the name of a Germanic pagan goddess, Eostre. In English literature such “folkloric” elements sometimes elicit romantic nostalgia. Geoffrey Chaucer’s “Wife of Bath” looks back to a magical time before the arrival of Christianity in which the land was “fulfild of fairye.” Hundreds of years later, the seventeenth-century writer Robert Herrick honors the amalgamation of Christian and pagan elements in agrarian British culture in such poems as “Corinna’s Gone A-Maying” and “The Hock Cart.”

Medieval Christianity was fairly uniform, if complex, across Western Europe—hence called “catholic,” or universally shared. The Church was composed of the so-called “regular” and “secular” orders, the regular orders being those who followed a rule in a community under an abbot or an abbess (that is, monks, nuns, friars, and canons), while the secular clergy of priests served parish communities under the governance of a bishop. In the unstable period from the sixth until the twelfth century, monasteries were the intellectual powerhouse of the Church. From the beginning of the thirteenth century, with the development of an urban Christian spirituality in Europe, friars dominated the recently invented institution of universities, as well as devoting themselves, in theory at least, to the urban poor.

The Catholic Church was also an international power structure. With its hierarchy of pope, cardinals, archbishops, and bishops, it offered a model of the centralized, bureaucratic state from the late eleventh century. That ecclesiastical power structure coexisted alongside a separate, often less centralized and feudal structure of lay authorities, with theoretically different and often competing spheres of social responsibilities. The sharing of lay and ecclesiastical authority in medieval England was sometimes a source of conflict. Chaucer's pilgrims are on their way to visit the memorial shrine to one victim of such exemplary struggle: Thomas à Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, who opposed the policies of King Henry II, was assassinated by indirect suggestion of the king in 1170, and later made a saint. The Church, in turn, produced its own victims: Jews were subject to persecution in the late twelfth century in England, before being expelled in 1290. From the beginning of the fifteenth century, the English Church targeted Lollard heretics (see below) with capital punishment, for the first time.

As an international organization, the Church conducted its business in the universal language of Latin. Thus although in the period the largest segment of literate persons was made up of clerics, the clerical contribution to great literary writing in vernacular languages (for example, French and English) was, so far as we know, relatively modest, with some great exceptions in the later Middle Ages (for example, William Langland). Lay, vernacular writers of the period certainly reflect the importance of the Church as an institution and the pervasiveness of religion in the rituals that marked everyday life, as well as contesting institutional authority. From the late fourteenth century, indeed, England witnessed an active and articulate, proto-Protestant movement known as Lollardy, which attacked clerical hierarchy and promoted vernacular scriptures.

Beginning in 1517 the German monk Martin Luther, in Wittenberg, Germany, openly challenged many aspects of Catholic practice and by 1520 had completely repudiated the authority of the pope, setting in motion the Protestant Reformation. Luther argued that the Roman Catholic Church had strayed far from the pattern of Christianity laid out in scripture. He rejected Catholic doctrines for which no biblical authority was to be found, such as the belief in Purgatory, and translated the Bible into German, on the grounds that the importance of scripture for all Christians made its translation into the vernacular tongue essential. Luther was not the first to advance such views—Lollard followers of the Englishman John Wycliffe had translated the Bible in the late fourteenth century. But Luther, protected by powerful German rulers, was able to speak out without fear of punishment and convert others to his views, rather than suffer the persecution usually meted out to heretics. Soon other reformers were following in Luther's footsteps: of these, the Swiss Ulrich Zwingli and the French Jean Calvin would be especially influential for English religious thought.

At first England remained staunchly Catholic. Its king, Henry VIII, was so severe to heretics that the pope awarded him the title "Defender of the Faith," which British monarchs have retained to this day. In 1534, however, Henry rejected the authority of the pope to prevent his divorce from his queen, Catherine of Aragon, and his marriage to his mistress, Ann Boleyn. In doing so, Henry appropriated to himself ecclesiastical as well as secular authority. Thomas More, author of Utopia, was executed in 1535 for refusing to endorse Henry's right to govern the English church. Over the following six years, Henry consolidated his grip on the ecclesiastical establishment by dissolving the powerful, populous Catholic monasteries and redistributing their massive landholdings to his own lay followers. Yet Henry's church largely retained Catholic doctrine and liturgy. When Henry died and his young son, Edward, came to the throne in 1547, the English church embarked on a more Protestant path, a direction abruptly reversed when Edward died and his older sister Mary, the daughter of Catherine of Aragon, took the throne in 1553 and attempted to reintroduce Roman Catholicism. Mary's reign was also short, however, and her successor, Elizabeth I, the daughter of Ann Boleyn, was a Protestant. Elizabeth attempted to establish a "middle way" Christianity, compromising between Roman Catholic practices and beliefs and reformed ones.

The Church of England, though it laid claim to a national rather than pan-European authority, aspired like its predecessor to be the universal church of all English subjects. It retained the Catholic structure of parishes and dioceses and the Catholic hierarchy of bishops, though the ecclesiastical authority was now the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Church's "Supreme Governor" was the monarch. Yet disagreement and controversy persisted. Some members of the Church of England wanted to retain many of the ritual and liturgical elements of Catholicism. Others, the Puritans, advocated a more thoroughgoing reformation. Most Puritans remained within the Church of England, but a minority, the "Separatists" or "Congregationalists," split from the established church altogether. These dissenters no longer thought of the ideal church as an organization to which everybody belonged; instead, they conceived it as a more exclusive group of likeminded people, one not necessarily attached to a larger body of believers.

In the seventeenth century, the succession of the Scottish king James to the English throne produced another problem. England and Scotland were separate nations, and in the sixteenth century Scotland had developed its own national Presbyterian church, or "kirk," under the leadership of the reformer John Knox. The kirk retained fewer Catholic liturgical elements than did the Church of England, and its authorities, or "presbyters," were elected by assemblies of their fellow clerics, rather than appointed by the king. James I and his son Charles I, especially the latter, wanted to bring the Scottish kirk into conformity with Church of England practices. The Scots violently resisted these efforts, with the collaboration of many English Puritans, in a conflict that eventually developed into the English Civil War in the mid-seventeenth century. The effect of these disputes is visible in the poetry of such writers as John Milton, Robert Herrick, Henry Vaughan, and Thomas Traherne, and in the prose of Thomas Browne, Lucy Hutchinson, and Dorothy Waugh. Just as in the mid-sixteenth century, when a succession of monarchs with different religious commitments destabilized the church, so the seventeenth century endured spiritual whiplash. King Charles I's highly ritualistic Church of England was violently overturned by the Puritan victors in the Civil War—until 1660, after the death of the Puritan leader, Oliver Cromwell, when the Church of England was restored along with the monarchy.

The religious and political upheavals of the seventeenth century produced Christian sects that de-emphasized the ceremony of the established church and rejected as well its top-down authority structure. Some of these groups were ephemeral, but the Baptists (founded in 1608 in Amsterdam by the English expatriate John Smyth) and Quakers, or Society of Friends (founded by George Fox in the 1640s), flourished outside the established church, sometimes despite cruel persecution. John Bunyan, a Baptist, wrote the Christian allegory Pilgrim's Progress while in prison. Some dissenters, like the Baptists, shared the reformed reverence for the absolute authority of scripture but interpreted the scriptural texts differently from their fellow Protestants. Others, like the Quakers, favored, even over the authority of the Bible, the "inner light" or voice of individual conscience, which they took to be the working of the Holy Spirit in the lives of individuals.

The Protestant dissenters were not England's only religious minorities. Despite crushing fines and the threat of imprisonment, a minority of Catholics under Elizabeth and James openly refused to give their allegiance to the new church, and others remained secret adherents to the old ways. John Donne was brought up in an ardently Catholic family, and several other writers converted to Catholicism as adults—Ben Jonson for a considerable part of his career, Elizabeth Carey and Richard Crashaw permanently, and at profound personal cost. In the eighteenth century, Catholics remained objects of suspicion as possible agents of sedition, especially after the “Glorious Revolution” in 1688 deposed the Catholic James II in favor of the Protestant William and Mary. Anti-Catholic prejudice affected John Dryden, a Catholic convert, as well as the lifelong Catholic Alexander Pope. By contrast, the English colony of Ireland remained overwhelmingly Roman Catholic, the fervor of its religious commitment at least partly inspired by resistance to English occupation. Starting in the reign of Elizabeth, England shored up its own authority in Ireland by encouraging Protestant immigrants from Scotland to settle in the north of Ireland, producing a virulent religious divide the effects of which are still felt today.

A small community of Jews had moved from France to London after 1066, when the Norman William the Conqueror came to the English throne. Although despised and persecuted by many Christians, they were allowed to remain as moneylenders to the Crown, until the thirteenth century, when the king developed alternative sources of credit. At this point, in 1290, the Jews were expelled from England. In 1655 Oliver Cromwell permitted a few to return, and in the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries the Jewish population slowly increased, mainly by immigration from Germany. In the mid-eighteenth century some prominent Jews had their children brought up as Christians so as to facilitate their full integration into English society: thus the nineteenth-century writer and politician Benjamin Disraeli, although he and his father were members of the Church of England, was widely considered a Jew insofar as his ancestry was Jewish.

In the late seventeenth century, as the Church of England reasserted itself, Catholics, Jews, and dissenting Protestants found themselves subject to significant legal restrictions. The Corporation Act, passed in 1661, and the Test Act, passed in 1673, excluded all who refused to take communion in the Church of England from voting, attending university, or working in government or in the professions. Members of religious minorities, as well as Church of England communicants, paid mandatory taxes in support of Church of England ministers and buildings. In 1689 the dissenters gained the right to worship in public, but Jews and Catholics were not permitted to do so.

During the eighteenth century, political, intellectual, and religious history remained closely intertwined. The Church of England came to accommodate a good deal of variety. "Low church" services resembled those of the dissenting Protestant churches, minimizing ritual and emphasizing the sermon; the "high church" retained more elaborate ritual elements, yet its prestige was under attack on several fronts. Many Enlightenment thinkers subjected the Bible to rational critique and found it wanting: the philosopher David Hume, for instance, argued that the "miracles" described therein were more probably lies or errors than real breaches of the laws of nature. Within the Church of England, the "broad church" Latitudinarians welcomed this rationalism, advocating theological openness and an emphasis on ethics rather than dogma. More radically, the Unitarian movement rejected the divinity of Christ while professing to accept his ethical teachings. Taking a different tack, the preacher John Wesley, founder of Methodism, responded to the rationalists' challenge with a newly fervent call to evangelism and personal discipline; his movement was particularly successful in Wales. Revolutions in America and France at the end of the century generated considerable millenarian excitement and fostered more new religious ideas, often in conjunction with a radical social agenda. Many important writers of the Romantic period were indebted to traditions of protestant dissent: Unitarian and rationalist protestant ideas influenced William Hazlitt, Anna Barbauld, Mary Wollstonecraft, and the young Samuel Taylor Coleridge. William Blake created a highly idiosyncratic poetic mythology loosely indebted to radical strains of Christian mysticism. Others were even more heterodox: Lord Byron and Robert Burns, brought up as Scots

Presbyterians, rebelled fiercely, and Percy Shelley's writing of an atheistic pamphlet resulted in his expulsion from Oxford.

Great Britain never erected an American-style "wall of separation" between church and state, but in practice religion and secular affairs grew more and more distinct during the nineteenth century. In consequence, members of religious minorities no longer seemed to pose a threat to the commonweal. A movement to repeal the Test Act failed in the 1790s, but a renewed effort resulted in the extension of the franchise to dissenting Protestants in 1828 and to Catholics in 1829. The numbers of Roman Catholics in England were swelled by immigration from Ireland, but there were also some prominent English adherents. Among writers, the converts John Newman and Gerard Manley Hopkins are especially important. The political participation and social integration of Jews presented a thornier challenge. Lionel de Rothschild, repeatedly elected to represent London in Parliament during the 1840s and 1850s, was not permitted to take his seat there because he refused to take his oath of office "on the true faith of a Christian"; finally, in 1858, the Jewish Disabilities Act allowed him to omit these words. Only in 1871, however, were Oxford and Cambridge opened to non-Anglicans.

Meanwhile geological discoveries and Charles Darwin's evolutionary theories increasingly cast doubt on the literal truth of the Creation story, and close philological analysis of the biblical text suggested that its origins were human rather than divine. By the end of the nineteenth century, many writers were bearing witness to a world in which Christianity no longer seemed fundamentally plausible. In his poetry and prose, Thomas Hardy depicts a world devoid of benevolent providence. Matthew Arnold's poem "Dover Beach" is in part an elegy to lost spiritual assurance, as the "Sea of Faith" goes out like the tide: "But now I only hear / Its melancholy, long, withdrawing roar / Retreating." For Arnold, literature must replace religion as a source of spiritual truth, and intimacy between individuals substitute for the lost communal solidarity of the universal church.

The work of many twentieth-century writers shows the influence of a religious upbringing or a religious conversion in adulthood. T. S. Eliot and W. H. Auden embrace Anglicanism, William Butler Yeats spiritualism. James Joyce repudiates Irish Catholicism but remains obsessed with it. Yet religion, or lack of it, is a matter of individual choice and conscience, not social or legal mandate. Over the past several decades, church attendance has plummeted in Great Britain. Only about 46 percent of the population identified itself as “Christian” on the 2021 census. Meanwhile, immigration from former British colonies as well as other countries has swelled the ranks of religions once uncommon in the British Isles—Muslim, Sikh, Hindu, Buddhist—though the numbers of adherents remain small relative to the total population.

PERMISSIONS ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

PERMISSIONS ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

TEXT CREDITS

William Blake: Blake engravings: reproduced from the Lessing J. Rosenwald Collection, Library of Congress. "America: A Prophecy," copyright © 2008 by W. W. Norton & Company, Inc., from BLAKE'S POETRY AND DESIGNS: A NORTON CRITICAL EDITION, SECOND EDITION by William Blake, edited by Mary Lynn Johnson and John E. Grant. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc., and from Collection of Robert N. Essick. Copyright © 2023 William Blake Archive. Used with permission.

Robert Burns: Selections from THE POEMS AND SONGS OF ROBERT BURNS, edited by James Kinsley. Copyright © 1968 by Oxford University Press. Reproduced with permission of the Licenser through PLSclear.

John Clare: "Mouse's Nest" and "Pastoral Poetry" from THE POEMS OF JOHN CLARE, edited by J. W. Tibble (J. M. Dent). Reprinted by permission of Everyman's Library, London. "The Nightingale's Nest" from SELECTED POEMS AND PROSE OF JOHN CLARE, edited by Eric Robinson and Geoffrey Summerfield. Reproduced with permission of Curtis Brown Ltd., London, on behalf of Eric Robinson. Copyright © Eric Robinson 1984, 1967. All other poems from THE LATER POEMS OF JOHN CLARE 1837–1864, edited by Eric Robinson and David Powell. Reproduced with permission of Curtis Brown Ltd., London, on behalf of Eric Robinson. Copyright © Eric Robinson 1984, 1967. "The Badger" from JOHN CLARE: POEMS OF THE MIDDLE PERIOD 1822–1837, edited by Eric Robinson, David Powell, P. M. S. Dawson.

Copyright © 2003 by Oxford University Press. Reproduced with permission of the Licenser through PLSclear.

John Keats: Reprinted by permission of the publisher from JOHN KEATS: COMPLETE POEMS, edited by Jack Stillinger, Cambridge, Mass.: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, copyright © 1978, 1982 by the President and Fellows of Harvard College. Reprinted by permission of the publisher. All rights reserved. From THE LETTERS OF JOHN KEATS 1814–1821, VOLUMES I and II, edited by Hyder Edward Rollins, Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, Copyright © 1958 by The President and Fellows of Harvard College. Copyright renewed 1986 by Herschel C. Baker. Used by permission. All rights reserved.

Percy Bysshe Shelley: From SHELLEY’S POETRY AND PROSE, SECOND EDITION, by Percy Bysshe Shelley, edited by Donald H. Reiman and Neil Fraistat. Copyright © 2002 by Donald H. Reiman, Neil Fraistat, and Rebecca Thompson. Copyright © 1977 by Donald H. Reiman and Sharon B. Powers. Reprinted by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.

Mary Wollstonecraft: Reprinted from LETTERS WRITTEN DURING A SHORT RESIDENCE IN SWEDEN, NORWAY, AND DENMARK by Mary Wollstonecraft, edited by Carol H. Poston, by permission of the University of Nebraska Press. Copyright © 1976 by the University of Nebraska Press. From A VINDICATION OF THE RIGHTS OF WOMAN: A NORTON CRITICAL EDITION, Second Edition, by Mary Wollstonecraft, edited by Carol H. Poston. Copyright © 1988, 1975 by W. W. Norton & Company, Inc. Reprinted by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.

Dorothy Wordsworth: Letter dated September 24, 1802, from THE GRASMERE JOURNALS, edited by Pamela Woof (1991), published by Oxford University Press. Reproduced with permission of the Licenser through PLSclear. “Grasmere—A Fragment” and “Thoughts on My Sick Bed” from DOROTHY WORDSWORTH AND ROMANTICISM. Reprinted by permission of The Wordsworth Trust, Dove Cottage, Grasmere.

William Wordsworth: From THE PRELUDE 1799, 1805, 1850 by WILLIAM WORDSWORTH: A NORTON CRITICAL EDITION, edited by Jonathan Wordsworth, M. H. Abrams. Copyright © 1979 by W. W. Norton & Company, Inc. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.

IMAGE CREDITS

Pages 2–3: © Tate, London/Art Resource, NY; p. 14: left: © The Trustees of the British Museum/Art Resource, NY; right: © The Trustees of the British Museum/Art Resource, NY; p. 17: Yale Center for British Art, Rare Books and Manuscripts; p. 23: © Chetham's Library, Manchester, UK/Bridgeman Images; p. 28: © The Trustees of the British Museum/Art Resource, NY; p. 55: World History Archive/Alamy Stock Photo; p. 76: public domain book, duplicated from the holdings at Louisiana State University Special Collections; p. 124: Rogers Fund, 1917. The Metropolitan Museum of Art; p. 131: Rogers Fund, 1917. Metropolitan Museum of Art; p. 135: Rogers Fund, 1917. Metropolitan Museum of Art; p. 138: Rogers Fund, 1917. Metropolitan Museum of Art; p. 139: Rogers Fund, 1917. Metropolitan Museum of Art; p. 143: Penta Springs Limited/Alamy Stock Photo; p. 211: Library of Congress Prints and Photographs Division, Washington, D.C.; p. 212: Library of Congress Prints and Photographs Division, Washington, D.C.; p. 213: The Miriam and Ira D. Wallach Division of Art, Prints and Photographs: Print Collection, The New York Public Library; p. 214: Penta Springs Limited/Alamy Stock Photo; p. 223: Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture, Photographs and Prints Division, The New York Public Library; p. 308: Courtesy Lilly Library, Indiana University, Bloomington, Indiana; p. 543: incamerastock/Alamy Stock Photo; p. 800: © British Library Board. All Rights Reserved/Bridgeman

Images; p. 934: Penta Springs/Alamy Stock Photo; p. 940: agefotostock/Alamy Stock Photo.

COLOR INSERT CREDITS

Page C1: © Tate Collection/Art Resource, NY; C2: top: Bridgeman Images; bottom: Fitzwilliam Museum, University of Cambridge, UK/Bridgeman Images; C3: top: British Museum/Bridgeman Images; bottom: V&A Images, London/Art Resource, NY; C4: top: National Portrait Gallery, London, UK/Bridgeman Images; bottom: from The New York Public Library Digital Collections. <https://digitalcollections.nypl.org/items/510d47db-b630-a3d9-e040-e00a18064a99>; C5: Louvre/Bridgeman Images; C6: AIFA Visuals/Alamy Stock Photo; C7: top: Snark/Art Resource, NY; bottom: Walker Art Gallery, © National Museums Liverpool/Bridgeman Images; C8: V&A Images, London/Art Resource, NY.

PERMISSIONS ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

TEXT CREDITS

Ada Nield Chew: Extract from THE LIFE AND WRITINGS OF A WORKING WOMAN by Ada Nield Chew. Published by Virago Press, London. Reprinted by permission.

Christina Rossetti: “Cobwebs,” “In an Artist’s Studio,” “Promises Like Piecrust,” and “In Progress” from THE COMPLETE WORKS OF CHRISTINA ROSSETTI, edited by R. W. Crump. Copyright © 1990 by Louisiana State University. Reprinted by permission of the Louisiana State University Press.

Oscar Wilde: De Profundis from THE LETTERS OF OSCAR WILDE, edited by Sir Rupert Hart-Davis and Merlin Holland. Letters © 1962 by Vyvyan Holland, © 1985, 1990, 2000 by Merlin Holland. Editorial matter © 1962, 1985 by Rupert Hart-Davis, © 2000 by Rupert Hart-Davis and Merlin Holland. Reprinted by permission of HarperCollins Publishers Ltd.

IMAGE CREDITS

Pages 2–3: The Print Collector/Alamy Stock Photo; p. 5: © National Portrait Gallery, London/Art Resource, NY; p. 7: Smith Archive/Alamy Stock Photo; p. 10: Bridgeman Images; p. 12: Gift of Bessie Potter Vonnoh, 1941. The Metropolitan Museum of Art; p. 14: GRANGER; p. 29: The Print Collector/Alamy Stock Photo; p. 63: Dinodia Photos/Alamy Stock Photo; p. 68: Look and Learn/Illustrated Papers Collection/Bridgeman Images; p. 78: GRANGER; p. 212: Lebrecht Music & Arts/Alamy Stock Photo; p. 291: Science History Images/Alamy Stock Photo; p. 305: Classic Image/Alamy Stock Photo; p. 308: Look and Learn/George Collection/Bridgeman Images; p. 315: top: Classic Image/Alamy Stock Photo; bottom: Sueddeutsche Zeitung Photo/Alamy Stock Photo; p. 333: Lebrecht Music & Arts/Alamy Stock Photo; p. 341: Skimage/Alamy Stock Photo; pp. 349, 358, 363, 375, 377, 390, 400, 405: from Charles Dickens, A Christmas Carol, 1843 edition, illustrations by John Leech, images scanned by Philip V. Allingham, courtesy Dickens collector and bibliophile Dan Calinescu, Toronto, "The Victorian Web" www.victorianweb.org/art/illustration/carol/gallery.html; p. 513: Liam Quinn; p. 525: © Delaware Art Museum/Samuel and Mary R. Bancroft Memorial/Bridgeman Images; p. 532: Courtesy of Dover Books/Victorian Fashions & Costumes from Harper's Bazar 1867–98; p. 546: GRANGER; pp. 550, 553, 554: from the book On Britain by Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Foreign Language Publishing House, Moscow, 1953; p. 619: Fogg Art Museum, © Harvard Art Museums/Bequest of Grenville L. Winthrop/Bridgeman Images; p. 646: Pictorial Press Ltd/Alamy Stock Photo; p. 915: Classic Collection/Alamy Stock Photo.

COLOR INSERT CREDITS

Page C1: top: © 2023 Museum of Fine Arts, Boston. All rights reserved/Henry Lillie Pierce Fund/Bridgeman Images; bottom: © 2023 Museum of Fine Arts, Boston. All rights reserved/Henry Lillie Pierce Fund/Bridgeman Images; C2: Ian Dagnall Computing/Alamy Stock Photo; C3: © Manchester Art Gallery, UK/Bridgeman Images; C4 © Tate, London/Art Resource, NY; C5: top: Lady Lever Art Gallery © National Museums, Liverpool/Bridgeman Images; bottom: © Delaware Art Museum/Samuel and Mary R. Bancroft Memorial/Bridgeman Images; C6: top: Gilman Collection, Gift of The Howard Gilman Foundation, 2005/The Metropolitan Museum of Art; bottom: Victoria & Albert Museum, London/Bridgeman Images; C7:

top: incamerastock/Alamy Stock Photo; bottom: GL Archive/Alamy Stock Photo; C8: steeve-x-art/Alamy Stock Photo.

PERMISSIONS ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

TEXT CREDITS

Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie: “Checking Out” by Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie, originally published in The New Yorker Magazine, March 18, 2013. Copyright © 2013 by Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie. Used by Permission of The Wylie Agency LLC. “The Danger of a Single Story” by Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie. Copyright © 2009 by Chimamanda Ngozi Adichie, used by permission of the The Wylie Agency LLC.

Patience Agbabi: “Prologue” from TRANSFORMATRIX by Patience Agbabi. Copyright © 2000 by Patience Agbabi. “Prologue (Grime Mix),” “The Kiss (Miller’s Tale),” and “What Do Women Like Bes’? (The Wife of Baf’s Tale)” from TELLING TALES by Patience Agbabi. Copyright © 2014 by Patience Agbabi. Reprinted by permission of Canongate Books Limited through PLSclear. “ECO2nomics” from IN THE TREES by Patience Agbabi. Copyright © 2007 by Patience Agbabi. “The Doll’s House” by Patience Agbadi. Copyright © 2014 by Patience Agbabi. Reprinted by permission of the author.

Mulk Raj Anand: “The Liar” from COLLECTED SHORT STORIES OF MULK RAJ ANAND by Mulk Raj Anand. Copyright © 2006. Reprinted by permission of MULK RAJ ANAND CENTER.

Simon Armitage: “The Tyre,” “Horses, M62,” “The English Astronaut,” and “Beck” from PAPER AEROPLANES: SELECTED POEMS, 1989–2014 by Simon Armitage. Copyright © 2014 by Simon Armitage. Reprinted by permission of Faber and Faber Limited. “Ark” by Simon Armitage. Copyright © 2020 by Simon Armitage. Reprinted by permission of David Godwin Associates.

Margaret Atwood: "Miss July Grows Older" from MORNING IN THE BURNED HOUSE by Margaret Atwood. Copyright © 1995 by O. W. Toad and Margaret Atwood. Used by permission of HarperCollins Publishers, McClelland & Stewart Ltd., a division of Penguin Random House Canada Limited, and Curtis Brown Group Ltd., London, on behalf of Margaret Atwood. "Death by Landscape" from WILDERNESS TIPS by Margaret Atwood. Copyright © 1991 O. W. Toad Limited. Used with permission of Doubleday, an imprint of the Knopf Doubleday Publishing Group, a division of Penguin Random House LLC, Bloomsbury Publishing Plc. and Emblem/McClelland & Stewart, a division of Penguin Random House Canada Limited. All rights reserved.

W. H. Auden: Introduction to THE POET'S TONGUE [Poetry as a Memorable Speech] by W. H. Auden. Copyright © 1935 and 1946 by W. H. Auden. Reprinted by permission of Curtis Brown. "Musée des Beaux Arts," "The Unknown Citizen," "Lullaby (1937)," "In Memory of W. B. Yeats," "As I Walked Out One Evening," and "September 1, 1939," copyright 1940 and © renewed 1968 by W. H. Auden; "The Shield of Achilles," copyright 1952 by W. H. Auden and © renewed 1980 by The Estate of W. H. Auden; "On This Island," copyright 1937 and © renewed 1965 by W. H. Auden; and "In Praise of Limestone," copyright 1951 by W. H. Auden and © renewed 1979 by The Estate of W. H. Auden; from COLLECTED POEMS by W. H. Auden, edited by Edward Mendelson. Used by permission of Random House, an imprint and division of Penguin Random House LLC. All rights reserved. "Spain 1937," copyright 1940 and copyright © renewed 1968 by W. H. Auden; from SELECTED POEMS OF W. H. AUDEN by W. H. Auden, edited by Edward Mendelson. Used by permission of Vintage Books, an imprint of the Knopf Doubleday Publishing Group, a division of Penguin Random House LLC and Curtis Brown, Ltd. All rights reserved.

J. G. Ballard: From THE DROWNED WORLD by J. G. Ballard. Copyright © 1962 by J.G. Ballard. Copyright renewed by J. G. Ballard. Introduction copyright © 2012 by Martin Amis. Used by permission of Liveright Publishing Company and HarperCollins Publishers Ltd.

Samuel Beckett: WAITING FOR GODOT. Copyright © 1952 by Les Éditions de Minuit. English text copyright © 1954 by Grove Press, Inc.; copyright © renewed 1982 by Samuel Beckett, now The Estate of Samuel Beckett. Used by permission of Grove/Atlantic, Inc., and Faber & Faber Limited. Any third-party use of this material, outside of the publication is prohibited.

Louise Bennett: "Jamaica Language" from AUNTY ROACHY SEH. "Dry-Foot Bwoy," "Jamaica Oman," "Colonization in Reverse" from SELECTED POEMS OF LOUISE BENNETT. Reprinted with permission of the Louise Bennett Coverley (LBC) Estate.

Caroline Bergvall: "The Franker Tale" from MEDDLE ENGLISH by Caroline Bergvall. Copyright © 2011 by Caroline Bergvall. Reprinted by permission of Nightboat Books.

Eavan Boland: "Fond Memory" from AN ORIGIN LIKE WATER: COLLECTED POEMS 1967–1987 by Eavan Boland. Copyright © 1987 by Eavan Boland. "The Lost Land" from THE LOST LAND by Eavan Boland. Copyright © 1998 by Eavan Boland. "The Dolls Museum in Dublin" from IN A TIME OF VIOLENCE by Eavan Boland. Copyright © 1994 by Eavan Boland. Reprinted by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc., and Carcanet Press Ltd.

Mary Borden: "Belgium" from THE FORBIDDEN ZONE by Mary Borden. Copyright © 1929 by Mary Borden. "The Song of the Mud" from The English Review, August 1917. Copyright © 1917 by Mary Borden. Reprinted by permission of Patrick Aylmer.

Elizabeth Bowen: "The Demon Lover" from THE DEMON LOVER AND OTHER STORIES by Elizabeth Bowen. Copyright © 1945, and 2019. Reproduced with permission of Curtis Brown Group Ltd., London, on behalf of the Literary Executors of the Estate of Elizabeth Bowen.

bpNichol: "First Screening: Computer Poems" by bpNichol. Copyright © 1984 by bpNichol. Reprinted by permission of Ellie Nichol.

Kamau Brathwaite: Extract from HISTORY OF THE VOICE by Kamau Brathwaite, published by New Beacon Books in 1994. Reprinted with the permission of the publisher. "On Sycorax Video Style" from CONVERSATIONS WITH NATHANIEL MACKEY by Kamau Brathwaite. Copyright © 1999 by the Estate of Kamau Brathwaite. Reprinted by permission of We Press. "Letter Sycorax" by Kamau Brathwaite, from MIDDLE PASSAGES. Copyright © 1993 by Kamau Brathwaite. Reprinted by permission of New Directions Publishing Corp.

May Wedderburn Cannan: "Rouen" from IN WAR TIME, POEMS. Reprinted by permission of James Cannan Slater.

Vahni Capildeo: From "The Book of Dreams/ Livre de Cauchemars, VI" from MEASURES OF EXPATRIATION by Vahni Capildeo. Copyright © 2016 by Vahni Capildeo. Reprinted by permission of Carcanet Press Limited.

Anne Carson: From "The Glass Essay" from GLASS, IRONY, AND GOD by Anne Carson. Copyright © 1995 by Anne Carson. Reprinted by permission of New Directions Publishing Corp. and The Random House Group Limited.

Caryl Churchill: TOP GIRLS. Copyright © 1982 by Caryl Churchill. Published by Methuen Drama, an imprint of Bloomsbury Publishing Plc. Reprinted by permission of the publisher.

J. M. Coetzee: Excerpt from WAITING FOR THE BARBARIANS: A Novel by J. M. Coetzee. Copyright © 1980 by J. M. Coetzee. Used by permission of Penguin Books, an imprint of Penguin Publishing Group, a division of Penguin Random House LLC, The Random House Group Ltd and David Higham Associates. All rights reserved.

Rachel Cusk: Excerpt from TRANSIT by Rachel Cusk. Copyright © 2016 by Rachel Cusk. Reprinted by permission of Farrar, Straus and Giroux and Faber & Faber Ltd. All rights reserved.

Kiran Desai: "The Sermon in the Guava Tree" adapted from HULLABALOO IN THE GUAVA ORCHARD, copyright © 1998 by Kiran Desai. Used by permission of Grove/Atlantic, Inc., and Faber & Faber Ltd. Any third-party use of this material, outside of this publication, is prohibited.

H.D. (Hilda Doolittle): "Oread" and "Sea Rose" from COLLECTED POEMS, 1912–1944. Copyright © 1914 by Hilda Doolittle. Reprinted by permission of New Direction Publishing Corp. and Carcanet Press Limited.

Carol Ann Duffy: "Warming Her Pearls" is taken from SELLING MANHATTAN by Carol Ann Duffy, published by Anvil Press Poetry in 1987. Copyright © Carol Ann Duffy. "Medusa" and "Mrs. Lazarus" from THE WORLD'S WIFE by Carol Ann Duffy. Published by Picador. Copyright © 1999 by Carol Ann Duffy. Excerpt from The Christmas Truce by Carol Ann Duffy. Published by Picador. Copyright © 2011 by Carol Ann Duffy. Reproduced by permission of the author c/o Rogers, Coleridge & White Ltd., 20 Powis Mews, London W11 1JN.

T. S. Eliot: "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock," "Sweeney among the Nightingales," and The Waste Land from COLLECTED POEMS 1909–1962 by T. S. Eliot. Reprinted by permission of Faber & Faber Limited. "Little Gidding," "The Hollow Men" and "Journey of the Magi" from COMPLETE POEMS AND PLAYS by T. S. Eliot. Copyright © 1950, 1943, 1939, 1930 by T. S. Eliot. Copyright © 1952, 1936, 1935 by Harcourt Brace & Company. Copyright renewed 1964, 1963, 1958 by T. S. Eliot. Copyright renewed 1980, 1978, 1971, 1967 by Esme Valerie Eliot. Used by permission of HarperCollins Publishers, and Faber & Faber Limited. "Metaphysical Poets" from SELECTED ESSAYS by T. S. Eliot, copyright © 1950 by Harcourt, Inc., and renewed 1978 by Esme Valerie Eliot. Reprinted by permission Faber & Faber Limited. "Tradition and the Individual Talent" from SELECTED ESSAYS by T. S. Eliot. Reprinted by permission of Faber & Faber Limited.

Bernardine Evaristo: "Amos Amas Amat" from THE EMPEROR'S BABE by Bernardine Evaristo. Copyright © 2002 by Bernardine Evaristo. Used by permission of Viking Books, an imprint of Penguin Publishing Group, a division of Penguin Random House LLC, and Penguin Random House UK.

E. M. Forster: "The Machine Stops" from The Oxford and Cambridge Review (1909) THE ETERNAL MOMENT (Sidgwick & Jackson, 1928) by E. M. Forster. Copyright © 1909 by the Provost and Scholars of King's College, Cambridge, and The Society of Authors as the Literary Representatives of the Estate of E. M. Forster. Used by permission of The Society of Authors.

Amitav Ghosh: From THE GREAT DERANGEMENT: CLIMATE CHANGE AND THE UNTHINKABLE by Amitav Ghosh. Copyright © 2016. Reprinted by permission of The University of Chicago Press. All rights reserved.

Robert Graves: From GOODBYE TO ALL THAT. Reprinted by permission of Carcanet Press Ltd. "Recalling War" from COMPLETE POEMS IN ONE VOLUME. Reprinted by permission Carcanet Press Ltd.

Thom Gunn: "Black Jackets," "My Sad Captains," "From the Wave," "The Missing," and "Still Life" from COLLECTED POEMS by Thom Gunn. Copyright © 1994 by Thom Gunn. Reprinted by permission of Farrar, Straus and Giroux, Inc., and Faber & Faber Limited. All rights reserved.

Ivor Gurney: "To His Love" and "The Silent One" from COLLECTED POEMS OF IVOR GURNEY. Reprinted by permission of Carcanet Press Ltd.

Thomas Hardy: "He Never Expected Much" reprinted with the permission of Scribner, a Division of Simon & Schuster and Palgrave Macmillan London, from THE COMPLETE POEMS OF THOMAS HARDY, edited by James Gibson. Copyright © 1978 by Macmillan London Ltd. All rights reserved.

Bessie Head: "Looking for a Rain God" from THE COLLECTOR OF TREASURES AND OTHER BOTSWANA VILLAGE TALES by Bessie Head. Copyright © 1977. Reissued 2014. Reprinted by permission of Waveland Press, Inc., and Johnson & Alcock Ltd. All rights reserved.

Seamus Heaney: "Casualty," "Clearances," "Digging," "Punishment," "Station Island XII" and "The Grauballe Man" from OPEN GROUND: SELECTED POEMS 1966–1996 by Seamus Heaney. Copyright © 1998 by Seamus Heaney. "Anything Can Happen" and "Hofn" from DISTRICT AND CIRCLE by Seamus Heaney. Copyright © 2006 by Seamus Heaney. All reprinted by permission of Farrar, Straus and Giroux, LLC, and Faber & Faber Limited. All rights reserved.

Geoffrey Hill: "In Memory of Jane Fraser," "September Song" and "Requiem for the Plantagenet Kings" from NEW AND COLLECTED POEMS by Geoffrey Hill. Copyright © 1994 by Geoffrey Hill. Used by permission of HarperCollins Publishers and Oxford University Press Limited through PLSclear. "Broken Hierarchies" from A TREATISE OF CIVIL POWER by Geoffrey Hill. Copyright © 2008 by Geoffrey Hill. Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press Limited through PLSclear. All rights reserved.

Ted Hughes: "Wind," "Pike," "Out," "Theology," "Crows Tyrannosaurus" and "Crow's Last Stand" from COLLECTED POEMS by Ted Hughes. Copyright © 2003 by The Estate of Ted Hughes.

Reprinted by permission of Farrar, Straus and Giroux LLC and Faber & Faber Limited.

Kazuo Ishiguro: "A Village After Dark" by Kazuo Ishiguro.

Published by The New Yorker Magazine, May 21, 2001. Copyright © 2001 by Kazuo Ishiguro. Reproduced by permission of the author c/o Rogers, Coleridge & White Ltd., 20 Powis Mews, London W11 1JN.

David Jones: Excerpts from IN PARENTHESIS by David Jones.

Copyright © 1981 by David Jones. Reprinted by permission of Faber & Faber Ltd.

Linton Kwesi Johnson: "Inglan is a Bitch" from MI REVALUESHANY FREN. Copyright © 2006 by Linton Kwesi Johnson. Reprinted with the permission of The Permissions Company, Inc. on behalf of Copper Canyon Press, www.coppercanyonpress.org, and the author.

Hanif Kureishi: "My Son the Fanatic" from LOVE IN A BLUE TIME by Hanif Kureishi. Copyright © 1997 Hanif Kureishi. First published in The New Yorker, and subsequently in NEW WRITING 4 (ed. A. S. Byatt and Allan Hollinghurst). Reprinted by permission Scribner, a division of Simon & Schuster, Inc., and The Wylie Agency LLC.

Philip Larkin: "Church Going" from THE LESS DECEIVED.

"MCMXIV," "Talking in Bed," "High Windows," "Going, Going," "Sad Steps," "The Explosion," "Homage to a Government," "This Be The Verse," and "Aubade" from COLLECTED POEMS OF PHILIP LARKIN, edited by Archie Burnett. Copyright © 2012 by the Estate of Philip Larkin. All reprinted by permission of Farrar, Straus and Giroux LLC, and Faber & Faber Limited. All rights reserved.

D. H. Lawrence: "Why the Novel Matters" from PHOENIX: THE POSTHUMOUS PAPERS OF D. H. LAWRENCE by D. H. Lawrence, edited by Edward McDonald. Copyright © 1936 by Frieda Lawrence, renewed © 1964 by the Estate of the late Frieda Lawrence Ravagli. Used by permission of Viking Books, an imprint of Penguin

Publishing Group, a division of Penguin Random House LLC. "Love on the Farm" and "How Beastly the Bourgeois Is" from THE COMPLETE POEMS OF D. H. LAWRENCE by D. H. Lawrence, edited by Vivian de Sola Pinto and F. Warren Roberts. Copyright © 1964, 1971 by Angelo Ravagli and C. M. Weekley, Executors of the Estate of Frieda Lawrence Ravagli. Used by permission of Viking Books, an imprint of Penguin Publishing Group, a division of Penguin Random House LLC. All rights reserved.

Doris Lessing: "To Room Nineteen" from A MAN AND TWO WOMEN. Copyright © 1963, 1988 by Doris Lessing. Reprinted by kind permission of Jonathan Clowes Ltd., London, on behalf of Doris Lessing.

Mina Loy: "Feminist Manifesto," and I, III, XIV, and XXVI from "Songs of Joannes" from THE LOST LUNAR BAEDEKER by Mina Loy. Works of Mina Loy copyright © 1996 by The Estate of Mina Loy. Introduction and edition copyright © 1996 by Roger L. Conover. Reprinted by permission of Carcanet Press Limited.

Robert Macfarlane: From UNDERLAND: A DEEP TIME JOURNEY by Robert Macfarlane. Copyright © 2019 by Robert Macfarlane. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company and David Higham Associates. All rights reserved.

Hilary Mantel: "Sorry to Disturb" from the book THE ASSASSINATION OF MARGARET THATCHER by Hilary Mantel. Copyright © 2014 by Hilary Mantel. Reprinted by permission of Henry Holt and Company, and the 4th Estate, HarperCollins Publishers Ltd. All rights reserved.

Una Marson: "Nigger" and "The Strangers" from SELECTED POEMS by Una Marson. Copyright © 2011 by Una Marson. Reprinted by permission of Peepal Tree Press.

Claude McKay: "Jelly Roll" from BANJO by Claude McKay. Copyright © 1929 by Harper & Brothers. Copyright © renewed 1959 by Hope

McKay Virtue. Used by permission of HarperCollins Publishers.

David Mitchell: "The Right Sort" by David Mitchell from Twitter. Copyright © 2014 by David Mitchell. Reproduced with the permission of Curtis Brown Group Ltd on behalf of David Mitchell.

Paul Muldoon: "Anseo," "From 7, Middagh Street," "Meeting the British" and "Milkweed and Monarch" from POEMS: 1968–1998 by Paul Muldoon. Copyright © 2001 by Paul Muldoon. "Turtles" from HORSE LATITUDES by Paul Muldoon. Copyright © 2006 by Paul Muldoon. "The Loaf" from MOY SAND AND GRAVEL by Paul Muldoon. Copyright © 2002 by Paul Muldoon. Reprinted by permission of Farrar, Straus and Giroux LLC and Faber & Faber Limited. All rights reserved.

Alice Munro: "Walker Brothers Cowboy" from DANCE OF THE HAPPY SHADES by Alice Munro published by Vintage. Copyright © 1968 by Alice Munro. Reprinted by permission of The Random House Group Limited and the William Morris Endeavor Entertainment LLC, on behalf of the Author. All rights reserved.

Les Murray: "Morse" from THE RABBITER'S BOUNTY: COLLECTED POEMS by Les Murray. Copyright © 1992 by Les Murray. Reprinted by permission of Caranet Press Ltd, Les Murray, c/o Margaret Connolly & Associates, and Farrar, Straus & Giroux LLC. "Corniche" from LEARNING HUMAN by Les Murray. Copyright © 1998 by Les Murray. Reprinted by permission of Farrar, Straus & Giroux LLC and Les Murray, c/o Margaret Connolly & Associates. "Kitchen Grammars" from THE BIPLANE HOUSES by Les Murray. Copyright © 2006 by Les Murray. Reprinted by permission of Caranet Press Ltd. and Farrar, Straus & Giroux, LLC. All rights reserved.

Daljit Nagra: "A Black History of the English-Speaking Peoples" from TIPPOO SULTAN'S INCREDIBLE WHITE-MAN-EATING TIGER TOY-MACHINE!!! By Daljit Nagra. Copyright © 2011 by Daljit Nagra. Reprinted by permission of Faber and Faber Limited.

V. S. Naipaul: "One Out of Many" from IN A FREE STATE by V. S. Copyright © 1971 by V. S. Naipaul. Used by permission of Alfred A. Knopf, an imprint of the Knopf Doubleday Publishing Group, a division of Penguin Random House LLC, Vintage Canada/Alfred A. Knopf Canada, a division of Penguin Random House Canada Limited, and The Wylie Agency LLC. All rights reserved.

Ngũgĩ wa Thiong'o: From "The Language of African Literature" in Ngũgĩ wa Thiong'o, DECOLONISING THE MIND: THE POLITICS OF LANGUAGE IN AFRICAN LITERATURE. James Currey, London and Heinemann, Portsmouth (NH), 1986. Reprinted by permission of Ngũgĩ wa Thiong'o and the Watkins/Loomis Agency.

Grace Nichols: "Epilogue" from I IS A LONG MARRIED WOMAN by Grace Nichols. All rights reserved, copyright © 1983 Grace Nichols. Reproduced with permission of Curtis Brown Group Limited, London on behalf of Grace Nichols. "The Fat Black Woman Goes Shopping" from THE FAT BLACK WOMAN'S POEMS by Grace Nichols. Copyright © 1984 by Grace Nichols. Reprinted by permission of Virago, an imprint of Little, Brown Book Group Limited through PLSclear. "Wherever I Hang" from LAZY THOUGHTS OF A LAZY WOMAN AND OTHER POEMS by Grace Nichols. Copyright © 1989 by Grace Nichols. Reproduced with permission of Curtis Brown Group Limited, London on behalf of Grace Nichols.

Ben Okri: "What the Tapster Saw" from STARS OF THE NEW CURFEW by Ben Okri, Penguin Random House, 1989. Copyright © 1989 by Ben Okri. Reproduced by permission of Ben Okri c/o Georgina Capel Associates Ltd., 29 Wardour Street, London, W1D 6PS.

George Orwell: "Politics and the English Language" and "Shooting an Elephant" from A COLLECTION OF ESSAYS by George Orwell. Copyright © 1946 by George Orwell. Copyright © 1953, 1952, 1949, 1946 by Sonia Brownell Orwell. Copyright renewed 1981 by Mrs. George K. Perutz, Mrs. Miriam Gross, Dr. Michael Dickson, Executors of the Estate of Sonia Brownell Orwell. Used by permission of HarperCollins Publishers.

Wilfred Owen: Ca. 800 words from WILFRED OWEN: COLLECTED LETTERS, edited by Harold Owen and John Bell (1967). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press through PLSclear. "Miners" by Wilfred Owen, from THE COLLECTED POEMS OF WILFRED OWEN. Copyright © 1963 by Chatto & Windus Ltd. Reprinted by permission of New Directions Publishing Corp.

Craig Santos Perez: "Thirteen Way of Looking at a Glacier" from HABITAT THRESHOLD by Craig Santos Perez. Copyright © 2020 by Craig Santos Perez. Reprinted by permission of the author.

Pascale Petit: "Rainforest in the Sleep Room" from MAMA AMAZONIA by Pascale Petite. Copyright © 2017 by Pascale Petite. Reprinted by permission of the publisher Bloodaxe Books.

NourbeSe Philip: "Discourse on the Logic of Language" from SHE TRIES HER TONGUE, HER SILENCE SOFTLY BREAKS by NourbeSe Philip. Copyright © 1989 by NourbeSe Philip. Reprinted with permission of the author.

Caryl Phillips: "Growing Pains" from COLOR ME ENGLISH: REFLECTIONS ON MIGRATION AND BELONGING by Caryl Phillips. Copyright © 2011 Caryl Phillips. Reprinted by permission of The Gernert Company, Inc., and The New Press. www.thenewpress.com. "Out of Africa: Chinua Achebe" by Caryl Phillips, from The Guardian, February 22, 2003. Reprinted by permission of Guardian News & Media Limited.

Ezra Pound: "In a Station of the Metro" from PERSONAE. Copyright © 1926 by Ezra Pound. Reprinted by permission of Faber & Faber Limited and New Directions Publishing Corp. "A Retrospect: A Few Don'ts" by Ezra Pound from LITERARY ESSAYS OF EZRA POUND. Copyright © 1935 by Ezra Pound. Reprinted by permission of New Directions Publishing Corp.

A. K. Ramanujan: "Self-Portrait," and "Elements of Composition" from THE COLLECTED POEMS OF A. K. RAMANUJAN. Copyright © 1995 by Oxford University Press. Reproduced by permission of Oxford University Press India, New Delhi.

Peter Reading: "Clockwise (from the bottom)" from VENDANGE TARDIVE by Peter Reading. Copyright © 2010 by Peter Reading. Reprinted by the publisher Bloodaxe Books. All rights reserved.

Henry Reed: "Naming of Parts" from HENRY REED: COLLECTED POEMS, edited by Jon Stallworthy (1991). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press Limited through PLSclear.

Jean Rhys: "The Day They Burned the Books," from TIGERS ARE BETTER-LOOKING: WITH A SELECTION FROM THE LEFT BANK by Jean Rhys (first published by Andre Deutsch 1968, Penguin Books 1972). "The Day They Burned the Books" (first published in The London Magazine). Copyright © Jean Rhys, 1960. Reprinted by permission of Penguin Books Ltd. "On Not Shooting Sitting Birds" from SLEEP IT OFF, LADY by Jean Rhys. Copyright © 1976 by Jean Rhys, and JEAN RHYS: THE COLLECTED STORIES, published by W. W. Norton & Company. Used by permission of Ellen Moerman on behalf of The Rhys Estate.

Arundhati Roy: Excerpts from THE GOD OF SMALL THINGS by Arundhati Roy. Copyright © 1997 by Arundhati Roy. Used by permission of Random House, an imprint of Penguin Random House LLC, Vintage Canada/Random House Canada, a division of Penguin Random House Canada Limited, and HarperCollins Publishers Ltd. All rights reserved.

Salman Rushdie: "The Prophet's Hair" from EAST, WEST: STORIES by Salman Rushdie. Copyright © 1994 by Salman Rushdie. Reprinted by permission of Pantheon Books, an imprint of the Knopf Doubleday Publishing Group, a division of Penguin Random House LLC, The Wylie Agency and The Random House Group Ltd. "Commonwealth Literature' Does Not Exist," copyright © 1983 by Salman Rushdie, "Imaginary Homelands," copyright © 1982 by Salman Rushdie from IMAGINARY HOMELANDS: ESSAYS AND CRITICISM 1981–1991 by Salman Rushdie. Copyright © 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984, 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988, 1989, 1990, and 1991 by Salman Rushdie. Used by permission of Viking Books, an imprint of Penguin Publishing Group, a division of Penguin Random House LLC and The Wylie Agency LLC. All rights reserved.

Samuel Selvon: "Waiting for Aunty to Cough" from WAYS OF SUNLIGHT by Samuel Selvon. Copyright © 1957 by Samuel Selvon. Reprinted by permission of the Selvon Estate.

Siegfried Sassoon: "Battle" from MEMOIRS OF AN INFANTRY OFFICER: THE MEMOIRS OF GEORGE SHERSTON by Siegfried Sassoon. Copyright © 1930, renewed © 1958 by Siegfried Sassoon. Used by permission of Penguin Books, an imprint of Penguin Publishing Group, a division of Penguin Random House LLC and by kind permission of the Estate of George Sassoon. All rights reserved. "The General," "Glory of Women," "The Rear-Guard," and "On Passing the New Menin Gate," copyright © 1918 by E. P. Dutton, copyright renewed 1946 by Siegfried Sassoon. "They" and "Everyone Sang" from COLLECTED POEMS OF SIEGFRIED SASSOON by Siegfried Sassoon, copyright © 1918, 1920 by E. P. Dutton. Copyright © 1936, 1946, 1947, 1948 by Siegfried Sassoon. Used by the kind permission of the Estate of George Sassoon.

Robert Service: "Only a Boche" from RHYMES OF A RED CROSS MAN by Robert Service. Copyright © 1916 by Robert Service. Reprinted by permission of the Estate of Robert Service.

Edith Sitwell: "Still Falls the Rain" from COLLECTED POEMS by Edith Sitwell. Copyright © 1956 by Edith Sitwell. Reproduced by permission of PFD on behalf of the Estate of Edith Sitwell.

Ali Smith: Excerpt from HOW TO BE BOTH by Ali Smith. Copyright © 2015 by Ali Smith. Used by permission of Pantheon Books, an imprint of Knopf Doubleday Publishing Group, a division of Penguin Random House LLC, The Random House Group Limited, and Vintage Canada/Random House Canada, a division of Penguin Random House Canada Limited. All rights reserved.

Stevie Smith: "Sunt Leones," "Our Bog Is Dood," "Not Waving but Drowning," "Thoughts About the Person from Porlock," and "Pretty" from COLLECTED POEMS OF STEVIE SMITH. Copyright © 1972 by Stevie Smith. Copyright © 1963 by Chatto & Windus Ltd. Reprinted by permission of New Directions Publishing Corp. and Executors of the Estate of James MacGibbon by way of Faber and Faber Limited.

Zadie Smith: "The Embassy of Cambodia" by Zadie Smith. Published by Penguin Random House, 2013. Copyright © 2013 by Zadie Smith. Reproduced by permission of the author c/o Rogers, Coleridge & White Ltd., 20 Powis Mews, London W11 1JN.

Wole Soyinka: DEATH AND THE KING'S HORSEMAN by Wole Soyinka. Copyright © 1975, 2003 by Wole Soyinka. Used by permission of W. W. Norton & Company, Inc., and Melanie Jackson Agency LLC.

Dylan Thomas: "The Force That Through the Green Fuse Drives the Flower" and "The Hunchback in the Park" by Dylan Thomas. Copyright © 1939, 1943 by New Directions Publishing Corp. "Poem in October" and "Fern Hill" by Dylan Thomas. Copyright © 1945 by The Trustees for the Copyrights of Dylan Thomas, first published in POETRY. "Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night" by Dylan Thomas. Copyright © 1952 by Dylan Thomas. All from THE POEMS OF DYLAN THOMAS. Reprinted by permission of New Directions Publishing Corp. and David Higham Associates.

Derek Walcott: "A Far Cry from Africa" and "The Season of Phantasmal Peace" from THE POETRY OF DEREK WALCOTT 1948–

2013 by Derek Walcott, selected by Glyn Maxwell. Copyright © 2014 by Derek Walcott. Excerpts from Books One and Six of OMEROS by Derek Walcott. Copyright © 1990 by Derek Walcott. All reprinted by permission of Farrar, Straus & Giroux, Inc., and Faber and Faber Limited. Excerpt from "Adios, Carenage" from "The Schooner Flight" from THE STAR-APPLE KINGDOM by Derek Walcott. Copyright © 1979 by Derek Walcott. Reprinted by permission of Farrar, Straus & Giroux, Inc. All rights reserved.

Virginia Woolf: "Professions for Women" from THE DEATH OF THE MOTH AND OTHER ESSAYS by Virginia Woolf, copyright © 1942 by HarperCollins Publishers, and renewed 1970 by Marjorie T. Parsons, Executrix. "Shakespeare's Sister" from A ROOM OF ONE'S OWN by Virginia Woolf, copyright © 1929 by Harcourt, Inc. and renewed 1957 by Leonard Woolf. Foreword copyright © 1981 by Mary Gordon. Excerpts from THREE GUINEAS by Virginia Woolf, copyright © 1938 by Harcourt, Inc., and renewed 1966 by Leonard Woolf. Used by permission of the HarperCollins Publishers and The Society of Authors as the Literary Representative of the Estate of Virginia Woolf. All rights reserved.

W. B. Yeats: "A Dialogue of Self and Soul," "Crazy Jane Talks with the Bishop," and "Byzantium" reprinted with the permission of Scribner, a Division of Simon & Schuster, from THE COLLECTED WORKS OF W. B. YEATS, VOLUME I: THE POEMS, revised, edited by W. B. Yeats, edited by Richard J. Finneran. Copyright © 1933 by Macmillan Publishing Company; copyright renewed © 1961 by Bertha Georgie Yeats. "Man and the Echo," "Lapis Lazuli," "The Circus Animals' Desertion," and "Under Ben Bulbin" reprinted with the permission of Scribner, a Division of Simon & Schuster, from THE COLLECTED WORKS OF W. B. YEATS, VOLUME I: THE POEMS, revised, edited by W. B. Yeats, edited by Richard J. Finneran. Copyright © 1940 by Georgie Yeats; copyright renewed © 1968 by Bertha Georgie Yeats, Michael Butler Yeats, and Anne Yeats. From "A General Introduction to My Work," reprinted with the permission of Scribner, a Division of Simon & Schuster, Inc., from ESSAYS AND INTRODUCTIONS by W. B. Yeats. Copyright © 1961 by Mrs. W. B. Yeats. All rights reserved.

YOUNG-HAE CHANG HEAVY INDUSTRIES: “BUST DOWN THE DOOR!” and “TRAVELING TO UTOPIA: WITH A BRIEF HISTORY OF THE TECHNOLOGY” by YOUNG-HAE CHANG HEAVY INDUSTRIES. Copyright © 2000 and 2001 by YOUNG-HAE CHANG HEAVY INDUSTRIES. Reprinted by permission of YOUNG-HAE CHANGE HEAVY INDUSTRIES.

IMAGE CREDITS

Pp. 2–3: Merry-Go-Round, 1916. Mark Gertler. Tate, Purchased 1984. Photo: Tate; p. 7: Photo by Imperial War Museums via Getty Images; p. 8: INTERFOTO/Alamy Stock Photo; p. 9: Image: John Mitchell/Alamy Stock Photo, Courtesy James Hart of Haida Gwaii and the Douglas Reynolds Gallery, Vancouver, Canada; p. 10: Bettmann/Getty Images; p. 11: Bettmann/Getty Images; p. 14: Tim Ring/Alamy Stock Photo; p. 16: ASSOCIATED PRESS; p. 69: Chronicle/Alamy Stock Photo; p. 142 left: Print Collector/Hulton Archive/Getty Images; p. 142 right: Paul Popper/Popperfoto via Getty Images; p. 144: Glasshouse Images/Shutterstock; p. 163: British Library/Bridgeman Images; p. 171: British Library/Bridgeman Images; p. 190: Edward Wadsworth, Newcastle, © 2023 Artists Rights Society (ARS), New York. British Library Board. All Rights Reserved/Bridgeman Images; p. 204: Private Collection, The Stapleton Collection/©Wyndham Lewis Memorial Trust. All rights reserved 2023/Bridgeman Images; p. 217: Private Collection, Photo © Christie’s Images/Bridgeman Images; p. 411: KGPA Ltd/Alamy Stock Photo; p. 612: Roger Viollet/Getty Images; p. 695: Bettmann/Getty Images; p. 702: Museo Nacional Centro de Arte Reina Sofia, Madrid, Spain © 2023 Estate of Pablo Picasso/Artists Rights Society (ARS), New York/photo via Bridgeman Images; p. 713: World History Archive/Alamy Stock Photo; p. 714: © BBC Archive; p. 752: Keystone/Hulton Archive/Getty Images; p. 975: PA

Images/Alamy Stock Photo; p. 976: dpa picture alliance archive/Alamy Stock Photo; p. 1111 both: Reprinted by permission of the Estate of bpNichol; p. 1112: Reprinted by permission of the Estate of bpNichol; p. 1113 both: Reprinted by permission of the Estate of bpNichol; p. 1115 both: Reprinted by permission of YOUNG-HAE CHANG HEAVY INDUSTRIES; p. 1116 both: Reprinted by permission of YOUNG-HAE CHANG HEAVY INDUSTRIES; p. 1132 top: "Seven Short Stories About Drones" © Teju Cole, used by permission of The Wylie Agency LLC.; p. 1133 bottom: "Hafiz" by Teju Cole. © 2014 by Teju Cole, used by permission of The Wylie Agency LLC., and the following tweeters: p. 1133: Courtesy of George Szirtes; p. 1134: Courtesy of Chioma Ogwuegbu; p. 1134: Courtesy of Ayesha Siddiqi; p. 1134: Courtesy of Divya Sachar; p. 1134: Courtesy of Alan Lawn; p. 1134: Courtesy of Matt Pearce; p. 1134: Courtesy of Brittle Paper; p. 1145: Photo 12/Alamy Stock Photo.

COLOR INSERT CREDITS

C1: © 2023 Estate of Pablo Picasso/Artists Rights Society (ARS), New York, Digital Image © The Museum of Modern Art/Licensed by SCALA/Art Resource, NY; C2: top: © 2023 Artists Rights Society (ARS), New York/DACS, London, Photo © Stefano Baldini/© Estate of Vanessa Bell. All rights reserved/Bridgeman Images; C2: bottom: © The Trustees of the British Museum/Art Resource, NY; C3: Merry-Go-Round, 1916. Mark Gertler. Tate, Purchased 1984. Photo: Tate; C4: Tube Shelter Perspective, 1941. Henry Moore OM, CH. Tate, Presented by the War Artists Advisory Committee 1946. Photo: Tate; C5: © The Estate of Francis Bacon. All rights reserved/DACS, London/ARS, NY 2023. Image © The Museum of Modern Art/Licensed by SCALA/Art Resource, NY; C6: © The Lucian Freud Archive. All Rights Reserved 2023/Bridgeman Images; C7: © Yinka Shonibare CBE. All Rights Reserved, DACS/ARS, NY 2023. Photo via Dan Kitwood/Getty Images; C8: Zeytun Travel Images/Alamy Stock Photo.

Index

Index

Account of a New Comet, An, 60

Adonais, 850

A flower was offerd to me, 136

A green and silent spot, amid the hills, 750

Ah! Sun-flower, 136

Ah Sun-flower! weary of time, 136

Aikin, Anna Letitia, 41, 56, 295, 755

Aikin, John, 295

Alastor; or, The Spirit of Solitude, 763

Alfoxden Journal, The, 434

A little black thing among the snow, 133

All Religions Are One, 121

A map of every country known, 58

Amazing grace! (how sweet the sound), 535

America: A Prophecy, 161

And did those feet, 170

And did those feet in ancient time, 170

And has the remnant of my life, 449

An old, mad, blind, despised, and dying King, 801

As from their ancestral oak, 801

A shadow moving by one's side, 881

As I lay asleep in Italy, 790

A simple Child, 322

A slumber did my spirit seal, 352

A thing of beauty is a joy for ever, 948

Auld Lang Syne, 188

Austen, Jane, 579

Axe Laid to the Root, The, 555

Badger, The, 893

Barbault, Anna Letitia, 41, 56, 295, 755

Beachy Head, 84

Beattie, James, 923

Beckford, William, 926

Behold her, single in the field, 386

Belle Dame sans Merci: A Ballad, La, 964

Beneath an old wall, that went round an old castle, 107

Biographia Literaria, 313, 519

Black Hassan from the Haram flies, 935

Blake, William, 117

Bonny Barbara Allan, 35

Bright star, would I were stedfast as thou art, 963

Burke, Edmund, 194

Burns, Robert, 171

Byron, George Gordon, Lord, 630, 757, 934

By the Same, 79

Camp, The, 754

Can I see anothers woe, 159

Casabianca, 901

Castle of Otranto, The, 292

Caterpillar, The, 52

Cease, Wilberforce, to urge thy generous aim!, 45

Characters of Shakespeare's Plays, 604

Childe Harold's Pilgrimage: A Romaunt, 638

Chimney Sweeper, The (Songs of Experience), 133

Chimney Sweeper, The (Songs of Innocence), 127

Chorus from Hellas, 849

Christabel, 494

Christophe, Henri, 226

Clare, John, 880

Clarkson, Thomas, 535

Clerveaux, Augustin, 226

Clock a Clay, 897

Clod & the Pebble, The, 132

Cloud, The, 843

Cobbett, William, 552

Coleridge, Samuel Taylor, 310, 468, 750

Come, balmy Sleep! tired nature's soft resort!, 78

Come, sportive fancy! come with me, and trace, 110

Composed upon Westminster Bridge, September 3, 1802, 388

Confessions of an English Opium-Eater, 617

Constitution of the French Colony of St. Domingo, 223

Corinne at the Capitol, 902

Cowper, William, 540

Cruelty has a Human Heart, 141

Dæmon-lover, The, 39

Darkness, 636

Darwin, Erasmus, 65

Daughter of th' Italian heaven!, 902

Davy, Humphry, 69

Dear Harp of my Country! in darkness I found thee, 1062

Declaration of the Independence of the Blacks of St. Domingo, 226

Defence of Poetry, A, 866

Dejection: An Ode, 511

De Quincey, Thomas, 615

Derozio, Henry Louis Vivian, 1060

Dessalines, Jean-Jacques, 226

Detached Thoughts on Books and Reading, 570

Discharged Soldier, The, 746

Discourse Introductory to a Course of Lectures on Chemistry, A, 69

Discourse on the Love of Our Country, A, 191

Divine Image, The (Songs of Experience), 141

Divine Image, The (Songs of Innocence), 127

Don Juan, 690, 757

Down a broad river of the western wilds, 908

Earth, ocean, air, beloved brotherhood, 765

Earth has not any thing to show more fair, 388

Earth rais'd up her head, 131

Earth's Answer, 131

Ecchoing Green, The, 125

Edgeworth, Maria, 273

Edwards, Bryan, 215

Eighteen Hundred and Eleven, a Poem, 755

Elegiac Sonnets, 77

Endymion: A Poetic Romance, 947

England in 1819, 801

England's Dead, 899

Enquiry Concerning Political Justice and Its Influence on General Virtue and Happiness, 744

Eolian Harp, The, 471

Epitaph, 519

Equiano, Olaudah, 542

Ere on my bed my limbs I lay, 515

Essay on the Slavery and Commerce of the Human Species, 536

Eve of St. Agnes, The, 953

Expostulation and Reply, 330

Factory, The, 1043

Fairy of the Fountains, The, 1045

Faith's Review and Expectation (Amazing Grace), 535

Fall of Hyperion: A Dream, The, 993

Fame, like a wayward girl, will still be coy, 966

Fanatics have their dreams, wherewith they weave, 994

Fareweel to a' our Scottish fame, 185

Farewell, my lute!—and would that I, 1036

Fears in Solitude, 750

Felicia Hemans, 1057

Five years have past; five summers, with the length, 333

Floating Island, 448

Fly, The, 134

For auld lang syne, my jo, 188

Forced from Home and all its pleasures, 540

Freedom to the Slave, 1062

Friend of the wise! and teacher of the good!, 516

Frost at Midnight, 509

Garden of Love, The, 137

Gather her raven hair in one rich cluster, 941

Germ of new life, whose powers expanding slow, 48

Giaour: A Fragment of a Turkish Tale, The, 935

Gillray, James, 210

Godwin, William, 744

Goody Blake and Harry Gill, 316

Grasmere—A Fragment, 445

Grasmere Journals, The, 436

Green Grow the Rashes, 176

Hail to thee, blithe Spirit, 845

Hark—how the church-bells thundering harmony, 752

Harmonious Powers with Nature work, 448

Harp of India, The, 1061

Haunted Beach, The, 108

Ha! whare ye gaun, ye crowlin ferlie!, 174

Hazlitt, William, 603

Hear the voice of the Bard!, 130

He loved the brook's soft sound, 898

Hemans, Felicia Dorothea, 898

Herschel, Caroline, 60

Heyrick, Elizabeth, 559

Historical Account of the Black Empire of Hayti, An, 218

Historical Survey of the French Colony in the Island of Saint Domingo, An, 215

History of Mary Prince, A West Indian Slave, Related by Herself, The, 563

History of the Caliph Vathek, The, 926

Holy Thursday (Songs of Experience), 133

Holy Thursday (Songs of Innocence), 128

Holy Willie's Prayer, 177

Homes of England, The, 903

How felt he when he first was told, 1062

Human Abstract, The, 138

Hymn to Camdeo, 924

Hymn to Intellectual Beauty, 785

I Am, 895

I am—yet what I am, none cares or knows, 895

If, in the month of dark December, 634

If by dull rhymes our English must be chain'd, 968

If from the public way you turn your steps, 365

I found a ball of grass among the hay, 892

I had a dream, which was not all a dream, 636

I have no name, 129

I heard a thousand blended notes, 323

I lost the love of heaven above, 895

I loved Theotormon, 142

I love thee, mournful, sober-suited Night!, 79

I love to walk, 746

Image in Lava, The, 911

I met a traveller from an antique land, 786

Immediate, not Gradual Abolition, 559

Immolation of a Hindoo Widow, 941

Improvisatrice, The, 1036

Indian Woman's Death Song, 908

Infant Joy, 129

Infant Sorrow, 139

Inscription for an Ice-House, 49

Insects, 883

In St. Lucie's distant isle, 550

Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano, or Gustavus Vassa, the African, Written by Himself, The, 542

In the cowslip's peeps I lie, 897

In the sweet shire of Cardigan, 319

Inventory of the Furniture in Dr. Priestley's Study, An, 58

Invite to Eternity, An, 896

In Xanadu did Kubla Khan, 492

Irish Incognito, The, 273

Is there a solitary wretch who hies, 81

Is there for honest Poverty, 186

Is this a holy thing to see, 133

It is a beauteous evening, 388

It is a beauteous evening, calm and free, 388

It is an ancient Mariner, 475

I took the scroll: I could not brook, 1037

I travelled among unknown men, 352

It seems a day, 353

It was in and about the Martinmas time, 35

I wandered lonely as a cloud, 379

I wander thro' each charter'd street, 137

I was angry with my friend, 140

I weep for Adonais—he is dead!, 852

I went to the Garden of Love, 137

I would to heaven that I were so much clay, 691

Jaga-Naut, 929

January, 1795, 104

Jones, Sir William, 922, 924

Joy in the City of great Jaga-Naut!, 929

Just by the wooden bridge a bird flew up, 884

Keats, John, 942

Kubla Khan, 491

Lamb, Charles, 569

Lamb, The, 125

Lament of Swordy Well, The, 888

Lamia, 976

Landing of the Pilgrim Fathers in New England, The, 910

Landon, Letitia Elizabeth, 940, 1035

Last Man, The, 1022

Lay of the Last Minstrel, The, 452

Letters (Keats), 1006

Letters Written during a Short Residence in Sweden, Norway, and Denmark, 259

Lewis, Matthew Gregory, 304

Life, Death, and Eternity, 881

Lift not the painted veil which those who live, 789

Lines (Tintern Abbey), 333

Lines of Life, 1040

Lines Written in Early Spring, 323

Lines Written under a Picture of a Girl Burning a Love-Letter, 1037

Little Black Boy, The, 126

Little Fly, 134

Little Lamb, who made thee?, 125

London, 137

London, 1802, 390

London's Summer Morning, 106

Lord Randall, 34

Louverture, Toussaint, 222

Love and Friendship, 581

Love seeketh not Itself to please, 132

Love's Last Lesson, 1037

Loves of the Plants, The, 65

Lyrical Ballads, 315

Manfred, 656

Marriage of Heaven and Hell, The, 149

Mask of Anarchy, The, 790

Michael, 365

Milton! thou should'st be living at this hour, 390

Missionary: An Indian Tale, The, 932

Monarch of Gods and Dæmons, and all Spirits, 808

Monk, The, 304

Mont Blanc, 780

Montesquieu, Baron de (Charles-Louis Secondat), 920

More, Hannah, 549

Mortal Immortal, The, 1026

Motions and Means, on land and sea at war, 391

Mouse's Nest, 892

Mouse's Petition, The, 57

Much have I travell'd in the realms of gold, 945

Music, when soft voices die, 848

Mutability, 762

My country! in thy day of glory past, 1067

My heart aches, and a drowsy numbness pains, 969

My heart leaps up, 380

My heart leaps up when I behold, 380

My mother bore me in the southern wild, 126

My mother groand! my father wept, 139

My pensive Sara! thy soft cheek reclined, 471

My Pretty Rose Tree, 136

My spirit is too weak—mortality, 947

Mysteries of Udolpho, The, 302

Natural History of Selborne, The, 62

Negro's Complaint, The, 540

Newton, John, 534

Nightingale's Nest, The, 881

No, helpless thing, I cannot harm thee now, 52

No, no, go not to Lethe, neither twist, 973

No more, no more—O, never more returning, 1057

No serf has lighted yon Kiosk, 1064

Nuns fret not at their Convent's narrow room, 387

Nurse's Song (Songs of Experience), 133

Nurse's Song (Songs of Innocence), 128

Nutting, 353

O, my Luve is like a red, red rose, 187

Ode: from the Persian of Hafiz, 1063

Ode: Intimations of Immortality, 380

Ode on a Grecian Urn, 971

Ode on Indolence, 974

Ode on Melancholy, 973

Ode to a Nightingale, 969

Ode to Psyche, 966

Ode to the West Wind, 802

O for ten years, that I may overwhelm, 945

O Goddess! hear these tuneless numbers, wrung, 966

O golden-tongued Romance, with serene lute!, 951

Oh, thou! in Hellas deem'd of heavenly birth, 638

Oh hear a pensive prisoner's prayer, 57

Oh there is blessing in this gentle breeze, 393

Oh! what's the matter? what's the matter?, 316

Old China, 575

Old Man Travelling, 332

On Anothers Sorrow, 129

On Being Cautioned against Walking on an Headland Overlooking the Sea, Because It Was Frequented by a Lunatic, 81

One dream of passion and of beauty more!, 905

One morn before me were three figures seen, 974

On Fable and Romance, 923

On Fame, 966

On First Looking into Chapman's Homer, 945

On Going a Journey, 607

On Love, 787

On Seeing the Elgin Marbles, 947

On Sitting Down to Read King Lear Once Again, 951

On the Connexion of the Physical Sciences, 75

On the Pleasure Derived from Objects of Terror; with Sir Bertrand, a Fragment, 295

On the Poetry of the Eastern Nations, 922

On the Sonnet, 968

On This Day I Complete My Thirty-Sixth Year, 740

On thy stupendous summit, rock sublime!, 84

O Rose, thou art sick, 134

O soft embalmer of the still midnight, 966

O thou, wha in the heavens dost dwell, 177

Owenson, Sydney, 931

O what can ail thee, knight-at-arms, 964

O where ha'e ye been, Lord Randall my son?, 34

O where have you been, my long, long love, 39

O wild West Wind, thou breath of Autumn's being, 802

O World, O Life, O Time, 849

Ozymandias, 786

Paine, Thomas, 206

Pains of Sleep, The, 515

Pastoral Poesy, 885

Pavement slipp'ry, people sneezing, 104

Peaceful our valley, fair and green, 445

Peasant Poet, The, 898

Petitioners are full of prayers, 888

Piping down the valleys wild, 123

Pity would be no more, 138

Plan of a Novel, According to Hints from Various Quarters, 601

Poet of Nature, thou hast wept to know, 763

Poet's Garret, The, 110

Poison Tree, A, 140

Poor Singing Dame, The, 107

Preface to Lyrical Ballads, 338

Prefatory Sonnet [Nuns fret not], 387

Prelude, The (1805), 391

Press'd by the Moon, mute arbitress of tides, 80

Price, Richard, 191

Prince, Mary, 563

Prometheus Unbound, 804

Properzia Rossi, 905

Proud Maisie, 454

Proud Maisie is in the wood, 454

Radcliffe, Ann, 300

Rainsford, Marcus, 215

Rapt in the visionary theme!, 112

Red, Red Rose, A, 187

Redgauntlet, 455

Reflections on the Revolution in France, 194

Resolution and Independence, 375

Review of The Monk by Matthew Lewis, 310

Rights of Man, 206

Rights of Woman, The, 47

Rime of the Ancient Mariner, The, 475

Rintrah roars & shakes his fires in the burdend air, 150

Robert Bruce's March to Bannockburn, 185

Robinson, Mary, 103, 753

Romance of the Forest, The, 300

Ruined Cottage, The, 354

Ruins of Rajmahal, The, 1064

Savage of Aveyron, The, 113

Say, what's the rose without the smile, 1063

Scots, wha hae wi'Wallace bled, 185

Scott, Sir Walter, 450

Season of mists and mellow fruitfulness, 992

Sea View, The, 82

September 1st, 1802, 389

She dwelt among the untrodden ways, 350

Shelley, Mary Wollstonecraft, 201, 228, 1020

Shelley, Percy Bysshe, 759

She Walks in Beauty, 635

She walks in beauty, like the night, 635

Sick Rose, The, 134

Simon Lee, 319

Sir Patrick Spens, 38

Slave Trade, 553

Sleep and Poetry, 945

slumber did my spirit seal, A, 352

Small, viewless Aeronaut, that by the line, 81

Smith, Charlotte, 76

Smith, Eaglesfield, 549

So, we'll go no more a roving, 638

Solitary Reaper, The, 386

Somerville, Mary, 74

Song: For a' that and a' that, 186

Song of Liberty, A, 160

Songs of Experience, 130

Songs of Innocence, 123

Sonnet [Lift not the painted veil], 789

Sonnet to Sleep, 966

Son of the ocean isle!, 899

Sorrows of Yamba; or, the Negro Woman's Lamentation, The, 550

Southey, Robert, 752, 929

Spirit of the Laws, The, 920

Spirit's Return, A, 912

St. Agnes' Eve—Ah, bitter chill it was!, 953

Standing aloof in giant ignorance, 952

Stanzas Written in Dejection—December 1818, near Naples, 788

Steamboats, Viaducts, and Railways, 391

Still the loud death drum, thundering from afar, 755

Stop, Christian Passer-by!—Stop, child of God, 519

Strange fits of passion have I known, 349

Stranger, approach! within this iron door, 49

Such a Parcel of Rogues in a Nation, 185

Summer Evening's Meditation, A, 42

Surprised by joy, 390

Surprised by joy—impatient as the Wind, 390

Swallow, The, 82

Swiftly walk o'er the western wave, 847

Tables Turned, The, 331

Tam o' Shanter: A Tale, 179

Teach it me, if you can,—forgetfulness!, 1037

Tents, marquees, and baggage waggons, 754

The awful shadow of some unseen Power, 784

The badger grunting on his woodland track, 893

The boy stood on the burning deck, 901

The breaking waves dash'd high, 910

Thee, Queen of Shadows!—shall I still invoke, 80

The Eternal Female groand! it was heard over all the Earth, 160

The everlasting universe of things, 780

The frost performs its secret ministry, 509

The garlands fade that Spring so lately wove, 77

The gorse is yellow on the heath, 82

The king sits in Dumferline town, 38

The lamp must be replenish'd, but even then, 657

The little hedge-row birds, 332

The Muses are turned gossips; they have lost, 50

There is a Thorn—it looks so old, 324

There Is No Natural Religion, 122

There lived a wife at Usher's Well, 36

There was a roaring in the wind all night, 375

There was a time when meadow, grove, and stream, 382

There were three ravens sat on a tree, 37

These tiny loiterers on the barley's beard, 883

The shadowy daughter of Urthona stood before red Orc, 162

The stately Homes of England, 903

The Sun does arise, 125

The Sun is warm, the sky is clear, 788

The upland shepherd, as reclined he lies, 82

The way was long, the wind was cold, 452

The world is too much with us; late and soon, 390

The world's great age begins anew, 849

This Lime-Tree Bower My Prison, 473

This living hand, now warm and capable, 1005

Thomas Moore: Dear Harp of My Country, 1062

Thorn, The, 324

Thoughts on My Sick-Bed, 449

Thou still unravish'd bride of quietness, 971

Thou thing of years departed!, 911

Three Ravens, The, 37

Three years she grew, 351

Three years she grew in sun and shower, 351

Thy voice prevails—dear friend, my gentle friend!, 912

Tintern Abbey, 333

'Tis an accursed thing!—, 1043

'Tis past! The sultry tyrant of the south, 42

'Tis the middle of night by the castle clock, 494

'Tis time this heart should be unmoved, 740

To a Little Invisible Being Who Is Expected Soon to Become Visible, 48

To a Louse, 174

To a Mouse, 173

To a Sky-Lark, 845

To Autumn, 992

To Fancy, 80

To Homer, 952

[To India], 1067

To Mercy, Pity, Peace, and Love, 127

To— [Music, when soft voices die], 848

To Night (Smith), 79

To Night (Shelley), 847

To Sidmouth and Castlereagh, 801

To Sleep, 78

To the Insect of the Gossamer, 81

To the North Star, 78

To the Poet Coleridge, 112

To thy bright beams I turn my swimming eyes, 78

To Tirzah, 140

To Toussaint l'Ouverture, 389

Toussaint, the most unhappy Man of Men!, 389

To William Wordsworth, 516

To Wordsworth, 763

True poesy is not in words, 885

'Twas in the mazes of a wood, 113

'Twas on a Holy Thursday, their innocent faces clean, 128

'Twas summer and the sun was mounted high, 354

Tyger, The, 135

Tyger! Tyger! burning bright, 135

Upon a lonely desert Beach, 108

Upon a time, before the faery broods, 976

Up this green woodland ride let's softly rove, 881

Up! up! my Friend, and quit your books, 331

Victory, The, 752

Vindication of the Rights of Men, A, 201

Vindication of the Rights of Woman, A, 231

Vision, A, 895

Visions of the Daughters of Albion, 142

Walpole, Horace, 292

Wandering Willie's Tale, 455

Washing-Day, 80

We are as clouds that veil the midnight moon, 762

We Are Seven, 322

Wedderburn, Robert, 555

Wee, sleekit, cowrin, tim'rous beastie, 173

We had a fellow-Passenger who came, 389

Well, read my cheek, and watch my eye, 1040

Well, they are gone, and here must I remain, 473

Well! If the Bard was weather-wise, who made, 511

Whate'er is Born of Mortal Birth, 140

What potent God from Agra's orient bow'rs, 924

When chapmen billies leave the street, 179

When I have fears that I may cease to be, 952

When my mother died I was very young, 127

When the lamp is shattered, 866

When the voices of children are heard on the green (Songs of Experience), 133

When the voices of children are heard on the green (Songs of Innocence), 128

White, Gilbert, 62

Who has not wak'd to list the busy sounds, 106

Why, William, on that old grey stone, 330

Why did I laugh tonight? No voice will tell, 963

Why did she love her mother so?, 1045

Why hang'st thou lonely on yon withered bough?, 1061

Why should I wish to hold in this low sphere, 79

Wife of Usher's Well, The, 36

Wilt thou go with me, sweet maid, 896

Wollstonecraft, Mary, 201, 228, 1020

Wordsworth, Dorothy, 433

Wordsworth, William, 314, 746

world is too much with us, The, 390

Written after Swimming from Sestos to Abydos, 634

Written at the Close of Spring, 77

Written in the Church-Yard at Middleton in Sussex, 80

Yellowhammer's Nest, The, 884

Yes, injured Woman! rise, assert thy right!, 47

Index

Acton, William, 533

After Death, 636

Ah! changed and cold, how changed and very cold!, 636

A hundred, a thousand to one; even so, 653

Ah! why, because the dazzling sun, 459

All things I can endure, save one, 896

And lo! within the garden of my dream, 537

Andrea del Sarto, 437

Angel in the House, The, 515

Appeal in Behalf of the Native Females of British India, 538

Apple-Gathering, An, 639

Arnold, Matthew, 82, 560

A sea of foliage girds our garden round, 869

As Kingfishers Catch Fire, 723

As kingfishers catch fire, dragonflies draw flame, 723

A Sonnet is a moment's monument, 632

Aurora Leigh, 183

Ave atque Vale, 705

'Ave you 'eard o' the Widow at Windsor, 948

Awakening Conscience, The, 609

Ballade of an Omnibus, 900

Banner of England, not for a season, O banner of Britain, hast thou, 282

Besant, Walter, 531

Binsey Poplars, 726

Birthday, A, 638

Bishop Orders His Tomb at Saint Praxed's Church, The, 416

Blackstone, William, 518

"Blame not thyself too much," I said, "nor blame, 229

Bleak House, 325

Blessed Damozel, The, 617

Bradley, Katherine Harris, 731

Brant: A Memorial Ode, 915

Break, Break, Break, 221

British and Foreign School Society, 538

Brontë, Emily, 456

Browning, Elizabeth Barrett, 167

Browning, Robert, 407

Buchanan, Robert, 614

Buried Life, The, 564

But, knowing now that they would have her speak, 658

But do not let us quarrel any more, 437

Butler, Josephine, 529

Buttoo, 862

Cabuliwallah, The, 909

Caliban upon Setebos, 443

Canadian Born, 918

Carlyle, Thomas, 41, 86

Carrion Comfort, 728

Castaway, A, 674

Chamberlain, Joseph, 34

Charge of the Light Brigade, The, 280

Chew, Ada Nield, 317

"Childe Roland to the Dark Tower Came," 422

Children's Employment Commission, The, 314

Christmas Carol, A, 350

Circe, 670

Cloud-puffball, torn tufts, tossed pillows | flaunt forth, then chevy, 730

Cobden, Richard, 31

Cobwebs, 637

Cohen of Trinity, 902

Cold in the earth, and the deep snow piled above thee!, 458

Commentaries on the Laws of England, 518

Complete Indian Housekeeper and Cook, The, 65

Comrades, leave me here a little, while as yet 'tis early morn, 222

Conan Doyle, Sir Arthur, 871

Condition of the Working Class in England, The, 522, 545

Cooper, Edith Emma, 731

Corn Husker, The, 73

"Courage!" he said, and pointed toward the land, 213

Criminal Law Amendment Act, 536

Critic as Artist, The, 787

Crossing the Bar, 285

Cry of the Children, The, 169

Culture and Anarchy, 585

Curse for a Nation, A, 197

Danny Deever, 947

Darwin, Charles, 285, 543

Dead before Death, 636

Dead is he? Yes, our stranger guest said dead, 689

Dead! One of them shot by the sea in the east, 201

Defence of Guenevere, The, 658

Defence of Lucknow, The, 282

De Profundis, 841

Descent of Man, and Selection in Relation to Sex, The, 292

Dickens, Charles, 325, 346, 608

Does the road wind up-hill all the way?, 640

Douglas, Lord Alfred, 537

Dover Beach, 574

Do ye hear the children weeping, O my brothers, 169

Duns Scotus's Oxford, 726

Dutt, Toru, 856

Eastern Life, Present and Past, 540

Eliot, George, 480

Ellis, Sarah Stickney, 512

Engels, Friedrich, 522, 544

English in the West Indies, The, 53

Eros, 739

Famine Year, The, 79

Felix Randal, 727

Felix Randal the farrier, O is he dead then? my duty, 727

Few Words on Non-Intervention, A, 32

Field, Michael, 731

First Report of the Commissioners, Mines, 315

Fleshly School of Poetry, The, 614

Fra Lippo Lippi, 428

France 1870, 869

Froudacity, 55

Froude, James Anthony, 52

Functions and Disorders of the Reproductive System in Childhood, Youth, Adult Age, and Advanced Age, The, 533

Gandhi, Mohandas, 953

Gardiner, G. (Grace), 64

Gaskell, Elizabeth, 320

Gioconda, La, 733

girl, A, 736

Gitanjali, 908

Glory be to God for dappled things, 725

Go, for they call you, shepherd, from the hill, 568

Goblin Market, 641

God of our fathers, known of old, 949

God's Grandeur, 722

Great Social Evil, The, 524

Grow old along with me!, 450

Gr-r-r—there go, my heart's abhorrence!, 410

Half a league, half a league, 280

Hamilton, Janet, 85

Hard by the Indian lodges, where the bush, 73

Hardy, Thomas, 329

"Hark! Lakshman! Hark, again that cry!, 858

Harlot's House, The, 786

Here is Venus by our homes, 734

Hermaphroditus, 704

Hind Swaraj, 954

Hiram Powers' Greek Slave, 182

Historic, side-long, implicating eyes, 733

History of Mary Prince, A West Indian Slave, The, 40

Hobson, J. A., 37

“Ho! Master of the wondrous art!, 862

Homeless, 318

Hood, Thomas, 310

Hopkins, Gerard Manley, 720

House of Life, The, 632

How do I love thee? Let me count the ways, 174

How I Became a Socialist, 666

How They Brought the Good News from Ghent to Aix, 414

How Wars Are Got Up in India, 31

Hurrahing in Harvest, 725

Huxley, Leonard, 304

Hymn to Prosperine, 700

I am poor brother Lippo, by your leave!, 428

I caught this morning morning’s minion, king-, 724

If—, 952

If you can keep your head when all about you, 952

I have lived long enough, having seen one thing, that love hath an end, 700

I heard an angel speak last night, 197

I'm happiest when most away, 457

Imperialism: A Study, 37

Importance of Being Earnest, The, 797

Impression du Matin, 786

In an Artist's Studio, 638

I never said I loved you, John, 654

In Memoriam A. H. H., 231

In Progress, 655

In summer's mellow midnight, 457

In the dungeon crypts idly did I stray, 460

In this lone, open glade I lie, 566

I plucked pink blossoms from mine apple tree, 639

Isolation. To Marguerite, 562

I sprang to the stirrup, and Joris, and he, 414

I stand on the mark beside the shore, 175

I tell my secret? No indeed, not I, 639

It is a land with neither night nor day, 637

It is cold dark midnight, yet listen, 318

It little profits that an idle king, 217

It was deep April, and the morn, 737

I wake and feel the fell of dark, not day, 729

Jenny, 623

Johnson, E. Pauline (Tekahionwake), 73, 914

Jones, Ernest, 313

Journal of Researches, 543

Journeys to England and Ireland, 323

Juist noo there are mony wha rin to an' fro, 85

Kipling, Rudyard, 921

Lady, we would behold thee moving bright, 738

Lady of Shalott, The, 208

Lakshman, 858

Lazy laughing languid Jenny, 623

Letter to the Queen on Lord Chancellor Cranworth's Marriage and Divorce Bill, A, 520

Levy, Amy, 890

Life and Letters of Thomas Henry Huxley, The, 304

Life's Parallels, A, 656

Lifted Veil, The, 482

Lift up thy lips, turn round, look back for love, 704

Light flows our war of mocking words, and yet, 564

Like a huge Python, winding round and round, 857

Lilies, are you come!, 738

Lines Written in Kensington Gardens, 566

Literature and Science, 592

Little brown baby-bird, lapped in your nest, 918

Living Wage for Factory Girls at Crewe, 5 May 1894, A, 317

Locksley Hall, 222

London Labor and the London Poor, 332

Look at the stars! look, look up at the skies!, 723

Lotos-Eaters, The, 213

Love among the Ruins, 420

Love came to Flora asking for a flower, 870

Lullaby of the Iroquois, 918

Macaulay, Thomas Babington, 57

Magdalen, 896

Maids, not to you my mind doth change, 732

Man Who Would Be King, The, 923

Márgarét, áre you gríeving, 727

Mariana, 206

Martineau, Harriet, 540

Mary Barton, 320

Mayhew, Henry, 331

Medea in Athens, 689

Mill, John Stuart, 32, 41, 136

Minute on Indian Education, 58

Modern Painters, 465

Moodie, Susanna, 70

Morning and evening, 641

Morris, William, 656

Mother and Daughter, 695

Mother and Poet, 201

Mukharji, T. N., 66

My aspens dear, whose airy cages quelled, 726

My Diary in India, in the Year 1858–59, 61

My first thought was, he lied in every word, 422

My heart is like a singing bird, 638

My Last Duchess, 413

My Sister's Sleep, 621

Negro Question, The, 46

Nests in Elms, 738

Never on this side of the grave again, 656

Newbolt, Sir Henry John, 33

New Love, New Life, 901

Night-Wind, The, 457

No, helpless thing, I cannot harm thee now, 52

"No, Thank You, John," 654

No coward soul is mine, 462

Norton, Caroline, 520

Not, I'll not, carrion comfort, Despair, not feast on thee, 728

Not dead,—oh no,—she cannot die!, 869

Nothing is so beautiful as Spring, 724

No worst, there is none, 729

No worst, there is none. Pitched past pitch of grief, 729

Now Sleeps the Crimson Petal, 229

Now sleeps the crimson petal, now the white, 229

Occasional Discourse on the Negro Question, 41

O Eros of the mountains, of the earth, 739

Of Queens' Gardens, 517

Old Lamps for New Ones, 608

One face looks out from all his canvases, 638

On either side the river lie, 208

On Liberty, 145

On the Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection, 287

On the Study of Celtic Literature, 83

Our Casuarina Tree, 857

Past and Present, 97

Pater, Walter, 711

Patmore, Coventry, 515

Pen-Drawing of Leda, A, 733

Picture of Dorian Gray, The, Preface to, 796

Pied Beauty, 725

Poor little diary, with its simple thoughts, 674

Porphyria's Lover, 409

Preface to Poems (1853) (Arnold), 575

Pre-Raphaelite Manifesto, The, 613

Pre-Raphaelitism, 611

Prince, Mary, 40

Princess, The, 228

Prisoner. A Fragment, The, 460

Proclamation of an Irish Republic, 81

Procter, Adelaide A., 318

Promise me no promises, 655

Promises Like Pie-Crust, 655

Queen's Reign, The, 531

Rabbi Ben Ezra, 450

Recessional, 949

Remembrance, 458

Rhymes for the Time, 85

Rossetti, Christina, 634

Rossetti, Dante Gabriel, 616

Rossetti, William Michael, 613

Roughing It in the Bush; or, Life in Canada, 70

Round Tower at Jhansi—June 8, 1857, The, 653

Runaway Slave at Pilgrim's Point, The, 175

Ruskin, John, 326, 463, 517, 609

Russell, William Howard, 61

Say over again, and yet once over again, 174

Scholar Gypsy, The, 567

Schreiner, Olive, 76, 844

Seacole, Mary, 106

Shall I strew on thee rose or rue or laurel, 705

She, who so long has lain, 901

She fell asleep on Christmas Eve, 621

She sat and sang alway, 635

Signs of the Times, 88

Sleeping Venus, The, 734

Soliloquy of the spanish Cloister, 410

Some men to carriages aspire, 900

Song (She sat and sang always), 635

Song (When I am dead, my dearest), 635

Song My Paddle Sings, The, 916

Song of the Low, The, 313

Song of the Shirt, The, 311

Sonnet—Baugmaree, 869

Sonnets from the Portuguese, 174

Sonnet—The Lotus, 870

South Australia and Western Australia, 74

Speckled Band, The, 872

Speranza (Lady Jane Francesca Wilde), 79

Spring, 724

Spring and Fall, 727

Starlight Night, The, 723

Stars, 459

Steel, F. A. (Flora Annie), 64

Stevenson, Robert Louis, 739

Stones of Venice, The, 469

Storm-Cloud of the Nineteenth Century, The, 326

Stowe, Harriet Beecher, 50

Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, The, 741

Stray Thoughts on South Africa, 76, 845

Strong Race Opinion: On the Indian Girl in Modern Fiction, A, 919

Strong Son of God, immortal Love, 231

Studies in the History of the Renaissance, 712

Subjection of Women, The, 157

Summer ends now; now, barbarous in beauty, the stooks rise, 725

Sunset and evening star, 285

Swinburne, Algernon Charles, 699

Tagore, Rabindranath, 907

Take up the White Man's burden, 950

Tears, Idle Tears, 228

Tears, Idle tears, I know not what they mean, 228

Tekahionwake (E. Pauline Johnson), 73, 914

Tennyson, Lord Alfred, 204

Ten years ago it seemed impossible, 655

Tess of the d'Urbervilles, 329

Testimony Before the Royal Commission upon the Administration and Operation of the Contagious Diseases, 529

That Nature Is a Heraclitean Fire and of the Comfort of the Resurrection, 730

That's my last Duchess painted on the wall, 413

The artist is the creator of beautiful things, 796

The blessed damozel leaned out, 617

The curtains were half drawn, the floor was swept, 636

The first time that the sun rose on thine oath, 174

The love that breeds, 737

Then, land!—then, England! oh, the frosty cliffs, 183

The rain set early in tonight, 409

There's a breathless hush in the Close to-night—, 33

The rooks are cawing up and down the trees!, 738

The sea is calm tonight, 574

The sun drops luridly into the west, 670

The Thames nocturne of blue and gold, 786

The woman's cause is man's, 229

The woods decay, the woods decay and fall, 219

The world is charged with the grandeur of God, 722

They say Ideal Beauty cannot enter, 182

Thomas, John Jacob, 55

Thou art indeed just, Lord, 730

Thou art indeed just, Lord, if I contend, 730

Thou large-brained woman and large-hearted man, 173

Three sang of love together: one with lips, 637

Tiger-Lilies, 738

'Tis Leda lovely, wild and free, 733

Tithonus, 219

To Christina Rossetti, 738

To George Sand: A Desire, 173

To George Sand: A Recognition, 173

To Lallie, 899

To Marguerite—Continued, 563

Tocqueville, Alexis de, 323z

Towery city and branchy between towers, 726

Triad, A, 637

Trollope, Anthony, 73

True Conception of Empire, The, 34

True genius, but true woman! dost deny, 173

Two Loves, 537

Ulysses, 217

Unbosoming, 737

Uncle Tom's Cabin, 50

Up-Hill, 640

Up those Museum steps you came, 899

Vanity, saith the preacher, vanity!, 416

Visit to Europe, A, 66

VitaiLampada, 33

Weary men, what reap ye?—Golden corn for the stranger, 79

Webster, Augusta, 669

We caught the tread of dancing feet, 786

We first saw light in Canada, the land beloved of God, 918

We're low—we're low—we're very very low, 313

West wind blow from your prairie nest?, 916

We were apart; yet, day by day, 562

What, have I waked again? I never thought, 890

“What are the bugles blowin’ for?” said Files-on-Parade, 947

What Is Poetry?, 138

When I am dead, my dearest, 635

When I behold the skies aloft, 515

When our two souls stand up erect and strong, 174

Where the mind is without fear and the head is held high, 908

Where the quiet-colored end of evening smiles, 420

White Man’s Burden, The, 950

Widow at Windsor, 948

Wilde, Lady Jane Francesca (Speranza), 79

Wilde, Oscar, 784

‘Will sprawl, now that the heat of day is best, 443

Windhover, The, 724

Winter: My Secret, 639

With blackest moss the flower-plots, 206

With fingers weary and worn, 311

Woman and Labor, 850

Woman’s Rose, The, 848

Women of England: Their Social Duties and Domestic Habits, The, 513

Wonderful Adventures of Mrs. Seacole in Many Lands, The, 108

Xantippe: A Fragment, 890

Yes! in the sea of life enisled, 563

“Young Canada” with mighty force sweeps on, 915

Young laughters, and my music! Aye till now, 695

Index

About suffering they were never wrong, 677

'A cold coming we had of it, 520

A cubit-wide turtle acting the bin lid, 1078

Adam's Curse, 224

Adichie, Chimamanda Ngozi, 132, 1221

Adlestrop, 148

Agbabi, Patience, 1012, 1168

Ah, Are You Digging on My Grave?, 58

A king's invocations at the Globe Theatre, 758

Among School Children, 235

Among starving polar bears, 1017

Anand, Mulk Raj, 606

And were Yeats living at this hour, 1075

Anseo, 1073

Anthem for Doomed Youth, 167

Anything Can Happen, 973

Anything can happen. You know how Jupiter, 973

Apeneck Sweeney spreads his knees, 501

Apologia Pro Poemate Meo, 168

April is the cruellest month, breeding, 504

Araby, 413

Ark, 1022

Armitage, Simon, 1021, 1164

As he knelt by the grave of his mother and father, 1076

As if he had been poured, 963

As I Walked Out One Evening, 675

A snake came to my water-trough, 492

As the Team's Head Brass, 150

As the team's head brass flashed out on the turn, 150

A sudden blow: the great wings beating still, 233

A suspicion, a doubt, a jealousy, 1154

A touch of cold in the Autumn night, 202

Atwood, Margaret, 1023

Aubade, 793

Auden, W. H., 669

Autumn, 202

A wind is ruffling the tawny pelt, 802

Ballard, J. G., 976

Banjo: A Story without a Plot, 577

Beck, 1168

Beckett, Samuel, 611

Belgium, 151

Bennett, Louise, 719

Bent double, like old beggars under sacks, 170

Bergvall, Caroline, 1107

Between my finger and my thumb, 962

Black History of the English-Speaking Peoples, A, 758

Black Jackets, 798

Blast, 203

Boland, Eavan, 1052

Book of Dreams / Livre de Cauchemars, The, 1015

Borden, Mary, 151

Bowen, Elizabeth, 706

Brathwaite, Kamau, 725, 1093

Break of Day in the Trenches, 162

British Indian Writer and a Dream-England, The, 745

Broken Hierarchies, 828

Brooke, Rupert, 145

Burning, 813

Bust Down the Door!, 1115

Byzantium, 238

Cannan, May Wedderburn, 176

Capildeo, Vahni, 1015

Carson, Anne, 1067

Casualty, 965

Channel Firing, 55

Checking Out, 1222

Cherry Trees, The, 150

Christmas Eve in the trenches of France, 1156

Christmas Truce, The, 1154

Church Going, 786

Churchill, Caryl, 902

Circus Animals' Desertion, The, 245

Clay, 217

Clearances, 970

Clockwise (from the bottom), 1013

Coat, A, 225

Coetzee, J. M., 1037

Cole, Teju, 1132

Coleridge received the Person from Porlock, 588

Colonization in Reverse, 722

Composed as I am, like others, 795

Conrad, Joseph, 63

Convergence of the Twain, The, 56

Corniche, 959

Crazy Jane Talks with the Bishop, 239

Creation quaked voices, 814

Crow's Last Stand, 813

Crow Tyrannosaurus, 814

Cusk, Rachel, 1182

Danger of a Single Story, The, 132

Darkling Thrush, The, 53

Daughters of the Late Colonel, The, 542

Day They Burned the Books, The, 566

Dead, The, 422

Dead Man's Dump, 165

Dear mamma, 1096

Death and the King's Horseman, 853

Death by Landscape, 1024

Decolonising the Mind, 730

Demon Lover, The, 706

Desai, Kiran, 1192

Dialogue of Self and Soul, A, 237

Digging, 962

Disabled, 173

Discourse on the Logic of Language, 741

Doll's House, The, 1179

Dolls Museum in Dublin, The, 1053

Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night, 693

Down by the Salley Gardens, 220

Down by the salley gardens my love and I did meet, 220

Downhill I came, hungry, and yet not starved, 149

Drowned World, The, 977

Drummer Hodge, 53

Dry-Foot Bwoy, 721

Duffy, Carol Ann, 1152

Dulce Et Decorum Est, 170

During Wind and Rain, 61

Early morning over Rouen, hopeful, high, courageous morning, 177

Easter, 1916, 227

ECO2nomics, 1012

Elements of Composition, 795

Eliot, T. S., 495

Embassy of Cambodia, The, 1205

Emperor's Babe, The, 755

English, 741

English Astronaut, The, 1167

English Is an Indian Literary Language, 748

Entrance and exit wounds are silvered clean, 182

Epilogue, 750

Epitaph on an Army of Mercenaries, 141

Evaristo, Bernardine, 755

Everyone Sang, 157

Everyone suddenly burst out singing, 157

Explosion, The, 792

Far Cry from Africa, A, 802

Fascination of What's Difficult, The, 225

Fat Black Woman Goes Shopping, The, 750

Feminist Manifesto, 211

Fern Hill, 691

Few Don'ts by an Imagiste, A, 198

First Screening, 1111

Flint, F. S., 197

Following tweye two breathing crises, 1107

Fond Memory, 1052

Force That Through the Green Fuse Drives the Flower, The, 688

Forster, E. M., 252

For the dim regions whence my fathers came, 576

For whom the possessed sea littered, on both shores, 827

4 degrees Celsius up, 1013

Four Quartets, 521

Franker Tale (Deus Hic, 2), The, 1107

Freedom, 1183

From the Wave, 799

Futility, 173

Garden Party, The, 555

General, The, 156

Get me a pint of Southwark piss!, 1173

Ghosh, Amitav, 998

Give me a word, 1068

Glass Essay, The, 1068

Glory of Women, 157

God of Small Things, The, 995

Going, Going, 789

Goodbye to All That, 179

'Good-morning; good-morning!' the General said, 156

Grauballe Man, The, 963

Graves, Robert, 178

Great Derangement, The, 999

Groping along the tunnel, step by step, 156

Groping back to bed after a piss, 791

Growing Pains, 1160

Guernica, 701

Gunn, Thom, 797

Gurney, Ivor, 159

Hafiz, 1133

Hap, 52

Hardy, Thomas, 34

H.D., 201

Head, Bessie, 985

Heaney, Seamus, 960, 1011

Heart of Darkness, 67

He disappeared in the dead of winter, 677

He Never Expected Much, 62

He sat in a wheeled chair, waiting for dark, 173

He's gone, and all our plans, 160

He splashed down in rough seas off Spurn Point, 1167

He stood among a crowd at Drumahair, 222

He was found by the Bureau of Statistics to be, 680

He would drink by himself, 965

High Windows, 788

Hill, Geoffrey, 826

Höfn, 1016

Hollow Men, The, 517

Homage to a Government, 791

Horse Dealer's Daughter, The, 474

Horses, M62, 1166

Housman, A. E., 137

How Beastly the Bourgeois Is, 494

How much longer can I get away, 1036

How to Be Both, 1117

Hughes, Ted, 809

Hulme, T. E., 191, 201

Hunchback in the Park, The, 688

I, too, saw God through mud, 168

I can feel the tug, 964

If but some vengeful god would call to me, 52

If I should die, think only this of me, 145

If it form the one landscape that we the inconstant ones, 683

If We Must Die, 576

If we must die, let it not be like hogs, 576

I had grieved. I had wept for a night and a day, 1155

I have crossed an ocean, 750

I have heard that hysterical women say, 240

I have met them at close of day, 227

I have two daughters, 1054

I know that I shall meet my fate, 230

I leant upon a coppice gate, 53

I leave me people, me land, me home, 751

I made my song a coat, 225

Imagisme, 197

I met the Bishop on the road, 239

In a solitude of the sea, 56

In a Station of the Metro, 202

Inglan Is a Bitch, 753

In idle August, while the sea soft, 803

In Memory of Jane Fraser, 826

In Memory of W. B. Yeats, 677

In Parenthesis, 184

In Praise of Limestone, 683

In the silence that prolongs the span, 798

In Time of 'The Breaking of Nations,' 62

Introduction [A General Introduction for My Work], 246

I read about freak floods in Nepal, 1012

I resemble everyone, 795

Irish Airman Foresees His Death, An, 230

I shall not soon forget, 800

Ishiguro, Kazuo, 1135

I sit in one of the dives, 680

I sought a theme and sought for it in vain, 245

I thought it would last my time, 789

It is all one chase, 1168

It mounts at sea, a concave wall, 799

It seemed that out of battle I escaped, 172

It was a school where all the children wore darned worsted, 1052

It was my thirtieth year to heaven, 689

I've longin' in me dept's of heart dat I can conquer not, 575

I walk through the long schoolroom questioning, 235

I will arise and go now, and go to Innisfree, 221

I work all day, and get half-drunk at night, 793

I work all day and hardly drink at all, 959

Jamaica Language, 720

Jamaica Oman, 723

Jamaica oman cunny, sah!, 723

Johnson, Linton Kwesi, 753

Jones, David, 183

Journey of the Magi, 520

Joyce, James, 410

Just how it came to rest where it rested, 1164

Kiss, The, 1173

Kitchen Grammars, The, 959

Kureishi, Hanif, 1143

Lake Isle of Innisfree, The, 221

Lapis Lazuli, 240

Larkin, Philip, 785

Lawrence, D. H., 459

Lay your sleeping head, my love, 671

Leda and the Swan, 233

Lessing, Doris, 761

Lessons of the War, 705

Letter Sycorax, 1096

Let us go then, you and I, 498

Liar, The, 607

Like a convalescent, I took the hand, 968

Little Gidding, 521

Loaf, The, 1077

Long Live the Vortex!, 205

Look, stranger, at this island now, 671

Looking for a Rain God, 985

Lost Land, The, 1054

Louse Hunting, 164

Loveliest of Trees, 138

Loveliest of trees, the cherry now, 138

Love on the Farm, 490

Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock, The, 498

Loy, Mina, 210

Lullaby, 671

Macfarlane, Robert, 1004

Machine Stops, The, 253

Man. In a cleft that's christened Alt, 244

Man and the Echo, 244

Mansfield, Katherine, 541

Mantel, Hilary, 1078

Man Who Dreamed of Faeryland, The, 222

Mark on the Wall, The, 278

Marson, Una, 716

McKay, Claude, 572

MCMXIV, 787

Medusa, 1154

Meeting the British, 1074

Memoirs of an Infantry Officer, 158

Metaphysical Poets, The, 534

Midnight Woman to the Bobby, A, 574

Midwinter spring is its own season, 521

Milkweed and Monarch, 1076

Miners, 169

Missing, The, 801

Miss July Grows Older, 1036

Mitchell, David, 1126

Modern Fiction, 283

Morse, 958

Move him into the sun, 173

Mrs. Dalloway, 288

Mrs Lazarus, 1154

Muldoon, Paul, 1072

Munro, Alice, 815

Murray, Les, 957

Musée des Beaux Arts, 677

My father sat in his chair recovering, 811

My name is Mrs Alice Ebi Bafa, 1175

My Sad Captains, 799

My Son the Fanatic, 1145

My Soul. I summon to the winding ancient stair, 237

Nagra, Daljit, 758

Naipaul, V. S., 829

Nation Language, 725

Neutral Tones, 52

Next to my own skin, her pearls. My mistress, 1153

Next year we are to bring the soldiers home, 791

Ngũgĩ wa Thiong'o, 730

Nichol, bp, 1110

Nichols, Grace, 750

Nigger, 716

No, the serpent did not, 813

Nobody heard him, the dead man, 587

No palm me up, you dutty brute, 574

No Second Troy, 225

Not a red rose or a satin heart, 1154

Not Waving but Drowning, 587

Now as I was young and easy under the apple boughs, 691

Now as I watch the progress of the plague, 801

Nudes—stark and glistening, 164

Odour of Chrysanthemums, 461

Okri, Ben, 988

Old England, 575

'O 'Melia, my dear, this does everything crown!, 54

Omeros, 806

Once I am sure there's nothing going on, 786

Once more the storm is howling, and half hid, 231

One by one they appear in, 799

One Out of Many, 830

Only a Boche, 146

Only a man harrowing clods, 62

On Not Shooting Sitting Birds, 570

On Passing the New Menin Gate, 157

On Sycorax Video Style, 1094

On the day of the explosion, 792

On the Western Circuit, 36

On This Island, 671

Oread, 202

Orwell, George, 590

Our Bog Is Dood, 586

Our Bog is dood, our Bog is dood, 586

Out, 811

Outcast, 576

Out of Africa, 128

Owen, Wilfred, 167

Owen's Letters to His Mother, 174

Owl, The, 149

Perez, Craig Santos, 1017

Petit, Pascale, 1019

Petition, 670

Philip, M. Nourbese, 740

Phillips, Caryl, 128, 1159

Piano, 491

Picasso, Pablo, 701

Pike, 810

Pike, three inches long, perfect, 810

Poem in October, 689

Politics and the English Language, 596

Pound, Ezra, 197, 201

Prayer for My Daughter, A, 231

Preface to The Nigger of the "Narcissus," 65

Pretty, 589

Professions for Women, 406

Prologue (Grime Mix), 1172

Prologue (Word), 1169

Prophet's Hair, The, 1062

Punishment, 964

Rain, 149

Rain, midnight rain, nothing but the wild rain, 149

Rainforest in the Sleep Room, 1020

Ramanujan, A. K., 795

Reading, Peter, 1013

Rear-Guard, The, 156

Recalling War, 182

Reed, Henry, 704

Requiem for the Plantagenet Kings, 827

Returning, We Hear the Larks, 164

Rhys, Jean, 565

Right Sort, The, 1127

Romanticism and Classicism, 192

Room of One's Own, A, 398

Rose, harsh rose, 203

Rosenberg, Isaac, 161

Rose of the World, The, 220

Rouen, 177

Roy, Arundhati, 995

Ruined Maid, The, 54

Rushdie, Salman, 744, 1055

Sad Steps, 791

Sailing to Byzantium, 234

Sassoon, Siegfried, 154

Schooner Flight, The, 803

Sea Rose, 203

Season of Phantasmal Peace, The, 805

Second Coming, The, 230

Self-Portrait, 795

Selvon, Samuel, 735

September 1913, 226

September 1, 1939, 680

September Song, 827

Sermon in the Guava Tree, The, 1194

Service, Robert, 146

7, Middagh Street, 1075

Seven Short Stories about Drones, 1132

She looked over his shoulder, 685

She taught me what her uncle once taught her, 970

Shield of Achilles, The, 685

Shooting an Elephant, 591

Shopping in London winter, 750

Silent One, The, 161

Sir, no man's enemy, forgiving all, 670

Sitwell, Edith, 703

Smith, Ali, 1117

Smith, Stevie, 584

Smith, Zadie, 1203

Snake, 492

Softly, in the dusk, a woman is singing to me, 491

Soldier, The, 145

Sombre the night is, 164

Song of the Mud, The, 153

Songs to Joannes, 214

Sorrow of Love, The, 221

Sorry to Disturb, 1080

Soyinka, Wole, 852

Spain, 672

Spawn of Fantasies, 214

Sprung from a field, 1166

Station Island, 968

Still Falls the Rain, 703

Still Life, 800

Stolen Child, The, 218

Strange Meeting, 172

Stranger, The, 716

Sunt Leones, 585

Swear by what the Sages spoke, 241

Sweeney among the Nightingales, 501

Talking in Bed, 788

Talking in bed ought to be easiest, 788

Terence, This Is Stupid Stuff, 140

That is no country for old men. The young, 234

That night your great guns, unawares, 55

The apparition of these faces in the crowd, 202

The Bishop tells us: 'When the boys come back, 155

The brawling of a sparrow in the eaves, 221

The cherry trees bend over and are shedding, 150

The darkness crumbles away, 162

The highway goes through, 1020

The lions who ate the Christians on the sands of the arena, 585

Then all the nations of birds lifted together, 805

Theology, 813

The plunging limbers over the shattered track, 165

There was a whispering in my hearth, 169

These, in the day when heaven was falling, 141

The three-tongued glacier has begun to melt, 1011

The time you won your town the race, 139

The trees are in their autumn beauty, 229

The unpurged images of day recede, 238

The verb in a Sanscrit or Farsi, 959

The wounds are terrible. The paint is old, 1053

'They', 155

They called me "Nigger," 716

They fuck you up, your mum and dad, 793

They sent out a dove: it wobbled home, 1022

They sing their dearest songs, 61

They throw in Drummer Hodge, to rest, 53

Thirteen Ways of Looking at a Glacier, 1017

This Be The Verse, 793

This house has been far out at sea all night, 810

This is the song of the mud, 153

Thomas, Dylan, 687

Thomas, Edward, 148

Those long uneven lines, 189

Thoughts About the Person from Porlock, 588

Three Guineas, 696

To an Athlete Dying Young, 139

Today we have naming of parts. Yesterday, 705

To His Love, 160

Top Girls, 904

To Room Nineteen, 762

Tradition and the Individual Talent, 528

Tuckett. Bill Tuckett. Telegraph operator, Hall's Creek, 958

Turning and turning in the widening gyre, 230

Turtles, 1078

Tyre, The, 1164

Ulysses, 450

Under Ben Bulbin, 241

Underland, 1005

Under the Waterfall, 59

Undesirable you may have been, untouchable, 827

Unknown Citizen, The, 680

Valentine, 1154

Village after Dark, A, 1136

Voice, The, 60

Waiting for Aunty to Cough, 735

Waiting for Godot, 613

Waiting for the Barbarians, 1039

Walcott, Derek, 801

Walk, The, 60

Walker Brothers Cowboy, 816

Warming Her Pearls, 1153

Waste Land, The, 503

We are the hollow men, 517

We brought him in from between the lines: we'd better have let him lie, 146

Welcome to my house, this stately home, 1179

Well, World, you have kept faith with me, 62

Well there are many ways of being held prisoner, 1068

We met the British in the dead of winter, 1074

wen mi jus come to Landan toun, 753

We sat together at one summer's end, 224

We stood by a pond that winter day, 52

What a joyful news, Miss Mattie, 722

What Do Women Like Bes'? (The Wife of Bath's Tale), 1175

What large, dark hands are those at the window, 490

What need you, being come to sense, 226

What passing-bells for these who die as cattle, 167

What the Tapster Saw, 989

Wha wrong wid Mary dry-foot bwoy?, 721

`Whenever I plunge my arm, like this, 59

When I put my finger to the hole they've cut for a dimmer switch, 1077

When I see a couple of kids, 788

When I Was One-and- Twenty, 138

When my April showers me with kisses, 1172

When snow like sheep lay in the fold, 826

When the Master was calling the roll, 1073

When to depict rain—heavy rain—it stands, 828

When You Are Old, 222

When you are old and grey and full of sleep, 222

Where dips the rocky highland, 218

Wherever I Hang, 751

Whirl up, sea, 202

Who died on the wires, and hung there, one of two, 161

Who do you love? Who do you love, 755

Who dreamed that beauty passes like a dream?, 220

Who Goes with Fergus?, 222

Who will go drive with Fergus now, 222

Who will remember, passing through this Gate, 157

Why is the word pretty so underrated?, 289

Why should I blame her that she filled my days, 225

Why the Novel Matters, 485

Wild Swans at Coole, The, 229

Wind, 810

Woman much missed, how you call to me, call to me, 60

Woolf, Virginia, 276, 696

Yeats, William Butler, 215

Yes, I remember Adlestrop, 148

Yesterday all the past. The language of size, 672

You did not walk with me, 60

You liked talking to people like me, 718

You love us when we're heroes, home on leave, 157

Young-Hae Chang Heavy Industries, 1114